My party has traditionally recognised the importance of fostering values of individual responsibility and self-determination in our fellow countrymen. I speak as the son of someone who came to this country from abroad—my mother was a refugee twice by the age of 15 and came here from central Europe. Many people come from nations where authority flows from a heavily centralised state. All too little reliance seems to be placed in those countries on the freedom of individuals to live their lives free from the demands of officialdom. A culture of freedom underpins our mature democracy which should not be undermined except in times of extreme national emergency, such as during a fully fledged world war, and I do not believe that the war on terrorism is such a time.

As the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) said, we all have birth certificates, driving licences and national insurance numbers, and an array of other information on each of us is held on debit, credit and store cards. The hon. Gentleman may well then ask what the objection is to another means of identification. In practical terms, however, any obligatory ID scheme is likely to take many years to establish and will cost the taxpayer an ongoing fortune both to implement and administer. In view of that expense, the very notion that ID cards could be introduced as a merely temporary measure is likely to receive short shrift from this or any Government.

In any case, experience tells us that the argument for restrictions on freedom being short term tends to disappear rapidly with the passing of time. I spent all too many days in Committee discussing what was then the Licensing Bill, and many of us will recall that a lot of our archaic restrictions on alcohol licensing were introduced as temporary measures during world war one. Even the commercial deregulation of the last decade or so has left some of those antiquated rules fairly intact.

In the feverish and security-conscious atmosphere that has inevitably been with us since 11 September 2001, the long-standing importance that we in this country attach to individual freedom from state intervention appears to have been swept away. It is therefore incumbent on the Government, and particularly on the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary, to explain precisely how any new laws will protect us from the existing terrorist threat.

Let us not forget that this country has for many centuries been a safe and popular haven for migrants, precisely because of the knowledge that there is a reliance on the traditional values associated with freedom of the individual and the rule of law. The events of 11 September 2001 changed the general outlook of countless thousands, but if the rest of us really believe that those appalling outrages changed the whole world beyond recognition, we are tacitly accepting that the terrorists and terrorism itself have won.

Some serious practical considerations suggest that ID cards are likely to be ineffective in preventing terrorism. However expensive the technology that we use, an increasingly sophisticated network of international terrorists will find it possible, perhaps even easy, to forge or simply steal an identity. Next, we shall have to employ a vast army of public officials to administer and police the entire scheme. Short of there being almost continuous surveillance, those citizens, including, presumably, any would-be terrorists not wishing to co-operate in such a scheme, could go to ground with impunity.

Many civil libertarians have argued that the police will use the excuse of compulsory ID cards to target foreigners and demand their co-operation, which will make them feel even more alienated. To be honest, my fear is that the opposite will happen, especially in central London. I believe that the Metropolitan police, especially in the aftermath of the Stephen Lawrence campaign, will find that the culture of political correctness will make it less rather than more likely that a policeman will stop a prospective terrorist from an ethnic background and demand to see his ID card.

The Criminal Justice Bill, which is working its way through the Lords—I am sure that the Minister hopes that it will conclude its passage in the next fortnight—contains provisions to end the double jeopardy rule for murder. In addition to compulsory ID cards, we are promised a series of measures that aim to curtail the legal right of some criminal suspects. The important thing to remember with such new laws is that when the state adopts draconian powers against strangers today, it tends to use them against one's friends tomorrow and oneself the day after.

In times of national crisis, it is easy to dismiss a highbrow, and perhaps slightly academic, defence of the rule of law. The hon. Member for Ceredigion made such a defence earlier this afternoon, and I hope that I have made a similar defence of civil liberties. At such times, the Government inevitably face great difficulties, and I would not like to be in the Minister's shoes when trying to present a policy that will keep the citizens of this country happy and secure, but it is precisely during these times that the rights of the individual must be defended with the utmost vigour.

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West): I apologise if I struggle a little today. I am getting used to wearing glasses, which is part of the ageing process, and I will probably look in the wrong direction.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I help the hon. Gentleman? It gets worse as one gets older. I note that several hon. Members rose at the same time as the hon. Gentleman. We can accommodate them all if they are brief, but we must remember that it is a matter for the Member who secured the debate to obtain a reply from the Minister.

Mr. Salter: Thank you for those wise words, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall try to be as brief as possible.

I speak as an instinctive libertarian—a child of the '60s—but as someone who has reached the conclusion that ID cards are not only inevitable but fundamentally desirable. In the Home Secretary's introduction to the White Paper, which I am sure hon. Members have read carefully, he says:

"There are strongly held views on all sides of the debate on identity or entitlement cards. Although many people have settled views on the principle of whether or not they favour them, I think it is important to rehearse all the pros and cons of a scheme even if this is seen as going over old ground."

I now have a settled view, as do my constituents. I responded to the Home Secretary's encouragement for us to consult widely on the White Paper in our constituencies. If it will warm the cockles of the Minister's heart, I am more than happy to read out the results that I obtained from the consultation in my constituency. People had to take the trouble of returning a reply-paid form. I am sure that the process was not scientific, but the results are interesting.

Three questions were asked. The first asked people whether they agreed or disagreed that:

"ID Cards are an abuse of human rights; and invasion of privacy and their introduction should be opposed."

Some 4 per cent. agreed; 89 per cent. disagreed. The second said:

"In this age of computers and credit cards, big business and other organizations already hold a huge amount of personal information and ID cards would not reduce a citizens right to privacy."

Some 88 per cent. agreed; 6 per cent. disagreed.

The third question was the inevitable one asked in any pub or club, or at the many doors on which many of us spend our Sundays knocking. It stated:

"Only people with something to hide have anything to fear from ID Cards."

Unsurprisingly, 95 per cent. were in favour; 3 per cent. disagreed. So my constituents have a settled view on ID cards.

I am also attracted to the notion of entitlement cards, although I would go much further. I was chairman of the leisure committee on Reading borough council and, as such, the politician who introduced the first entitlement card in Reading since 1952. We had a real problem with people from outside our borough using leisure facilities that were paid for by the council tax payers of Reading, so I introduced a passport-to-leisure system. People had to prove that they were council tax payers in Reading to qualify for preferential bookings and discount schemes. Some 40,000 people registered for the scheme. There was no customer resistance at all.

Mr. Gerrard: My hon. Friend has just quoted an interesting statistic. What checks were carried out to determine how many of the 40,000 were fake?

Mr. Salter: Nineteen eighty-six was a long time ago. I am certainly aware that proof of residence was required. Of course, there was a much more serious point, about which I am sure that my hon. Friend would agree, which was that it was particularly demeaning for unemployed people to have to turn up in front of a lot of other people with their UB40s to get a free swim. The advantage of a card system was that it gave people a sense of dignity and hid the fact that they were unemployed from public view. There were many aspects of the approach that my hon. Friend could agree with.

The history of ID cards in this country is chequered. They were introduced in the National Registration Act 1915, when there was a requirement for people aged between 15 and 65 to hold a card. They were reintroduced in 1939 and functioned much as a "producer" does now; a person did not have to carry documents, but if they were caught without documents by a police officer they had to produce them within 48 hours.

The cards continued into the post-war period. They were a requirement to qualify for ration books. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick) describes himself as a Bevanite—I assume that he means Aneurin Bevan—and, interestingly, it was Aneurin Bevan who famously said in 1947 that the ID card had become "almost a popular document". There are probably those who still regret that the requirement for ID cards came to an end in 1952.

One of the more bizarre points made by the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) was about ID cards heralding a repressive regime, rivalled only by that of Saddam Hussein. I understand that Sweden is one of the most progressive states in Europe, and it is about to introduce compulsory ID cards. Identity cards exist in one form or another in 11 EU states. None of those states has a tremendous history of repression. Cards are compulsory in Spain, Greece, Germany and Belgium. Interestingly, in nine of the 11 EU states with identity cards, the cost is nominal.

David Winnick rose—

Mr. Gerrard rose—

Mr. Salter: I give way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Which hon. Member is the hon. Gentleman giving way to?

Mr. Salter: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I only saw my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North.

David Winnick: I am aware that my hon. Friend was not around at the time of the decision to abolish ID cards in 1952, but am I to take it from his comments that he thinks it was wrong?

Mr. Salter: No, not at all. I only said that some would regret their passing. However, life has moved on.

Mr. Gerrard: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Salter: No; I will make headway if I can.

Five benefits would immediately flow from the proper introduction of ID cards. There has been much talk about the fact that our asylum and immigration system and our borders are not as secure as one would like; nor is the system as valid as one would want. My area is not known for intensive farming, but only the other week my local paper reported that a double-decker bus had crashed, and about 40 people were seen scampering into the fields. The police arrested 17 Polish nationals, all of whom had been working in this country for a year without any documentation. That leads to the conclusion that 23 have disappeared into the system; they are presumably illegally working elsewhere and probably being appallingly exploited by unscrupulous employers.

We know that a huge amount of fraud goes on. The consultation documents suggest a sum of £1.3 billion per annum for ID fraud. We know that we have pitiful outward border controls. An exchange that took place in the Home Affairs Committee led to The Times reporting on 22 October:

"The Home Office has deported only one of 63 Chinese nationals found working illegally in the summer".

"Figures given to the committee show that of the 63 Chinese nationals found in the raids, four were failed asylum-seekers who should not have been in the country, 16 were asylum applicants, who are banned from working, and 10 had committed other immigration offences and should not have been working."

There is an extensive, illegal black economy in operation even in relatively prosperous parts of our nation. The introduction of ID cards would be a useful control mechanism, not just against people who should no longer be in this country, but against those who seek to exploit the misery of asylum and refugee status.

Brian White: Does my hon. Friend accept that if ID cards were introduced, the organised criminals who bring such people in would provide them with fake ID?

Mr. Salter: I shall touch on that point shortly.

I do not want to dwell on health tourism, but we undoubtedly have failings and weak flanks in our NHS controls. I would like to touch on a far more friendly matter, and that is convenience. I am not a great man for carrying a huge amount of plastic, but I have just emptied the contents of my wallet and I see 16 different cards. First and most important is my Labour party membership card, followed by my trade union cards. Also, even in Liberal Democrat-controlled authorities one needs an ID card to get into the council offices. I would be interested to see what the Liberal Democrats make of that. We then go from the important, with a blood donor card, to the Caravan Club, an organisation that I commend to hon. Members. I envisage, in my lifetime, that an awful lot of the plastic that we carry will be rolled up, using the advantages of new technology, into one or two simple cards. That would be a lot easier for us all. I understand from the White Paper that some 137 million plastic cards are in circulation in one form or another.

I have categorised the objections to the proposals. Some people object on the grounds of civil liberties. I respect that view. However, with the amount of information that corporate Britain holds on us as citizens, for every time we use a credit card or a debit card, I wonder what is wrong with a democratically elected progressive state holding a portion of that information.

Mr. Paice: Can I confirm that the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that an ID card will contain all the information that he has arrayed in front of him on all those cards? Does he believe the membership of those different clubs and organisations, his entitlement to enter Reading borough council offices and the rest will all be on that card? I do not see where his argument will take us, if not there.

Mr. Salter: I can envisage a time in my life when it will be convenient to amalgamate some of the information that we now carry on a lot of separate cards. I do not envisage that, in my lifetime, the Caravan Club, the National Trust or Johnson's dry-cleaning will appear on a national ID card.

I understand some of the objections to the introduction of an ID card scheme on the grounds of cost. However, we should weigh that against the cost of an asylum system that does not work, a benefits system that is subject to fraud and an ID system that is at least questionable.

The last objection to ID cards is that they could be forged. However, a lot of things could be forged. If we decide not introduce a system of ID cards because of potential forgery—and biometric technology makes that increasingly unlikely—why do we bother with driving licences, passports and all other documentation? Of course people will try to find a way around the system. On balance, if ID cards help the police and Customs, reassure the public and make us feel more secure, that is a price worth paying.

Far more significant than that, however, is that the real threats to the country arise from issues such as social cohesion, race relations, the rise of far-right, racist and fascist groupings and organised crime, particularly gun crime, which I have seen in the past few days on the streets of my constituency, and its connection to hard drugs, the smuggling of drugs and people, and prostitution. Those are the real threats to our civil liberties. If an ID card can deal with 5 or 10 per cent. of those threats it is a price worth paying.

2.53 pm

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow): As I said in Home Office questions, I think that I am one of the few people who still has an ID card. I was issued with one 10 days after I was born in 1942, and I still have it. It has little rubber stamps on it, from when it was inspected.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If it is any compensation, I think that there are probably three of us here.

Mr. Gerrard: Right. One of the difficulties in debating an ID card system is that we need to know what we are actually discussing, because the consultation paper opened up a range of options. In his response to that consultation paper, the Information Commissioner stated:

"I face a real difficulty in knowing what the scheme that is being proposed really amounts to"

because of the diverse range of options that have been proposed, and because the consultation paper asked for more suggestions. The Information Commissioner was saying, "I've got a real problem here knowing what I should be responding to," and that, before the Government go any further, they should produce something more focused and clear.

It is obvious from the debate so far that everyone assumes that the main purpose of ID cards is to deal with problems such as fraud, illegal working, and illegal immigration. Terrorism has been mentioned, but I do not think that the Government consultation paper suggested that ID cards could be used to address terrorism.

Three questions should be asked, all of which have been raised in the debate. Would ID cards work? Even if they were to work, would they be the best way to deal with the problems mentioned? Would they be acceptable? People may have issues with showing the cards. As my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick) said, there is a different culture in this country about how to respond to the police when asked to produce papers than in those European countries in which such practices have been common for some time.

Another issue that has been discussed is that of illegal working. It is a criminal offence for an employer to employ someone whom they know is not entitled to work, but that does not stop them from doing it. For example, my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter), mentioned an incident involving a busload of people going to work illegally. I do not believe that their employer did not know that they were working illegally. Of course he knew. If an employer is prepared to break the law by not bothering to check whether someone can produce a piece of paper that states that he is entitled to work, would that employer ask to see an ID card? Of course he would not. Those employers who avoid making checks are the same type of people who are involved in large-scale fraudulent employment of illegal workers. I doubt whether ID cards would make any difference.

If we want to catch the employers who are illegally employing people, we should look at tax returns, VAT returns and national insurance claims. One can bet one's life that they will not be making those returns properly. I have mentioned that before in debates on this issue. We should remember that Al Capone went to jail for tax evasion. There is more than one way of getting at those who are involved in illegal employment.

As the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) pointed out, benefit fraud is more often about the misrepresentation of circumstances than the misrepresentation of identity. The police do not usually have a problem identifying who someone is. They have much more of a problem finding the evidence to tie them to the crime.

My main point is about how the system would be established. Without a national database, an ID card system would be doomed to failure. It would be a gift to fraudsters if ID cards were to become the ultimate proof of identity, as they might, and we did not have secure systems from the start. We know that systems such as those used by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency and the UK Passport Service are not secure. There are plenty of fake driving licences around. In the past month, I have dealt with three cases in which people were using fake driving licences in my constituents' names. That is probably happening across the country, because DVLA and passport records were not designed to establish identity. If we build on those databases, we will construct a system that is full of flaws from day one.

If we were to opt for biometrics based on those systems, we would still have a problem. Even if I produce a card with my iris data or my finger prints, it proves only that I am the person whose personal data is on the card. It does not prove that I am who I say I am. It cannot do that unless we start with a secure database, but that has enormous cost and time implications, and it would affect how such a system was constructed and therefore how acceptable people would find it. Card readers would need to be connected to the database in hospitals, benefit offices and so on—an immense infrastructure would be needed.

Finally, I come to acceptability. I have heard many times before the argument that we are all used to carrying bits of plastic, but that is not so. For instance, only 50 per cent. of the population has a credit card. Even now, many people do not carry plastic. Those who are least likely to do so are to be found in the most deprived and marginalised communities, and they will become targets if they do not have ID cards.

I am not convinced that those who say, "I have nothing to fear. I wouldn't mind. I carry plastic anyway," would feel the same if they were stopped in the street or on arrival at hospital and asked, "Where is your ID card?" They would say, "Why me? Why are you questioning me? I have nothing to hide. I am innocent. I am a respectable person." People would not take it kindly.

[Mr. Gerrard]

I return to the Information Commissioner's response, which is worth listening to. He said:

"I am concerned that although there may be plausible arguments made for the introduction of an entitlement card scheme in the short term there is the potential for function creep as administrative and political priorities change or even just to maximise the use of a costly infrastructure."

In other words, as I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West, there is not much doubt that if a scheme were introduced that, on paper, was voluntary, it would be compulsory within 10 years and people would be asked to carry their cards with them wherever they went. Whatever the Government may say—I do not disbelieve them—it does not bind future Governments. That is one of the greatest dangers.

Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I thought that the hon. Member was intervening. I am sorry, but it is time to start the winding-up speeches. I call the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten).

3.2 pm

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This has been an excellent debate. I am genuinely disappointed that we cannot hear from the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White). I am almost tempted to support the idea of ID legislation being mentioned in the Queen's Speech so that we can continue the debate and go on to defeat the measure. The arguments put forward today have been compelling.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) on introducing the subject. His arguments about a written constitution were excellent, and I entirely agree about the difficulties of previous attempts to administer such changes, particularly the chaos that we had with passports a couple of years ago. I, too, was in the ridiculous and embarrassing situation of having my bank manager ask for my passport for identification, despite the fact that we have known each other since I was 18—that was 20 years ago. The hon. Gentleman mentioned some excellent examples.

I agreed entirely with the hon. Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick), who said that if he were convinced that the system would significantly help to deal with terrorism, he would be prepared to set aside some of his concerns. That is exactly where I come from, but neither of us is convinced. His example on Northern Ireland was a point well made.

The hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) and I share common ground on the libertarian issue. I enjoyed his remarks about the need for a balance between the state and the individual, which were very well made. His arguments about the impact on terrorism carried even more weight, given his constituency.

I was disappointed in the hon. Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter). As a child of the '60s, he is normally quite liberal. I can put his viewpoint down only to the fact that his eyesight is failing. Now that he has glasses, he might be able to look again at some of the issues. I congratulate him on having his shirts and suits dry-cleaned for the rest of the year, given the number of plugs that he has given to Johnson's dry-cleaning.

Finally, the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) was right to talk about cultural differences. I welcome the fact that the relationship between the police and an individual in this country differs from the culture of fear that one sees in other parts of the world. His points about illegal working were spot on. If the argument for ID cards relies on an undercurrent feeling that things operate better elsewhere and that having an ID card will suddenly achieve that for us, it is nonsense.

I shall be brief, because we all want to hear from the Minister and the Conservative party. I have shifted my view. I was one of the rare Liberal Democrats who thought that it might be possible to make a case for ID cards along the lines of "What have you got to hide?". However, I have looked, listened and learned, and I have changed my view. I have concluded that we need to understand why the Government would want to introduce them. What is the purpose? Is it security, immigration or entitlement? I conclude that the reason is none of those, but that a focus group or some opinion polling has suggested that such a policy might sound tough and macho. The Government have not set out a genuine reason for it.

Let us consider some of the arguments. First, we have heard about the 9–11 terrorists—cards did not stop terrorism. One can almost gain a false sense of security by assuming that having a card in place can tackle terrorism. We have also heard arguments about the difficulties with rip-offs. The points have been well made.

On the issue of criminals and benefit fraud, surely the main problem for the police is not identifying the criminals, but catching them in the first place. If we were to spend the amount of money on identity issues that is being mentioned, we could start by giving the police a lot more technology with which to do their current job—fingerprint identification and such issues would be a good starting point and might make more practical difference than the introduction of ID cards. My understanding about benefit fraud is that the main problem is not the question of identity but that of individuals who misrepresent what they are claiming the money for.

Brian White: The hon. Gentleman mentions the fingerprint project. Does that not highlight the difficulties, in that if we wished to introduce one, its scale would be such that, given the history of projects to do with national fingerprinting that still have not been rolled out fully, the time that it would take to introduce a computer system would cause problems?

Mr. Oaten: We agree on that. According to the latest figures, there are only 176 automated fingerprint identification systems in the country. What hope have we of getting an ID card set up and running?

On cost, moving towards a nanny state system and then charging people £40 could well shift the opinion polls and the views of individuals, and given our ability to deliver the system, that could make the dome look like a tea party. I can envisage the headlines, the difficulties and the dangers involved. The project will cost a lot of money, and Governments—regardless of party—do not have a good track record when it comes to technology.

Who should hold the card at any given time? We would have difficulties, for example, with EU nationals who were in this country to work and people here on holiday. That could open a loophole that might be used by those who wanted to exploit the system. We could even have the perverse situation in which the people of this country who wanted jobs had to show an ID card whereas EU nationals did not.

If entitlement were the Government's only intention, and if I could be convinced that we would benefit in our daily lives—the hon. Member for Reading, West with all his different cards, and the rest of us with access to health services, benefits and going into post offices—I might see some merit in considering the system. However, if they were to introduce it, the only result would be an enormous burden for business. Government would impose on our public services a great deal of technology—not just that required to produce cards for so many people, but that needed to read them at local hospitals, in post offices and at different places.

Mr. Thomas: That is a point that we have not considered so far. Entitlement to health services is one of the Government's crucial arguments. Of all the services, the health service is the least automated, the one with the fewest records available in a digital format and the least prepared to take the system on board. Surely, on top of the existing crisis, the project would place an immeasurable burden on the health service.

Mr. Oaten: The point is well made. Coping with the production of some 60 million cards is one thing, but providing receiving equipment to do anything with them up and down the country, once we have produced them centrally, is another, and I just cannot see it happening. I do not understand what the entitlement will be if the idea is that if one goes into an accident and emergency department in a rush, one has to have a card and put it through a system. I cannot see what advantage that will bring.

I have changed my view. I had felt that if there was a compelling case I would be prepared to set aside some of my instinctive civil liberty and libertarian concerns, but there is no compelling case. A range of issues has been raised, which, in my judgment, mean that the Government should not introduce the cards. They should heed the consultation and listen to Labour Members and members of the Cabinet, and they should not proceed with this policy. It would be unpopular in the country and unworkable.

3.10 pm

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) on securing the debate. I share the view of the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) that we could, and hopefully will, debate the matter for much longer. We may well then come to the conclusion that he wants.

Much of the debate is focused on liberty and civil liberties. The one aspect on which I dissent from the view of the hon. Member for Ceredigion is his point that this is a particularly apposite week for the debate because we are remembering 11 November and the sacrifice that people made for freedom. I think that that generation is generally the most supportive of introducing identity cards. That is not to say that I am swayed by that argument, but I do not think that the hon. Gentleman's argument flowed. There is much support for ID cards among the general public, particularly the older generation—of which, I hasten to add, I am not quite a member. There is also a lack of understanding of some of the technological and logistical issues to which several hon. Members have referred. I shall not spend much time discussing liberty, although that is not in any way to underestimate it.

I must look at what is happening elsewhere. Much mention has been made of other countries in Europe, and valid arguments have been made on both sides of the debate. It is interesting to know that of all the 11 countries in the EU that have an ID card, only Belgium uses any form of biometric information, which is the fingerprint system. The only three countries in the world to have the more comprehensive form of biometrics that we believe the Government envisage are Malaysia, Thailand and Singapore. Despite being chairman of the all-party group on Singapore, I would not put forward any of those three as being among the most libertarian regimes in the world.

It is interesting that Australia, which has robust anti-immigration and asylum measures—the Minister is no doubt aware of them—has rejected the idea of ID cards being part of that system. Nevertheless, ID cards have some important protagonists, including the Police Federation, for which I have immense admiration, which supports the idea of a mandatory system of ID cards.

That brings me to the point that the hon. Member for Winchester just raised: what is the scheme for? What are we trying to achieve? Is this an anti-crime measure, aimed at trying to identify criminals going about their business so that they can be apprehended more quickly? Are we trying to deal with illegal immigration and asylum, or just with entitlement to public services? If we are looking at entitlement—the Government use that word, so let us assume that that is what they are considering—the need to be fraud and forgery-proof is critical. There is a huge industry out there forging all sorts of documents. In London and elsewhere, one can pick up a forged passport, a driving licence and a social security number for a couple of hundred pounds. All those means of ID are available, so to pretend that an ID card would not be equally forgeable is nonsense, unless we used biometric information. Even then, I would not be entirely convinced, although I am prepared to be persuaded that iris recognition, at least, is fraud-proof.

We then come, however, to the question raised by the hon. Member for Winchester. It is no use having a card with a unique number and a magnetic strip, or whatever means is used for iris memorisation, if the place that a person has gone to has no means of checking their iris to see whether the person holding the card is the person on it. There would have to be an iris reader in every school, every library, every GP's surgery and, because of home visits, every GP's car and every accident and emergency department—the whole works. It is foolish to believe that such an array of technology could be rolled out in the foreseeable future.

Those examples concern public services, but we should consider banks, which are, of course, private institutions. This afternoon, there has been much discussion about the need for identification in banks, building societies and other financial institutions. Can such institutions install card readers and will they be allowed to do so? If the information concerns only iris recognition—leaving aside the question whether the hon. Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter) is a member of his local Labour party, whether he is entitled to enter Reading borough council offices or whether he is allowed to have his suits dry cleaned—it will be pointless unless the location in which people are trying to use their cards has facilities for reading them.

Setting aside the simple issues of false identity and forgery, I shall turn to crime prevention. The Police Federation obviously believes that police officers should be able to identify people by checking their cards. However, the Government's repeated assertion that it will not be compulsory to carry an ID card nullifies any crime prevention benefit that the scheme might otherwise have. Imagine that a police officer stops someone and asks them who they are. The person replies, "I am John Smith". The officer asks, "Have you got your identity card?", and the person replies, "No. I do not have to carry it." The officer says, "Will you present it at a police station next week?" How can the officer know who has failed to turn up at the police station the following week if the person who was stopped gave a false identity? The situation is absurd. The job should be done properly by making it compulsory to carry an ID card, or the logic behind the introduction of ID cards breaks down entirely.

Let us examine the consequences of not having an ID card, even if it is only for entitlement. What happens when someone who does not have a card turns up at an A and E department? Will they be refused treatment? Will a GP or ambulance refuse to treat someone because they do not have a card?

Mr. Oaten rose—

Mr. Paice: I would like to give way to the hon. Gentleman, but I am pressed for time.

What about housing? Will homelessness legislation apply to somebody who has not got a card? There are so many issues.

On illegal immigrants, I wholly condemn the bad practice and worse of gangmasters, examples of which have been mentioned by other Members. Gangmasters operate in my constituency—I hasten to add that all those of whom I am aware are entirely legitimate and operate properly. However, some gangmasters are criminals. In many cases, gangmasters are involved in big business. They will be able to access forgery systems to provide the necessary information.

I am sure that the Minister will agree that the majority of illegal immigrants who come into this country do so with the help, connivance and conspiracy of professional people traffickers. Those organisations will have access to the necessary technology to provide a good forged identity unless we use biometric information. Certainly, the idea of some sort of glorified driving licence is wide open to abuse.

As of next summer, the citizens of 25 different countries will be able to move freely within this country. It seems absurd that our residents might be expected to have an ID card while those of other countries are not. It has been suggested that the ID card will cost £40 per head, although it will be issued free to asylum seekers. How will that help to advance race relations or multiculturalism?

The hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) raised the issue of a database, and he was wise to do so. I, too, take the view that in a system of ID cards that include biometric information, there must be a central database if the system is to work. A database is not essential to start with, but it is a logical progression. That takes us into the issue of the other information that may be on the database. A national DNA database has its advocates, although I am not one of them. There is also the question of who should be able to access that information.

Like the hon. Member for Winchester, I have become ever more sceptical the more that I have studied ID or entitlement cards. The Government have some huge questions to answer if they intend to proceed any further with this. What are the cards for? Will the system be secure and forgery-proof? Who will have access to the information that may be contained in the system, however much or little of it there may be? What will the cost be? What will happen to the refuseniks who will not carry a card? Without all those answers, and without a clear understanding of how the system will operate, I remain extremely sceptical, as does the Opposition. We are not at all convinced that the Government have thought the idea through.

3.20 pm

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Beverley Hughes): We have had an excellent debate and I am grateful to the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) and all Members who have contributed. Although it is clear that there is a wide range of views, right across the party, it is right that that is so, if the Government proceed on these lines. I appreciate the difficulty caused for Members by the fact that there is no specific proposal on the table—they know why. It is clear that there is a body of opinion, which varies in the degree to which it is well informed, to be expressed if the Government do propose a specific scheme. During any subsequent debates, there will no doubt be a great deal of interest and enthusiasm for grappling with some of the difficult issues involved.

I am not in a position today to give details or to make any announcement. Members know that the Cabinet is discussing the matter, and proposals will be made in due course. Although I will try to deal with some of the questions, one of the most helpful contributions that I can make in the short time available is to set out clearly for Members the developments in the use of biometrics and security of identity that will take place anyway. They are all in the public domain, but they may not have been set out together. Members' views on the desirability of ID cards should perhaps properly be informed by the context of what will happen anyway, both internationally and domestically.

We are not in the same position that we were 50 years ago. In today's world, correct identification has become imperative in a way that we could not have foreseen. We face new threats and increases in the scale and sophistication of illegal immigration, organised crime and terrorism, but there are also new opportunities and new improvements in the technology of biometrics. Crucially, such improvements offer the opportunity to link an identity record to an individual with a high level of security. That record can then be used to verify a person's identity and immigration status, show entitlement to work and do some of the other things on which Members have touched.

First, Members need to know that international developments will soon require us to upgrade the security of all our identity documents. The United States is requiring countries that wish to continue in the visa waiver scheme, in which we are included, to include biometric information in passports. Secondly, the European Commission is looking for a decision on including finger scan biometric information on EU common format visas. We must choose between continuing to respond in a piecemeal fashion to some of those external developments and playing a leading role in shaping the way the world responds to the challenge of secure identification in a changing world. Those developments will take place internationally and in the UK.

Thirdly, in May this year, the International Civil Aviation Organisation adopted a global harmonised blueprint for biometric information in passports and other travel documents. The agreed ICAO standard is the inclusion of a mandatory facial image biometric in a contact-less chip—the document would be placed on a reader—with the option of including a secondary biometric finger scan or iris scan in the future.

The 188 ICAO contracting states are now considering adopting that standard in their travel documents. As the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) mentioned, Australia looks like being the first to issue passports to that new standard, followed by New Zealand and the United States.

Although biometric documents are being introduced internationally, in the UK the Passport Agency has decided to include a facial image biometric on passports from 2005, with an initial pilot to develop that process. There are also plans for biometrically secure driving licences. We are piloting the use of finger scan biometrics in Sri Lanka for UK visas and extending iris scanning for many secure foreign visitors to allow fast-track immigration clearance.

Several international and UK developments are inevitable, and they include developing biometrics to secure someone's identity to a much higher level of assurance. Such developments will incur costs to individuals for a passport with a much higher degree of security and to the Government for the investment required to develop the technology. A lengthy time scale will be required for their implementation.

Is it sensible to make the investment in money, technology, time and commitment to secure developments that would take us to the point of an ID card system, but to have none of the additional benefits that an ID card system would bring?

Mr. Oaten: Will the Minister give way?

Beverley Hughes: I will, with reluctance, because many Members want to question me.

Mr. Oaten: The Minister gave the example of the technology available, but is she able to provide her own view on ID cards?

Beverley Hughes: I am personally convinced that ID cards are indispensable in addressing some of the issues touched on by Members, some of whom have been sceptical about the contribution that ID cards can make. They are not a panacea, as my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick) said, but they are vital to progress on some of the serious issues faced by the UK and every country in the modern world.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter) has graphically made clear, we are a nation of cardholders. People are used to carrying cards, and the results of our consultation process were very similar to those of consultation under the last Conservative Government, who proposed a voluntary scheme that would have been little more than a glorified driving licence.

An ID card scheme would give us an important means of responding to some of the external threats that we face, within the broader strategy of tackling illegal immigration and illegal working. ID cards could reduce identity fraud and sift out those not entitled to services.

My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard), who talked about illegal working, must understand, as I am sure he does, that the difficulty is that there is no single document establishing an entitlement to work. The national insurance number does not do that; it is, and always has been, issued to people who do not have an entitlement to work. Employers have a statutory defence against prosecution if they can show that they have looked at a document. There is no single secure document so most prosecutions fail.

Terrorists also use false identities. Although I would not begin to claim that ID cards are a panacea in the fight against terrorism, they are an extremely important weapon, given that terrorists and organised criminals use multiple identities.

In the last few seconds available to me, I would like to make it clear that there would be a national register to underpin such a card scheme. Parliament would have to debate the questions about the information that would go on the card, the chips and the database. I recognise that if we were to go ahead with the scheme it would be a major undertaking, which would take six to 10 years. That is why we need to debate it now, and we need to consider not only whether we need an ID card system now, but whether we shall need one in 10 years' time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Could I ask hon. Members not wishing to stay for the next debate to leave quickly and quietly? It is likely that a Division will occur during that debate, so I shall set out my intentions now. There is the possibility of two Divisions; there may only be one. If there is one Division, we shall suspend for 15 minutes. If there are two Divisions, we shall suspend for half an hour.

Police Funding (Dorset)

3.30 pm

Mrs. Annette L. Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): Dorset police covers an area of over 1,000 square miles and serves a population of nearly 700,000. Half of the population live in the conurbation of Poole and Bournemouth, and the remaining 50 per cent. of the constituency is predominantly rural in character; a very good mix. The specific features of the county are important in relation to how the police service is delivered, and the way in which it is financed. Dorset is an area with high house prices—it is such a lovely place to live—but where wages are relatively low. That results in Dorset not qualifying for the area cost adjustment, but presents major problems for recruitment and retention of staff throughout the public sector.

Dorset has almost 50 per cent. more residents over the age of 65 than the national average would predict, resulting in a high proportion of households on fixed or restricted incomes being faced with increasing tax demands to maintain the same level of service. Feelings are running very high in the county and I am sure that high overall council tax increases will provoke widespread demonstrations next year.

Within the conurbation of Poole and Bournemouth a further difficulty arises. Bournemouth is increasingly becoming a major south coast venue, attracting a large influx of night-time visitors. It now has in excess of 30,000 licensed drinking spaces available each night, creating operational policing pressures more akin to those in metropolitan areas. There is a reflection within the formula to take account of visitors, but it assumes that the visitors share the same characteristics as the resident population. That is not the case. The fact that my daughter and her friends come down from London possibly contributes to that view, but Bournemouth is a very attractive place to come for the weekend.

Despite the diverse micro-economy and the pressures that brings, Dorset police prides itself on being innovative and providing a high-quality and efficient service to the people of Dorset. There are many ways in which that is clearly demonstrated, not least in the inspection process by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, which regularly cites Dorset as an example of good practice. The annual achievement of 2 per cent. efficiency gains symbolises the rigorous procedures the force employs in all its activities and its own desire continually to improve.

More than 90 per cent. of the force's officers work directly on front-line policing. It has improved and exceeded its targets in responding to emergency calls for assistance from the public in both rural and urban areas, but—here is the big but— Dorset police force is the sixth lowest spending police force in the country yet it receives the second lowest amount of Government support. Despite its low expenditure the effect of the low funding results in the residents of Dorset having to pay the fourth highest council tax per head in the country.

I am sure that the Minister will appreciate the mixed messages that the residents of Dorset are receiving. We have a highly efficient and effective police force within the existing funding constraints, but we are faced with one of the highest taxes in the country. That makes local accountability very difficult. When people are asked to pay more, they naturally ask, "Why don't I ever see a police officer on the beat?"

To be fair, Dorset police now has 1,422 police officers, an increase of 10 per cent. over the last 10 years. That is very good news. However, a local capability assessment has identified a shortfall of officers of approximately 200. I frequently request extra support in local communities to tackle low-level antisocial behaviour. As Dorset is a relatively safe place, much greater use could be made of community support officers and accredited safety officers, whose mere presence would contribute towards people feeling safer. Community support officers are employed in the west of the county only and funding is inadequate to expand the scheme. There are just six CSOs in Dorset. Neighbourhood warden schemes financed by the Government are very limited in number and funding has not been secured for the future.

The Dorset police force prides itself on its consistent and positive approach to achieving national targets and, through its extensive programme of consultation, to accommodating local requirements. However, the situation is becoming increasingly difficult and could lead to significant issues for members of the police authority who must determine how to address the future.

Local consultation has demonstrated strong support for the provision of community beat officers and a desire that such individuals should not be abstracted to other activities, a feeling that is shared across the country. However, the difficulty faced by the force is that with insufficient resources and manpower it cannot fulfil those local priorities as well as achieve all the national targets; hence, the local dissatisfaction that I mentioned earlier. I fear that matters will get worse and hope that the Minister will provide some reassurance this afternoon.

Changes in the Government grant last year led to a reduction in central funding. Dorset received the minimum increase, which was wholly inadequate to meet the pressures of police reform, pensions and increased national insurance.

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): May I assure the hon. Lady that all her Dorset colleagues, irrespective of politics, fully support the powerful case that she is making for our constituents?

Mrs. Brooke: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his support.

The result of all the pressures was a double figure increase in council tax last year just to maintain existing services. If the authority were to cut its budget to keep to an inflation-only increase next year, it could face a cut in officer numbers of more than 100, which represents 7 per cent. of the force establishment. Dorset residents want more police, not fewer, and they want a reduction in crime and antisocial behaviour. To maintain the present service, Dorset faces a funding gap of £6.5 million on a budget of nearly £100 million. Without a significant increase in central support, that would result in a council tax increase of more than 20 per cent. Dorset residents are reaching the point where they are not prepared to pay more for less.

As one of the smaller forces in the country, Dorset police is able to react swiftly, re-deploy resources efficiently and to take on and implement innovative solutions that can then be used as an example to the rest of the country. However, as a small force, it finds itself unduly exposed to the current unique funding mechanism for police pensions. A move to direct national funding could address concerns about the current balance of funding review. That would make an enormous difference, particularly for a small authority. Such a move would also produce efficiency savings in administration and reduce perversities in the movement of officers between forces; another issue for those who live in a very nice part of the country, as the Minister will recognise. The public would then see that they were paying for the current service and not the pensions of former officers.

I would not want to see the Dorset police authority, which is a smaller authority, abolished. I truly believe in local policing. It is right to deal with some matters nationally, and the continued drive by the Home Office to identify and deliver national solutions to police information requirements through the identification and procurement of IT systems is recognised as the right way forward for the police service. However, the ability to take on national systems becomes increasingly difficult when the cost must be met by local taxpayers.

Local consultation has identified a specific problem in Dorset and I suspect that the Minister has received quite a lot of representations in relation to the road safety camera project. I wholeheartedly support road safety, speed reduction and saving lives. However, at a local level there is great opposition to the scheme because, according to the letters that I receive, the cameras are on roads that are safe. Opposition is difficult to deflect because the public do not entirely know how the scheme is funded. In the current year, the Dorset road safety camera project will return more than £1 million to the Treasury, money that could and should be invested in local initiatives to improve road safety in its widest context. I applaud the project, but the financing should be managed to support Dorset.

Looking to the future, Dorset pledges to work with the region, the country and the Home Office to ensure that it delivers the national and local agenda. Dorset welcomes initiatives and flexibility within the financial framework. The authority welcomes the prudential code on capital because it will enable better and more strategic long-term planning of both its capital assets and its long-term capital plan. However, even within that new flexibility there has been no announcement to the Dorset police authority on how future capital support will be provided under the new system.

The application of the cost floor has been essential for Dorset to continue to maintain its current level of service but, as yet, there is no indication of what that floor will be in future years or what tapering may be applied to it, thus creating great difficulties in medium-term planning given the tightness of funds in Dorset.

A great deal of work is being undertaken nationally by the police service and by the Government, which will address some of my concerns. However, to meet the immediate needs of Dorset, I should like some assurance on the following points. First, will the total level of Government support to cover general, specific and capital grant be maintained with at least an inflationary increase next year? Secondly, could the rules relating to the road safety camera project be relaxed to enable a greater proportion of the income to be invested locally in sensible schemes? Thirdly, will there be a review of future funding to address the issue of police pensions and can we expect some answers on that shortly? Fourthly, will the continued drive to national information systems be fully funded?

Fifthly—this is very important for Dorset—will the rural police grant be continued? Dorset residents were alarmed to read in the The Sunday Times last week:

"The redistribution of police money marks part of a wider government effort quietly to move central government resources away from wealthier, predominantly southern areas to poorer neighbourhoods in northern England, Wales and Scotland."

I do not wish to deprive other areas of funding, but not at a cost to Dorset. Will the Minister comment on the truth of that statement in The Sunday Times?.

This year all police authorities seem to have had concerns about the forthcoming financial settlement, but Dorset—with its historically low funding and a shortage of money to deliver local policing priorities—is, justifiably, particularly worried about the future. Residents of Dorset are reaching the point where they are not prepared to pay more for less. What reassurance can the Minister give to the Dorset police authority and the residents of Dorset on the issues that I have raised this afternoon?

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing, and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): I should like to congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke) on obtaining this important debate on police funding for Dorset. She has made some important representations and I hope that I can reassure her on some of the points that she has raised. However, I have to be a little tantalising, because later this month I shall make an announcement on the 2004–05 provisional police funding settlement. I am not in a position to go into a lot of detail today, but I hope that I can give the hon. Lady a broad flavour of what the factors will be in preparing the settlement.

There are currently inescapable pressures on precepts. I receive representations from a range of police authorities that are concerned about the effects on their communities. They are also concerned about the possibility of police authority capping, so the Home Secretary has been keen to emphasise that we want authorities to act responsibly when they set their budgets. We also want them to lock in some of the improvements that they have made in recent years, because we are delighted that authorities have been prepared to go that extra mile and get extra resources to extra officers.

Communities appreciate the higher visibility policing that we have now, but authorities must make well-justified cases for any improvements to their communities and ensure that they have broad public support for the budgets that they set. I remind the hon. Lady that in the last two years authorities have set budgets well in excess of what they have needed to stand still. We are pleased about that, because it has meant more resources going to the police service. There has been considerable growth out there in police authorities over the last few years, with central Government expenditure increasing by 30 per cent. to support it.

Mrs. Brooke: Even though the Minister cannot say anything precisely about the settlement, will she comment on whether there will be capping on the police part of the council tax?

Ms Blears: As the hon. Lady knows, the question of whether local authorities will be capped is a matter for my colleagues in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, not the Home Office. I am sure that she also knows that discussions are taking place to ensure that we reach a balanced position on local authorities generally and on the pressures on police authorities. Any decisions on capping, however, are a matter for the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, which has been clear that there will certainly not be universal capping but that a close eye will be kept on the increases.

Last year's increases in some places—not the hon. Lady's constituency—were in the order of 70 per cent. and 75 per cent., which are not sustainable in the longer-term. Dorset police, however, increased its budget last year to £95.6 million, which was an increase of £7.7 million, or 8.8 per cent., which was broadly in line with police authorities generally. The precept was increased by 19.2 per cent., which sounds like a large percentage increase but was actually 38p a week; we must get things in perspective. Although the percentages are large, the sums themselves are fairly modest and appropriate to the improvements that people have seen in policing on their streets.

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.3 pm

On resuming—

Ms Blears: I am delighted to resume the debate. I was just about to outline Dorset's funding and budget, but first I wanted to say a word about the funding formula. The formula was updated last year and the new formula had buy-in and agreement from all parties in the tripartite structure for policing. I note what the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole said about issues still being outstanding. There is scope for improvement in the formula but a period of stability this year is probably in our best interests. In future we will examine with the policing community how we can best develop grant mechanisms to meet the needs of contemporary policing. This is an ongoing debate. I want to ensure that the new funding formula arrangements support the reform and modernisation process on which we have embarked and which are moving on apace.

The hon. Lady also mentioned specific grants. Dorset continues to benefit from our targeted initiatives. It received a further £2.31 million from the crime fighting fund, £0.16 million for Airwave and £0.44 million from the rural policing fund. The authority also receives £470,000 for basic command unit funding; £490,000 for DNA—for forensic sciences; and £380,000 in special priority payments.

There has been some concern among police authorities about the amount of grant provided in that specific way. However, virtually all the specific grants are for things that the police service has told us that it wants to see happen. In the past, money has been set aside to improve policing. Under the previous Conservative Administration, money was provided for an extra 5,000 officers, but not one of them was put in place, because police authorities chose to spend that money on other areas. We are therefore concerned to ensure that the crime-fighting fund is spent on those additional officers, who the hon. Lady has been generous enough to acknowledge have made a real difference to the visibility of policing in her area.

By targeting our grant, we can overcome some of the necessary imprecision in general grant figures. Using specific grants enables us to target funds where they are needed and to get real results on the ground. I realise that some forces are concerned about the long-term nature of specific grants and that that makes it difficult for them to plan ahead. I want to ensure that in all our specific grants we take into account the issue of long-term funding and sustainability.

I shall comment briefly on the rural policing fund, which is a big issue for the hon. Lady's constituency. As I said, Dorset's share of the 2003–04 fund was £440,000. As part of the overall changes to policing grant formulae in 2002, we considered whether to put the rural policing grant into the general grant. At that time, police authorities were concerned that that would leave a number of rural forces with less grant than before. We agreed that that outcome would have been counter-productive, and so we did not make that change. I assure the hon. Lady that that conclusion stands, and that the rural policing grant will continue.

Police authorities do not have to bid for the rural grant—it is allocated on the basis of a sparsity formula—but they do report on what they are doing with the grant. In the police force in the hon. Lady's area, they will be improving analysis of rural crime trends, considering the provision of community contact vehicles to ensure that the police are out and about in the rural areas, and supporting a project to try to improve call handling, which should improve performance on the ground.

The hon. Lady raised the important issue of pensions, which affects forces throughout the country, particularly when peaks of retirement occur and police authorities are called on to fund those peaks in pension requirements. As the hon. Lady said, that can be a real drain on a small force. I assure her that we are actively reviewing the pensions issue to see whether, in future, we can provide a system that will relieve some of the pressure on police authorities.

Reasonable provision is made in the annual formula funding settlements for the overall cost, and most forces have enough provision to cover net pension costs—certainly when they can call on pension reserves. However, we are now collecting new data to obtain up-to-date information on the real costs.

The current arrangements do not give a funded scheme that would provide for projected costs in the future to be covered by investing standard annual contributions from the employer as well as the employee. If we were to establish a fully funded scheme now, it would be prohibitively expensive—we could not afford to do that. We are looking at the feasibility of a notionally funded scheme for police pensions, under which the officers' employee contributions plus a new employer's contribution could be topped up as necessary by central Government to meet the audited pensions bill. We would aim to smooth out the peaks and troughs of retirements that are often faced by the police authorities. When we issue details of the pensions review, the hon. Lady, and other hon. Members, will be pleased with some of the proposals that it will contain.

I have already had discussions with the Police Superintendents Association, the Police Federation, the Association of Chief Police Officers and the Association of Police Authorities on the question of pensions. The issue is under active consideration.

The hon. Lady raised the issue of road safety income. I understand that all the income from fixed-penalty notices is invested locally in road safety schemes, and is ring-fenced for that. I advise the hon. Lady to find out from Dorset police what they are doing with that income and how it is being reinvested. We are keen that road-safety schemes and speed cameras are targeted at those areas where there are casualties, so that we can reduce the number of deaths and injuries on our roads. There are far too many road accidents. Speed cameras can make a difference, but they should be targeted properly in the areas in which they can have the greatest effect.

The hon. Lady also talked about community policing; clearly a topical issue in view of the consultation document launched by the Home Secretary yesterday on the long-term future of the police service and what it might look like in 10 or 15 years. We are determined to ensure that local neighbourhood community policing is at the heart of what we do and that the officers are valued and properly rewarded. We also want to ensure that the job of community beat manager is much appreciated by the force as well as by the local community, and that people will want to do it in the long term.

The hon. Lady is right that neighbourhood policing cannot function where officers are continually abstracted to do other duties. Increasingly, forces are allocating a specific number of officers in a community for the long term. That means that they can build relationships with local people and can be much more effective in gaining intelligence and information from the community, which means that they can do their job in the best possible way. Getting local community policing right is at the heart of our proposals, as is improving the connection between local people and their police service, examining accountability mechanisms, ensuring that local people have a greater say in setting priorities and in challenging us, as national politicians, to let devolution take root in local areas.

The hon. Lady also raised the important matter—the consultation document addresses it—of how we get the structure of forces right to ensure that they have sufficient capacity to cope with serious and organised crime. There is no point simply getting local community policing right unless forces have the resilience to tackle crimes, which increasingly threaten our communities, and some of the new technology that criminals are using.

[Ms Blears]

That raises other questions. We should not reorganise for the sake of reorganising, but how can we ensure that forces, especially small ones, can combat organised and serious crime? They may be able to do so by collaborating with their neighbours, by specialising in particular areas or by amalgamating, if that is what they want to do. We must ensure that every level of policing has the best possible structure so that we can deliver the right equipment and the right staff, and can drive up performance.

I am delighted to be able to tell the hon. Lady that the performance of the force in her constituency is extremely good. In the year to March 2003 in Dorset, burglary had fallen by 7 per cent., drug offences by 1 per cent., violent crime was two thirds of the national average, the incidences of burglary in a dwelling were half the national average, and the incidences of theft of a vehicle were roughly half the national average. Dorset is a safe place to live. I appreciate that the hon. Lady is committed to ensuring that Dorset still receives the appropriate level of policing and support. She made a very good case for her local area, but it is important to ensure that the country's resources are also directed to the areas of greatest need, as well as providing a decent amount of support for policing throughout the country.

That is why we want a framework of national standards, within which there is as much devolution as possible. My party does not simply advocate a free-for-all and that everything should be delegated to the local area, but we do see a role for national standards that give everyone in the country the right to a certain standard of policing and police performance; a key difference between the approaches of the political parties to some of the complex issues that are taxing us at the moment.

I am glad to be able to reassure the hon. Lady, but she will have to wait a little longer for the detail of the settlement, which will be published later this month. I congratulate her on speaking for members of her community and on ensuring that their voices are heard in this Chamber, which is the appropriate thing to do.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed), I must tell hon. Members that although I do not believe that there will be a Division during the next debate, I will suspend the sitting for 15 minutes if there is.

Education Funding (Leicestershire)

4.14 pm

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough): Thank you for warning us that the Division Bell may ring, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I am grateful for the opportunity to speak about education funding in Leicestershire. When the Minister's team saw that in their in-tray early last week, I fear a groan must have gone around the Department for Education and Skills. There is a feeling that we have been here before.

Unfortunately, many of the problems in Leicestershire have not gone away, and it is necessary to return the debate to the Chamber. I declare a personal interest. My four-and-a-half-year-old son will start at St. Bartholomew's school in our home village, Quorn, in January next year. I was a governor of my local schools, first the school that I attended and, more recently a school in Sileby. I was educated in the local state schools, hopefully with reasonable success.

I wanted a balanced and open debate today, avoiding a lot of the clichés and soundbites traded over the last couple of years. I do not want to let either side off. The Minister knows me as a fair-minded person who will ask some searching questions. I am sure that he will answer them. I recognise the great advances in Leicestershire education since 1997, and I shall start by talking about some of those.

The policy is extremely complex and difficult for people to understand. I could almost bore for England on area cost adjustment and the standard spending assessment funding formula. I did not expect to have to do that when I first arrived as a Member of Parliament. However, those of us who joined the E8, as we were known in the early days when only eight of us moaned about local education authority funding, rapidly became the F40. I have attended many meetings both in the House and in my constituency to discuss the issue and, for something that is so complex, it creates a great deal of passion.

It is important to recognise that education funding is only part of the wider picture. Only yesterday, I was involved in a debate in this Chamber, in which we heard that research carried out in the London School of Economics had found that the most important factor in predicting whether a child would do well at school was not whether his parents were well educated, whether he was from a middle-class home or whether his school was well funded, but whether his parents were actively involved in his education. Given that billions are spent in an effort to drive up educational attainment and standards, the single most cost-effective thing that the Government could probably do is take action to ensure that parents can do more and spend more time with their children.

I hope that there is some joined-up thinking in Government. That phrase was over-used a few years ago, but it is vital that we still look at it. The full picture, in terms of educational funding between 1992 and 2001, needs to be shown. I have asked over 85 parliamentary questions—I checked the figure on the web yesterday—both written and oral on the issue, and I have a wealth of statistics in front of me. I will try to keep those to a minimum, but they are important.

Between 1992 and 2001, we have seen both year-on-year increases and decreases in education funding in Leicestershire. The year 1992–93 saw a 7.2 per cent. increase in funding. That was an election year, so one would expect that. In 1993–94, we saw a decrease of minus 9.7 per cent.—a real-terms cut for Leicestershire; in 1994–95, we saw a 0.9 per cent. increase—with inflation running at around 4 per cent., that represented a year-on-year real-terms cut; in 1995–96, we saw a 0.8 per cent. increase; 1996–97 showed a little improvement, with a 5.5 per cent. increase—again, probably linked to the election year. Following 1997–98, we have seen increases of 7.1, 6 and 5.6 per cent. I think that 2001–02 saw another 5.6 per cent. increase.

We have seen some great improvements in cash terms since 1997. Later I will quote some head teachers who recognise that that cash increase has started to feed through to schools. It is also important to recognise that the real-terms increase in spending per primary school pupil between 1997 and 2003 has been £600 per pupil in Leicestershire. For secondary pupils, the increase has been £530 per pupil. There have been year-on-year improvements from the base.

The biggest improvement is in our capital programme. That comes across strongly when one talks to local heads, or if one is involved in education in the county. I am sure that the Minister will know the figures off the top of his head. In 1997–98, capital expenditure in Leicestershire was £2.9 million; it rose to £6.5 million, which was quite generous; that even went up to £9 million, and to beat that we have now reached a figure of £25 million per annum. That is something to celebrate and it is sometimes lost from the overall debate when we focus on the formula spending share and the standard spending assessment. It is important to treat those as a basis from which to start.

I could talk about the summary of cash and the rest, but the key to what I am talking about is the difference that it makes to children. We have a positive story to tell in Leicestershire about what we have achieved with our money. At key stage 3, which covers 11 to 14-year-olds, we are in the top 25 per cent. At key stage 2 we are in the top quartile. Our GCSE and SATs results have improved—in the case of SATs from 65 to 76 per cent. Primary class sizes in particular—for five, six and seven-year-olds—have reduced. At the school of which I was a governor in 1995–96, every class had more than 35 or 36 children. Those numbers are all reduced.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): To make this debate even more fruitful than the hon. Gentleman is already making it, I want to ask whether the case that the Minister must answer is the charge of the inequity and disparity that Leicestershire and Rutland face, compared with other counties—not just the overall level of funding.

Mr. Reed: That is perfect timing by the hon. Gentleman. As hon. Members will have seen, I have turned the page and reached the "but": what he explained is exactly what I want to point out. The year-on-year percentage and cash increases have been delightful for us, but the problem has been that we have had the same funding formula since the early 1990s. We started in 1997 from a position of inequity. That is one of the reasons why I joined the E8—later to become the F40—and asked so many parliamentary questions aimed at teasing out the problem.

One of my more recent questions was about the average. It is difficult to compare county with county in every case; we should look at comparable counties or areas. One of the starkest figures is the difference between Leicestershire and Slough. That example is not exactly the same as a county, but I was trying to identify the bottom and top levels of funding outside London. There are other figures that would demonstrate that Leicestershire falls well behind even the average comparable county. However, I shall give figures in relation to Slough. For three to 15-year-olds in Leicestershire the average sum is £2,939, but for Slough, at the top, the figure is £3,828. That is a 30 per cent. difference in funding. I accept that Slough is completely different; but can deprivation and area cost adjustment alone explain such a wide gap?

When I was working on the figures relating to the area cost adjustment, I found that the problem seems to lie there. Hon. Members present today who support my argument have been fairly active in the F40 group; on looking at the relevant tables we recognised that even when Leicestershire was second from the bottom of the funding formula under the previous Government and in the first few years of the Labour Government, when residency numbers, sparsity, additional educational needs and free school meals were taken into account, the cost of the difference between us and some other counties that were averagely funded was slight—that even applied to Hertfordshire, which was usually cited as way out at the top. The difference between Leicestershire and the bottom of the table was only about £40 or £50 a head, but when the area cost adjustment was built in, it jumped to about £250 or £300. That is where much of the problem lies.

I want to ask the Minister about the work that was done on the funding formula review, which I recognise was thorough, and which led to some beneficial changes. However, Leicestershire really needed change in respect of area cost adjustment. I have gone through the figures, and it appears that one problem was rejection of the idea of taking a variety of costs into account; it seems that the vast majority of what is taken into account is still based around wages and salaries.

Leicestershire Members will know that although the east midlands region has high productivity and employment, it has relatively low wages compared to some parts of the country. Compared to other regions, many quarters, especially south Leicestershire, are close to parts of what I would call the outer London commuter belt. Many of my constituents commute to London daily.

I am not necessarily seeking a funding formula that means that everyone is the same. I am the first to recognise that there will be differences. There is even a funding formula in the county council's distribution to schools. Many heads have argued for the funding formula for Loughborough to be much fairer at county, rather than at national, level and I have taken delegations to county hall on that. We have many of the same problems on a smaller scale—they are important to the town itself—including English as a second language and deprivation. Two of the richest wards in the county are next door to two of the poorest, just outside the city; Shelthorpe and Leamington Hastings wards are surrounded by Nanpanton and Outwoods. That means that figures are skewed in the whole and little pockets of deprivation can almost be missed. I am not looking for a miracle, but we want to try to narrow the gap between us and the best funded, or even the averagely funded, authorities. The disparity seems too great.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) wishes to speak in more detail on what happened in the change from the SSA to the FSS—the formula spending share—and our disappointment at that. To compound the problem, as my hon. Friend the Minister is aware, last year, we had the additional problems caused by the change in the overall settlement. I have met most of my heads during the past 18 months or so in numerous meetings. In a typical middle school—I shall not name the head or the school—last year's funding problems has meant increased class sizes for key stage 4 for maths and science, a rise in average class size from 22 to 27, the use of non-specialist teachers in various subject areas, fewer admin and technical side staff and additional staff not being available.

The head of that school c[illegible]nted, on the positive side, that the school has seen [illegible]dget increases in the past four years, enabling it to repair and improve dilapidated buildings, improve the working conditions of the staff and, most importantly, raise educational standards. However, he also said that it had been promised on several occasions that there would be more funding for education to carry out necessary reforms and improvements. Under the last Tory Government, at least he had known that there would be a cut in the budget year on year and could plan accordingly; last year had made things really difficult. That school is very well managed, but is now having to work with a deficit of £300,000.

I welcome last week's statement announcing an additional £3.7 million for Leicestershire as part of the transitional relief, but can the Minister assure me that he will meet a delegation from Leicestershire if we honestly feel that that was not quite enough? I know that everyone always comes to the Department saying that there is not quite enough, but I shall look around the schools and the deficits that have accrued as a one-off from last year—although there are very good teams of governors, heads and teachers—to see whether that £3.7 million is adequate.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for so generously giving way during his Adjournment debate. Has he, like me, been told that Leicestershire schools do not think that £3.7 million is enough for this year?

Mr. Reed: As the Secretary of State said in his statement, many schools—even before they knew the figures nationwide—had already said that the amount or package was not enough. My automatic reaction to that was to sit down, look at the £3.7 million and quickly think through the schools in my constituency and the size of their deficits. A quick calculation made me realise that the amount would probably not be sufficient, so I make my plea to the Minister. I always try to be fair. I moan when necessary and praise when necessary, and I shall work through the figures carefully with others in the county. If there is a genuine case for coming back to the Department, I would appreciate it if my hon. Friend allowed us to meet him.

I want to be positive. There have been many positives for Leicestershire. There is still the problem of the funding gap, as it has been called, but I want to move on from that debate. We recognise that there will always be a formula and some discrepancies; we want only to decrease the size of them. Will my hon. Friend the Minister accept that it is difficult for people in Leicestershire to understand why there is such a gap between us and average counties, which have similar make-ups? I admit that last year was difficult, but we must be positive and say that a £2.7 million increase for education is something that we should welcome.

The Treasury has taken a good approach, but I want to know why that increase can be turned into a disaster at local level. At what point did Ministers realise that there was little headroom when all the other matters had been taken into consideration? However, we must not be negative. Investing in teachers' pay, pensions and working conditions is a real assistance for schools, but we must recognise the difficulties that it caused.

In conclusion, I wish to say that we have seen a positive change in Leicestershire. We have problems and we wish to work together with the Department to ensure that there is fair and equitable distribution of the moneys that are available. Will the Minister look again at the area cost adjustment element of the funding source? Will he confirm that he would be happy to meet us if we had a problem with the £3.7 million transitional relief for this year? So that we do not have to debate such matters again, will my hon. Friend ensure that, at every opportunity when such matters pass his desk and statements have to be made about funding, he will consider specifically the problems of Leicestershire and ensure that we achieve a fair deal? I am sure that he will do that. Over the past 18 months in which he has been in post, he has been aware of Leicestershire's problems and has done his best to alleviate them.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am unable to call the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for Loughborough took 17 minutes to make his contribution. He has now eaten into the Minister's time. I call Mr. Miliband. [Interruption.] The Standing Orders are simple to understand. We are holding an Adjournment debate, which is held to allow the hon. Member to receive a reply from the Minister. The Minister's time must not be eaten into.

David Taylor: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have sought the sanction of my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough, who initiated the debate, and that of the Minister. I wrote to the Speaker's Office, which seemed to be the way to comply with the requirements.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Standing Orders are simple. An Adjournment debate involves an hon. Member who is seeking a reply from a Minister. If the hon. Member concerned wishes to give up time to another hon. Member, he or she is entitled to do so, but taking 17 minutes, which is two minutes out of the Minister's time, does not leave time for any other hon. Member to speak. I call Mr. Miliband.

Mr. Alan Duncan: On a point of order, Mr. McWilliam. Is it not a convention under the Standing Orders that hon. Members call the Adjournment debate and that there is no strict time set for the Minister to speak?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is quite right, but under the basic Standing Order, it is for the Minister to reply to the hon. Member. The hon. Member for Loughborough said that he would give up time to another hon. Member, but spoke for 17 minutes, which is more than half of the time for debate. It is only fair to the Minister to allow him to come in at this time. I call Mr. Miliband.

Mr. Duncan: This is absurd.

Mr. Reed: On a point of order, Mr. McWilliam. I wish to be of assistance. I had discussed the matter beforehand and considered that if I were to take 15 minutes and my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire took five minutes, the Minister would be more than happy to speak for 10 minutes. Can we proceed on that basis?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot be privy to those decisions. I call Mr. Miliband.

4.33 pm

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. David Miliband): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Obviously, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) on securing such an important debate. He suggested that perhaps the Department did not have unalloyed delight at the prospect of another discussion about education funding. I wish to put him completely at ease about that. We are delighted to have the opportunity to debate funding in Leicester as well as anywhere else. I am certainly happy to receive comments from hon. Members during the 11 minutes that remain, if they want to say anything.

It is important to recognise the outstanding work that my hon. Friend has done to put the case for funding for schools in Loughborough. I want to put on the record that he has been tireless in such work. I am glad that he mentioned in passing the outstanding work that is done by many schools in his constituency and in the rest of the country. He will know that, over the past five years, teacher numbers have increased by about 10 per cent.

The January 2003 teacher count of 5,290 for Leicestershire was 490 teachers up on the position in 1998. They have produced some outstanding results. I was pleased that, over the past three years, Leicestershire schools have produced a rate of improvement for GSCE at about twice the national average. It was highlighted in the May Ofsted inspection report that, at key stage 3, at the age of 14, there was a particular strength of schools in Leicestershire. My hon. Friend will know that the primary schools are also doing well at key stage 2.

I want to focus on funding. We have discussed it before, but there are new elements to consider, given the Secretary of State's announcement last week. My hon. Friend was generous in recognising the outstanding improvements that have been made in funding throughout the country as well as in Leicestershire. My figures tally with his, showing that in cash terms the increase in funding in Leicestershire has been about £950 per pupil during the past six years and that capital investment is now £28 million a year. That is up from £2.9 million in 1996–97, which is a tenfold improvement that can only be of benefit to pupils in Leicestershire.

I appreciate that people in Leicestershire are concerned that their county is the lowest funded on a per-pupil basis of the 150 local education authorities, and it is up to the Government to justify that position. One LEA will always be 150th, as one will always be first, and we must ensure that we have sound grounds for the distribution of money to local authorities.

My hon. Friend will know that the old system for calculating the local authority grant—the standard spending assessment—was out of date and based on the 1991 census. It was even more complicated than the current system and widely seen to be unfair, as it was based on historic spending patterns rather than set amounts per pupil for additional educational needs and to take account of area costs. That is what the new system does; those elements mean that similar pupils in different parts of the country are funded by the Department for Education and Skills in the same way. It is then up to local government to raise money for education and to distribute it in their area.

David Taylor: There is no doubt that the new formula is more transparent and has the potential for greater equity. Nevertheless, when the figures came into the public domain, it was clear that the disparity between counties had widened rather than narrowed, despite what counties and LEAs had hoped for and expected.

Mr. Miliband: I recognise the outstanding campaigning that my hon. Friend has done over the years, but I assure him that any changes are the result of population changes among counties. I could explain further in writing, if that were helpful.

I said that it was the Government's commitment to ensure that, as far as DFES funding was concerned, similar pupils in different parts of the country were funded in a similar way. That is why every primary school pupil is funded this year to the tune of about £2,100 as a basic entitlement. Extra money of up to £1,300 is available for additional educational needs, which is the same whether the pupil lives in Leicestershire, Lancashire or Leeds. There is also recognition of extra costs, which I will come to.

The reason for differential funding is that the English average for income support is 19.8 per cent. of pupils, but in Leicestershire it is 9.2 per cent. We take account of that relative prosperity in Leicestershire when we distribute the grant for additional educational needs. English as a second language is also considered.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend is right to point out that Leicestershire is a relatively prosperous county, but in the absence of an adequate formula within the country to recognise deprivation, the schools in the less well-off areas—which tend to be in my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough—are not receiving the benefits.

Mr. Miliband: My hon. Friend makes a profound point, but one that is outwith my powers. As he notes, it is the joint responsibility of central and local government both to raise and to distribute fairly money for education. We distribute money fairly among LEAs, and it is then for each LEA to ensure that its funding formula recognises the different needs within its boundaries.

In Leicestershire, which is a large and diverse county, there will be difficult issues in the construction of any formula, but if my hon. Friend feels that pupils in his constituency or that of Loughborough are getting a raw deal from the Leicestershire funding formula, I am afraid that I have to point him towards local democracy and decisions made in county hall in Leicestershire. I do not decide the funding formula that local authorities use for the distribution of money to schools, but I can assure him that similar pupils in Leicestershire are treated similarly for the distribution DFES grants.

I want to address some specific points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough, including the problems that have occurred this year and how we can get over them in the next two years, as they are obviously of central concern to teachers, governors and head teachers in the county.

My hon. Friend referred to the area cost adjustment. It is important to note the basis on which we distribute that money. We recognise that some local authorities have to adopt special measures to recruit and retain teachers, which means that they face extra costs, such as additional allowances to help recruit and retain staff, the cost of supply cover for vacant posts—it is worth noting that the vacancy rate in Leicestershire is now 0.6 per cent., relatively low by national standards—and the cost of recruiting and advertising for staff. The allowance is not based on teachers' pay scales, which are national—except for the inner-London allowance—because those scales do not fully reflect the differences in the costs of recruitment and retention. That is why we based the additional cost allowance on wage differentials around the country. I assure my hon. Friend that there is no political interference in that. The basis on which those wage differentials are calculated is a matter of national record.

I will now move on to some of the problems that have occurred this year, and how we propose to get out of them over the next two—

4.40 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.55 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Miliband: I shall try to regain my flow and passion with as much authenticity as I can manage, having lost some hon. Members and our friends from the media, who have obviously had their fill.

It is important to recognise that schools in some parts of the country have suffered genuine problems this year. There were significant changes to the local government funding system, and the changes in the standards fund hit individual schools hard. We are trying to overcome that in moving towards our goal of ensuring that every school has a three-year budget on which it can rely and on which it can plan. That must be the aim for anybody interested in sensible budget management.

The way in which we intend to do things this year addresses the acute issue of the responsibility of local government not merely to raise money for education but to distribute it fairly within its boundaries. The whole point of a constitutional settlement that gives an important role to local government is that local government can recognise the pockets of disadvantage and the needs within an area of which it is impossible for central Government in Whitehall to take proper account. I hope that local government will take those responsibilities seriously.

David Taylor: There has been significant progress in education since 1997, but it is starting to stall in some areas, including my constituency. Class sizes are drifting up, old textbooks are not being replaced, there is less support and contact time for teachers and there are fewer extra-curricular activities. Those are the sorts of things about which I receive letters as, no doubt, do other Leicestershire Members.

Mr. Miliband: I understand the dangers, but I would urge the hon. Member to ensure that schools and the LEA are in serious dialogue about the distribution of funds. This year, we need to deliver a minimum per-pupil increase for every school in the country. That has never been done before, and it means that the variation within the county should be reduced. Every school is guaranteed a per-pupil increase of at least 4 per cent. We have given an LEA floor of 5 per cent. Last year, the per-pupil increase for Leicestershire was 3.2 per cent.; it was a floor authority. This year it is 5 per cent. That gives an immediate and significant infusion of extra funds to help in 2004–05 and beyond, because it is built into the baseline.

My hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough referred to the figure of £3.7 million. That is on top of the higher per-pupil floor for the LEA; in addition to the 5 per cent. increase, there is £3.7 million of transitional support designed to target precisely those schools that have an overhang from this year. We are fulfilling our responsibility to recognise some of the problems that have existed this year and to play our part in overcoming them. In addition, we have reversed the plans to reduce the amount of standards fund being distributed over the next two years.

We all wait with eager anticipation to hear from the School Teachers Review Body, which will next week reveal its conclusions about school teachers' pay for the next two and a half years. Anybody who claims to know what budget problems they will have in that period before the figures are known knows something that I do not. Nobody can say whether they have problems or surpluses until they know about teachers' pay.

In conclusion, I recognise the passion and conviction that hon. Members bring to the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough will know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State met an all-party delegation from Leicestershire earlier this year to talk about the problems there, and numerous parliamentary and other questions have been asked. I appreciate the spirit in which he has suggested that those discussions should continue. There is close dialogue at official level, and if he tells me that there is a need for further dialogue at ministerial level, I shall respond well to his suggestion.

David Taylor: I hope that those discussions will address the serious point that 4,500 pupils a day from the much better funded city are educated in the county. Perhaps something ought to be done to bridge that funding gap. That will be very helpful.

Mr. Miliband: It will be an interesting discussion. I suggest that we focus our attention on how to help Leicestershire schools over the next two and a half years. Stability in our funding formula is an important element, but we are guaranteed extra money on top of that. That can be put to good use by Leicestershire schools and I look forward to working with hon. Members to achieve that.

Question put and agreed to.

Export Controls

[Relevant documents: First joint report from the Defence, Foreign Affairs, International Development and Trade and Industry Committees, Session 2002–03, on the Government's proposals for secondary legislation under the Export Control Act 2002, HC 620, and the Government's response thereto, Cm 5988; and the second joint report, Session 2002–03, Strategic Export Controls—Annual Report for 2001, Licensing Policy and Policy Scrutiny, HC 474, and the Government's response thereto, Cm 5943.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Charlotte Atkins.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Roger Berry (Kingswood): It is a pleasure to open this debate on the latest two reports of the Quadripartite Committee.

I am aware that the Select Committee on International Development meets at 3.15 pm, and that some members of that Committee want to speak in this debate. I will therefore try to be brief and speak for only 15 or 20 minutes to enable colleagues to contribute to the debate before they have to leave. If there is time later in the debate, I might, with permission, be able to finish what I had planned to say.

I thank my colleagues on the Committee for their efforts in producing yet another unanimous report. I also thank our Clerks for their excellent drafting and advice, and all those who gave written and oral evidence to the Committee, especially Saferworld, Oxfam, the United Kingdom working group on arms, the Defence Manufacturers Association, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Foreign Secretary.

The Committee again congratulates the Government on the significant progress that they have made in recent years in many areas of arms export control, including the development of consolidated criteria, the introduction of the ban on the export of torture equipment, the Landmines Act 1998, the Export Control Act 2002, and their annual reports, which improve and become more helpful every year and have facilitated greater transparency and accountability.

On behalf of the Committee, I acknowledge yet again the significant progress that has been made in recent years in opening up this important debate on arms export control policy. However, serious issues remain, which the Committee and others outside this place would like the Government to address, such as: licensed production overseas; prior parliamentary scrutiny; the implications for licence decisions of the "war on terror"; the application of end-use conditions; and brokering and trafficking.

I doubt that anyone would argue with the statement that the need for rigorous control of the international arms trade has never been greater. Those who have read the recent report published by Oxfam and Amnesty International, "Shattered Lives", will have had that need reconfirmed in their minds. Every year, more than 500,000 people are killed, and thousands are maimed and forced from their homes. We want to be assured that our Government are doing everything possible to end that situation.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): I recognise the case that Oxfam and others are making, but the hon. Gentleman should be clear that we already have a rigorous arms export control regime, and that our defence exporters are responsible people. When he links our attempts to engage in export control and the wilful distribution of low-level weapons that cause mayhem in other countries, the public might think that he is connecting that trade with British exporters, when there is little evidence that any British exporter is involved.

Mr. Berry: The hon. Gentleman well knows my views on the matter. Not only do I recognise the legitimate business activities of UK companies that export arms lawfully, but I have argued, and will repeat today, that the UK has the toughest arms export control regime in Europe. Indeed, I have just congratulated the Government on that very policy. However, I return to the point that no one, having read the report published by Oxfam and Amnesty International, can seriously disagree with the proposition that, given the slaughter and maiming that occur as a result of the use of unlawful weapons, we should have greater control over the international arms trade.

There are more selfish reasons why we should control the arms trade rigorously. When a country is engaged in conflict, it is natural to ask who supplied the other side with the weapons. When a country or a group of countries is concerned about the threat of terrorism, and the fight against it, it is perfectly legitimate to ask who is supplying arms to the terrorists. Of course we want an assurance that our Government are doing everything possible to ensure that arms do not get to terrorists in situations in which the UK Government is able to exercise controls. I do not apologise for saying that any sensible person would wish to see a rigorous regime of international arms trade control.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman has missed my point. We know that Britain is the second largest exporter of defence equipment in the world—our major companies are represented in constituencies all over the United Kingdom. I ask him to confirm that he recognises not only that the Government are doing their bit but that our arms exporters are responsible people, who share his concerns and mine.

Mr. Berry: I have already referred to the Defence Manufacturers Association and expressed gratitude for its evidence to the Committee. I have constituents who work for BAE Systems, Rolls-Royce and other companies with business interests in the arms trade. I do not criticise lawful arms exports, nor would I argue—I never have done—against the arms trade. All I am saying is that because of the problems in conflict zones around the world, and because of the war against terrorism, we need to address the issue very seriously. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me to continue and will not seek to put words in my mouth.

[Mr. Berry]

United Kingdom legislation regulates only the export of arms from the UK. There is nothing to prevent UK individuals or companies from exporting arms from some other country. It would be no surprise if I were to say that the first thing that someone might consider, if he thought that he would not get a licence to export arms from the UK, would be to try to do it from somewhere else. That is what arms brokers do. There are many examples, but I shall not bore hon. Members with more than the one that is frequently cited: the British company, Mil-Tec, which was linked with weapons shipments to Hutu militias responsible for the 1994 Rwanda massacre. Such activities remain perfectly legal under UK law if the weapons do not touch British soil.

The Quadripartite Committee's report on the draft Export Control Bill, published in May 2001, concluded that "there are compelling arguments in favour of extending controls on brokering and trafficking to activities outside the country", and recommended unanimously that

"controls be introduced on the activities of UK citizens and companies wherever they take place."

The Government seemed to arrive at the same conclusion before the 2001 general election, because there was a clear commitment in the manifesto:

"We will legislate to modernise the regulation of arms exports, with a licensing system to control the activities of arms brokers and traffickers wherever they are located."

We used the phrase, "wherever they take place", whereas the Labour party manifesto used the phrase, "wherever they are located". I think that they mean the same thing, but others may disagree.

I welcome many things in the Export Control Act, as does the Committee, and in particular section 4, which for the first time gives the Government the power to impose controls on trafficking and brokering conducted by UK citizens anywhere in the world. That is a welcome and long overdue provision and should be applauded. Unfortunately, however, the Government's proposals show that they believe that the actions of UK citizens overseas should be regulated only where they relate to trade either in long-range missiles or in torture equipment, or to an embargoed destination. For trade in other controlled equipment, a licence will therefore be required only if the trafficking or brokering takes place in the UK.

That is a serious weakness in the Government's proposals under the Export Control Act. Such controls would not even attempt, for example, to prevent UK arms brokers overseas from transferring weapons such as machine guns to the war-torn Ivory Coast, to FARC rebels in Colombia or to the Lord's Resistance Army in Uganda. There is no way that the Government's proposals would influence such transactions, nor would they control British arms dealers overseas who wanted to supply surface-to-air missiles, for example, to Governments who have been accused of sponsoring terrorism—such as, some would say, Syria, Lebanon and Saudi Arabia.

Those are examples of how the Government's proposals, welcome though they are, do not go far enough. It is the Committee's view that if national controls alone are applied to trade in arms, those involved in repugnant aspects of the arms trade—I make this point for the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth)—will simply go abroad. That is why extraterritorial controls are necessary. The Committee argues that it would be a missed opportunity if the Government failed to regulate all UK citizens and companies involved in overseas trafficking and brokering activities that would not be granted a licence in the UK if conducted in the UK.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): Sometimes that can have a direct effect: for example, I have for many years been pursuing our licensing of arms exports to Morocco. In itself, Morocco will never cause us any particular problems, but it has illegally annexed Western Sahara. It is therefore right to ask whether any arms that are exported to Morocco can be used to subjugate Western Sahara. That is a direct example of why we need to be tough in controlling export licences.

Mr. Berry: I agree.

I should like briefly to address the Government's concerns about the Committee's position, so as to allow time to the Chairman of the International Development Committee, the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), before he has to go. The Government have argued several things, one of which is that extraterritorial controls, on small arms for example, would be unenforceable owing to the lack of an international agreement, and that an attempt to enforce them would, under the circumstances,

"expose the futility of such a unilateral approach and undermine the credibility of our strategic export . . . control regime".

That was in their response to recommendation 7.

I have been impressed by the campaign run by Amnesty International and Oxfam in support of an international arms trade treaty. If the Minister wants to declare full Government support for that, no one in this Chamber will be happier than me. However, until we have an international arms trade treaty that addresses the issue, we must do the best we can. Of course, the Government are committed to attempting to enforce extraterritorial controls in relation to long-range missiles, torture equipment and exports to embargoed destinations. Why are the difficulties greater when enforcing extraterritorial controls for small arms? I do not believe that they are.

The United States applies full extraterritorial controls; so do a number of other countries. Do the Government believe that those controls seriously undermine the credibility of the US export control regime? If they do, given that we rightly export arms to the United States, perhaps questions should be asked. To use their own terminology, do they believe that the US approach is "futile"? I do not believe that it is.

It has also been said that it would be "unreasonable" to expect a UK citizen living and working abroad to be aware of UK laws on arms brokering of conventional weapons, small arms and the like to non-embargoed destinations. However, under the Government's own proposals, the same person would be expected to be aware that they would be subject to the new law with regard to the brokering of long-range missiles and their components, torture equipment and exports to UK-embargoed destinations.

I fail to understand how it can be reasonable to assume that UK citizens should be aware of some parts of the new legislation but not others. With respect, I must say that the Government response is entirely unconvincing. In their response to recommendation 6, the Government went on to say that extraterritorial control would be likely to lead to "conflicts of jurisdiction where other countries take a different view to us on individual cases".

However, the Government already propose to assert extraterritorial controls on the brokering of torture equipment and on destinations subject to a national embargo. In both cases there is no international consensus.

The concern about the conflict of jurisdiction is also thrown into doubt when we recognise that the Government address such concerns more sensibly in other areas. For example, under of the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 bribery is a criminal offence under UK law when committed anywhere in the world by a UK citizen. Why is bribery more self-evidently a criminal act than arms dealing without a licence? Arms can kill. The indirect effect of bribery may be the same, but the direct effect certainly is not.

Why is asserting the legal right to prosecute UK citizens abroad when evidence shows that they have committed acts of bribery and corruption not a problem, whereas doing so when it comes to arms deals is? Do the Government seriously believe that it is easier to obtain a successful prosecution for corrupt payments to foreign officials than for unauthorised trafficking overseas? I do not believe that.

Finally, the Government argued that:

"Extending extra-territorial controls . . . would spread our licensing and enforcement resources ever more thinly, distracting our efforts from enforcing controls on the activities of greatest concern".

They have calculated, however, that the additional costs of their new controls would be £500,000 to £800,000 a year. Those are not large amounts, given our concerns about arms falling into the hands of terrorist organisations.

In the wake of the tragic shootings in Birmingham at the start of the year, the Government announced their intention to allocate significant resources to prevent the illicit trafficking of weapons in the UK. They have identified countries in central and eastern Europe as significant sources of such weapons. Those countries have also been identified as the sources of illicit weapons that are exported to conflict zones around the world.

The information and co-operation needed to prevent illicit arms entering the UK can and should be used to enforce controls on arms brokering overseas. Yesterday, the all-party group on gun crime published a significant report. One of its recommendations, which I believe was unanimous, was that part of the response to the gun crime problem in the UK should be full extraterritorial control on arms brokers.

I concentrate on this issue not because other issues are not important but because I passionately believe that the Government have yet to get it right. The Committee's unanimous view is that the Government should fulfil their election manifesto commitment to tackle those who engage in arms brokering and trafficking. I repeat that I very much welcome the significant progress of the proposals for legislation, and I hope that no one will interpret my comments as a suggestion that the Government are making anything other than dramatic progress, which is long overdue. However, by failing to tackle brokering, their proposals fail to tackle one of the main causes of suffering and instability around the world, and that is why the issue should be addressed again.

Tony Baldry (Banbury): The hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) has chaired the Quadripartite Committee with great skill, and managed to steer it to produce an excellent report with unanimous conclusions. It is not easy to bring together four Select Committees with diverse views.

I apologise to you, Mr. Benton, and to the Minister and the Chamber, because the Select Committee on International Development is taking evidence from the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for International Development this afternoon, so the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Colman) and I, and other members of the International Development Committee, will have to leave fairly soon to take that evidence. Therefore, I will keep my comments as brief as possible.

On Tuesday, the House debated African development strategies. During that debate, many hon. Members raised concerns about conflict constricting development. The Under-Secretary of State for International Development responded to those concerns at the close of the debate, when he stated that the Government

"are spending a total of £110 million specifically on conflict management and prevention activities. Much of that amount is spent on UN operations, such as those that took place in the Congo. However, we are also working on security sector reform, reducing the prevalence of small arms and carrying out peace-building work."—[Official Report, 4 November 2003; Vol. 412, c. 767.]

I do not doubt that the UK is investing such sums for peacekeeping in Africa, but such spending is often negated by aspects of the UK's defence export control legislation, which hampers international development and allows for the proliferation of small arms in Africa and elsewhere.

Small arms account for nearly all combat deaths in developing countries. In some parts of Africa, every child appears to have an AK45. It is terrifying to hear what the Lord's Resistance Army has been doing in northern Uganda, and what was happening in Sierra Leone before the UN and British forces intervened. Practically every child seemed to have an AK45. Poverty fuels conflict and conflict fuels poverty. Civil wars leave countries poorer, with many more people living in absolute poverty. Almost all the countries that have recently had civil wars are developing countries. Nearly half the countries with the highest defence burden have the lowest indicators of development. Angola and Eritrea, for example, spend more than 20 per cent. of their gross domestic product on the military. Indonesia, the second highest recipient of net overseas aid, spends almost the same sum on its military forces as it receives in development aid. Pakistan's total defence spending consumes a third of its GDP at the same time as its servicing of debt on loans to finance defence purchases rises to 50 per cent.

[Tony Baldry]

Overall, some $22 billion a year is spent on arms by countries in Africa, Asia, the middle east and Latin America. That sum would enable those countries to be well on track to meet the millennium development goals by 2015—to achieve primary education for all and to meet the UN's targets to reduce infant and maternal mortality.

Those stark facts are highlighted not by the Quadripartite Committee's report but by "Shattered Lives: The Case for Tough International Arms Control", the report that was recently published by Oxfam and Amnesty International. I know that hon. Members are conscious of the report, much of which reinforces the conclusions and recommendations of the Quadripartite Committee's report.

The Committee has been speaking much the same language as the "Shattered Lives" report. One need only reflect on the Committee's recommendations in 2001 about sustainable development and enforcement of the EU's criterion 8 on arms exports, with respect to the Export Control Act 2002. Given much of the language used by Ministers during its passage—at least by Ministers from the Department for International Development—it is disconcerting that it is still necessary to raise concerns about the likely effectiveness of the 2002 Act and, now, its secondary legislation.

I shall not repeat what I said in the House on Third Reading. I simply say that putting sustainable development in the schedule to the Bill was a start, but was not nearly enough. From my perspective as Chairman of the International Development Committee, the Quadripartite Committee's report supports the case for robust checks on arms brokering and end use, and robust prior scrutiny.

I believe that the Quadripartite Committee's report supports many of the recommendations in "Shattered Lives". The Oxfam and Amnesty International campaign is sensibly seeking the adoption of the UN's arms trade treaty by the time of the 2006 UN review conference on small arms. Such a treaty would be legally binding and would help to ensure that the international community worked together to the same standards to prevent the irresponsible transfer of arms and to seek to prevent violations of international human rights and humanitarian law. The UK should champion such an arms trade treaty.

The Quadripartite Committee's report also demonstrates the need for the Government to take action domestically. It shows the need to create new international instruments to prevent irresponsible arms brokering, transporting and financing, and foreign licensed production, using the arms trade treaty criteria to define and prevent irresponsible transfers; to establish independent mechanisms to bring to justice, without delay, those who perpetrate serious violations of international human rights or humanitarian law, ensuring that such violations are adequately punished and other steps are taken to end impunity; and to enforce existing legislation or create new legislation to control the import, export, transit, production, management and use of all arms.

The standards outlined in the arms trade treaty should be used when taking decisions on national arms exports, ensuring that human rights, international humanitarian law and sustainable development do not suffer as a consequence of commercial pressure. Transparency and oversight should be ensured by the provision of regular and meaningful information to the public about the production, possession and transfer of arms; the reports should be subject to regular review by legislatures and parliaments.

It is therefore of some concern that the Financial Times—a periodical not known for being left-leaning—reported last month, about the measures that we are discussing, that

"the legislation will fail to include regulations permitting law enforcement agencies to prosecute Britons who sell small arms illegally outside the country. The legislation is also expected to omit other regulations, including a register for UK arms dealers and a requirement that all arms contracts include end-user certification, which would allow British authorities to ensure that dual-use technologies had been used for non-military purposes. Similar regulations are in place in several leading arms-exporting countries, including the US."

One of the questions that we need to ask the Government is why we are doing less than the United States in this context? My hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) accurately observed that the UK is one of the largest defence equipment exporters in the world. The United States' defence exports outstrip ours by a considerable factor. If the United States can feel confident with that legislation, why cannot the United Kingdom?

That approach contrasts sharply with recent international developments on trafficking and brokering activities, including the EU common position on brokering of June 2003, and the statement of understanding on arms brokerage adopted by the Wassenaar arrangement in December 2002. In response to the Committee's report, the Government stated that they remain

"convinced that the most effective way of preventing the illicit trade in small arms is through multi-lateral action."

However, it is slightly difficult to reconcile that statement with the Government's response to the launch of the "Shattered Lives" report.

Let us further consider the secondary legislation. The Government have rejected calls from the Quadripartite Committee to introduce full extraterritorial controls on arms brokering. In response to the Committee's report, they stated:

"The new controls will criminalise anyone trading, without a licence, in military equipment from the UK or a UK person anywhere trading in 'Restricted Goods' and in arms to embargoed destinations. This latter control should capture many of the circumstances in which arms are transferred to areas of conflict or rogue States."

That statement contrasts considerably with the commitments that the Minister made to me during the passage of the Export Control Bill. In a letter dated 21 February 2002, he said:

"there is no question of the Government going back on its manifesto commitment in this area."

Unfortunately, the Government response to the Quadripartite Committee does not support that claim; rather, it suggests a somewhat stunted ambition on the part of the Government to attempt to control brokering.

It is simply not enough to design legislation to capture, in the words of the Government report, "many of the circumstances". That is a very loose line to take.

Comprehensive controls are required. The measure will not capture many of the circumstances in which arms are transferred to areas of conflict or rogue states. It will not prevent UK arms brokers overseas from transferring machine guns and helicopters to the Lord's Resistance Army in Uganda, FARC rebels in Colombia or the war-torn Ivory Coast. It will also still be legal for UK dealers to supply surface-to-air missiles to countries whose Governments have been accused of sponsoring terrorism, such as Lebanon, Saudi Arabia and Syria. Unless the secondary legislation is tightened, the risk will remain that arms brokers will carry out activities overseas to sidestep the legislation.

Similarly, the Government made it clear to the Committee that they believe that the proposed legislation

"would also be likely to lead to conflicts of jurisdiction where other countries take a different view to us on individual cases, and to enforcement difficulties and administrative overload."

That is nonsense. Ministers already propose to exert such controls on the brokering of certain torture equipment and arms to destinations subject to a national embargo, so if they can do that there, why not elsewhere? That raises the question whether the Government believe that it will be easier to obtain a prosecution for corrupt payments to foreign officials made overseas than for the unauthorised trafficking in conventional weapons to a non-embargoed destination. I do not understand the logic in that, so I would welcome clarification from the Minister today.

In evidence to the Quadripartite Committee on 3 April, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry referred to controls where any part of the transaction, including an email, fax or telephone call, takes place in the UK. However, in response to a question about a company being able to enter into a provisional agreement relating to the sale of equipment that it owns in one overseas country to another overseas country before acquiring the licence, the Secretary of State said that a licence would be required only when a commitment was entered into.

On that basis, there is clearly the risk that UK regulations could be avoided by carrying out the marketing and promoting in the UK, while brokering the deal offshore. Such a loophole needs to be closed by the Government, and the most straightforward and effective approach would be to license all arms transfers brokered by UK persons, regardless of their whereabouts. If all transfers are regulated, the control of negotiations becomes redundant.

I alluded to the Minister reaffirming the Government's manifesto commitment on export controls. As the hon. Member for Kingswood, who chairs the Quadripartite Committee, acknowledged, the Labour party's 1997 manifesto contained the commitment to "strengthen monitoring of the end-use of defence exports to prevent diversion to third countries and to ensure that exported equipment is used only on the conditions under which the export licence has been granted".

The Government have failed to introduce an effective end-use monitoring system. In the past year, several reports have surfaced regarding the diversion of military equipment from third countries into Iraq, and to Jordan, Ukraine, United Arab Emirates and Yemen, all countries to which the Government authorised weapon sales in 2001, a number of which were suspected of being links in the Iraqi military equipment supply chain.

In February it emerged that UK forces had found UK-made equipment in an Iraqi weapons store outside Basra, and Ministry of Defence sources were reported to have said that the find highlighted the threat from the burgeoning black market arms trade across the middle east.

Obviously, that raises a number of questions, yet the Government declare themselves satisfied that existing pre-licensing checks are sufficient to prevent diversion or unauthorised export, and refuse to institute a system of end-use monitoring. That leads me to the subject of prior parliamentary scrutiny.

The Quadripartite Committee has long called for the introduction of prior parliamentary scrutiny, but Ministers continue to reject it. The Committee's report recommends that the Government come up with proposals for a system of prior parliamentary scrutiny of export licence applications by a Select Committee or Committees of the House. I agree. That same letter of 21 February said that the Government believe that the system of prior parliamentary scrutiny of individual export licence applications cannot be made to work without having a materially adverse impact on the efficiency and effectiveness of the export licensing process, and risks making Parliament complicit in the eventual licensing decision.

Ministers are clearly seeking to say that there is some sort of constitutional impediment to proper prior scrutiny. I do not think so—there is no constitutional impediment that would prevent Parliament from legislating to give itself a role in scrutinising arms export licences, it is simply that Ministers do not wish to enable Parliament to have a greater say or role in this activity.

The impact of small arms on the lack of development in many parts of the world, especially in several parts of Africa, is self-evident to anyone who reads a newspaper. If we are to have an Export Control Act, it is essential that it is effective, as if it is not, it is not worth having. The International Development Committee will shortly be considering the impact of small arms on migration. I hope that the Quadripartite Committee in its next work will want to consider the calls for the strongest possible United Nations arms trade treaty by 2006.

3.7 pm

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling): Let me say at the outset that although the Government's policy on arms export control still has some material shortcomings, which I will refer to, the present Government since 1997 have made the most enormous strides in achieving a quantum leap in accountability, openness and transparency to the House, and therefore to the wider public, on the issue of arms exports.

Indeed, I do not believe there is any Government, probably in the world, who produce a document that in terms of comprehensiveness and detail is equivalent to the United Kingdom strategic export controls annual report. The Government should be commended for producing such a document, and within the word "Government" I most emphatically include a commendation of the civil servants in the four Departments who put in a great deal of effort to provide the House, and therefore the wider public, with the information in the annual report.

I hope that this does not sound self-serving as far as the Quadripartite Committee is concerned, but having been privileged to serve on the Committee since its inception, I believe that the progress that has been made in achieving greater parliamentary accountability and public accountability on arms exports owes quite a bit to the intensive work that the Committee has done in scrutinising the Government's policy and pressing for additional improvements. If it has made a significant contribution, that has been due in no small measure to the excellent chairmanship of Ted Rowlands, the former hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil, in the previous Parliament, and the equally excellent chairmanship of the hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) in this Parliament.

Those are the bouquets. I now have one or two brambles. They are significant brambles that were highlighted by the hon. Member for Kingswood and by my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry). I want to make my own comments on the issue of prior parliamentary scrutiny. I was among a small group of members of the Committee in the last Parliament who visited Sweden and the United States, the two countries that for some years have had a system of prior parliamentary scrutiny of their arms exports. Sweden is a fellow EU member country with a not insignificant arms export business, certainly historically, and the United States is far and away the most significant arms exporter in the world. Our inescapable conclusion from those two visits was that it is definitely possible to operate a prior parliamentary scrutiny system without improperly curtailing the freedom of ministerial decision making and without adversely affecting the competitiveness of the arms export business of those two countries.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Nigel Griffiths): I do not want to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but did the report not conclude that the system in operation in Sweden

"could not readily be translated into a UK parliamentary context"?

Did it not also highlight four weaknesses of the American system, without coming up with four solutions?

Sir John Stanley: I certainly acknowledge that every country's parliamentary system and the interface between the Executive and the legislature in each country will be different. If we produced our own system of prior parliamentary scrutiny, we would no doubt make it compatible with the way in which we operate here. That does not detract from my main point, that both those countries, in the context of their parliamentary and congressional systems, have been able to run a system of prior parliamentary scrutiny without the dire impact that the Government have consistently and mistakenly forecast would happen if such a scrutiny system were operated here.

If the Government were prepared to show more flexibility, it would be possible to operate a satisfactory system of prior parliamentary scrutiny here. An accommodation could be reached if they were less stony-faced and more willing to accept some give and take and to allow the Quadripartite Committee to proceed on a selective basis. We are looking only at a selective basis in relation to major export contracts and contracts that are particularly sensitive in terms of foreign policy. Once again, I urge the Government to take a fresh look at this, to show more flexibility and to try to work with the Committee to see whether we can reach a middle-ground position that would enable some prior parliamentary scrutiny to take place.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil): The right hon. Gentleman and I visited Sweden and the United States. In both cases, the relationship between the legislature and the Executive is different from ours. Our Executive holds powers that are not quite unaccountable but certainly of an inaccessible character in relation to the legislature. It is on that basis that they are not prepared to give anything up—hence the asinine but well-intentioned intervention from the Minister. The Executive and their creatures in Government will not concede one iota on giving the legislature an opportunity to second-guess. That is the fundamental constitutional point with which we, as a group of legislators confronting the Executive, must contend.

Sir John Stanley: I will leave to the hon. Gentleman the choice terminology of criticism that he made of those on his own Front Bench. I endorse the broad thrust of what he said, but I hope that we can achieve some accommodation. In certain areas, the Government have made important progress in prior consultation. They have made important changes in relation to the prior scrutiny of legislation and of major decisions.

On 18 March, the Government gave the British Parliament and the House of Commons the opportunity to be consulted and to vote on the issue of peace and war. They were the first Government to do that, and I commend them for it. If they can do that, surely it is possible to have prior consultation with the Quadripartite Committee on an altogether less massive decision on individual export cases. I urge the Government to consider the subject afresh and show more flexibility than they have hitherto, in the light of the views expressed today.

I will now move on to the Government's policy on trafficking and brokering. When the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry appeared before the Quadripartite Committee on 3 April, I expressed deep scepticism about the adequacy of the Government's policy. Their brokering provisions cover just three areas. The first, which is self-evidently desirable, is brokered sales to destinations under an embargo, and those are rightly included in the parameters of the legislation. Beyond that, only two other areas of military goods and equipment are covered by the legislation. The first area is torture equipment, and I still hold the view that the definition of torture equipment is too limited; the second is missiles, but only those with a range in excess of 300 km.

I had to go to a Clerk to discover the definition of torture equipment employed by the Government for the legislation, and which items of torture equipment fall within the extraterritorial brokering provisions. Other hon. Members may have found it easier, but in case they had the same difficulty, and for anyone interested outside, it is necessary to look at the schedule to the Trade in Goods (Control) Order 2003. In paragraph 1, the reader is directed to

"Any good falling within paragraph c. or g. of PL5001 in Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods, Transfer of Technology and Provision of Technical Assistance (Control) Order 2003."

Looking at paragraphs c. and g. of the second statutory instrument, one finally finds a reference to those items of torture equipment that fall within the ambit of this anti-brokering legislation. It is worth reading out those items for the record. They include leg irons, gang chains, electric shock belts, various dimensions of handcuffs, various dimensions and types of shackles, and certain portable devices for the purpose of riot control or self-protection by the administration of an electric shock. The list is limited to those items. Hon. Members may think that it sounds comprehensive, but it does not take much further thought to realise that it excludes a substantial number of items that could be regarded as torture equipment.

I stress to the Minister that the definition is seriously inadequate. It is far too limited. I will repeat the illustration that I gave when the Committee met the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I reminded the Committee that one form of torture used—I fear that it may still be used—in Northern Ireland, by paramilitaries on both sides, is a particularly foul use of the handgun. The handgun is not used in the conventional way, but is placed at the back of the knee, in order to shoot out people's kneecaps. That is torture, by any definition, and is a commonplace form of so-called punishment shooting by paramilitaries. Handguns are wholly excluded from the definition of torture equipment. No doubt there are many other types of military goods and other equipment that could be used to inflict torture on people. The Minister should continue to examine very critically the definition of torture equipment as laid down in the statutory instruments. It is wholly inadequate and should be widened significantly.

The second item concerns missiles. I shall repeat what I said to the Secretary of State when she appeared before the Committee. The policy of including within the legislation only long-range missiles with a range in excess of 300 km seems to me to be unsustainable and, in the present terrorist environment, wholly irresponsible. When I raised that issue with the Secretary of State, I received a disturbing reply. I will quote the exchange that took place between us on 3 April, as reported in paragraph 112.

I asked the Secretary of State:

"How can you defend missiles above 300 k and not shorter?"

The Secretary of State, who was accompanied by her official, Mr. Glyn Williams, replied:

"I wonder whether Mr. Williams would like to comment on that because I am not aware of the detailed thinking on that one."

I found that an extraordinary reply. I commend her for her candour, and in fairness, she went on to give a generalised response to my question. However, I found it extraordinary that, in speaking about such a significant policy decision—to restrict the ambit of this legislation to missiles with a range of 300 km or longer—the Secretary of State could say to the Committee that she was not aware of the detailed thinking on that policy issue.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): Does that mean that surface-to-air missiles of the type that were used in Mombasa against an Israeli charter aircraft, or that may indeed have been used more recently against aircraft taking off from Heathrow, would not come under the legislation?

Sir John Stanley: My hon. Friend, with his usual acumen, has anticipated a point that I was about to reach.

The Government have got their policy back to front on the brokering of missiles. I do not know whether there is any history of brokering long-range surface-to-surface missiles, but I am certain that the concentration of brokering activity is on short-range missiles, including surface-to-surface and surface-to-air missiles, and even rocket-propelled grenade launchers. That is where brokers are active and where huge amounts of military goods could be available to terrorist groups. I will not advocate the removal of the provisions affecting brokers of longer-range missiles, but the Government must address the question of shorter-range missiles.

I urge the Minister to reflect on known events that have taken place in the past few months. An El-Al civil airliner, on take-off from Nairobi airport, was fired at by a terrorist organisation with a surface-to-air missile, which according to reports missed by just a few metres. The infrared locking-on device was apparently programmed for a fast jet take-off aircraft rather than the much slower-moving civil airliner. If the missile had hit, all the passengers and crew would be dead.

We have also seen one or more full-scale security alerts at Heathrow, backed up with full military deployment, because of intelligence about a possible surface-to-air missile attack on civil airliners taking off from Heathrow. As has been widely reported, a British citizen, Mr Hemant Lakhani, was arrested in the United States while he was allegedly trying to sell up to 50 Russian surface-to-air missiles. The intelligence services should be warmly congratulated on the success of that operation, which happily thwarted that attempt. Tragically, there have also been continuing deaths among Coalition forces in Iraq from rocket-propelled grenades, and in the past few days we have seen the worst ever number of casualties as a result of the downing of a Chinook, apparently by a surface-to-air missile.

Every one of those terrorist events or threatened events would have fallen outside the provisions of the current and proposed legislation, and I am in no doubt that the Quadripartite Committee's recommendation on trafficking and brokering, which we agreed unanimously, was right. In paragraph 50 of the report, we said:

"We recommend that the Government should seek to extend extraterritorial control to all trafficking and brokering which, if conducted in the UK, would not be granted a licence."

[Sir John Stanley]

I am certain that on this policy issue the Committee has got it right and the Government have got it seriously wrong. I urge them to adopt the Quadripartite Committee's policy as quickly as possible.

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): Before I call the next speaker, I should point out that a number of people still want to speak and that I propose to start the winding-up speeches, subject to any Divisions in the House, at 4.40 pm. I ask hon. Members to bear that in mind, so that we can try to allow everyone to speak.

3.29 pm

Sue Doughty (Guildford): I welcome the first joint report. It sets out clearly some of our problems with the proposed secondary legislation. I recognise—albeit slightly grudgingly—the huge progress that the Government have made with controlling arms exports with increased transparency. I certainly support the words of the Chairman of the Quadripartite Committee and the report: there is a long way to go yet. The report sets out clearly the outstanding issues that need to be addressed. In particular, I share the worries that have been expressed about full extraterritorial controls on arms broking. At a time when there is so much arms proliferation throughout the world—we have heard about the problems of arms and their end use—it seems that we are backing off from putting controls in place.

The Government have said that it would be difficult to prove the part played by United Kingdom nationals and that it would not be worth the effort to try to do so. I do not know whether they think that, if they do not close such a loophole, arms brokers will just stay in the UK and desist from such activities. That is not so. Arms brokers will go overseas, do the deal and return. We are almost encouraging such behaviour.

The Government should require that all arms brokers who hold United Kingdom passports operate under a licence. If not, what else could happen? Worries have already been expressed by the Irish Government about there being nothing to stop arms brokers flying to Ireland to conduct business. At this critical stage, the last thing that the Irish Government want is for brokers to go to Ireland to sell arms. The loophole will provide an unregulated shop window for brokers.

The Government have proposed to keep a close watch on matters and said that, if evidence comes to light, they will act. However, evidence can be hard to obtain. Given that we know such events will happen, we must have the common sense to act now. A broker who sells 3,000 Kalashnikov rifles may be supporting the further provision of weaponry in countries that have already been ruined by internal conflict. The Chair of the International Development Committee referred to the problems in Africa. In a debate that took place the other day, he raised important points, as he did earlier. He asked how there can be peace when there are so many arms and said that we must ensure that expenditure is on development, not warfare.

Even though some of the countries have peace, it is a fragile peace. The last thing that we want is a lot of guns, small arms and larger munitions washing around in such countries. We have asked the Foreign Office to put pressure on other Governments, but it is becoming a bit late to do that. How many dead bodies need to be counted before the Government decide that prevention is better than cure? In the case under discussion, there is no cure. It is death and war, or nothing.

The Government said that they could not alone realistically hope to control all exports of military goods arranged and undertaken wholly within other states. We have debated whether it is possible to do so. Finland and Poland have fought extraterritorial control over their respective nationals. Belgium is bringing in a law. Austria, the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden all require their residents to apply for licences when brokering arms between third countries. It is essential that we do not wait for a review. We recognise that we have a national responsibility, and we must take that responsibility.

Do the Government believe that the United States and other extraterritorial systems lack credibility? Is that why they will not bring in such proposals? Given that so many other European countries are introducing comprehensive extraterritorial controls on arms brokers, why is the United Kingdom not acting similarly? At present, £1 billion worth of Hawk aircraft are apparently being sold as training planes to India and not for use in combat, yet that is in a territory where, particularly in the mountains of Kashmir, planes need to fly slower, as training craft do. What will happen with those craft? Will they be used in combat? How would we prevent that? Even if they are training craft, do we want to support the training of pilots in a country that is so often in conflict with its neighbours? Should we be easing the path to training for pilots in a country that wants to improve its nuclear capacity? Those exports are worth £1 billion. How many years' support for sustainable development would that money provide?

What is happening with arms exports? The A team go out to sell the goods in India, but those managing the sales are possibly not the A team. The Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for Defence have talks with their opposite numbers—high-profile talks between high-profile politicians. Export priorities come faster than scrutiny of use. When we consider what those planes will be used for, how difficult will it be to say that we will not grant a licence, given the sales team who went ahead and promoted those sales? There are a lot of questions about that.

We have queries about licensed production facilities. The Government have said that they will seek more information from exporters about the intended use of their exports. Those of us outside—the great British public—might ask whether they should not be asking those questions already. We are moving a long way forward, yet we are building delay into what could be a major improvement in the way in which we license exports. How do we know where those facilities will export to, and what controls will be in place at those facilities?

What happens if there is a regime change in Saudi Arabia? What end-user restrictions might be needed and what production ceiling should be in place? Should we not ask those questions now and make those points a condition of licence, rather than worrying about the matter later? What do we do when it all goes wrong, and we find that exporters are producing for export to countries that we would not export directly to? Those are major questions.

Parliament has insufficient information. We are not able to scrutinise arms export licences—that is essential. We have historic problems, such as the dubious al-Yamamah deal between BAE Systems, then British Aerospace, and Saudi Arabia. We are still not getting clear answers to those questions and Parliament needs many such answers.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: The hon. Lady has made a serious assertion. She said "the dubious" al-Yamamah project. BAE Systems headquarters are in Farnborough, which I represent—it is near her constituency. Many of her constituents will be employed there. Perhaps she can explain what she thinks is dubious about the al-Yamamah programme?

Sue Doughty: I would like to correct my words to "allegedly dubious". They relate to the articles that have appeared in The Guardian. I will not take up the time of the Chamber on that one deal. They are serious allegations, which have not been proved. However, it would be useful to have more information when such allegations are flying about. The deals may or may not be respectable. However, we do not know what is going on, and Parliament does not have access to that information.

A point was made earlier about the international arms trade treaty proposals made by Amnesty International and Oxfam. I welcome the support that hon. Members, particularly the Chairman of the Quadripartite Committee, have given them because we need legally binding international arms controls. We cannot continue seeing British weapons being used by corrupt Governments at the cost of lives, stability and economic stability. We need to monitor that, instead of saying, "Yes, there are all these guns in Iraq and, gosh, isn't it difficult to bring about peace?"

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Lady said that British Governments—by definition, she means this Government—have exported to corrupt Governments around the world. Will she be more explicit?

Sue Doughty: Yes, I would be delighted to repeat exactly what I said: we are seeing British weapons being used. I did not say that they were exported directly by the British Government. However, it is a fact that British weapons find their way around the world through third-party deals. That is why we have to accept responsibility and ensure stringent controls. We should be placing stronger and more effective controls on brokers in the first place.

It is not too much to expect the Government to take note of the concerns raised, rightly, in the report. I am an opponent of the arms trade, and that is well known, but that does not mean that the Government and our country should not realise that, if we continue to export arms—and many people's livelihoods depend on that—the Government must accept their responsibilities and do much more to control the business.

3.40 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): This is a useful debate. I join the hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) in expressing revulsion at the tragic waste of life around the world as a result of the proliferation of small arms in particular.

I was in the House yesterday when Mr. Parry, the father of Tim Parry, launched an appeal for funds and told us about what the Tim Parry Jonathan Ball Trust is trying to do to bring people together. As part of the launch, there was a presentation, during which a film was shown of some of the atrocities that are being committed throughout the world. No one who sees children aged 13 bearing weapons can feel anything other than huge revulsion, and a duty to do something about the issue and to stop such things happening. The hon. Member for Kingswood and I have that opinion in common.

My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) referred to the AK45; I think that he meant the AK47, which is, of course, Russian, not British, and which is readily available throughout the world. It is the most easily tradeable kind of weapon. It causes the most damage to people's lives and the greatest injury across the world.

Anyone who has been to Peshawar in Pakistan will know that if they drive out of Peshawar towards the border, they will come to a huge arms market where people make whatever small arms people want. I did not venture into it to find out exactly what went on. Instead—rather more calmly—I made my way up the Khyber pass. People at the market make to order whatever weapons the customer wants in a matter of hours or days. The issue that faces us is how to try to deal with that trade.

I am concerned about the effect that the legislation is having on our defence industry, and I make no bones about that. I represent Aldershot, the home of the British Army, and Farnborough, which is the birthplace of British aviation and the main administrative headquarters of BAE Systems, the fourth largest defence contractor in the world. However, I rise to support BAE Systems not because it is in my constituency but as a matter of principle. It is imperative for the defence of the people of our islands that there is a vibrant defence manufacturing capability in this country. Sadly, in order to defend our country, we cannot rely simply on our home market; we have to engage in defence exports in order to ensure economies of scale, so that we can sustain our industry.

Of course, that of itself would be an insufficient argument but there are further moral justifications for the defence industry, and for supporting and approving of its activities. One of them is that we can defend our friends. The hon. Member for Guildford (Sue Doughty) mentioned Hawk sales to India. It is entirely proper to debate whether it is right for the United Kingdom to sell Hawk aircraft to India. The Hawk aircraft is an advanced jet trainer capable of being adapted for more offensive use. The Hawk 200 was developed by British Aerospace for that purpose, but it has not been so used. It is perfectly legitimate for the United Kingdom to support our friends and allies around the world, and one way in which we can do that is to help them to defend themselves. India happens to be a member of the Commonwealth—

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): So is Pakistan.

Mr. Howarth: So is Pakistan, which is why it is entirely right that we should have this debate. I have no problem with that. However, the idea that Hawk aircraft are being exported in the absence of any public debate and that Ministers are secretly negotiating deals without telling anyone is wide of the mark.

Sue Doughty: I object to the implication that I suggested that there were secret sales, because I made no such comment.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Lady came clean towards the end of her comments and said that she was opposed to the arms trade. I am sure that those of her constituents who are employed in that wholly honourable business will take note of that at the next general election.

Sue Doughty: My views on that were known to my electorate at the last election, and they made their decision accordingly.

Mr. Howarth: They will be known even better at the next election, because we shall make sure of that.

It is no good adopting a holier-than-thou attitude. If India did not have access to the Hawk, plenty of similar aircraft are available around the world, and I understand that the Treasury was urging the Ministry of Defence to look at some of the weapons that are available from other parts of the world. I assure the hon. Lady that if we do not export the Hawk to India, plenty of other Governments with similar equipment will be only too keen to take our place, and that they will be a great deal less fussy than even this Government about policing their exports and ensuring that they are used for training purposes rather than adjusted for offensive purposes. She is kidding herself if she thinks that she can stop these exports from the United Kingdom, and the weapons will thereby disappear.

Malcolm Bruce: I hear what the hon. Gentleman is saying but he is inviting us to go down a dangerous avenue. Is he not implying that it would be foolish of us to try to impose standards that are higher than the lowest in the world, on the ground that we would lose business? If that is what he is saying, this debate is pointless.

Mr. Howarth: No, I am not saying that, but I am issuing a warning: this is an important industry in this country. It employs well over 300,000 honourable people, many of whom are constituents of Members in this Chamber.

Mr. Berry: I am one of the joint authors of the two reports. They recognise the important contribution of the UK defence industry to our economy. I do not think that anyone doubts that.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) may have been leading us down that road. I am trying to make the point that it is important to put the matter in context: we are discussing an honourable business that employs many people in this country and contributes to our indigenous ability to defend ourselves.

I agree wholeheartedly with the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) on long-range missiles. I will not repeat what he said, save to draw to the attention of the Chamber the concerns expressed by the Defence Manufacturers Association, which questions why the Government have identified the trade in long-range missiles, unmanned air vehicles and their components as "activities of greatest concern". I hope that the Minister will answer my right hon. Friend's points, because it is inexplicable why long-range missiles and unmanned air vehicles should be restricted goods. Unmanned air vehicles will take on an even greater importance in future developments of defence technology. It is important that we do not do anything that will interfere unnecessarily with that business. However, the DMA states that it is "unaware of any such notorious cases involving LRMs or UAVs or shady gun runners hanging around on street corners in Africa approaching passers by and saying 'Psst . . . wanna to buy a Tomahawk Cruise Missile?'"

That amply makes the point.

Sir John Stanley: I am wholly in favour of long-range missiles in excess of 300 km continuing to be restricted goods. My point was that I also wish to see short-range missiles included in that category. Is my hon. Friend sure about his reference to pilotless aircraft? The only missiles that are within the ambit of the brokering provisions are those that are capable of a range of 300 km or more, and specially designed components for them. If, like me, he is not sure, perhaps the Minister will clarify the point.

Mr. Howarth: I am afraid that I cannot enlighten my right hon. Friend. It is for the Minister to explain what the Government have in mind. Clearly, there is some opaqueness about this, and it would be helpful if it were clarified.

The industry has had a long-standing concern that the new legislation could impose excessive burdens on it. That applies almost as much today as it ever did. The industry has indicated that the Government have listened to its concerns and have moved towards meeting them. However, we have had a note from the Society of British Aerospace Companies, which represents the aerospace industry. It is concerned about the training implications for its staff. It has been suggested that something like half the staff of BAE Systems—some 25,000 people—will have to be specially trained in how to understand the implications of the legislation. As it is a large company, BAE Systems has a range of training resources at its disposal. The same cannot be said of smaller companies, which are located all over the country: they do not have such resources. I would like the Minister to explain how he proposes to deal with that.

There is also the issue of intangible exports. I understand that the United States of America's regulations mean that when a US business man visits London and opens his laptop computer, he is opening it in a discrete part of the United States, which has moved temporarily to London. However, when a British business man goes to New York or Washington and does the same with his laptop, which contains, of course, all the information about the technology or the deal that he is working on, he is opening it in the United States, and therefore he has exported the knowledge to that country. Those are difficult areas. I should like the Minister to explain how he proposes to deal with what could turn out to be an absolute nightmare, in terms of the conduct of business.

My final concern is a parochial one, about the Farnborough air show in my constituency. I hope that all right hon. and hon. Members have visited the show—or, if they have not, that they will accept an invitation to come to next July's show—because it is one of the greatest air shows in the world. However, it is not just an air show: it is also a trade fair. It has won its place in the world by virtue of the fact that we welcome people from all over the globe, and give other manufacturing nations equal access to the world's markets. That does not happen in quite the same way in Paris, which will surprise some right hon. and hon. Members. American manufacturers, in particular, like coming to the UK because they get a fair crack of the whip.

I understand that some progress is being made on the Farnborough air show, but it has been pointed out that the essence of the business that is conducted there—meeting people, negotiating and signing deals—could be put in jeopardy by the new legislation. In 2000, deals worth about $54 million were signed at the air show. That is a huge sum. Much of that business had, of course, been negotiated in advance, but it was signed at the Farnborough air show. I do not want anything to imperil the air show, and nor do the many UK companies for which it is the major shop window.

I hope that the Minister recognises that the global air show circuit is becoming more competitive, and that Paris is not the only competitor—Dubai, Singapore and other places are also important. The SBAC fears that the new legislation could still create a disincentive to sign major contracts in the UK, and lessen the commercial attractiveness of Farnborough as a global business event, so I hope that the Minister will reassure me on that point.

3.56 pm

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme): Thank you for allowing me to say a few words, Mr. Benton. I shall make some brief remarks about the Committee's recommendations on extraterritorial controls on arms trafficking and brokering, with particular reference to an international arms dealer based in the UK. I raised my concerns about that dealer with my hon. Friend the Minister during the passage of the Export Control Act 2002. I apologise to him for not giving notice beforehand, but I originally planned to have another meeting, which was subsequently cancelled.

Since I was elected two years ago, I have repeatedly raised the issue of military supplies and arms being supplied to Zimbabwe, both for internal repression and to support its military adventures in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. I have highlighted the activities of one John Arnold Bredenkamp, who holds a dual Zimbabwean-Dutch passport but is resident in the UK—indeed, he has residence rights here. He is certainly not small fry, but is one of the Mugabe regime's biggest arms suppliers, from small-calibre weapons right up to—it is reliably understood—MiG Hind attack helicopters from parts of the former Soviet Union. Cleverly, Mr. Bredenkamp supplies those arms via Zimbabwe-incorporated companies, so they are not directly exported from the UK, but his business empire is firmly based in this country—in Berkshire—and he well known in military and intelligence circles.

When the Export Control Act 2002 was passing through the House, my colleagues and I were naturally concerned to establish whether its provisions and sanctions would catch the activities of those such as Mr. Bredenkamp. The Minister who is to wind up today's debate assured me that they would, saying:

"My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under- Lyme (Paul Farrelly) referred to some specific examples, but as he knows, I cannot comment on individual cases. However, he raised an important point of principle on which I think the House will want to have the Government's views on record. I can assure my hon. Friend and the House that the Bill will give us the power to control UK citizens and anyone operating in the UK, which I think was the point that he was making. He was concerned about someone who was not a UK citizen who was a trafficker and broker in arms to arms-embargoed destinations such as Zimbabwe. Such people will be caught. That is important."—[Official Report, 8 November 2001; Vol. 374, c. 416.]

At a distance, those so inclined might want to quibble about semantics, especially about the meaning of the word "caught". As my question and the debate thereafter show, however, there can be no doubt about the meaning of the assurance that the Bill would catch people such as those I described. I do not want to embarrass my hon. Friend the Minister—the legislation and its implementation are complicated, and I am certain that his assurance was given in good faith—but I have to tell him that his assurance was incorrect because, under the legislation, people like Mr. Bredenkamp will continue to operate with impunity from a UK base. It is simply wrong that people like him can cleverly organise their affairs to outwit legislation and to make a mockery of arms control legislation.

Nigel Griffiths: My hon. Friend is simply wrong.

Paul Farrelly: I repeat that I am certain that the assurance was given in good faith, but the record is in Hansard for everyone to see.

Nigel Griffiths: I am not correcting the Hansard reference, but my hon. Friend's mistaken interpretation of the current and future state of the legislation.

Paul Farrelly: For the first time in my two years in the House, I am grateful to be told that I am mistaken. I look forward to my hon. Friend's concluding remarks. Given hon. Members' contributions today, however, it is fair to say that the question still stands: when will something be done about merchants of death such as Mr. Bredenkamp who are operating from the UK? When I have asked that question outside the context of the Act, the answer has generally been, "Bring us the evidence and we will have a look." That brings me to another aspect of the effectiveness of our arms control regime.

[Paul Farrelly]

Mr. Bredenkamp is well known. He is one of the UK's richest people—one only has to look at The Sunday Times guide to the rich every year—and he has a long track record of arms dealing. He helped Ian Smith's Rhodesia bust international sanctions, and supplied weapons, including anti-personnel mines, to Iraq during its bloody war against Iran, which were eventually used against British troops in the 1990 Gulf war. [Interruption.] My apologies. I have now switched off my wife.

Cleverly, in pursuit of profits, Mr. Bredenkamp has long since turned his allegiance to Robert Mugabe. He was named in a recent United Nations panel report as one of those who are supposed to have profiteered from the tragic war in the DRC by looting the country of its precious minerals, which is the price for his arms supply to Zimbabwe. The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) may be interested to know that he has also been a BAE Systems agent in Zimbabwe. Given the position of the hon. Gentleman's right hon. Friend the shadow Foreign Secretary on the Mugabe regime, I am sure that he will be as concerned as I am if BAE Systems is exporting spares to Zimbabwe for use in Hawk jets, which are being used to prosecute the war in the DRC. I mention this history because any arms control regime needs to be proactive, not just reactive, if it is to deal with merchants of death.

Given that my hon. Friend the Minister corrected me, will he state the Government's position on UK-based individuals who are trafficking arms abroad by whatever mechanisms? Will he also agree to calls made by hon. Members here today and by the Quadripartite Committee for the scope of the Act and its implementation to be extended to cover such individuals?

Mr. Berry: I understand that it is correct to say that section 4 of the Export Control Act 2002 gives the Government the power to exercise full extraterritoriality, but that under secondary legislation, it specifically will not cover trafficking and brokering unless part of that transaction takes place in the UK. Is that my hon. Friend's understanding? That may help to clarify the Minister's response later.

Paul Farrelly: The problem is indeed the scope of the secondary legislation to give effect to the Bill.

4.4 pm

Sitting suspended for Divisions in the House.

On resuming—

Paul Farrelly: I was just saying how important it is for any arms control regime to be seen to be proactive and not merely reactive. I do not want the Chamber to misunderstand my comments today. I welcome the Act and congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on the effort that he has put into a complicated piece of legislation, the implementation of which is also complicated. However, confusion and misapprehension remain as to how easy it may be for clever and resourceful individuals and businesses—such as those involved in the arms business—to evade the provisions, particularly by relocating offshore.

I hope that I am simply confused and wrong. In view of the Minister's comments, I would be grateful if he wrote to me to clarify the position of individuals such as Mr. Bredenkamp, who have UK residence rights but who organise their affairs so that no transaction takes place in the UK. Will they fall under the new legislation, which is to be enacted on 1 May? If not, as part of a learning process, will the Government consider extending the legislation?

4.29 pm

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute briefly to the debate. I had not thought that I would do so, because I spoke in the debate on 27 March, in which I covered some of the principal subjects according to my lights. Hon. Members know my views, but I wish to add a few points, as events have moved on slightly since then.

I will not talk about prior parliamentary scrutiny, as it has been mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) and others. As he knows, we are not unanimous on that. I do not wholly endorse the use of prior parliamentary scrutiny as a mechanism to scrutinise the export control system. However, if we are not to have formal prior parliamentary scrutiny, it is important that at every point at which something might be construed as changing policy in the export control system, it should be disclosed to Parliament and the Committee in a form that enables the Committee to seek to influence and scrutinise that policy before it is put into practice. It is not wholly the case that that happens now. Policy has seemed to develop, particularly in relation to incorporation. That was discovered during our inquiries, rather than its being disclosed to us as an explicit intention of the Government.

That leads me on to the subject of incorporation, which I touched on in March. The Government have responded to us on that subject, among others, but I am not entirely happy with where we have gone since March. The Government interpreted my concerns as though our argument about incorporated equipment was simply that the Government were abandoning the consolidated criteria in favour of some other set of criteria. That is not really my argument. I am sure that the Government continue to look at applications against the consolidated criteria, but they then go one step beyond that and add particular considerations of incorporation that could conflict with the consolidated criteria. In their response to our recommendation 30 in the annual report, the Government stated that "it is likely that if the UK is the only source for certain goods, or if the UK-origin goods are being supplied as part of a long-standing supply programme that the implications of refusing licences on the UK's defence relations with the incorporating country are likely to be greater. This will be taken into account in reaching any decision."

As far as I am aware, that is expressly beyond the consolidated criteria. We do not say that if there is a long-standing supply contract and if circumstances change, export licences will none the less be granted in recognition of that fact. We do not say that if the UK is the only source of particular licensable goods, they should be licensed because of the impact that not doing so would have on someone else's defence industry. We are lucky that the consolidated criteria do not operate in that way. We want to know whether equipment that is relatively immaterial to the final product is more likely to be licensed.

The Government are not answering that question If it is immaterial, it may not make too much difference, but if the items are integral to the defence equipment and the UK is the only source or origin, the question whether it is licensed becomes very relevant. It is instrumental to the further point of whether the export controls of the country to which goods are sent—America is the obvious case in point—are not only robust in themselves, as the American ones no doubt are, but aligned with those of the UK. In one relevant instance they are not. After May, the waiver regime with respect to the Americans, and collaboration with them, may make some difference to us.

On the matter of small arms and light weapons, and the question of extraterritoriality, I am somewhat heartened by the Government's response to the first joint report, and particularly our recommendation 7. The Government have rightly set out how they have pursued international consensus on the trade in small arms and light weapons, and I think that the range of that response reinforces the Committee's argument that, in so far as we should extend the scope of our extraterritorial jurisdiction, small arms and light weapons meet the Government's broad criteria.

There is an international consensus, which seems sufficiently well established to be the basis of the UK's activity in the international arena. It should not necessarily require us to go to the point of turning every potential destination into an embargoed destination to achieve enforcement. As the Government said, the approach is about international consensus, and that was the basis on which we discussed the matter in March; there is an international consensus on small arms, and if it is not enforceable in every state of the world, it is substantially enforceable in line with a set of international agreements. It would certainly encourage other countries to subscribe to those agreements if we were to extend our extraterritorial jurisdiction to show, in this very particular respect, the UK Government's intentions.

I want to mention the timing of what is happening. As I understand matters, we should have seen the orders by now, and I confess that I have not. I do not think that the orders have been laid, although the Minister may tell us otherwise. We were told in the Government's response that they would be laid by the end of October. The Minister is not interrupting me, so I assume that that has not happened.

I think that the Government's response stated that the user guidance was going to be made available at the same time as the orders and that the final regulatory impact assessment would also be available then. I think that the latter item is available to the industry. If we are moving towards a commencement date in May 2004 and the orders are now late I should like to be sure that we know the precise timetable.

Much hangs on what is being done. As my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) said, there is a substantial training and implementation task for the industry. Training sometimes seems to be a discretionary activity, but in the present context it is not. It would be rash to allow—and I do not think that any responsible employer would allow—someone to be engaged in the relevant kind of activity without the appropriate training, because of the penalties that might ensue if they behaved contrary to the regulations. If 50 per cent. of the staff of BAE Systems were thus affected, the training requirement would be enormous. That would be very testing if it had to be achieved in six months.

All that work must be done by the industry alongside its continuing tasks. Of course, one of the questions that we considered during our inquiry was the extent of the additional burden. The industry tells us that the regulatory impact assessment cites the latest figure of a 22 per cent. increase in the number of applications that are required. That is something like six times more than the number of additional licences originally anticipated in the first regulatory impact assessment. When we return to the question of minimising burdens on business, the Minister must address those points.

In particular, will the Minister consider what we have not seen from the review of the licensing system, which is the point about compensating reductions in burdens in the licensing system in the range of existing applications, to be achieved through the use of more open licensing and so on? Will he also consider continuing to speed up the system? Ensuring the certainty of the timing of licence applications will mean that, even if the burdens of bureaucracy still exist, those in the industry can be reasonably confident of an early response, which will give them some commercial benefit.

The situation has moved on since March, and I wanted to put those points on the record, not least because many believe that the Minister can give us some information on them.

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): As hon. Members will recall, to facilitate the attendance of the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) at a Committee, the hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) curtailed his speech. With the leave of the Chamber, I call him again.

Mr. Berry: Thank you, Mr. Benton. With your permission, I have two points to make to complete my speech, and I will make them as quickly as possible.

I commented almost exclusively on trafficking and brokering because they are an important part of the debate about how the Government use the Export Control Act 2002, which gives the Government powers further to control the arms trade. On the Committee's behalf, the Clerk of the Quadripartite Committee wrote to the Foreign Office on 12 September to raise the case of Hemant Lakhani, the British citizen about whom hon. Members may have read in the press. He was arrested in the USA and accused of attempting to sell shoulder-launched surface-to-air missiles to supposed terrorists.

It is my understanding, and that of our Clerk, that the Government's proposals would not make it an offence for a British citizen to sell or arrange for the sale of such missiles from outside the UK. Such missiles would be covered if their range were 300 km or more. Therefore, if someone is trying to broker arms sales to terrorists, as long as any missiles on the shopping list do not have a range of 300 km or more and the sale takes place outside the UK, they will not be controlled by proposals under the Export Control Act.

We asked the Foreign Office to clarify why the Government's proposals do not regulate extraterritorial trade in equipment that would be of such obvious interest to terrorist groups. We have not yet received a reply, which is not a criticism. However, if the Government are not proposing to take control over the activities overseas of British citizens who are brokering the sale of missiles to terrorists, I would not want to be a Minister if, heaven forbid, a terrorist group used a missile that had been brokered by a British citizen. I mentioned terrorism at the beginning because one reason to be ever more vigilant about controlling the international arms trade is the threat and reality of terrorism. I would appreciate my hon. Friend the Minister's comments on that. I cannot emphasise strongly enough how seriously all Committee members, including the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) who raised it earlier, feel about it.

My other point relates to end use. The Government try to control arms exports from the UK by not granting licences for exports that they believe are going to the wrong places and by granting licences for legitimate arms exports. From time to time, the Government attach specific conditions to the use of equipment that they allow for export: for example, in 2000 they sought and received assurances from Israel that United Kingdom military equipment purchased by Israel would not be used in the occupied territories. It turned out that our attaché observed equipment such as Centurion tanks being used in the occupied territories. The Government were clear that the Israeli Government were in breach of the assurances that they had given to the United Kingdom and decided that they would no longer take Israeli assurances into account when deciding whether to allow exports. However, I no longer know what that means. We export a fair amount of military equipment to Israel. Do the Government have assurances that henceforth all exports will not be used in the occupied territories? Do they believe that they can accept those assurances?

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): My hon. Friend will know that the issue has caused great worry. Does he share my concern about an article that appeared in The Guardian yesterday? Perhaps the Minister can comment on it. The newspaper claimed:

> "Exports approved by the government this year cover categories including leg-irons, electric shock belts and chemical and biological agents such as tear gas. They also include categories covering mortars, rocket launchers, anti-tank weapons, military explosives, and infrared and radar sensors."

The report focuses on exports from this country to Israel that seem to breach absolutely all our guidelines.

Mr. Berry: I share my hon. Friend's concern. I confess that I am great reader of The Guardian. Although it occasionally contains inaccurate information, hon. Members will know that that is true of all sections of the media. Sometimes, those in the media get things right; other times, they get it wrong. More importantly, I hope that the Minister can arrange for those of us who have an interest in the issue, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden) and me, to receive a written response to the series of allegations outlined in The Guardian. I will understand if the Minister is unable to response to such matters today, because he has so much to cover in the winding-up speech. If the allegations were true, that would be of enormous concern.

In reference to the use of British-supplied Hawk aircraft and Scorpion personnel carriers in Aceh in Indonesia, I was advised that the UK Government had received assurances that military equipment in Indonesia would not be used against civilians who were exercising their human rights and that that meant specifically that the equipment could not be used to harass the citizens of Aceh. After that, I had the pleasure of appearing on the "Today" programme—I have now alienated more than half the Chamber by referring to The Guardian and the "Today" programme in the same speech. When I recounted what I understood to be the Government's policy, I was astonished when a spokesperson for the Indonesian Government said, "Well, we bought these planes and I do not know what on earth people thought we were going to use them for if we weren't going to fly them around and enforce our policy."

What information do the Government have about the Indonesian authority's use of British-built military equipment in operations in Aceh this year? Was the equipment used in a way that breached the Indonesian Government's assurances not to use such equipment offensively or in violation of human rights? What representations have the Government made to the Indonesian authorities about the way in which they have used British-built military equipment in Aceh? Do the Government believe that the assurances have—or may have been—breached? Have they taken any action against Indonesia or in relation to existing export licence applications that may be pending?

In conclusion, there are general issues about the assurances that our Government rightly seek from those who purchase weapons from the UK, and about the assurances that are given. I am not clear about a couple of points. What do the Government believe would be the appropriate action for them to take if an end user did not abide by assurances it had given? If you have received an assurance, but it becomes clear that the end user has broken that assurance, what can you do? Do you stop exporting and review all existing arms licences? What do you do? I am using "you", Mr. Benton, in the "what does one do?" sense. What particularly interests me is whether, when end user assurances are requested and obtained, the Government set out to the end user what the consequences of breaching those assurances might be and, if so, how they do it.

Those questions require detailed answers. In fairness to my hon. Friend the Minister, he has been asked thousands of questions this afternoon. I hope that all of them will be answered, but if he cannot answer them in his winding-up speech, please will he do so in writing as soon as is convenient? I am grateful for having been allowed to speak again.

4.50 pm

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): This has been a useful, interesting and informative debate. I congratulate the Quadripartite Committee, although I wish we could find a friendlier term for four Committees coming together in one body to do work that has, both in the reports before us and over the years, been so productive.

Let us recognise that we started from a point at which there was considerable embarrassment about the lack of a control system, and we had an incoming Government who had a clear political obligation to put in place a regime that was considerably better than the one that had been exposed. We have the Committee to thank for identifying the considerable progress that has been made: there is much greater transparency and consequently we can justifiably claim to have one of the best and most transparent systems in the world. We should acknowledge that and I do so unreservedly.

Having said that, it seems that there are some underlying problems. Let us start with public opinion. Many people are uncomfortable about all aspects of the arms trade—indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Sue Doughty) says simply that she is against the arms trade. She is not alone; many say that we should not trade arms at all. In return, the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) points out perfectly reasonably that the nature of the defence industry is such that one cannot sustain one's capabilities purely within the domestic market and that it is therefore necessary to internationalise it. However, it is important to set out clear criteria for what we are trying to achieve. The argument that if we do not sell somebody weapons, somebody else will, is about the weakest that I can think of for not imposing controls and standards.

We have to acknowledge two fundamental facts. One is that the purchasing power of the United States in defence systems is 50 per cent. greater than that of the rest of the world combined. The US can afford to waste a great deal on its contracts and it throws a lot of money away; however, it ends up with much more powerful equipment and more of it, and the capacity to undercut and compete with everybody else in the world. Secondly, the only counterbalance to that in the European context is both to co-operate where we can with the United States, and to develop some Europe-wide capacities. I remind the hon. Member for Aldershot that that issue has at times rent his party asunder, leading on one occasion to the spectacular resignation of Michael Heseltine.

Having put that into context, we should identify the countries with which we have a natural defence association and with which we wish to trade, co-operate and share technology—as well as compete in business. Clearly, the United States, our main NATO ally, is at the core of that. What can become a problem are cases in which competition and co-operation cut across each other—that has been alluded to. In addition, competition in third markets can become a significant economic raison d'être for some defence contractors. We need two things: first, a clear policy on who we will and will not sell to, and what we will and will not sell; and, secondly, a transparent mechanism for delivering that. When making decisions, we have to accept that there may be some economic disadvantage attached to certain decisions, but that we may have to balance the issues and conclude that what might be called the higher aspirations of public policy should take precedence.

Reading the report, particularly the country-by-country report, it is satisfying to note that many countries that I think should not be in the list are not, and that, in the case of some of the countries over which there are question marks, there appear to be answers. Take Uzbekistan, for example, to which my immediate reaction is: "Are we sure we should be doing business with that country?" The reassurance given is that we are not; I hope that that is true. The United States and we are operating out of Uzbekistan. Given the travails of our ambassador there, we have to be assured that what goes on in Uzbekistan is entirely under our control and that of our allies, and that it is not in the hands of a Government whose human rights record is severely questioned.

I take the point made by the hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry). There is something slightly perverse about selling weapons to people and then complaining when they use them, or about what they use them for. Clearly, one expects the country to use the weapons, or at least have them in provision, for the purpose for which they were intended. That brings me to a particular point of debate: the supply of weapons, in particular Hawks, to India. That is a matter of debate and I do not have a definitive view about it, but it must be acknowledged that there is genuine public concern, given the potential escalation to the point of nuclear trigger of the situation between India and Pakistan. Many people think that we should not be arming either side, or adding any kind of fuel, and there are much more complicated arguments that people can put into play. Although I regard myself as a friend of India, I have great concerns about the imbalance between India and Pakistan. India has a substantial conventional superiority, and it worries me to add to that because to do so lowers the nuclear threshold.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: The point is that the issue is in the public domain and is being discussed. It is not as though the Hawks will be marketed by nefarious characters operating from Berkshire, Zimbabwe, or anywhere else.

Malcolm Bruce: I accept that, but there is legitimate concern. The prime purpose of the aeroplanes being sold is to serve as training aircraft. The question is: who is the country training? It is training pilots to fight in combat. It is a little naive to suggest that by selling only trainers, one is not adding to defensive or offensive capabilities. The basic point of concern—the imbalance still applies, although I completely take the hon. Gentleman's point.

A subject that has not been touched on but is worth mentioning is the role of the Export Credits Guarantee Department in guaranteeing exports in some cases. It has been identified that it is quite difficult to get detailed information out of the ECGD on how much of its total guarantee budget is for defence and non-defence projects. However, it appears that £3.1 billion is spent on underwriting defence contracts. Some of that will go to countries with a bad record on payment. I ask the House to consider the following: if a contract with a Government for military equipment is in some way in default, or if payments are not being made on time, how can one be sure that a Government who cannot fulfil their financial obligations will fulfil their contractual obligations regarding what they do with the equipment that has been supplied? Any Government who have been given guarantees for defence contracts that they have not honoured should, de facto, fall off the list as a matter of principle. I should be interested to see whether the Minister thinks that that such a view is in process or should be.

The role of Ministers in promoting contracts has been mentioned. No one suggests that they should not be doing so or that it is wrong of them to do so, although some people do not like them doing it and would prefer them to promote other things. However, it is a problem if Ministers promote something in a questionable area where a licence is a debatable issue. If high-profile Ministers have made anything that looks like a commitment, it clearly prejudices the licensing process thereafter.

One matter to which the report alludes—I am surprised it has not been given more attention—is the trade between ourselves and the United States and third parties, the most obvious example being Israel. I happen to be a member of the Technological and Aerospace Committee of the Western European Union. I do not regard myself as an expert, but serving on the Committee gives me an opportunity to engage in discussions about the exchange of technology, trade and joint ventures. Having visited defence interests in the United States, I am aware of some of the obvious issues.

A "Buy America" Act is proposed. It is clear that it is part of a populist campaign. It is superficially attractive to be able to say on US doorsteps, "If we are spending all this money on defence, we should make sure that every cent goes to American contractors. We should only buy American, and we can do it. We spend two thirds of the world's defence budget." Defence experts, however, say that America must get some things from other sources either because they are better or because they are subject to patents and therefore unobtainable from domestic sources. A component may be very small, but if the Americans were prevented from buying it, in extreme cases, their planes would not be able to fly. Defence contractors never want to be constrained in their ability to buy the best, whatever it costs and wherever it comes from. That is the natural instinct of every defence procurement person I have ever met. That is one of the reasons why that piece of legislation will not come into play, but the sentiment behind it will not be lost.

The head-up display units that we traditionally supply through established contracts in the United States to be fitted in aircraft that are subsequently sold to Israel would, if they were supplied direct to Israel, fall completely under our own ban. In other words, we would supply neither the planes nor the equipment to be installed in such planes in a direct contractual arrangement with Israel. The Government argue that they have a long and established contractual arrangement with American defence sources and if, having bought the units from us, the Americans choose to fit them in aircraft and send them to Israel we should not interfere. As I understand it, the Government are worried about the implications for defence contract relations between the US and Britain, which I understand are large, and feel that they just have to accept that.

The Committee makes it clear, and I entirely endorse its recommendation, that as the United States has no compunction in attaching conditions to its armament exports to any third party, including this country, it is not unreasonable of us to say that we will not sell certain things to the Israelis and the condition of our selling them to the US is that it will not use them in that context either.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: It should be put on the record that a head-up display has no offensive capability whatsoever. It simply enables the pilot to see out of the cockpit without having the instruments reflected on the glass. It adds nothing to the offensive capability of the aircraft.

Malcolm Bruce: I am not sure that I am grateful for that intervention. Certainly the report suggests that it is an aid that is relevant. Before the Chairman of the Committee intervenes, I should point out that the fact remains that we have decided that the units are not something that we would sell to the Israelis. My argument is not altered by that intervention.

Mr. Berry: Is it not the case that the Government's export control criteria apply not only to finished products, but to components? The fact that one cannot commit an offensive act with a head-up display on its own—although one could probably hit someone with it—is neither here nor there. It is a component in a piece of hardware that can be used offensively and therefore is subject to controls.

Malcolm Bruce: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. The report makes that point clear, which is why I picked up on it. I repeat: we have identified the items as a product that we would not sell direct to Israel.

The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) put his finger on a point that needs to be clarified. I do not wish to be churlish, and I hope that now or in future we will have put our finger on something that becomes positive rather than negative. There is a danger that we pass primary legislation which sets out clear, fine criteria about ideals that we wish to set as our standards, but in the detailed administration, either there are exemptions or we do not take up the powers that people thought were important. In a sense, we create primary legislation that sets out the ideals, and secondary legislation that overtly creates loopholes in order to undermine the spirit, and to some extent the letter, of the primary legislation.

That is putting it starkly, and it is up to the Committee to get their hands on it and decide whether it is a genuine point of criticism. We are in part talking about ethics, not just about the defence industry. We all acknowledge that the defence industry is important, but we are trying to set ethical standards and limit the misuse of defence equipment. Small arms are perhaps the biggest problem, but as the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) said, none of us would regard missiles with a capacity of 300 km as small arms. The Chairman of the Committee made it clear that equipment that terrorists are actively seeking and trying to use—indeed, some have used it—is the subject of real, legitimate and active concern

I listened with considerable interest to the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling, who is familiar with the subject and has been through the hearings and reports. I am astonished by the situation as he described it. It flies in the face of our practice and policy and makes absolutely no sense—indeed, it makes nonsense of the objective of preventing the misuse of weapons. I strongly endorse what the hon. Member for Kingswood said, and I advise the Minister responding to the debate to communicate the message to his colleagues very powerfully. If any such terrorist activity happened here and it became apparent that a British citizen had been instrumental in the weapon's procurement, I think that not one Minister, but the whole Government, would have to resign, so serious would the matter be. We have identified that there is a problem and it seems absolutely clear that the loophole should the closed as quickly as possible. I am genuinely grateful to the Committee for drawing that to our attention, because it is an issue that Ministers cannot walk away from.

We have had a good debate. The Quadripartite Committee is serving an extremely useful purpose. I acknowledge that the dialogue is producing a genuine improvement in our transparency and our principles, but—to put my finger on the nub of the problem—there is still a conflict of interests involving British defence contracts and capabilities, important though they are. Ensuring that our exports are not misused is not only an ideal but a principle that we wish to establish. We need to check our experts, to follow them through and, on occasion, to do random tests on what is being done with our export commodities in third-party markets, so we can be sure that they are not being misused.

I commend the report's recommendations to the Minister, who should respond positively to this debate and recognise that there is some additional action that the Government need to take if people are to be reassured that both principles and protection are at the heart of the Government's objectives.

5.8 pm

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): As the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) said, this has been an important, interesting and unusually surprising debate, because a number of issues have been raised that were not necessarily covered by the two reports, yet are vital to the interests of the United Kingdom and its citizens. I will return to that shortly.

The debate was opened by the hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry) in his usual admirable style, which we all expect from him. He presented a private Member's Bill on disability in 1992–93, which he also did very well. He talked in this debate about the progress in recent years. Opposition Members accept and welcome the very good progress that has been made.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned that there is considerable interest in the issue outside Parliament. I for one will receive a petition on it in the close of Lichfield cathedral on Saturday from Andrew Jacobs, representing Amnesty International. The issue interests not only pressure groups such as Amnesty International and Oxfam but other organisations and individuals, because the trade in arms is an emotive issue. It is also important because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) pointed out, it involves jobs, and even the defence of the realm.

The hon. Member for Kingswood said that we have the toughest regime in Europe, in which we can take pride, but that does not mean that we can be complacent. Knowing the Minister, I suspect that "complacency" is not a word in his lexicon. Nevertheless, we have seen that there is a huge lacuna in respect of brokering and factoring, to which I shall come shortly.

The hon. Member for Kingswood spoke about gun crime. That is interesting because gun crime is increasing in this country, partly as a result of weapons—small arms—being imported from eastern Europe. When those countries join the European Union—I welcome their entry—we must ensure that rules are in place to impede any illegal arms transfer between countries in the EU.

My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) apologised and explained why, as Chairman of the International Development Committee, he could not stay for the whole debate. He made the interesting point that, on the whole, it is the poorest developing countries that spend most on arms. I was tempted to ask him about the causality of that. Does the purchase and consumption of arms make those countries poor, or do they feel that they need to buy arms to protect themselves because they are poor? That is an interesting question, but I suspect that it is not for debate today.

My hon. Friend talked about the brokerage of torture equipment and the controls on that, as did my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley). My right hon. Friend made the interesting point that Sweden and the United States offer prior parliamentary scrutiny of export sales, and called for a similar legislative procedure here. I do not think for one moment that he would expect every export licence to be discussed here first, but I suspect that he was saying that Parliament should have the prerogative to look at any export licence before it is issued. That would have advantages and disadvantages. One disadvantage might be that it could slow the provision of an export licence, but my right hon. Friend addressed that when he asked why, if that were the case, the system worked in Sweden and the United States.

The Minister said, rather robustly, that he thought that the system did not work in the United States and that it did not work well in Sweden. The hon. Member for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill), the Chairman of the Trade and Industry Committee, referred to the Minister's comments as "asinine".

One of the most interesting and relevant points made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling concerned trafficking and brokering, which were also mentioned by the hon. Member for Gordon. The definition of torture equipment seems far too limited. I accept that it is difficult to define these things in Acts of Parliament or secondary legislation, but I would welcome the Minister's comments on whether there is some way of drafting statutory instruments more tightly, so that torture equipment is defined more closely. It would be dreadful if there were a loophole.

[Michael Fabricant]

On the subject of loopholes, surely the biggest is the brokerage of missiles. I was shocked, and people listening to this debate will be shocked, to know that missiles with a range of less than 300 km do not come within the ambit of trafficking and brokering as defined in the Export Control Act. Again, I remind colleagues of the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling. At a time when we are at war with agents of terror and know that they have used ground-to-air missiles in Kenya, are using them in Iraq and could use them on us here—there was a scare only a few months ago—it is quite extraordinary that ground-to-air missiles are exempt. I, for one, want a commitment from the Minister that that loophole will be closed. It must be closed and it is in our national interest that it be closed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot is always a doughty defender of the defence industry, and rightly so. He said that there is always a balance between ensuring that we try to protect the interests of those who suffer from terrorists or belligerent nations, and recognising that many people in the United Kingdom are legitimately employed in the defence industry. That is a difficult balance. Slow and cumbersome regimes will do nothing for the defence of the realm, or the employment of the tens of thousands of people who are gainfully and legitimately employed directly in the defence industry in the UK. Some have argued that several hundreds of thousands of people are indirectly employed in the industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly)—I am allowed to call him my hon. Friend because he is a fellow Staffordshire Member and we rightly co-operate closely on a number of issues, as does the hon. Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins), who is the Government Whip in this debate—raised an extraordinary case. I will not repeat the Dutch—I believe he is Dutch—gentleman's name. However, it seems that he is able to operate legitimately—although there may be some doubt about that, according to the Minister—in the UK in the sale of arms overseas to Zimbabwe and from there to other countries. I must repeat the stricture raised by the hon. Member for Gordon: the Minister will bear a huge burden of responsibility if a single British citizen or a single person on UK soil is injured due to those lacunae in the law. Directly or indirectly, he will be responsible and we need some clear answers at the end of the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) always speaks informatively and raised a number of issues. I shall not cover them all but he referred to a growing and helpful international consensus on the control of small arms and light weapons. We sometimes forget when discussing ground-to-air missiles, grenade launchers and fighter and trainer aircraft that small arms and light weapons often cause much damage. I remind the Chamber that the Lord's Resistance Army, which operates in Sudan and Uganda, has abducted more than 10,000 children in the past few years. That is appalling. Many other people have been murdered and maimed not just by the LRA but by other terrorist groups, not with heavy weapons but with light arms and small weapons. Those issues need to be dealt with.

The Conservatives welcome the findings of the Quadripartite Committee's report on Government proposals for secondary legislation. The report correctly highlighted the extreme sensitivity in the industry about the Government's original consultation document.

There is no question but that the issue of licensing proposals is one of pivotal importance for British industry, as my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot pointed out. The Quadripartite Committee received protestations about the Government proposals from such established trade bodies as the Defence Manufacturers Export Licensing Group, representative of exporters in the Defence Manufacturers Association, which said that it had "grave concerns" about such proposals, and that they "could be disastrous" when they are implemented. In that situation, it is vital that the proposals are laid bare and undergo thorough scrutiny. This debate is a part of that.

The primary issue of importance for the industry was the lack of clarity in what the proposals mean for business. The DMELG said that the proposals are "phrased far too vaguely and loosely . . . relying on a pragmatic and common sense approach by Government".

Will the Government have that pragmatic and common-sense approach? The Quadripartite Committee stated:

"Industry and the public rely on a pragmatic and common-sense approach by Government in many areas of life. We fail to see why such an approach should be undesirable here".

We can all agree with that.

The proposed new trade controls are at the centre of the industry's concerns about the lack of clarity in the new regulations. The Government have estimated that annual individual trade licence applications will number between 100 and 250. The DMELG believes that those hypothetical figures are a gross underestimate of the number of licences that will be required by both UK industry and overseas business visitors to the UK. The system has to work.

For example, a coincidence took place a couple of days ago. I received an e-mail from a Mr. Anderson, the managing director of a firm in Burntwood, in my constituency, called Eco-Tec. He wanted to know whether equipment that the company was selling to China needed an export licence. On 5 September, the firm contacted the Department of Trade and Industry. Eco-Tec is a small firm wanting an export licence. I used to be in business—not in the arms trade, I hasten to add, but selling radio and television stations overseas—and if one does not move quickly on such matters, other countries come in as well. All that the firm wanted to know was whether it needed a licence.

Two months passed and nothing happened. The DTI gave no answer. Finally, we managed to contact the DTI and, as ever with any large organisation, spoke to a number of jobsworths. At last, we got through to a Mr. Richard Hickman. I hope that the Minister is listening, because Mr. Richard Hickman deserves a gold star. Richard Hickman promised that he would contact Mr. Anderson. He did so within hours and the matter was resolved. If Mr. Hickman is here today, he should stand up and we should salute him, because at least he got things moving. However, that is just one small example. If hundreds of applications are going to be made and the DTI get slower in dealing with them, the industry is right to be concerned.

The important issue of open licences also caused concern in the industry. We have discussed some of the issues. The Government have informed us that open licences are intended to reduce some of the burden of applying for individual licences and to ensure that applications for such licences can be kept to a minimum. We welcome that but we are not sure that it will work in practice. It is worrying when we feel that there has not been a clearly thought through process regarding how the licences will work.

Then there is the question of record keeping. The Government have proposed two options for companies: the prescriptive approach and the functional approach. The Committee believes that industry and the Government should devise a pragmatic record-keeping system between them, which would be sufficient to show compliance and avoid imposing an unreasonable burden on industry. We welcome that. However, there are problems with the electronic transfer of information. If a company is exporting around the world, the quickest way to get something delivered on paper from A to B is by e-mail. In fact, that is the quickest way to get something on paper delivered from A to B in this country, given the postal unrest. Under the draft Export of Goods, Transfer of Technology and Provision of Technical Assistance Order, it is not clear how e-mails and other forms of electronic data should be stored.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot raised the question of trade fairs and gave a good advertisement for Farnborough. I am sure that all Quadripartite Committee members will go if we receive tickets, provided that we are let off by the Whips—there might be an important debate that week. The Committee emphasised that it recognised the great importance attached to trade fairs by the British defence industry. The report concluded that there is a danger that the new legislation will make it difficult for participants in trade fairs in the UK to take advantage of spontaneous business opportunities, which do occur. I am not saying that someone will appear at Farnborough and say, " I would like to buy a squadron of fighters." However, from time to time, people make spontaneous purchases and although firms have a duty of care to ensure that a spontaneous sale is not made to an unreasonable company or individual, it would be unfortunate if they were overburdened. There needs to be greater flexibility. The industry and I feel that the Government have not addressed the question of trade fairs adequately.

I have raised a series of issues, and many more have been raised in the reports and in the debate today. It behoves the Minister to address those issues. He must turn to the issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot: how do the Government intend to achieve the balance between promoting exports and employment in the defence industry and ensuring that arms do not fall into the hands of terrorists and belligerent nations?

My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury and my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling raised the question of the overseas brokerage of arms and torture equipment. Why can controls in place in the United States not be applied here? If they work in the United States, why can they not work here? Why is there such a loophole regarding the brokerage of small arms and missiles? How can decisions leading to the issue of licences, or a refusal to issue them, be made more efficient? At a time of world instability and terror, does it make any sense for grenade launchers and ground-to-air heat-seeking missiles to be exempt from the brokerage provisions? Is that not a most reckless omission?

Will the Minister clarify that non-UK nationals trading in arms from the UK fall within the ambit of the Export Control Act? When will the Government take action on the sort of individuals named by the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme? Why are such individuals still permitted to carry on with nefarious activities, which cost lives in Zimbabwe and in the poorest parts of Africa? At a time when we are fighting a war against terror, those giant loopholes cannot be allowed to persist. Would it not be both ironic and desperate if those loopholes permitted British weapons, or weapons provided either by people in Britain or by British citizens operating overseas, to be used against us?

The Minister bears a heavy burden of responsibility on export controls. He has a great duty of care to prevent acts of terrorism and belligerence through arms sales. Serious issues have been raised in this debate. They deserve serious answers.

5.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Nigel Griffiths): I am grateful for the opportunity to discuss the helpful reports that the Quadripartite Committee has published on both secondary legislation on export control and the annual report. I am grateful for the thoughtful contributions that right hon. and hon. Members have made, and for the serious points that they have raised, which I shall address.

Before I do that, however, may I say how pleased I am to be the Minister who supervised the completion of the most comprehensive and open review of the UK's export control regime for more than 60 years? The review followed Lord Scott's recommendations, and the new legislation consolidates all existing controls, puts on a statutory footing many of the innovations that were introduced on a voluntary basis, such as our annual reports, and extends our control to reflect 21st century technologies. The new controls will ensure that we do better than the assessment that was given by the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley), who was generous enough to say that we have the toughest export control regime in Europe, and will give the UK one of the most comprehensive, open and transparent export control regimes in the world.

That is reflected in the annual report, which, I am told, gives more information than any other annual report. We introduced the annual report on a voluntary basis after taking power in 1997—before then there was no annual report—to aid Parliament's scrutiny of our export licensing and decisions, and to open up the Government's export licensing policy and practice. We have put the reports on a statutory footing to ensure that future Governments cannot cancel them without primary legislation in Parliament. We also hope that placing a statutory requirement on the Government to produce a report every year will ensure even greater transparency.

I am determined to do more, however: to put more information in the public domain, and to work with the Quadripartite Committee to ensure greater accountability and transparency in the licensing process. I welcome the Committee's input on the Government's secondary legislation under the Export Control Act 2002, which shows the House's commitment to a strong, effective and transparent UK export control regime. The Committee's helpful report on our secondary legislation proposals also contains a number of recommendations that we have acted on.

We share the same overarching objective that the UK should be actively involved in the fight against proliferation and that the UK strategic export control policy should effectively promote global security. The Government are already committed to assessing all licence applications on a case-by-case basis against other national arms export licensing criteria and the consolidated EU criteria. We are committed to ensuring that UK strategic exports neither contribute to regional instability, internal repression or external aggression, nor seriously undermine the development of poor nations, and we want to prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

More than one hon. Member referred to the report in The Guardian, so let me say that the Government have not licensed leg irons, electric shock belts or tear gas for export to Israel. Leg irons and electric shock belts are never approved for export to any country.

The new legislation consolidates the existing controls, which I have referred to in one specific case mentioned by hon. Members. It puts on a statutory footing many innovations that had previously been voluntary, such as the annual report. The 2002 Act ensures that the UK has one of the most comprehensive, open and transparent export control regimes in the world. The Act achieves that by introducing powers to impose controls on the electronic transfer of technology for military goods, and on the transfer of technology intended for use in connection with weapons of mass destruction. It also introduces powers to impose controls on the provision of technical assistance to a WMD programme, and the trafficking and brokering of goods outside the UK. The Act implements the recommendations of the Scott report by providing for greater Government accountability and transparency in the export control regime.

The new weapons of mass destruction controls were first proposed in 1998, but, in the aftermath of 11 September 2001, we all recognise the threat posed by the use of weapons of mass destruction by terrorists and terrorist regimes. In responding to questions about the range of the missiles, it may be helpful if I tell hon. Members that the controls were originally proposed and accepted under arms control regimes, such as the missile technology control regime, which identified the range of 300 km as the threshold of WMD capabilities. I appreciate that it is a problem that weapons of mass destruction below that threshold would not fall under present regimes, and that is why we have addressed the problem.

Several hon. Members raised the issue of terrorism and terrorists. The trafficking in shorter-range missiles by terrorists, or for the purposes of terrorism, is covered in many circumstances by the anti-terrorism legislation, which also has extraterritorial effect. United Nations sanctions are already in place to prevent trafficking and brokering to designated terrorists and their associates. We have made it an offence for anyone in the UK, or any UK citizen abroad, to supply or arrange to supply arms to those designated people, wherever they are located.

Mr. Berry: I appreciate my hon. Friend's response to the queries raised, but he said that the issue has been addressed in most circumstances. Will he advise us in which circumstances the issue has not been addressed? Does he acknowledge that if missiles are not covered through the extraterritoriality provisions, they could be supplied to one or two individuals who could subsequently supply them to terrorists? He will appreciate our concerns if we do not have comprehensive extraterritorial control.

Nigel Griffiths: My hon. Friend's point is covered. One reason why we consider exports on a case-by-case basis is to review reports on where they end up. It is our intention to stop exports being passed on by anyone beyond the designated destination. That is the most effective way to keep weapons out of the hands of terrorists, or anyone else.

Mr. Lansley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Nigel Griffiths: I shall not, because I want to make progress. Several questions were put and it is unfair to other hon. Members if I do not answer their points in as much detail as I am attempting to answer points already made.

We corrected the anomaly in the previous regime that controls the physical transfer of technology but not the transfer of the same technology—

Sir John Stanley: On a point of order, Mr. Benton. Given that there have been two Divisions, could you clarify for the Chamber how much injury time we have beyond 5.30 pm, and at precisely what time you will call for the debate to end?

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): The Chamber will adjourn at 17.54.

Nigel Griffiths: Thank you, Mr. Benton.

As I was saying on the key issue of the extension covering the transfer of technology under the new Act, it is covered if it is a physical transfer but not if it is by e-mail or by other electronic means. In 2000, we introduced controls on the electronic transfer of dual-use technology and are extending those powers to cover all electronic transfers of controlled items.

I share the strong desire of all my hon. Friends to control the supply of weapons that fuel so many conflicts throughout the world. We already have stringent controls on exports from the UK, and we will now also have controls on trade overseas. These controls are the first of their kind in UK legislation, and our EU partners recently agreed a common position on arms trafficking and brokering, which is reflected in our new controls.

Since the 1998 White Paper, the Government have consulted extensively on the scope of the controls, and the scope of the legislation and our intention to introduce secondary legislation were set out during the Bill's passage through Parliament in 2001–02. The consultation on the draft secondary legislation, which ended on 30 April, provided an opportunity for detailed comments on the operation of the new controls.

The Committee's reports have provided further opportunity to scrutinise the Government's secondary legislation proposals. We have responded in each phase of the consultation process, and have accepted most of the recommendations made by the Committee in its recent report. The new controls are far-reaching. They will challenge industry and the Government, but are also designed to be practical, workable, effective and enforceable in our fight against proliferation. They will affect every aspect of modern defence business.

As we heard today, UK manufacturers have voiced serious concerns about the practical implications of the controls, emphasising the increasing globalisation of the sector. Manufacturers engaged in international collaboration were concerned that they would not be able to communicate easily with partners abroad, as the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) suggested. The new controls must not undermine legitimate defence exporters who want to abide by the export control regime, nor should they be undermined by shady and unscrupulous illegal arms dealers.

The Committee's report contained helpful recommendations on how the Government should work with industry to ensure effective implementation of the new controls while minimising the burden on legitimate business. As I said, we have acted on most of its recommendations. The DTI has worked closely with business to secure effective solutions to the practical administration of the new controls, and its export control organisation has worked with industry representatives to develop detailed user guidelines that explain how to operate under the new controls. This guidance makes clear the essential record-keeping requirements and how companies will be expected to comply fully with them.

The Quadripartite Committee reflected concerns that defence companies should not have to keep records of all the e-mails that they send out about electronic transfers, which we accept.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will the Minister give way?

Nigel Griffiths: No, I want to make progress.

We have also agreed that the requirements on record keeping should relate only to technology that is controlled and that can therefore be licensed. They will relate only to the actual transfer of the technology and not to extraneous matters, such as associated follow-up e-mails, which are not part of the actual transfer. We do not require records to be kept of every e-mail to a particular end user if a transfer takes place over a prolonged period. I am informed that it is sufficient to identify the technology transferred, the dates between which it was transferred and the identity of the end user.

As for record keeping for trade transactions under open licences, we recognise that it will not always be possible for businesses to obtain the paperwork from overseas companies on the shipment dates of brokered deals. However, we will require records to be kept of the date on, or period of time over which, the trading activity took place. For example, a project manager in the UK who authorises the movements of components between various third countries will have to record the nature of the goods to be transferred and the dates over which the activity took place.

It is vital that the staff of companies fully understand their responsibilities. Compliance officers from ECO will work closely with industry throughout the implementation period to ensure that staff are fully prepared for those record-keeping requirements and that they are fully aware of what is required in order to be compliant.

I welcome the Committee's strong endorsement of the need to maximise the use of open licensing to minimise the burdens on legitimate industry and to enable us to focus our licensing effort on the areas of most concern. The user guidance sets out what licences will be available under the new controls. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry), the Chairman of the Committee, and to the Committee as a whole for supporting the need to maximise the use of open licensing to "minimise the regulatory burden on legitimate business, and in particular to ensure that new business is not lost."

That will enable us to focus the licensing efforts on the areas of most concern.

In addition to extending existing licences automatically to cover electronic transfers, an open general licence is available to cover most transfers of goods involving the EU and most other OECD countries. If the trade is to a destination that is too sensitive to be included on the open general licences, companies will have to apply for open individual licences.

The Committee reflected industry's legitimate concern that some employees may inadvertently breach export controls by opening their e-mails while abroad. A new open general licence will cover remote access of controlled military technology to allow persons authorised by the exporter and normally based in the UK to access their intranet site in the UK from a temporary destination overseas, but only for their own personal use and on condition that the technology would not be further disseminated.

Two new open licences are being introduced. The first will permit the export of most goods on the military list—

Mr. Howarth: The Minister is dealing with the particular point that I raised about accessing computers. He says that the individual should not be able to disseminate that information. What would happen if that individual were to open his e-mail and find information there that was not available to him when he left the UK, and then discuss that information with, for example, his joint strike fighter partner in the United States, or with a potential customer?

Nigel Griffiths: What is important is that a record is kept of all those transactions. We are trying to make it clear that an e-mail such as that would be highly pertinent to the export licence relating to technology, compared with communications of a less significant or insignificant nature between the employee and their base in the UK.

[Nigel Griffiths]

We are introducing two new open licences, one to permit the export of most goods on the military list, provided that the export relates to an eligible UK Government contract. The second will permit the supply of goods and technology as set out in the licence to UK forces engaged in a specific operation. There will be such an open licence for each operation. Unusually, those licences will include nuclear, biological and chemical equipment, which is typically excluded from open general licences, due to the potential for it to be misused if it falls into the wrong hands, and assist illicit WMD programmes. Those licences specifically address the Committee's concern that the new controls could impede industry's ability to fulfil contracts with the Ministry of Defence and provide operational support to UK armed forces, in particular protection for our troops from nuclear, biological or chemical attacks.

Recommendation 21 of the Committee's report highlighted the importance of trade fairs to British defence manufacturers—a point that was raised by more than one hon. Member today. Following discussions with the organisers of major trade fairs, it is clear that the speculative marketing activity that typically takes place will not fall within the definition of trafficking and brokering because the legislation refers to a specific activity done in return for a consideration. That will be kept under review. The Department of Trade and Industry, the Ministry of Defence and trade associations will ensure that a full package of information and guidance on the controls and available licences is provided to companies registering to attend trade fairs. We have secured the agreement of fair organisers to ensure that overseas exhibitors and visitors are made aware of the new controls and agree to abide by them.

As Minister with responsibility for export control, I have taken several steps to ensure that the system of considering licences is made more efficient. I introduced timelines to ensure that all Departments providing input into licences were aware of unacceptable delays. Partly as a result of that, for the first nine months of this calendar year the Government have for the first time exceeded the target of processing 70 per cent. of standard individual licence applications in 20 days. I am glad that the constituents of the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) have benefited from a speedy decision.

We have focused on reducing the number of long-standing export licence applications and have successfully reduced them to less than a handful. When I became Minister, over 174 cases were more than six months old and approximately 270 were between three and six months old. At the end of October, we had only three cases more than six months old and 25 between three and six months old. I am now looking at them individually.

The Committee stressed the need for the civil service to be geared up to operate the controls effectively. ECO is reorganising and will redeploy staff. New processes are being introduced as a result of the JEWEL project—joined-up more efficient ways of export licensing—to ensure that all relevant Departments work together and that applications are dealt with expeditiously. We are formulating new performance indicators, IT systems, business processes, joint working arrangements and our interface with exporters to achieve a speedy and fair processing of the controls, whether the answer is yes or no.

The Committee urged that transitional periods for implementing the secondary legislation should not be unduly protracted. I met representatives of the industry last week and was pressed for a delay in the implementation period of the orders. Suggestions ranged from 12 months to a rather longer period. I have considered that carefully and, in the light of the Committee's request for a "modest delay" in implementation, I have already agreed to twice the normally recommended implementation period. I am informed that six months should be adequate for industry to prepare. The user guidance will set out in detail the practical record-keeping requirements under the new controls and how businesses will be expected to comply with them.

In addition, to assist industry preparations and ensure full compliance, ECO is already holding seminars on the new controls and, together with trade associations, will hold further seminars, workshops and regional roadshows in the new year to raise awareness and understanding of the new controls and the licences available. Officials have agreed to monitor industry preparations, through the seminars and from direct feedback from compliance visits, to ensure that staff are fully prepared for the record-keeping requirements and aware of what is required in order to be—

It being six minutes to Six o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Immigration and Asylum

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Beverley Hughes): The Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Lammy) and I have today announced new legislative proposals for asylum reform. We are writing to a number of key stakeholders outlining these proposals and inviting comments. I will be placing copies of this letter in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament and on the IND and DCA websites. The major proposals include: reform of the immigration and asylum appeals system into a single tier of appeal with restricted access to the higher courts; measures to tackle the problem of asylum seekers deliberately destroying or disposing of their documents to make unfounded claims; provisions removing NASS support from families whose claim for asylum has been rejected and enhancing the effectiveness of the Office of the Immigration Services Commissioner.

The Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002 has enabled us to make significant progress in reforming the UK's nationality, immigration and asylum systems. In the asylum system this has meant that the number of people claiming asylum has halved, removals are at record levels and the number of claims awaiting an initial decision is at the lowest for a decade. The Government determined that there should be a balanced approach in asylum and immigration policy so that we bear down on those who would seek to enter the UK illegally and who make unfounded asylum claims, whilst ensuring effective help for refugees who need our protection. Our policy on asylum has to be seen in the wider context of managed migration, through which we are opening up routes for people to enter the UK legally. That is why we are committed to continued reform, as necessary, of the asylum system to ensure that those in need of protection are identified quickly and those who try to exploit the system are prevented from doing so.

We believe that these reforms should be in place as a matter of urgency and will introduce legislation to enact the measures as soon as parliamentary time allows. We are therefore urgently seeking comments from interested parties on the proposals. We would welcome views on the proposals by 17 November.

TREASURY

National Insurance Fund

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): I have today laid before the House a report that the Government Actuary has made on the operation of the legislation governing national insurance contributions and contributory social security benefits between 6 April 1995 and 5 April 2000 in accordance with Section 166 of the Social Security Administration Act 1992.

Copies of the report are available in the Libraries of the House.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Incapacity Benefit

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Andrew Smith): I laid before the House on 18 November 2002 a consultation document entitled "Pathways to Work, Helping People into Employment" Cm 5690. This outlined a range of proposals to provide more effective support to people with health conditions and disabled people. The Pathways to Work pilots represent the next steps in the Government's strategy of providing people with health conditions and disabilities with the help and support they need—particularly support in helping them into employment. My Department, together with the Department of Health and appropriate Scottish Executive and Welsh Assembly officials, have been preparing for the implementation of the Pilots.

On 26 March I announced the locations of the first three Pathways to Work pilots and on 5 June I subsequently announced the locations of the final four pilots.

Today, I am pleased to announce the launch of the first three pilots—Bridgend Rhondda Cynon Taf; Renfrewshire, Inverclyde, Argyll & Bute; and Derbyshire.

The pilots will provide a range of individual help and support (including new condition management programmes provided by the NHS and a range of financial incentives) for people with health conditions and disabilities. We will fully evaluate the impact of the extra support we are providing.

Cold Weather Payment Scheme

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): I am pleased to announce that, following advice from the Meteorological Office, the annual review of the cold weather payments scheme has now been completed. Amending regulations were laid on 10 October and will come into force on 1 November, in time for the beginning of the winter period.

Six of the weather stations used in the scheme last winter, Bracknell, Dumfries, Dyce, Leeds, Ringway and Redhill are closing and six new weather stations are being introduced at South Farnborough, High Wycombe, Dundrennan, Craibstone, Woodford and Charlwood to provide data for the scheme. In addition to changing two weather station linkages to more representative links, eight postcode to weather station linkages have been changed on the advice of the Meteorological Office following representations made by hon. Members.

Cold weather payments are separate from, and in addition to, winter fuel payments, which are paid to eligible people from age 60.

I have written to each of the hon. Members affected by the changes.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

New Millennium Experience Company

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): Further to the statement by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) on 17 December 2002, Official Report, column 41WS, the shareholding in the New Millennium Experience Company was transferred from Lord Falconer of Thoroton to me on 17 October 2003.

Written Ministerial Statements

Tuesday 28 October 2003

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

The Standards Board for England

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I have today laid the Standards Board for England's Annual Report and Accounts for 2002–03.

The Report and Accounts cover the first year of significant operations by the Standards Board for England. At the end of March 2003, 2,948 allegations of misconduct had been referred to the Standards Board since the introduction of the Code of Conduct in May 2002.

As the Annual Report shows, the Board is continuing to work in partnership with local government to promote and sustain the high standards of conduct which are essential to public confidence in our local democracy.

Copies of the Report are available in the Libraries of the House.

Electoral Pilot Schemes

The Minister for Local Government, Regional Governance and Fire (Mr. Nick Raynsford): The Government are looking at many ways, including all-postal ballots and e-voting, to modernise our electoral system and to increase the opportunities that people have to vote. To test the robustness of the new options and to build public confidence in them, we have undertaken an extensive programme of pilot innovations at local elections. This is why we are promoting legislation to permit further pilots to be held in a number of regions at the European Parliament and combined local elections in June 2004.

Our focus over the forthcoming months will be on working to ensure that pilots held at the combined elections are successful in delivering elections that are more straightforward and accessible for all electors. As a result, we are currently not minded to approve applications for by-election pilots for the period from 1 April 2004 until 1 August 2004.

Outside that period, our general approach on local authority by-election pilots is that while we will consider, as legislation requires us to do, all applications for pilots at by-elections, we are minded normally to approve such applications only if the proposals are consistent with the recommendations of the Electoral Commission as set out in "The Shape of Elections to Come".

TREASURY

United Kingdom Listing Authority

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): The Financial Services Authority, acting in its role as the competent authority for listing, is referred to as the United Kingdom Listing Authority. Every year, the operational objectives of the UKLA are discussed with the Treasury. The annual objectives for 2003–04, which the Treasury has endorsed, will be placed in the Library, and also put on the Treasury website.

Child Trust Fund

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): The Government are today publishing their detailed proposals for the Child Trust Fund. Copies are available in the Vote Office and the Libraries of the House.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Compensation Agency

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Paul Murphy): The Compensation Agency will publish today its Corporate Plan for 2003 to 2006 and Business Plan for 2003 to 2004. I have set the Agency the following Key Performance Targets for 2003 to 2004:

Claims under the Criminal Damage (Compensation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1977

Maintain average time taken to reach decisions at 19 weeks for claims received from 1 April 2003;

Reduce by 85 per cent. the number of claims in hand at 31 March 2003 on which no decision has been reached; and

Process claims under the Criminal Damage and Terrorism Act schemes at a combined average unit cost of £140.

Claims under the Terrorism Act 2000

Reach decisions on claims in 53 days for claims received from 1 April 2003;

Reduce by 85 per cent. the number of claims in hand at 31 March 2003 on which no decision has been reached; and

*Process claims under the Criminal Damage and Terrorism Act schemes at the combined average unit cost of £140.

*This unit cost target relates to claims under the Criminal Damage and Terrorism Act schemes. The work involved in processing these claims is carried out in a single organisational unit within the agency so the efficiency of this element of the agency's operations is measured by reference to a combined unit cost target.

Claims under Criminal Injuries (Compensation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1988

Reduce by 45 per cent. the number of claims in hand at 31 March 2003; and Reach a decision on 50 per cent. of undecided criminal injuries claims in hand at 31 March 2003.

Claims under the Criminal Injuries Compensation (Northern Ireland) Order 2002 (Tariff)

To decide 45 per cent. of all applications within 12 months of receiving the application.

To reach decisions on applications at an average unit cost of £290.

Compliance with Legislation/Standards of Adjudication —All Schemes

That the agency's standards of adjudication are appropriate which will be confirmed by the Department's internal audit branch through random sampling of claims.

Value for Money—All Schemes

Manage the workload in 2003–04 within a running costs budget (to cover salaries and administrative expenditure) to financial limits agreed with the Department (including in-year adjustments).

DEFENCE

Iraq

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): HQ 3 (UK) Division continues to command the multinational division (South-East) (MND(SE)) in Iraq, with contributions from the Czech Republic, Denmark, Italy, Lithuania, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal and Romania.

We have begun a process of roulement of United Kingdom Forces, which involves the incremental replacement of HQ 3 (UK) Division with a composite HQ MND(SE), the replacement of 19 Mechanised Brigade with 20 Armoured Brigade, the replacement of HQ 101 Logistic Brigade with a composite HQ UK National Support Element (NSE), the roulement of the combat service support units that will make up the UK NSE, and the mobilisation of around 1,000 reservists. We expect the maritime and air elements of our presence in theatre to remain broadly stable.

A number of adjustments to our force levels in Iraq were made over the summer. Some of these were relatively minor, such as the withdrawal of around 30 armoured engineers and the short-term deployment of around 30 personnel from 23 Pioneer Regiment Royal Logistic Corps to undertake building and construction tasks around Shabah Logistics Base.

On a larger scale, we also deployed the 2nd Battalion The Light Infantry (2LI) and the 1st Battalion The Royal Green Jackets (1RGJ), to conduct a number of additional security and training tasks and provide MND(SE) with the flexibility and capacity to carry out surge operations designed to counter crime and enhance security. A recent major operation in MND(SE), OPERATION SWEENEY, has resulted in 291 arrests, the seizure of six weapons caches, and the interception of 57 vessels and 58 vehicles involved in criminal activity.

Some of the additional requirements for which 2LI and 1RGJ deployed are now being reduced or progressively transferred to Iraqi security forces. But some other requirements will continue over the next few months, including the provision of training for the new Iraqi Civil Defence Corps. In overall terms, we assess that these continuing requirements can be met by approximately one battalion rather than two. When 2LI and 1RGJ are withdrawn from theatre in November and December they will therefore be replaced by the 2nd Battalion The Parachute Regiment (2 PARA). We envisage that 2 PARA will deploy from early November.

In addition to adjustments to force levels, we have also deployed further equipment to theatre, including over 200 armoured Land Rovers, three Puma helicopters and three Gazelle helicopters. Taken together, these enhancements provide MND(SE) with greater mobility, force protection and surveillance capabilities, increasing the flexibility and effectiveness of the force.

We will continue to keep the size and mix of forces in theatre under close review, and we expect to make further adjustments as a matter of routine to ensure that MND(SE) have appropriate capabilities for the tasks in hand. This is likely to include temporary increases in force levels when appropriate, to provide the General Officer Commanding MND(SE) with additional tactical flexibility and help ensure that progress and momentum are maintained and where possible accelerated. To facilitate this process we intend as a matter of course to nominate two battalions as over-the-horizon operational reserves for Iraq.

Skill Force

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): Skill Force is a nationwide Ministry of Defence originated and Department for Education and Skills supported youth initiative to reengage disaffected 14 to 16 year-olds with mainstream education. There are currently 23 teams operating in around 100 schools with 3,000 participants. Pupils drop two GCSE options in favour of a more vocationally based education. Skill Force mainly uses former military Instructors, who have recently left the armed services to deliver a wide range of Key Skill-based subjects to young people who are in danger of becoming disaffected with the formal academic education system.

Evaluation of the first 12 schemes showed that Skill Force had been very successful in reducing truancy and exclusions by around 80 per cent. and had had a positive impact upon behaviour. As a consequence, DfES has helped to fund a further 11 schemes, which have been operating for a year as part of the behaviour improvement programme.

The Institute of Education, London University, has recently conducted an independent and comprehensive evaluation of Skill Force. The report concluded that:

> "Overall, Skill Force is an extremely well managed programme which provides a unique service to schools. It has been successful in meeting the needs of many disaffected students, improving their motivation, confidence, communication and social skills. It has reduced exclusions, improved behaviour, attendance, attitudes towards education and attainment and also provided students with a range of practical, vocational qualifications. It offers excellent value for money. The comments from students and parents provided in this report are a testament to the opportunities it offers. Perhaps more importantly it has the support of school management. The ethos of Skill Force is positive, 'can do' and focused on problem solving. The challenges outlined above will be tackled with enthusiasm and solutions found."

I am today placing a copy of this report in the Library of the House. We are currently assessing, with the Connexions Service, the impact that Skill Force has had upon participants entering employment, training and education on leaving secondary school in July 2003 at the end of the initial two year course. The Ministry of Defence and the Department for Education and Skills will continue to work together on the longer term future of Skill Force.

Veterans Agency

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): I have set the following Key Targets for the Chief Executive of the Veterans Agency for 2003–04. They are as follows:

SERVICE

Key Target 1: To reduce the average time it takes to issue decisions on claims to war pensions to no more than 63 working days. This is an improvement of 19 working days on the 2002–03 target; and it represents a cumulative improvement of 37 per cent. against the 2000–01 baseline level of 100 working days.

Key Target 2: To reduce the average time it takes to issue decisions on war widows claims to no more than 23 working days. This is an improvement of 11 working days on the 2002–03 target; and it represents a cumulative improvement of 36 per cent. against the 2000–01 baseline level of 36 working days.

Key Target 3: To achieve an externally validated claims accuracy rate of at least 97 per cent.

PERSONNEL

Key Target 4: To carry out an externally validated programme of internal Investors in People assessments during 2003–04 to determine whether the Agency continues to meet the requirements of the IiP standards.

WORKING IN PARTNERSHIP

Key Target 5: To work with the Department for Constitutional Affairs Court Service to reduce the average time it takes an appeal to pass through the war pensions appeals process. By 31 March 2004 the average time should reduce to no more than 250 working days. This is an improvement of 60 working days on the 2002–03 target; and it represents a cumulative improvement of 56 per cent. against the 2000–01 baseline level of 565 working days.

EFFICIENCY

Key Target 6: To use the Agency output costing methodology developed in 2002–03 to help identify and generate such administrative efficiencies and other savings as will enable the agency to operate within a 2003–04 running cost baseline figure that is 3 per cent. less than its resource departmental expenditure limit for that year.

SKYNET 5

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): We announced in February 2002 that the British-based consortium Paradigm Secure Communications had been selected as preferred bidder to supply the SKYNET 5 satellite communications service to the MOD under the Private Finance Initiative.

I am pleased to announce that last Friday contract negotiations were successfully concluded and that the SKYNET 5 PFI contract, the biggest yet placed by the MOD, has been enacted.

The full value of the contract, which is planned to run until 2018, is expected to be around £2.5 billion and Paradigm expect it to create or sustain up to 1,900 jobs across the UK at its peak.

The MOD is getting this service at a significant value for money advantage compared to the costs that would have been associated with a more traditional procurement route.

The move to a PFI approach and accompanying fresh and innovative thinking has resulted in substantial savings. SKYNET 5 is within budget and remains on target to achieve initial provision of new services from 2005. It is a clear example of how we are getting better military capability and better value for money by using Smart Acquisition principles.

This deal will provide the MOD with a number of benefits, including transfer to risk to the contractor. SKYNET 5 will also provide a greatly improved service with regular technology upgrades, and the flexibility to cope with the growth in military satellite communications requirements we expect over the next few years.

The events of 11 September 2001 provided us all with a timely reminder to make sure that our key military communication and information systems have the necessary resilience to ensure business continuity. SKYNET 5 services will provide this assurance under almost any conceivable scenarios.

TRANSPORT

Disability Discrimination Act (Taxis)

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): The Government will today announce their proposals for implementing the taxi provisions of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. This will allow us to set standards for wheelchair access and a range of other features to help disabled people use taxis. We intend to vary the application of the regulations to target first those areas where we believe accessible taxis will make the biggest impact in meeting the needs of disabled people and where additional cost will not have a major effect. We are calling these first phase authorities and propose to introduce the Regulations in these areas over a 10-year period from 2010–20.

Authorities within the first phase have been identified and each meet one or more of the following criteria:

A licensing authority population of at least 120,000 people;

A major transport interchange;

A major tourist attraction; or

An existing mandatory policy resulting in 100 per cent. accessible vehicles.

A list of those authorities that are currently included will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Licensing authorities outside of this first phase would not be subject to the regulations in the first instance. We would instead issue voluntary guidance to these authorities on establishing an appropriate mix of vehicles and on the design parameters that they should be considering. We would also monitor the introduction of accessible vehicles in these areas to determine whether the guidance is effective. A view would then be taken on the necessity of extending the regulations to these areas.

The proposals, which apply to England and Wales only, will be the subject of a full public consultation process in due course. Scotland and Northern Ireland will be holding their own separate consultation processes.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Judicial Appointments Annual Report for 2002–2003—10–28

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): The judicial appointments annual report, covering the period 1 April 2002 to 31 March 2003, is published today. This year's report shows that:

Six hundred and ninety seven appointments were made in 2002–03 from 3,449 applications.

Appointments of minority ethnic candidates rose from 7.8 per cent. in 2001–02 to 8.9 per cent. (this includes lay appointments) and is more than double the 1999–2000 figure which was 4.2 per cent.

Women accounted for 31 per cent. of appointments and although this was a decrease of 3 per cent. compared with 2001–02, the figure remains significantly higher than it was five years ago when the first report was published.

The pilot Assessment Centre in October/November for the Deputy District Judge (Civil and Magistrates) competitions and the Deputy Queen's Bench Master competition was a success. The Commissioner for Judicial Appointments' audit of the pilot was very positive.

The report also explains other recent action on equal opportunities.

Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The report is also available on the Department's website at http://www.dca.gov.uk./

WORK AND PENSIONS

EU Pensions Directive

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): Copies of the Government's consultation document on the implementation of the European Directive (2003/41/EC) on Institutions for Occupational Retirement Pensions have today been placed in the Library. Copies of the consultation and the Directive are also available on the Department for Work and Pensions' website at http://www.dwp.gov.uk/resourcecentre/consultation_papers.asp

The Directive supports the Government's plans for reform of the UK pensions system, as outlined in the recent Green Paper Simplicity, Security and Choice: Working and Saving for Retirement (Cm 5677) and the Government's response, Action on Occupational Pensions (Cm 5835).

It sets up a common framework across Europe for the operation and supervision of institutions providing occupational retirement pensions. It allows pension schemes established in one EU Member State to be sponsored by employers in another Member State, enabling the establishment of cross-border pension schemes.

The consultation being undertaken builds upon the extensive pensions consultation carried out by the Department for Work and Pensions over the last year. It focuses upon implementation of those areas of the Directive which have not been covered in the earlier consultations.

The consultation period will close on 23 December.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Teachers' Pension Scheme

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. David Miliband): Parliamentary approval for additional resources of £45 million will be sought, prior to funding from the winter supplementary estimate process becoming available, to meet a further cash requirement for existing services (teachers' pension scheme payments), as provision for the total net cash requirement on the estimate is exhausted.

The teachers' pension scheme fund is managed by The Department for Education and Skills and administered under contract by Capita Business Service Ltd. The Department's funding to Capita is completed on a daily basis with the funded amount being determined by the net cash requirement for payments that Capita makes on behalf of the teachers' pension scheme.

Cash drawn down from the consolidation fund is greater at the beginning of each month because appropriation in aid arrives too late to fund this expenditure. To enable the Department to meet its November and December funding obligations, £45 million will be required to make up the shortfall between the funding requirement and winter supplementary funding becoming available.

Parliamentary approval for additional resources of £145 million for teachers' pensions will be sought in the winter supplementary estimate for the Department for Education and Skills. Pending that approval, expenditure estimated at £45 million will be met by repayable cash advances from the contingencies fund.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Combined European Parliamentary Elections

The Minister for Local Government, Regional Governance and Fire (Mr. Nick Raynsford): My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs have today issued a joint consultation document seeking views on draft Statutory Instruments which would make provision for the conduct of European parliamentary elections in Great Britain and Gibraltar, for the combination of polls of these elections and certain other elections in England and Wales, for amendments to the Greater London Authority election rules, and for giving effect to the Government's announced intention to move the date of the English local council and Greater London Authority elections in 2004, so that they take place at the same time as the European parliamentary elections.

Comments are invited from key stakeholders and interested parties for the deadline of 11 December 2003.

Copies of these documents are available in the Libraries of the House and will also be available on the OPDM and DCA websites.

NORTHERN IRELAND

North/South Implementation Bodies

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Paul Murphy): I have today placed in the Library papers relating to decisions that have been taken during the period 1 July 2003 to 30 September 2003 which relate to the North/South implementation bodies and Tourism Ireland Ltd under the terms of the exchange of notes of 19 November 2002 (Cmnd 5708).

TREASURY

Tax Law Rewrite

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): The tax law rewrite project at the Inland Revenue has completed its rewrite of the pay-as-you-earn (PAYE) regulations. The regulations were laid today. They were accompanied by a detailed commentary on them by the project. Copies of the commentary have been placed in the Library of the House.

The rewritten regulations complement the modernisation of the legislation for employment income in the Income Tax (Earnings and Pensions) Act 2003.

There will be no change in practice for employers and employees generally. But those who do use the regulations will find them clearer and more consistent.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Sustainable Procurement in Government

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): The UK Government is committed to the achievement of sustainable development. Continued action is needed by all sectors in society to ensure that our social, economic and environmental objectives are achieved simultaneously. The scale of central civil government procurement—estimated at £13 billion per year—means that the purchase of goods, works and services by Government has the potential to contribute directly to sustainable development across a wide range of sectors, from construction to information technology.

Following the recent high-level cross-Government review by the sustainable procurement group, we are clear that central Government procurement can and should support sustainable development within the framework of the Government's procurement policy and its overarching aim of achieving value for money, and the EC procurement rules.

The revised guidance published today by Defra and the Office of Government Commerce makes clear the relationship between sustainable development objectives and the legal and policy framework for procurement. It demonstrates practically how to integrate relevant sustainable development issues at the various stages of the procurement process. It replaces the Joint Note on Environmental Issues in Purchasing issued in 1999 by HMT and DETR. Followed properly, there should be no conflict between relevant sustainable development objectives and obtaining value for money. Indeed, there will be synergies between them, for instance in purchasing energy efficient goods that reduce whole life costs.

We are keen that consideration of environmental impacts should be built in right at the start of the procurement process (at the business case and specification stages), when options are being considered, as this approach is likely to have most potential to contribute to sustainable development objectives, as well as being more appropriate under the EC rules. The consideration of whole life costs is important at these early stages, as well as at the award stage.

This revised guidance signals our support for sustainable procurement across government and meets one of the headline recommendations of the Sustainable Procurement Group. Defra and OGC will continue to work closely together with other departments and the Government's central buying agencies OGCbuying.solutions and NHS PASA on minimum standards for commonly purchased products, departmental environmental procurement strategies, ongoing development of sustainable product information and environmental risk assessment for larger procurement projects. These will be progressed primarily under the procurement section of the Framework for Sustainable Development on the Government Estate.

Our first priority is for environmental procurement to become embedded across the board in Government purchasing, in order to build upon the progress already made in this area. The understanding, by purchasers, of the scope to consider social issues in procurement is less developed, and further discussion of this by the cross-Government Sustainable Procurement Group is planned, leading towards more comprehensive guidance.

Sustainable procurement will not be achieved overnight, but this guidance is a vital first step to put in place the structures to support and encourage all those involved in government procurement in delivering this important commitment. Copies of the Joint Note on Environmental Issues in Purchasing have been placed in the Library and can also be found online at www.ogc.gov.uk/ or http://www.sustainable-development.gov.uk/sdig/improving/contextf.htm

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Equality and Human Rights

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and Minister for Women (Ms Patricia Hewitt): A fair and prosperous Britain must provide opportunity for all. A society that is to flourish must make full use of the talents of all its members. Thriving societies and economies are based on strong, cohesive communities where diversity is celebrated as a strength and discrimination tackled.

Equality matters to everyone—it is not a minority concern.

Last October the Government launched the consultation document "Equality and Diversity: Making it Happen" to seek views on the role, priorities and structure for Great Britain's statutory equality institutions in the new century to help meet this vision of a cohesive and prosperous society.

The consultation drew a strong response from a wide range of interested groups and individuals. I am placing a summary of those responses and copies of the responses themselves in the Libraries of both Houses.

In the light of the consultation the Government have concluded that a single body represents the best option for realising its vision of a fairer, more inclusive and prosperous Britain. A single equality body provides an effective and flexible framework for supporting our equality legislation as well as underlining the importance of equality as a mainstream concern.

Many respondents also highlighted the potential role a new body might play in providing support for human rights as well as equality. The government also considered carefully the sixth report of the Joint Committee on Human Rights, which called for integrated institutional support for human rights and equality. We have therefore decided that the new body's remit should cover the promotion of human rights together with its equality responsibilities.

The Government recognises the crucial contribution to the diversity agenda already made by the Commission for Racial Equality, the Disability Rights Commission and the Equal Opportunities Commission and the need for a single body to build on and protect the programmes they have put in place.

Role of the New Body

The working title of the body will be the Commission for Equality and Human Rights. It will promote an inclusive agenda, underlining the importance of equality for all in society as well as working to combat discrimination affecting specific groups. It will promote equal opportunities for all and tackle barriers to participation. It will play a key role in building a new, inclusive sense of British citizenship and identity in which shared values of respect, fair treatment and equal dignity are recognised as underpinning a cohesive, prosperous society. It will promote a culture of respect for human rights, especially in the delivery of public services.

I intend to publish a White Paper next spring making detailed proposals for the body and seeking comments. At this point the Government has reached no conclusions on key issues such as the governance of the body and its internal structure. A range of views on these and other questions were expressed during the consultation, which need further examination and debate with interested stakeholders. I am therefore establishing a task force with members reflecting the interests concerned to provide advice on these issues. This reflects the Government's commitment to an open and transparent process for developing the new body. The task force will include representatives of the existing commissions and the new anti-discrimination strands of sexual orientation, religion and belief, and age. It will also include members with a particular interest in human rights as well as people from Scotland, Wales and other interests.

The responses to the White Paper will inform the preparation of legislation to establish a single body which will be introduced as soon as Parliamentary time allows. Late 2006 would be the earliest that the new body can be established.

There was a strong call in the consultation for the body's arrangements in Scotland and Wales to fit well with devolved legislation, institutions and policies and for its policies to take account of the social, cultural and economic circumstances of Scotland and Wales. The Government will set out proposals for the Commission's Scottish and Welsh arrangements in the White Paper to be published next spring.

Key Priorities for the New Commission

The Government looks forward to the Commission's priorities being defined through continuing consultation and debate. However, the Government believe the following principles should underline its work:

> Promoting equality and diversity in the round, fostering understanding of their importance in underpinning a prosperous and cohesive society; promoting a culture of respect for human rights and acceptance of the responsibilities that go with them.

Giving full attention to the specific needs of individual groups who receive legislative protection against discrimination, ensuring the availability of relevant skills and expertise.

Improving support for individuals through better and more accessible provision of services, particularly advice and information.

Working in partnership with business and public sector organisations, meeting the requirement expressed strongly by business and others for a single, accessible source of advice and guidance covering the breadth of legislative obligations as well as advice and support on good practice.

Mainstreaming equality and human rights in the public sector and public service delivery. Key tools will be the promotion and enforcement of the Race Relations Amendment Act statutory duty on public bodies to promote equality of opportunity, the planned disability duty, awareness of the duties under the Human Rights Act and working to encourage good practice in equality and human rights generally.

Developing partnerships with a range of bodies at regional and local level, including statutory, voluntary and business organisations, to deliver local, accessible information and advice to individuals, public sector bodies and businesses.

Bringing a strategic, modern approach to enforcement of equality legislation supported by up to date enforcement tools.

Promoting community cohesion through providing support to local initiatives to promote dialogue and understanding between different communities and groups, where relevant drawing upon the balance between rights and responsibilities contained in the Human Rights Act.

The Government are committed to ensuring that the needs of all groups covered by equality legislation will be met by the new body, as well as supporting our legislation on human rights, and that relevant levels of focus, expertise and influence are all retained.

We will therefore ensure that the single body has robust and transparent means of ensuring that the voices of specific groups are heard and that they have a significant role in steering the policy and approach of the body on matters of concern to their strand. We will also ensure that strand specific work is clearly identified, supported and attracts appropriate priority, visibility and profile within the organisation; and that fit for purpose governance and organisational structures are developed which reflect this approach.

Disabled people and their organisations have raised concerns that a single equality body should meet their particular needs. The Government recognise the distinctive aspects of the disability rights agenda and the concerns above that reflect the relatively recent establishment of the Disability Rights Commission and the fact that there has been relatively little time for the distinctive disability rights legislation to take hold. There is also a demanding programme of disability legislative reform over the next few years requiring sustained and major campaigns of information, advice, publicity and guidance to ensure effective implementation.

Our White Paper will put forward proposals developed in conjunction with key stakeholder interests to deal with these and other related concerns.

DEFENCE

Ministry of Defence (Annual Report and Accounts)

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): Information about the Ministry of Defence's performance during the last financial year is contained in the Ministry of Defence Annual Report and Accounts for 2002–03, which will be laid before the House today as HC 1125.

Copies will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses and it will also be available on the Ministry of Defence website.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Opium Poppy Crop (Afghanistan)

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime released its survey results for the 2003 opium poppy crop in Afghanistan on 29 October. The survey showed that opium poppy cultivation increased by 8 per cent. from 74,000 hectares in 2002 to 80,000 hectares in 2003 while production rose by 6 per cent. from 3,400 tonnes in 2002 to 3,600 tonnes in 2003. The UN survey also revealed that cultivation in traditional areas—where the Afghan Government has been able to exert control—decreased and moved into more marginal areas.

The UK uses the UN survey, which is produced in partnership with the Afghan Government, as a reference point for its work as the lead nation on counter-narcotics support in Afghanistan. While the increase in opium cultivation and production is unwelcome, it is not unexpected. Experience of counter-narcotic policies in other countries, such as Pakistan and Thailand, shows that cultivation tends to increase before declining. Production also tends to move from traditional areas to more marginal and inaccessible areas to protect crops against law enforcement activity. Reductions in the traditional areas demonstrates that drug control policy has been effective where the Afghan Government has been able to exert control. Increasing security and stability in Afghanistan remains key to progress in reducing opium production.

Afghanistan's national drug control strategy, agreed earlier this year, has set the target of eliminating opium poppy by 2013. The UK is investing £70 million on sustainable measures over the next three years to support implementation of that strategy; additional staff are being deployed to Kabul to assist in the implementation. Other nations are also contributing, either directly or indirectly, to counter-narcotics work in Afghanistan, complementing the UK's efforts. I will be co-hosting, with President Karzai and the United Nations, an international conference in Kabul in February next year to boost further the international counter-narcotics effort in Afghanistan.

Iraq

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): In response to an oral question from the right hon. Member for Sleaford and

North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) on 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 9, I undertook to inform the House of the costs of the United Kingdom's involvement in Iraq. They are as follows:

Military Costs

The Chancellor has set aside £3 billion for military operations in Iraq. The Ministry of Defence has drawn down £1 billion from this special reserve during the 2003 Spring Supplementary Estimates. From this amount, the cost of preparatory activity in the 2002–03 financial year is currently estimated to have been £700 million. Further information on the total net additional cost of the military operation during the 2002–03 financial year will be found in the Ministry of Defence's Resource Account for 2002–03, which is due to be published around the end of October.

For the current financial year, further sums have been drawn down from the special reserve. These are subject to scrutiny by HM Treasury and Parliament through the normal estimates process.

Reconstruction

Her Majesty's Government plan to spend a total of £544 million on reconstruction in Iraq for the three years from April 2003, including our contribution to EC assistance and our secondment of personnel to the coalition provisional authority.

Other Costs

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office spent £5.62 million on additional security at posts in the Middle East during 2002–03, and expects to spend a further £1.3 million in this financial year on security costs at posts directly attributable to our action in Iraq.

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office estimates that it will have spent up to £12.1 million on the British Office in Baghdad and other bilateral representation by the end of this financial year.

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office forecasts a further £1.8 million of Iraq-related costs outside Iraq during this financial year.

Future Costs

Her Majesty's Government have not so far committed any other amounts in connection with the United Kingdom's involvement in Iraq.

It is too early to predict the continuing costs of military deployment, support for the Coalition Provisional Authority and development of bilateral relations with Iraq beyond the end of this financial year.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Unified Courts Agency

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): The Secretary of State and I have carefully considered all the representations made to us about the location of Hampshire and the Isle of Wight within the structure of the new courts agency. We have focused on what produces the best justice system for the public in the South East and South West regions. A number of submissions have been made to us on the administration of justice if Hampshire were to be part of the South East region. We acknowledge that making a change at this stage would raise a number of potentially difficult issues for the Judiciary and the Bar, which could impact on the administration of justice for the public. In addition we have received representations from partner criminal justice agencies locally to the effect that from their perspective change would not bring significant benefit.

The established Government policy of aligning public bodies with the Government regions is important and can potentially bring significant benefits to the administration of justice. However the immediate benefits of that policy do not, currently, justify realigning Hampshire and the Isle of Wight in the South East region. Taking account of the widespread strength of feeling, we have decided not to realign Hampshire and the Isle of Wight at this time. As the regional agenda develops, however, we believe there may well be a much clearer case for realignment and we will therefore reconsider this issue in 2006–07.

In reviewing the distribution of business across Hampshire, Dorset and Wiltshire, we have decided that in order to provide a better service for court users in Dorset that subject to the views of the senior judiciary Bournemouth Crown Court should become a first tier centre. This would mean that serious cases from Dorset could be tried more conveniently—clearly a benefit for victims and witnesses in the area.

TRANSPORT

Disability Discrimination Act (Rail Provisions)

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): The Government today published a consultation paper on its proposals to amend the rail provisions in Part V of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (DDA). The consultation period will end on Monday 26 January 2004.

Amending the rail provisions of the DDA was one of the recommendations made by the Disability Rights Task Force (DRTF) in their report "From Exclusion to Inclusion". The Government have accepted the DRTF's recommendations on transport. This consultation process fulfils the commitment to take forward the recommendations for the introduction of an end date by which all rail vehicles must comply with the Rail Vehicle Accessibility Regulations 1998 and regulations covering the refurbishment of rail vehicles.

The consultation also takes the opportunity to invite views on a number of associated issues that affect the operation of the rail provisions of the Act. These additional issues, which include changes to the enforcement regime and the removal of the requirement for exemptions to be granted via statutory instrument, were not covered in the DRTF report.

As rail services are not devolved, this consultation will cover England, Scotland and Wales.

Copies of the consultation document have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Housing Benefit

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): Deductions from eligible rent for heating and hot water were not increased in the 2003 uprating Order (S.I. 2003/526) from £1.15 to £1.20 as was indicated in the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, Mr. Andrew Smith, on 18 November 2002, Official Report, column 365. Eligible rent forms part of local authorities assessment of Housing Benefit.

The annual DWP uprating circular quoted a deduction rate of £1.20, which means that some housing benefit recipients will have been underpaid. Local authorities are being advised today of the issue and are being advised to take corrective action on affected cases, and that they should consider how best to take that action given their individual circumstances.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Regional Referendums

The Minister for Local Government, Regional Governance and Fire (Mr. Nick Raynsford): My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and I will be launching an information campaign in the North East, North West and Yorkshire and Humber on 3 and 4 November. This campaign will explain to voters the issues around the referendums on regional assemblies and the associated local government changes, which we expect to be held next autumn. Further events will be held over the next year. Copies of the voter friendly leaflet are available in the Libraries of both Houses.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Voluntary and Community Sector

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): I am pleased to announce that the Government and the voluntary and community sector will be celebrating the fifth birthday of the Compact on Relations between Government and the sector with Compact Week from 3 to 9 November. The Compact is the partnership agreement for improving our relationship. Since the Compact was launched in 1998, this has been followed by five Codes of Good Practice (on consultation, funding, black and minority ethnic organisations, volunteering and community groups), and Local Compact Guidelines. Progress is being achieved across Government and the Sector in implementing the Compact and Codes. We have been working with Local Government and the majority of local authority areas are now covered by a Local Compact, also involving other local public sector bodies, for building on relationships at local level.

We need to build further on the achievements to date by continuing to promote the Compact and good working practice between Government and the sector, and the sector's activity. Compact Week is an excellent opportunity to take steps to encourage greater awareness and make the Compact a reality across the breadth of Government and the voluntary and community sector.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Iraq (Madrid Donors' Conference)

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): I represented the United Kingdom at the Donors' Conference on Iraq held in Madrid on 23 and 24 October. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and Baroness Symons also attended.

The Conference was opened by UN Secretary General Kofi Annan. A total of 73 countries attended, along with 20 international organisations and 13 non-governmental organisations. The Iraqi Governing Council was represented by their President, Dr. Ayad Allawi, and a number of other members. Iraqi Ministers also participated. The Conference was characterised by a strong and visible Iraq presence, as well as by a sense of the international community coming together to focus on how it can help Iraqis secure a stable and prosperous future.

Over US$33 billion in grants and concessional loans was pledged towards Iraq's reconstruction for the period 2004 to 2007, significantly exceeding expectations. $20 billion was pledged by the USA, $5 billion by Japan, $3 billion–$5 billion by the World Bank, $2.5 billion by the IMF, and the rest by other bilateral donors, mainly from European and Arab countries. Additional pledges were made by way of export credits and assistance in kind.

In addition to the finance committed at Madrid, Iraq's investment needs are expected to be met increasingly by oil revenues, foreign direct investment and commercial lending once Iraq's debts have been rescheduled through the Paris Club. Another donor meeting could be called in the future if necessary.

As set out in my statement to the House on 14 October, I pledged £296 million over the next two years on behalf of the United Kingdom, bringing our total commitment in Iraq since April 2003 to £544m. This commitment will not result in any reduction in DFID's planned development expenditure for low income countries, or affect our commitment of £1bn for Africa by 2005–06. Nor will it result in any reductions to existing programme commitments in the current financial year.

The Conference Chair's Conclusions can be found on the Conference website: http://www.comisionadoiraq.org/donors/index_ing.htm

My speech to the Conference is on DFID's website: http://www.dfid.gov.uk/

DEFENCE

Regional Prime Contract South West

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): The Ministry of Defence has undertaken to make significant improvements to the defence estate through a restructuring of the service and construction delivery mechanisms. Regional prime contracting is a key element of that policy for which the South West region represents the second of five regional contracts. The initiative aims to provide a better quality of service and greater value for money through a suitably incentivised contract awarded on Smart Procurement principles that encourages innovation and efficiency.

I am pleased to tell the House that the assessment phase is now complete. Revised bids have been received from three consortia and the bids have been evaluated against detailed criteria. The preferred bidder has been identified as Debut Services Ltd, a consortium of Bovis Lend Lease and Babcock Services Group International.

The South West regional prime contract will provide for capital works, property maintenance and facilities management services throughout the MOD's estate in South West England over the next seven years. The value of this contract is likely to be in excess of £500 million. It is expected that contract award will take place in spring next year.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Bovine Tuberculosis

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): The Independent Scientific Group on cattle TB (ISG) was appointed by Ministers in 1998 to design and oversee a large-scale field trial, the randomised badger culling trial (RBCT), aimed at evaluating badger culling as a means to reduce the incidence of cattle TB. The trial involves three experimental treatments: (i) proactive culling, which aims to reduce badger densities to very low levels across entire trial areas, (ii) reactive culling, which seeks to remove only those badgers geographically close to recent cattle TB outbreaks on particular premises, and (iii) no culling (survey only).

The culling of badgers in reactive treatment areas of the RBCT will be suspended from today. The decision to suspend the culling of badgers in these areas has been taken on the basis of recent scientific findings from the ISG.

The ISG has advised Ministers that its interim analysis of trial data so far indicates that there was a 27 per cent. increase in the number of cases of bovine TB (breakdowns) occurring in reactive culling areas compared to the related survey only areas where no badger culling took place.

I have decided to suspend operations immediately because of the risk that a further three months of culling would cause additional TB breakdowns.

The results that have now emerged from the reactive culling part of the trial will be published as soon as possible in a peer reviewed scientific journal. Data on herd breakdowns from the reactive trial areas will continue to be collected and subjected to further analysis with the more detailed results being submitted for publication in a peer reviewed journal at a later date.

On the advice of the ISG, operations will continue in proactive areas because the data for these areas do not yet yield a statistically significant result. The survey-only (control) areas will also continue to be monitored.

The Government's policy on bovine TB is based on scientific advice and these findings will be taken into account in the development of the forthcoming TB strategy.

TREASURY

Double Taxation Convention (United Kingdom and New Zealand)

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): A protocol to the double taxation convention with New Zealand was signed on 4 November 2003. After signature, the text of the protocol was deposited in the Libraries of both Houses and made available on the Inland Revenue's website. The text of the Protocol will be scheduled to a draft Order in Council and laid before the House of Commons in due course.

Financial Services and Markets Act 2000

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): I am today announcing the scope of the two-year review of the Financial Services and Markets Act, details of which are set out in a paper which is available in the Vote Office and the Library of the House.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Bermuda

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): Pursuant to my written statement of 3 March 2003, Official Report, column WS72, the Governor of Bermuda has, on 2 November 2003, initiated a public debate in Bermuda on this subject, by publicising and distributing widely a consultation document seeking comments from political parties, organisations and interested individuals by 31 December 2003. Copies of this document have been placed in the Library of the House.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Extradition Bill

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): The Government are today publishing a report containing their response to the consultation on the draft extradition code of practice.

The draft code of practice, which sets out the operation of police powers under Part 4 of the Extradition Bill, was published on 9 June 2003. The consultation closed on 8 September.

We are grateful to all those who took the time and trouble to respond to the consultation. The responses (other than those where the author requested that the response remain confidential) were placed in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament and made available on the Home Office website on 30 September.

The report contains a summary and analysis of the comments received and sets out the Government's position in response to the main issues raised by respondents. Copies of the report are available in the Libraries of both Houses and can be accessed through the Home Office website at http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/crimpol/oic/extradition/bill/documents.html

Assuming that the Extradition Bill receives Royal Assent, the code of practice will be revised in the light of the comments received and laid before Parliament for approval by a resolution of each House.

National Policing Plan 2004–07

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): I have today placed in the Libraries of both Houses copies of the National Policing Plan 2004–07 and the consultation paper "Policing: Building Safer Communities Together".

The national policing plan sets the framework and context for policing in England and Wales for the next three years. It sets out the vision for successful policing, the key priorities, underpinning themes, national standards and the operational tools to deliver the service wanted and demanded by the public. The national policing plan will inform local planning and help to ensure that all communities know what they should expect from their local police force.

The plan is central to our determination to ensure the police are able to work within a modern and efficient criminal justice system and to be engaged with the communities they serve. That is why we have published it jointly with our consultation paper "Policing: Building Safer Communities Together".

The consultation paper sets out our broad thoughts on the future direction of police reform. We want to build on the successes of the existing reform programme in moving towards a modernised, truly representative, more responsive police service delivering, consistently, core national standards of policing that the public has a right to expect, within a framework which allows for local flexibilities. We want a genuine dialogue on the issues contained in the paper which are grouped under four main themes—increasing community engagement, strengthening accountability arrangements, improving operational effectiveness and modernising the police service.

Both documents are available on the Home Office website at http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Excellent Authorities

The Minister for Local Government, Regional Governance and Fire (Mr. Nick Raynsford): Authorities categorised as excellent[1] by the Audit Commission following comprehensive performance assessment are given a wide range of freedoms and flexibilities in recognition of their performance and capacity to improve.

These freedoms and flexibilities include the removal of almost all plans, virtually no inspection and a dramatic reduction in ring-fenced grants. A programme is in train which has already provided some substantial freedoms. Others will become available as the Local Government Act 2003 and other deregulatory measures come into effect.

The Government have decided that councils which lose their status as excellent where their performance has slipped should in principle retain the full range of freedoms and flexibilities for the following year, 2004–05. Exceptionally freedoms could be retained for a further year if that proves necessary in securing improvement in key areas of weakness.

The Government will meet with formerly excellent authorities as soon as possible after recategorisation to determine how best to secure the necessary improvement in performance. The relevant Inspectorate/Department (as appropriate) will agree with the authority:

- the way in which the authority will tackle declining performance and what steps are needed to move back up to excellent;
- the time period within which improvement in performance is expected to take place; and
- how performance improvement will be supported and assessed.

The principle of an inspection holiday will be retained for councils subject to an agreement, but there will need to be some inspection involvement in respect of any specific service in which performance has deteriorated. However, the scale and scope of assessment will be the subject of discussion with each authority and will be proportionate to the scale of the problem to be addressed. It could include a large degree of self-assessment.

The duration of the agreement will be tailored to individual councils' circumstances but will be up to 12 months, although in exceptional cases it could be up to 24 months.

[1] Excellent authorities that are currently less then 3 star education performers will gain access to the full package of flexibilities, including the inspection "holiday", as they relate to education on achieving 3 star status.

Councils which have been recategorised downwards from excellent will remain members of the Innovation Forum.

An agreement will be made when:

a rule comes into play eg

- Social services performance falls below 2 stars;
- Education performance falls below 2 stars;
- Financial standing; the auditor's judgement falls to 2 or below on the 4 point scale;
- Any other core service scores 1 on the 4 point scale.

Overall service scores fall below the 2002 threshold for excellent based on the 2002 CPA methodology.

In exceptional circumstances drops in service or corporate performance may be sufficiently serious as to warrant immediate removal of some or all freedoms and flexibilities. These circumstances include:

- Service failure in either social services which would lead to zero star or special measures status, or education, in the event that an LEA receives an OFSTED inspection report graded "unsatisfactory" or worse;
- Exposure of fundamental problems in the council that had not previously been evident;
- Breakdown of relations between members and officers such that the council ceases to be able to run itself effectively.

The reaction would be different in different cases and would be proportionate to the scope and severity of the failure. In the event of service failure in education or social services any removal of freedoms and flexibilities would be limited to those related to the relevant service area.

Renewable Energy

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Yvette Cooper): I am today announcing the start of the public consultation period for planning policy statement 22, which sets out this Government's planning policy for renewable energy projects.

Increased development of renewable energy resources is vital to facilitating the delivery of the Government's commitments on both climate change and renewable energy. This new draft planning policy statement clearly sets out positive planning policies, which will facilitate renewable energy developments and contribute to all four elements of the Government's sustainable development strategy.

This statement makes clear:

- that local planning authorities should set clear criteria in their plans on which renewable energy projects will be judged rather than identifying any specific locations suitable for certain types of development. We believe that the past emphasis on identifying specific areas of search within development plans has proved unsuccessful;
- that targets for renewable energy generation should be set within regional planning guidance, as indicated in the Energy White Paper. Such targets may be disaggregated sub-regionally if appropriate, but the aim should always be to exceed any targets set, rather than just meet them;

the latest Government planning policy relating to renewable energy developments and the additional safeguards for national parks or other national and internationally designated areas.

Due to the need for clearer and more concise statements of Government policy this PPS does not include technical advice or good practice guidance. The intention is to publish separately a companion guide containing the technical details of what was originally in the annexes of PPG22. We are also keen to include evidence of good practice from both developers and local planning authorities within this guide. Work on the guide will commence shortly and it will be published alongside the final version of PPS22.

TRANSPORT

School Buses

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): My Department is today publishing a research report by Steer Davies Cleave which evaluates the impacts of three yellow school bus pilots in Hebden Bridge (West Yorkshire) Runnymede (Surrey) and Wrexham (North Wales), plus a variety of other schemes around the country. I am arranging for copies of the report to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses. This research sets of the potential advantages of well designed dedicated bus schemes and the service features which are most highly valued by both primary and secondary school children.

Although the pilots evaluated have been relatively small in scale, there is clear evidence that dedicated bus schemes have the potential to reduce car dependency on the journey to school, the key objective of the travelling to school action plan, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills and I published jointly on 17 September.

Several local authorities have already submitted, or are in the process of submitting, capital funding bids for dedicated school bus schemes through the local transport plan process. I welcome the initiative that is being taken by local authorities in considering how dedicated school buses can contribute to the overall mix of transport policies at local level. Where these schemes can meet our normal appraisal criteria, and subject to affordability constraints, my Department will give full and fair consideration of such bids, consistent with its approach to other bids for major capital funding.

DEFENCE

Gurkha Prisoners of War

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): The Government have carried out a detailed review of the eligibility for the ex-gratia payment scheme established in 2000 for far east prisoners of war. This follows the ruling in the High Court by Mr. Justice McCombe in November 2002.

I am now able to announce that, in accordance with the principles set out in the judgment of the Court, the scheme will be formally extended to include those Gurkha far east prisoners of war (FEPOW) who were held captive by the Japanese in the second world war and who, in 1951 when the peace treaty between the United Kingdom and Japan was signed, were citizens of Nepal. Claims can be made by the FEPOW or by their surviving spouse for the payment of £10,000.

In order to deal with applications, a team from the Ministry of Defence will be established in Kathmandu and in Delhi by the end of February 2004. Application forms will be available for claims after this date but in the meantime an internet site http://www.army.mod.uk/fepow is available now for potential claimants to register their interest.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Oil and Gas Licensing

The Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services (Mr. Stephen Timms): I am pleased to inform the House that I am today offering Burlington Resources (Irish Sea) Limited an oil and gas exploration and production licence on Seaward Blocks 113/21 and 113/22 in the East Irish Sea.

The successful applicant will have a fixed period in which to decide whether or not to accept the offers.

DTI undertook an environmental appropriate assessment prior to advertising these blocks to ensure compliance with European Union environmental legislation.

Overseas Exhibitions

The Minister for Trade and Investment (Mr. Mike O'Brien): Details of UK Trade & Investment's £20 million programme of support for UK company participation in supported groups at overseas exhibitions, seminars and sector focused outward missions will be placed in the Library of the House. Sponsor organisations that bid for support to organise groups are being informed.

These overseas exhibitions, seminars and sector focused outward missions continue to be central to trade development work world wide. UK Trade & Investment is conscious of sponsor organisations' need for flexibility in the way in which the funding is allocated. The operation of the programme during the 2004–05 financial year will continue to take account of this need for flexibility, within the overall budget provision, and the need for efficient administration.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Magistrates Courts Service

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): The Annual Report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of the Magistrates' Courts Service for 2002–03 has been laid before Parliament today. This document gives full details of the Magistrates Court Service Inspectorate's performance for that year. Copies of the Report have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan Pipeline

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): On 4 November the Executive Board of the International Finance Corporation (IFC) agreed to provide a loan to help fund the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan (BTC) Pipeline. The IFC decision was taken by the IFC Executive Board on which 175 shareholders are represented by 24 Directors, including the UK. The IFC loan, which will be at commercial rates of interest, is for around 4.5 per cent. of the total cost of the BTC pipeline and accompanying Azeri-Chirag-Gunashli (ACG) Phase 1 oil field development projects.

The BTC pipeline will provide an export route for oil from Azerbaijan's Caspian oil fields. The Governments of Azerbaijan, Georgia and Turkey—the countries through which the pipeline passes—strongly support the project and have negotiated agreements with BTC Corporation, the pipeline company. Azerbaijan, a low-income country, will benefit from significant revenues from the ACG oil field development. Georgia, also a low-income country, will benefit from transit revenues of up to 10 per cent. of current GDP/year. The pipeline will help to strengthen cooperation between the three countries and increase their links to global markets. It will provide local employment and demonstrate the potential for foreign investment. The construction of the pipeline, which will be buried underground, has already started.

Responsible and transparent management of oil revenue will be vital if the BTC project is to achieve real development benefits for the people of the region. Working to achieve this will need to be a priority for the Governments of the region, with support, assistance and oversight from civil society, the private sector and the international community. The agreement of BTC to "publish what it pays" and in turn the agreement of Georgia and Azerbaijan to "publish what they receive" are welcome steps. The UK will continue to work to increase transparency and build local capacity in decision making on the use of revenues, including through the Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative (EITI).

DFID is not providing any direct funding for the BTC project. DFID's role is as a shareholder of IFC and of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (EBRD)—whose Executive Board will consider finance to BTC on 11 November. The institutions carried out rigorous social and environmental, integrity, legal and commercial due-diligence procedures. In accordance with our standard practice, we did not duplicate the due diligence undertaken by these institutions.

Over the last year DFID officials have met with local and international NGOs, staff from IFC and the EBRD, BTC and representatives of the governments involved to build a better understanding of the benefits and risks associated with the pipeline. In view of the project's complexity, DFID commissioned consultants to do an assessment of the BTC Environmental Assessment. They confirmed compliance with the IFC and EBRD policies and procedures. I will place a copy of this report in the House of Commons Library.

The Government recognise that large-scale pipeline projects such as the BTC pipeline present risks as well as potential benefits. Project risks include the weak governance environment and the potential social and environmental impacts of the pipeline. The multilateral institutions have thorough environmental and social safeguards procedures and genuine expertise of working in the region. We believe that their engagement provides the best prospect that the BTC pipeline will be constructed and operated to the highest standards. The UK Director at IFC therefore supported the project.

We are now focusing on ensuring that the project is implemented properly. In particular we recognise the importance of very strong monitoring including NGO and community representatives. We therefore pressed IFC to:

Ensure regular independent consultation on monitoring the implementation of the project—IFC will set up a mechanism that brings together IFI staff, the sponsors, Governments from the region, civil society (local and international) and representatives from the IFI Executive Boards in order to resolve issues arising during project implementation.

Encourage enhanced transparency of revenue management—IFC will support the IMF and the World Bank in their efforts to promote the transparency of revenues in both Azerbaijan and Georgia and to encourage the use of these revenues to support Poverty Reduction Strategy Paper objectives.

Demonstrate how IFC has learnt from the BTC/ACG projects—IFC will ensure that these lessons are properly reviewed and inform future policy development, including in discussions of the Extractive Industries Review (EIR), and report back to the Board. We made clear that we would strongly support the use of Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA) for future infrastructure projects on this scale. IFC agreed to include in its review an assessment of the potential for SEA in future large scale and cross border projects. Other shareholders supported the UK points.

The challenge now is to ensure that the people of the region benefit from the opportunities offered by the Caspian's natural resources. This will require concerted effort by the countries of the region, and also by civil society, the private sector and the international community. The UK Government will work to ensure that risks, which might impact on this project's contribution to sustainable development, are addressed.

Written Ministerial Statements

Thursday 6 November 2003

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Planning Aid

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): Planning aid is the provision of free and independent professional advice on town planning to groups or individuals in need of such advice and who cannot obtain it without an aid service. It is currently funded by the Royal Town Planning Institute and by grants and donations from public, private and charitable organisations but it is significantly under-resourced and stretched in respect of its current role. On 5 February 2003 the Deputy Prime Minister announced in "Sustainable communities: building for the future" that planning aid would receive up to £4 million of Government funding over the next three years to expand its service.

The enabling legislation supporting wider Office of Deputy Prime Minister spending on planning aid is contained in the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill. The Bill received Second Reading on 17 December 2002, Official Report, column 729, and it was anticipated that Royal Assent would be received by September 2003. Funding for planning aid was expected to commence from 1 October 2003. However, as my hon. friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) explained during the carry-over debate on the Bill on 10 June 2003, Official Report, column 564, the likely timescale for Royal Assent is now March 2004.

Planning aid needs to undergo a significant expansion programme to make it more proactive in engaging with communities who traditionally do not get involved in planning issues. The expansion programme is built on the findings of an Office of Deputy Prime Minister funded research study[1] which concluded that there was a clear demand for an independent advisory service, but that planning aid was currently running almost permanently at close to breaking point. Delay in funding planning aid until March would severely undermine the good progress being made in this area.

An advance from the contingencies fund is being made available. Without the advance planning aid would be very likely to suffer the loss of key staff and volunteers, fracturing the current regional network. This, along with the loss of momentum brought about by the implementation programme, would set back plans to develop planning aid to a point where it might be difficult for it to recover for some time, even after funding became available.

[1] "Planning aid: A review of its role and prospects for development", ODPM, February 2003.

Parliamentary approval for additional resources for this new service will be sought in a later Estimate for the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. Pending that approval, urgent expenditure estimated at £554,000 will be met by repayable advances from the contingency fund.

Planning Obligations (Consultation Document)

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): In December 2001 the Government published a consultation paper proposing that local authorities should set standardised tariffs for different types of development as a substitute for the negotiated planning obligations permitted by section 106 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. In July 2002 the Government indicated that they had decided not to proceed with this proposal and would consider other options. They also indicated that many of the Government's objectives could be achieved through non-legislative routes.

Today I am publishing a further consultation document seeking views on firm proposals for the reform of planning obligations. These proposals contain a mixture of administrative and legislative reforms and are designed to increase the speed, certainty and transparency of the planning obligations while retaining flexibility.

New development brings benefits to communities, including homes, jobs, and a range of new services and facilities. Investment in land and property is also an important component of economic growth and higher productivity.

New development can also have an impact on services and infrastructure in the local area. The existing system of planning obligations permits planning authorities to seek contributions from developers, which are used to mitigate negative impacts. They therefore facilitate development, which might otherwise not occur. So planning obligations help the developer, the community and the local authority to work together to deliver successful and sustainable communities.

However, the current system of negotiating planning obligations is often slow, resource intensive and lacks transparency. Development is often delayed rather than facilitated by the process.

The Government have therefore decided to introduce changes designed to give developers the choice between the current negotiated approach offering flexibility and a pre-determined charge, which offers speed and certainty. We will legislate within the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill to introduce this new optional charge. We will also revise our existing statement of policy on planning obligations, Circular 1/97, to remove the inconsistency which the policy exhibits compared to case law, to require greater transparency in the use of negotiated obligations, to encourage best practice and to set out our policy in relation to the new charge.

Local planning authorities would be required to set out their charge proposals in advance, giving the developer certainty as to the level of the contribution they will be asked to make and an indication of the impacts of development to which charge income will be applied. This requirement will also mean that assessing and mitigating the impact of development will become a plan-led activity. If developers opt to pay the charge, we propose that legislation would prevent local planning authorities from seeking any further financial or in-kind contribution in respect of those matters covered by the charge. Our consultation document invites views on the matters that would be covered. However, planning obligations can extend to non-financial matters as well and we expect that where the charge is paid, a residual negotiation may have to take place. But we are determined to ensure that our final proposals do not ask developers to pay twice.

The developer will always have the option not to pay the charge and to negotiate in the same way as the present system allows. For example, negotiation might still be necessary for difficult, financially marginal or special cases where a negotiation can better mould the agreement to the proposed development. We propose that our new policy will require all local planning authorities to adopt existing best practice and set out the matters to be covered in negotiation in local planning instruments. So transparency and predictability will be increased even where the developer opts not to pay the charge.

We propose to amend the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill to enable us to make these reforms. These amendments will provide a power to establish the new optional charge but we intend to use secondary legislation to set out the detailed framework. This secondary legislation will be informed by the outcome of the consultation, an approach that will enable business, local government and other stakeholders to contribute to the development of the new system. To aid this further, I aim to publish draft Regulations in January and in spring 2004 we will also consult on a new draft Circular to replace Circular 1/97.

The consultation period runs until 8 January 2004 and we welcome views on how best to make our proposals work for everyone involved in securing sustainable communities: developers, local authorities and the communities they serve.

The Government appointed Kate Barker earlier this year to investigate factors affecting the supply of housing, including the role of the planning system. The Government will consider any relevant recommendations of the Barker review before it finalises its planning obligations policy in summer 2004. Representations already made to the Barker review on the subject of planning obligations will be taken into account as the Government finalise their policy.

In conclusion, the Government believe that the proposals offer an opportunity to resolve this difficult area of policy in a way, which retains flexibility where necessary and offers speed and certainty where possible.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Low-Income and Middle-Income Countries

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): I have previously indicated that changes would be made to planned future programme allocations for middle-income countries over the next two years. This results from decisions taken on financing for Iraq and the Government's commitment to increase the proportion of our direct assistance going to the poorest countries.

As reported in the Department's 2003 Annual Report, we are planning to increase significantly total bilateral allocations for DFID's country and regional programmes over the next two years from this year's estimated total of £1.429 billion to £1.762 billion in 2004–05 and £2.078 billion in 2005–06. This includes meeting the Prime Minister's commitment to increase our spending for Africa to £1 billion annually by 2005–06; and increasing our spending in Asia by some 45 per cent. to nearly £800 million by the same year. Overall, the UK's aid budget will grow to nearly £4.6 billion by 2005–06, an average annual increase over the 2002 spending review period of 8.1 per cent. in real terms. The UK's level of Official Development Assistance is set to reach 0.4 per cent. of national income by 2005–06—a 93 per cent. increase in real terms since 1997. This is evidence of this Government's continued commitment to make progress towards meeting the UN target of an ODA/GNI ratio of 0.7 per cent.

As set out in the 2003 Departmental report, responding to changes in circumstances is an integral part of DFID's work, and financial allocations for future years are subject to change. We had already planned to reduce the overall allocation to middle-income countries in order to allow an increase in spending on the poorest countries.

Over the next two years, funding for the reconstruction of Iraq includes £50 million reallocated from planned programmes, together with DFID contingency funding of £115 million and contributions from other Government Departments. Our Public Service Agreement includes the commitment to increase the share of our bilateral programme going to low-income countries to 90 per cent. by 2005–06. As a consequence of the temporary increase in funding for Iraq, which we expect to return to middle-income status soon, we will also need to move a further estimated £50 million from middle-income country programmes to low-income country programmes. This is in line with our commitment to the 90 per cent. target.

The total effect of these changes will be a reduction in planned bilateral spending in middle-income countries in 2004–05 and 2005–06 of around £100 million. Funding for programmes in middle-income countries during the current financial year will not be affected. Our budget for humanitarian activities will remain as planned.

We will continue to provide substantial support to middle-income countries through our contributions to multilateral institutions. In 2001–02 this amounted to some £600 million, of which some £350 million was for middle-income developing countries; and the rest was for middle-income countries in transition.

These changes in planned bilateral allocations will involve withdrawal from programmes, earlier than we had previously decided, from a number of middle-income countries, which are less dependent on UK bilateral aid. Romania, Bulgaria, Croatia, and Egypt are in this category. Our planned programme in Jordan will be re-phased. Our current programmes in Anguilla and TCI will now close in 2004–05, a year earlier than originally planned.

We will be continuing with our bilateral programmes, with some reduction in spending levels and in some cases an adjustment of focus in the following countries/regions: South Africa, China, Sri Lanka, Russia, Jamaica, Guyana, Brazil, Bolivia, Serbia and Montenegro, Bosnia, Albania, Kosovo and the Caribbean. Our small programme in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia will close by 2005–06, as will the small programmes in Peru and Honduras. We will be developing a new approach to regional involvement in Latin America. Our programmes in the Palestinian Authority, Montserrat and St Helena will remain unaffected; and we will retain a programme in Nicaragua.

I also propose to increase, from 2005–06, our partnership funding for NGOs, including those working with middle-income countries and Latin America.

My officials are in touch with all of the countries affected by these changes in plans. We are also talking to the multilateral agencies and some other bilateral donors about the scope for increasing our cooperation with them. This will be reflected in the new middle-income country strategy that the Department is preparing in consultation with other Departments in Whitehall. I shall report further to the House on the impact on individual country programmes once these discussions are complete.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Diversity of the Magistracy

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): At the beginning of October, the Secretary of State and Lord Chancellor published a national strategy for recruitment to the magistracy, setting out my Department's plans to increase the number of appointments as a justice of the peace, and to encourage applications from people with a wider range of backgrounds. In furtherance of the national strategy, the Secretary of State and Lord Chancellor is now amending his directions to the Committees, which advise him on magisterial appointments. The Committees are asked to achieve a bench that is broadly representative of the community which they serve. Following advice from royal commissions in 1910 and 1948, political association has hitherto been used as an indicator of social class in seeking to achieve that balance. The Secretary of State and Lord Chancellor is satisfied that the way people vote is no longer a reliable guide to social perspective and standing. Therefore a new system is being introduced; applicants will identify themselves against occupational and industrial groupings, based on standard classifications used by the Office for National Statistics. The Secretary of State and Lord Chancellor is also telling the Committees that there need be no lower age limit for applicants who can show that they have the key qualities needed for appointment. Copies of the national strategy document and of the new application form, which sets out the occupational groupings categories, have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

DEFENCE

Future Command Liasion Vehicle

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): I am pleased to announce that the Ministry of Defence has today signed a contract worth £166 million (including VAT) with Alvis Vickers Ltd, for the manufacture of the future command and liaison vehicle (FCLV).

On 17 July we announced that the FCLV would be deployed with the RAF regiment and that the contract value would be worth over £200 million. Ongoing work on armoured fighting vehicle rationalisation has led to a review of the initial requirement for vehicles. Consequently, we have revised the size of the initial procurement of FCLV whilst retaining the option to procure additional FCLV at a later date. The RAF regiment will no longer receive vehicles from the initial fleet of FCLV and the contract value of the initial work has been revised.

The FCLV will perform the command and liaison role and replace the ageing and disparate vehicle fleet within the manoeuvre support brigades comprising elements of the 430 series, Saxon, Land Rover and combat vehicle reconnaissance (tracked) fleets. From its planned in-service date of 2006, the FCLV will provide levels of crew protection and mobility commensurate with their roles in an increasingly extended ground manoeuvre area. It will offer protection against small arms, blast and anti-personnel mines. Those in the direct fire zone will contain a self-defence weapon (SDW) that can be operated under armour to provide suppressive fire and surveillance and target acquisition (STA) system will be provided to enhance situational awareness, reconnaissance, targeting and reporting. The vehicle has been selected to deliver the solution to the armed forces requirement for enhanced speed, reliability, flexibility and protection for a wide range of users in combat or peacekeeping operations.

The award of this contract to Alvis Vickers Ltd is excellent news for both our Armed Forces and the defence industry. It will sustain approximately 35 highly skilled jobs at the Alvis Vickers Ltd facility at Telford, and a further 25 within other UK companies. This is the culmination of work conducted by both the MOD and industry, and is a good example of the principles of smart acquisition being put into practice. It is incumbent on the MOD and industry to work together to ensure that our armed forces have access to the right equipment, in the right quantities, at the right time and at the right price.

Defence Geographic and Imagery Intelligence Agency Targets (2003–04)

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The role of the Defence Geographic and Imagery Intelligence agency is to provide imagery intelligence and geographic support to defence policy, operations and training; to meet customer requirements for imagery intelligence and geographic support in accordance with defence priorities; to maintain and develop agency capabilities and readiness in line with future defence requirements; and to become progressively more efficient, whilst improving the quality and delivery of its products and services. The key targets for the agency for the 12 months from April 2003 are:

KEY TARGET 1A—OPERATIONAL IMINT PROVISION

To satisfy operational requirements for Imagery Intelligence within timescales and to standards agreed between the Agency and its customers, by satisfying at least 95 per cent. of requirements overall, whilst delivering not less than 98 per cent. of priority one tasks.

KEY TARGET 1B—OPERATIONAL GEOGRAPHIC SUPPORT

To satisfy operational requirements for geographic support within timescales and to standards agreed between the agency and its customers, by satisfying 100 per cent. of the geographic products and services essential to support current and potential operations, both from the agency's UK based operation and its deployable units.

KEY TARGET 2—READINESS

To achieve the required levels of operational readiness in line with defence planning assumptions, whilst continuing to satisfy those deployable element outputs required under Key Target 1, maintaining agreed states of readiness as set by PJHQ for all contingency forces.

KEY TARGET 3A—STRATEGIC AND CONTINGENCY IMINT PROVISION

To satisfy strategic and contingency requirements for Imagery Intelligence within timescales and to standards agreed between the agency and its customers, by providing at least 57 per cent. of the requirements as set out in the imagery exploitation programme (HEP), while delivering not less than 92 per cent. of priority one tasks.

KEY TARGET 3B—STRATEGIC AND CONTINGENCY GEOGRAPHIC SUPPORT

To satisfy strategic and contingency requirements for geographic support within timescales and to standards agreed between the agency and its customers, completing at least 90 per cent. of a customer endorsed programme of work for geographic products and services.

KEY TARGET 3T (TRANSITIONAL)—MEASUREMENT OF GEOSPATIAL PROVISION

To develop improved mechanisms for the measurement of geospatial provision which enable effective evaluation of output efficiency. Definition of output measurement mechanisms for geospatial provision which enable a baseline for output efficiency to be quantified during FY 04–05.

KEY TARGET 4—IMPROVEMENT IN GEOGRAPHIC INFORMATION HOLDINGS

To demonstrate a further 1 per cent. improvement in the coverage of geographic information holdings resulting in at least a cumulative 4 per cent. improvement on the baseline established in 1999, and to ensure that the quality of the collection achieves the level of readiness agreed with customers. This will be demonstrated by maintaining the MOD map library collection at the agreed level of readiness and achieving a further 1 per cent. improvement in coverage of geographic information holdings.

KEY TARGET 5T (TRANSITIONAL)—OUTPUT EFFICIENCY

To define mechanisms for the measurement of output efficiency that encompass all key areas of agency business, which will enable a baseline for output efficiency to be quantified during FY 04–05.

Defence Intelligence and Security Centre Agency Targets (2003–04)

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): DISC is the centre for defence intelligence training in the UK. CE DISC is responsible for training authorised personnel in intelligence, security and information support disciplines and maintaining an operational capability. The key targets for the agency for the 12 months from April 2003 are:

KEY TARGET 1—TRAINING QUANTITY

To deliver, within the resources available, the quantity of training places agreed with sponsors through the statement of training requirement (SOTR) process, and as endorsed by the customer executive board (CEB) and owner's advisory board (OAB).

KEY TARGET 2—TRAINING QUALITY

To set up a new process by which DISC can measure its training output in terms of quality.

KEY TARGET 3—EFFICIENCY

To reduce the current cost in real terms of delivering the average training place made available and to reduce the average cost of a man training day (MTD) successfully completed in financial year (FY) 2003–04.

KEY TARGET 4—OPERATIONS

To satisfy the operational tasking of the defence de-briefing team (DOT) and the field HUMINT team (FHT).

TREASURY

UK Dividends (Taxation Changes)

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): Legislation to block potential tax avoidance by individuals using transactions in UK equities is to be included in Finance Bill 2004. The changes will have immediate effect.

The legislation closes a loophole resulting from a mismatch in the rules for taxing UK dividends and making "manufactured" payments under a sale and repurchase (repo) or stock lending arrangement. These schemes enable individuals to obtain an unintended tax windfall by using repos or stock loans to manufacture a dividend payment. The new provisions will apply to dividends received and manufactured dividends paid on or after today.

A copy of today's Inland Revenue news release giving the relevant background to this measure has been deposited in the Libraries of both Houses and is accessible on the Inland Revenue's website at http://www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk.

Written Answers to Questions

Aircraft Landing Fees

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much was paid by his Department in respect of landing fees for British military aircraft using commercial airfields (a) in each of the last three years and (b) so far in 2003, broken down by airfield. [133624]

Mr. Ingram: Information on landing fees is not held by airfield, and cannot be provided in this format. Figures are available for the United Kingdom and overseas, by budget area, but these figures include handling charges and associated costs (e.g. parking, training, transport and navigation). In some cases the figures are not available from current records and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Army Regiments

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has held with Scottish army regiments on restructuring. [134008]

Mr. Ingram: There have been no recent discussions with Scottish regiments on restructuring.

Bechtel

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the contracts for consultancy and work carried out by Bechtel in each year since 1997, stating in each case (a) the nature of the work, (b) the value of the contract and (c) the duration of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [133581]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 22 October 2003]: The Ministry of Defence has placed one direct contract with Bechtel Limited since 1997. It covers the provision of project management services in support of a programme of assistance to the Russian Government in respect of chemical demilitarisation. The contract was placed on 24 January 2003 with a three year duration with two separate one year options to extend.

The contract is funded jointly by the UK MOD, which has contributed £9.1 million, the Norwegian Government, and the European Union.

C130 Aircraft

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many C130J Hercules have been delivered; and how many serviceable engines there are; how many C130J Hercules aircraft are grounded because of a shortage of (a) spares and (b) software; and if he will make a statement. [134276]

Mr. Ingram: Twenty five Hercules C-130J aircraft have been delivered to the RAF.

The RAF currently holds 81 serviceable engines. At 09.00 hours 24 October 2003, five Hercules C130-J aircraft were unavailable to Front Line Commanders while awaiting spares.

Colombia

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his answer of 16 October 2003, Official Report, columns 321–22W, on military aid to Colombia, if he will break down the figures of (a) £48,296 and (b) £77,934 into major expenditure category. [134120]

Mr. Ingram: These figures relate to the cost of courses attended by two officers of the Colombian Armed Forces in the UK. One officer attended the Royal College of Defence Studies course and one is currently attending the Advanced Command and Staff College.

The figures supplied cover course tuition, and accommodation and airfares for the students and entitled accompanying family members. A detailed breakdown of these figures is not held centrally.

Depleted Uranium

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with representatives of Governments participating in the International Security Assistance force in Afghanistan about the use of depleted uranium ammunitions (a) during and (b) after the conflict in Afghanistan; what Governments raised concerns about this matter; what those concerns were; how they were addressed; and if he will make a statement. [133643]

Mr. Ingram: Depleted Uranium (DU) ammunition has not been used by Allied Forces in Afghanistan and has therefore not featured significantly in the discussions that take place amongst nations participating in the International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan.

Fast Jet Pilots

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many trained fast jet pilots are serving in flying roles in the RAF; and how many have served in each year since 1997. [134459]

Mr. Ingram: The number of trained Fast Jet Pilots serving in flying roles in the RAF at 1 October 2003 was 533. The numbers since 1997 are shown in the following table:

	Number
1 April 1997	639
1 April 1998	615
1 April 1999	581
1 April 2000	543
1 April 2001	545
1 April 2002	523
1 April 2003	548

The numbers of flying posts in the RAF are subject to constant review and will change throughout a year.

Hawk Trainer

Tony Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what name is to be given to the new Hawk trainer. [133954]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 23 October 2003]: The new Hawk 128 is planned to meet the United Kingdom's Advanced Jet Trainer requirement. There are no plans to rename it.

Hired Tankers

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many tankers have been hired by his Department to transport fuel for the Royal Navy and at what cost, in each of the past three years. [134464]

Mr. Ingram: The information requested is shown in the table.

Financial year	Ship	Cost (£)	Remarks
2001–02	MV Tees fisher	17,750	Coastal Tanker to supply HMS Albion with fuel post build
	MT Bardsey	45,178	Coastal Tanker to supply fuel to HMS Ark Royal post refit
2002–03	MV Mersey Fisher	98,242	Coastal Tanker to supply HMS Invincible with fuel post refit
2003–04	MV Dicksi	87,500	Ocean/Tanker to supply fuel to Oil Fuel Depot Thanckes[1]
	MT Black Rock	44,678	Coastal Tanker to supply fuel to HMS Bulwark post build
		317,723

[1] This vessel had to be chartered by the Department because the MOD's vessel, the Maersk Rapier was delayed while on a commercial charter. Cost of this voyage is in the process of being entirely recouped by the MOD as compensation against the third party who chartered the MOD's vessel and were responsible for the delay.

The MOD also has the Maersk Rapier on permanent charter. The Rapier is a multi-tasked tanker which not only supplies all fuel to the naval facilities in the United Kingdom, Gibraltar, Falkland Islands and Souda Bay, Crete but it is also chartered to supply aviation fuel to Cyprus, Ascension Island and Falkland Islands. The MOD charters the vessel to commercial companies when it is not in use for defence requirements.

Iraq

Adam Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on recent developments regarding plans to disarm Iraqi civilians. [125245]

Mr. Hoon: Our aim for Iraq is a stable, united and law-abiding state, no longer posing a threat to its neighbours or to international security.

In accordance with this aim, Coalition Provisional Authority policy, which states that no person shall possess small arms in a public place with the exception of Coalition Forces and those who have been authorised to carry weapons by Coalition Forces, is being enforced with due sensitivity to local customs.

The recent efforts to create a new Iraqi army and an Iraqi police force are an integral part of our efforts to ensure a secure environment for the people of Iraq.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how often he plans to rotate British troops in Iraq. [132121]

Mr. Ingram: Troops will be rotated as often as appropriate and necessary. For most units a six-month tour, with appropriate opportunity to acclimatise, has now been established.

Adam Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it Government policy to launch inquiries into incidents in which Iraqi civilians have been killed in Iraq by United Kingdom and United States military forces since the end of the conflict. [129531]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 15 September 2003]: We investigate every incident in which we can confirm that there has been a civilian fatality, and it has allegedly been caused by United Kingdom military personnel.

We are not in a position to comment on incidents involving US forces.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with the United States Administration in respect of the publication of the report of the finding of the Iraq Survey Group; and when it will be published. [131113]

Mr. Hoon: I have frequent discussions with the United States Administration on a wide range of issues of mutual interest. The Iraq Survey Group is one such issue.

Dr. David Kay published his Statement on the Interim Progress Report on the Activities of the Iraq Survey Group on 2 October. It can be found at www.cia.gov and copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to visit Iraq to view the reconstruction programme. [132128]

Mr. Hoon: I have recently returned from a visit to Iraq where I discussed infrastructure development with United Kingdom forces, the Coalition Provisional Authority and local leaders. I witnessed first hand the hard work and determination to ensure the success of reconstruction and security sector reform in Iraq.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement outlining the circumstances under which the test tube of botulinum was discovered in Iraq and how long it had been stored in its place of discovery. [132343]

Mr. Hoon: The Iraq Survey Group was led to the vial of "Clostridium botulinum" okra B in the home of an Iraqi BW scientist. It was found in the kitchen in a container with other vials, which are believed to have been stored there for some time.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement regarding his assessment of the United Kingdom Government's claim that Niger was prepared to sell uranium to Iraq. [132344]

Mr. Hoon: Niger sold some 270 tonnes of uranium ore to Iraq in the early 1980s. The Government have made no claim that Niger was prepared to sell uranium to Iraq since then.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence why British experts on the Iraq Survey Group have not been given access to the classified version of the report presented by David Kay; and if he will make a statement. [132345]

Mr. Hoon: The classified version of Dr. David Kay's Interim Report on the work of the Iraq Survey Group was drawn up in consultation with United Kingdom, United States and Australian experts working in the field in Iraq.

Since Dr. Kay's return to Iraq, ISG personnel from all three coalition countries with a need to know and the appropriate clearances have been granted access to the completed report.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the test tube discovered in Iraq contained (a) the bacteria botulinum and (b) the toxin itself; what strain it was; how many times more toxic than the nerve agent VX the B strain is; and if he will make a statement. [132346]

Mr. Hoon: The vial contained viable "Clostridium botulinum" type B organisms. This would have allowed the Iraqis to grow from this seed stock increasing quantities of "Clostridium botulinum" from which its toxin could be derived. The toxin could then have been weaponised.

The vial was labelled as "Clostridium botulinum" strain Okra B. This micro-organism can produce botulinum toxin type B. "Clostridium botulinum" toxin type B is many times more toxic than VX nerve agent. The comparison varies depending on the route by which each is applied, on the methods by which the botulinum toxin is prepared and on the subject to which it is applied.

Mr. Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to receive the final report from the survey group in Iraq on weapons of mass destruction [133155]

Mr. Hoon: The Iraq Survey Group will take as long as necessary to complete its investigations into Iraqi weapons of mass destruction programmes and produce a final report.

Life Insurance

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how long an army reservist would need to serve in hostile or war conditions before life insurance under the Army PAX scheme would cover war risks. [133835]

Mr. Ingram: PAX provides Personal Accident and Life cover for regulars and RPAX for reservists. Cover under these schemes is the same for all three Services. Membership of these schemes is voluntary and thus the decision to purchase this cover rests with the individual.

A reservist's eligibility for war risks cover under PAX and RPAX is governed not by how long they have served in hostile or war conditions but by the length of time their cover has been in force. Under new arrangements which came into effect on 1 July 2003, PAX and RPAX exclude war risks for the first six months of a new cover purchased at any time other than during initial training.

This qualifying period was introduced as a result of the trend which Service personnel deployed to war zones have recently shown to buy short-term cover at the last minute. This increases insurers' exposure to risk, making them unable to accrue long-term premium income from which claims can be paid, and causing them to increase premiums or to close their schemes altogether to new applicants. The six-month qualifying period helps to avoid such closures and to protect the interests of prudent long-term scheme members by keeping premiums affordable.

The Ministry of Defence encourages Service personnel to recognise the long-term nature of life insurance throughout their service and not just at times of more active duty.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department will provide a precise figure for the number of nuclear warheads stockpiled by the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [133757]

Mr. Hoon: In line with the policy set out in the Strategic Defence Review, we have fewer than 200 operationally available warheads. It would not be in the interests of national security to be more precise than this, and I am therefore withholding the information under Exemption 1 (Defence, Security and International Relations) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the approximate yield is of the warheads deployed on the United Kingdom's Trident missiles; and if he will make a statement. [133758]

Mr. Hoon: I am withholding the information requested under Exemption 1 (Defence, Security and International Relations) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information for reasons of national security.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the United Kingdom's nuclear weapons are also assigned to NATO. [133759]

Mr. Hoon: Yes, but they remain under United Kingdom national control at all times.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the sub-strategic role is of the United Kingdom's nuclear weapons; and if he will make a statement. [133760]

Mr. Hoon: The Government set out its nuclear deterrence policy in the Strategic Defence Review. I particularly refer the hon. Gentleman to chapter four and Supporting Essay Five.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many United States nuclear weapons are based in the United Kingdom; what the purpose is of their deployment; and if he will make a statement. [133718]

Mr. Hoon: As stated in NATO's Strategic Concept (paragraph 63), 'nuclear forces based in Europe and committed to NATO provide an essential political and military link between the European and the North American members of the alliance. The alliance will therefore maintain adequate nuclear forces in Europe.'

Numbers of US nuclear weapons in the United Kingdom can and do vary, and the capability for deployments of such weapons to and from the UK remains extant regardless of the particular number of weapons in the UK at any given time.

It is NATO and national policy not to comment on the detail of such nuclear deployments. I am therefore withholding the information under Exemption 1 (Defence, security and international relations) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Procurement

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department gives preference to British defence companies (a) when selecting producers for equipment and (b) for project procurement; and if he will make a statement. [133043]

Mr. Ingram: Open and fair competition remains the bedrock of the Ministry of Defence's procurement policy. However, we are also prepared to use other approaches for our acquisition requirements where they offer better long term value for money. The MOD's non-warlike acquisition requirements are subject to the EC Public Procurement Regulations that require such opportunities be advertised in the Official Journal of the European Union.

The Government's Defence Industrial Policy Paper (published in October 2002) recognises that, although acquisition decisions will be driven principally by key factors such as cost and operational effectiveness, they also need to take into account wider factors, such as industrial capabilities, which are desirable to retain in the United Kingdom. The Government are committed to a strong and healthy UK defence industry owing to the economic value that the industry brings to the UK by creating employment, technology and intellectual property in this country. Globalisation of the defence business means that the UK defence industry embraces suppliers that bring benefit and create value within the UK, regardless of the nationality of their shareholders.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the terms of the contract for the procurement of Meteor missiles are, with particular reference to the total agreed to purchase cost; and if he will make a statement. [133645]

Mr. Ingram: The Meteor contract with MBDA UK Ltd covers development, the delivery of development hardware to support aircraft integration programmes (on each of Typhoon Eurofighter, Rafale and Gripen), production of the missiles and Contractor Logistics Support. The total current contract cost is some £1.2 billion, to which the UK has committed some £700 million.

At this time, only the UK has committed to the delivery of production missiles and to the associated Contractor Logistic Support (for a period of 10 years). Production options in the contract include a number of pricing break points, with the overall unit production prices reducing as those break point quantities are exceeded. Under the terms of the Meteor Memorandum of Understanding, all Partner Nations will pay the same unit production price for Meteor missiles ordered during the option period. If current estimates of Partner Nations' production quantities are fulfilled, the unit production cost for the UK's missiles will reduce from that currently budgeted.

Weapons of Mass Destruction

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if it is Her Majesty's Government's policy to reserve the right to be the first to use weapons of mass destruction in war. [133719]

Mr. Hoon: The phrase 'weapons of mass destruction', is generally held to refer to nuclear, chemical and biological weapons.

The United Kingdom is a State Party to the Chemical Weapons Convention and Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention which outlaw the use and possession of chemical and biological and toxin weapons respectively. The UK gave up such capabilities in the 1950s.

We maintain only a minimum nuclear deterrent, the purpose of which is to prevent war rather than fight it.

As the Government has made clear on many occasions, we would be prepared to use nuclear weapons only in extreme circumstances of self-defence. As our overall strategy is to ensure uncertainty in the mind of any aggressor about the exact nature of our response, and thus to maintain effective deterrence, we do not define the exact circumstances under which we would be prepared to use nuclear weapons.

We would not use our weapons, whether conventional or nuclear, contrary to international law.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Direct Payment

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the progress being made on moving away from the use of order books and giros by the Post Office. [133612]

Mr. Pond: I have been asked to reply.

The mailing exercise for Direct Payment began in October 2002.

The huge numbers of customers involved in the conversion process mean the changes are being phased over the period to 2005. This approach will ensure the process is carried out efficiently and with the minimum of disruption. Customers do not need to do anything until they receive a letter from the Department.

Key figures on the progress of conversion to Direct Payment are available in the Commons Library, updated every four weeks.

With Direct Payment there are accounts that allow people to continue to be able to collect their money at the Post Office. This has been made possible by the successful introduction of universal banking service in April this year.

Company Accounts

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will amend the requirement for companies to submit provisional accounts to the National Statistical Office before those accounts have been audited; and if she will make a statement on the purpose of this requirement. [134237]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Nigel Jones, dated 27 October 2003:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your recent question on the submission of provisional accounts to the Office for National Statistics before they have been audited. (134237)

There is no requirement for companies to submit provisional accounts to the Office for National Statistics. Under the Statistics of Trade Act, 1947 companies are required to reply to questions in certain business surveys from the Office for National Statistics, which can require information on a company's performance that is drawn from its accounts prior to auditing.

These surveys are essential to the production of timely economic statistics that allow the Government, the Bank of England and businesses to base key decisions on the latest information.

ONS works to minimise the burden placed upon businesses by the requirement to respond to our surveys. Smaller businesses are selected for survey samples on a rotational basis, to ensure that the burden of compliance is shared as evenly as possible. ONS works within an annual compliance cost limit, and produces an annual Compliance Plan which is approved by our Minister.

Employers' Liability Insurance

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what research her Department has conducted into the proportion of the cost of employers' liability compulsory insurance that is taken up by (a) paying the claimant, (b) covering legal costs and (c) covering administration costs; and what steps she is taking to reduce the proportion taken up in (i) legal and (ii) administrative costs. [133413]

Malcolm Wicks: I have been asked to reply.

In the first stage of the review of Employers' Liability Compulsory Insurance the Government, in assessing the scope and nature of the current EL difficulties, examined EL insurance results.

Figures from Datamonitor's analysis of data from the Association of British Insurers (ABI) showed that, during 2001, claims incurred were 111 per cent. of net written premiums (gross written premiums less outward re-insurance premiums). Management expenses and commission accounted for a further 28 per cent. of net written premiums.

The Department does not have figures within the above analysis telling us precisely the proportion of claims incurred that was made up of legal costs. However evidence from one major EL insurer submitted during the first stage of the review suggested that legal costs represented on average 36 per cent. of the total claims cost for EL.

The Department is working closely with stakeholders to reduce the costs of resolving claims and will report further on this in the autumn.

EU Constitution

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what changes the Government is seeking in Article III—157 of the draft EU Constitution concerning energy policy. [134315]

Mr. Timms: Article III—157 introduces a new Treaty legal base for EU action on issues relating to energy. There is already Union activity in this area and we believe that creating a specific provision should lead to greater transparency. The Government are considering their position on this article in the context of the Intergovernmental Conference. Any changes to the provisions of the existing EU Treaties, including those proposed in Article III—157 of the draft Treaty, require the unanimous agreement of all member states.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what power the EU will have under Article III—157 of the EU Constitution to regulate UK oilfields by majority vote. [134316]

Mr. Timms: Article III—157 of the draft EU Constitutional Treaty would give the EU competence in energy matters related to the establishing of the internal market, including natural resources, with voting by qualified majority. Article III-130(2)(c) provides for unanimity on

> "measures significantly affecting a Member State's choice between different energy sources and the general structure of its energy supply".

Gas Supply

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions she has had with other governments, with particular reference to those of (a) Russia and (b) Algeria, on the supply of gas to the UK; and if she will make a statement. [134327]

Mr. Timms: One of the goals of the Energy White Paper, published in February this year, is that people and businesses can rely on secure supplies of energy at predictable prices delivered through the market. Part of this is about promoting diverse energy sources, suppliers and supply routes.

We are currently working with industry to maximise the economic potential of our North Sea supplies. But it is still likely that the UK will become a net importer of gas on an annual basis by around 2006.

Against this background, we are making good progress on a Treaty with Norway to underpin future cross-boundary oil and gas developments. I recently agreed the key principles of the Treaty with my counterpart in Norway. This will facilitate direct delivery of around 20 per cent. of UK gas demand from 2006.

Looking more widely, we are continuing our discussions with Russia. We jointly hosted a major conference "Russia/UK Energy: Long Term Partners", during President Putin's State Visit in June, when my Russian counterpart and I signed a Memorandum of Co-operation on the North European Gas Pipeline. This pipeline will encourage suppliers from diverse sources into the EU including the UK. It involves no direct link to the UK, but we hope that some of this gas will come into the UK in the future.

My predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), visited Algeria on a Trade Mission in February and my colleague, the Minister for Trade and Investment, visited in May 2003. Discussions with Algeria also take place through the European Mediterranean Partnership. Seniors officials will attend a Euro Med ministerial in December to discuss energy infrastructure and co-ordinate policies on security of energy supply.

There have also been discussions about a Treaty Framework between the UK Government and Dutch Government for the proposed new interconnector from the Netherlands to the UK. It is expected that this interconnector will import 8 bcm of gas by 2005–06.

Inkjet Cartridges

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what discussions she has had with EU Trade and Industry Ministers about including printer inkjet cartridges in the implementation of the EU Directive on Waste Electrical and Electronic Equipment; [134212]

(2) what recent representations she has received about the implementation of the EU Directive on Waste Electrical and Electronic Equipment from (a) representatives of the recycling of printer inkjet cartridges industry and (b) environmental bodies; and if she will make a statement; [134213]

(3) what measures she is taking to encourage the recycling of printer inkjet cartridges; [134214]

(4) what assessment she has made of the contribution of the recycling of printer inkjet cartridges industry to achieving the Government's targets on (a) recycling and (b) sustainable development. [134215]

Mr. Timms: The Department has made no specific assessment of the contribution of refilling inkjet cartridges towards environmental objectives. However, the potential environmental benefits of printer cartridge refilling, as well as the contribution of the independent refill sector towards customer choice, are recognised and welcomed by Government.

The Department has recently received a large number of letters from independent printer cartridge refillers, including many from franchisees of Cartridge World. The independent cartridge refillers have raised concerns that recent innovations by equipment manufacturers in printer cartridge technology may hinder or prevent refilling by independent operators. They have pressed for the Government specifically to include printer cartridges as electrical and electronic products in the implementation of the EU Directive on waste electrical and electronic equipment (the WEEE Directive) and to implement the Directive's "eco-design" provisions to restrict these developments in cartridge technology.

This DTI has not received representations from environmental organisations on these matters.

The Government are currently planning UK implementation of the WEEE Directive, with the aim of publishing implementation proposals later this autumn for consultation. The Directive applies to whole electrical and electronic products, not to individual components, sub-assemblies or consumables. Printer cartridges fall into this latter category.

The Department sees a harmonised approach to the scope of the Directive as desirable. Officials from this Department with responsibility for implementation planning for the WEEE Directive regularly meet their opposite numbers from other EU member states and the European Commission and have discussed the status of printer cartridges under the Directive. A majority of member states and the Commission have said they share the UK's interpretation. DTI Ministers have not discussed this issue directly with EU counterparts.

Iran

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the value of export credits for Iran has been in each year since 1996; and what the main trade products between Iran and the UK have been. [132924]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: 1. The Value of export credits for Iran since 1996 is as follows:

	Value of Export Credits £ thousand
1997	0

DTI analysis of data published by HM Customs and Excise

Manufacturing

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance her Department provides to manufacturing companies in the UK to improve export levels; and if she will make a statement on the importance of (a) manufacturing exports and (b) export credit guarantees to the UK economy. [133137]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: British Trade International, a joint DTI and FCO operation, provides a range of information, advice and support to enable potential and existing exporters, including manufacturers, to raise their productivity and competitiveness levels by trading internationally.

Manufacturing exports are a crucial part of the UK's prosperity. Manufacturing accounts for the majority of our exports and makes a substantial contribution to the balance of payments.

ECGD provides guarantees, insurance and reinsurance against loss to UK exporters and investors in overseas markets. During 2002/03, the total amount of business supported by ECGD was £3.5 billion.

Oil Stocks

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans the EU has to share oil stocks in the event of an oil crisis. [134317]

Mr. Timms: The UK is required as a member state of the European Union to hold emergency oil stocks equal to 67.5 days' consumption, and as a member of the International Energy Agency (IEA) to take part in any collective response to a major international supply disruption.

Under the legislation governing the EU stock-holding obligations, if difficulties arise with regard to EU oil supplies the European Commission will arrange a consultation between member states. However, any response to disruption, including sharing arrangements, is a matter for member states, acting as members of the IEA. The European Commission made a proposal last year to increase its own role. This proposal was opposed by member states at the Energy Council in May 2003, and by the European Parliament at a plenary session in September 2003.

Post Office Card Accounts

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reasons a married couple will be issued with two different Pin numbers for a Post

Office card account when the card account holder appoints a Permanent Agent with limited access to the account. [134207]

Mr. Timms: The detailed operation of the Post Office card account is an operational matter for Post Office Ltd.

I understand from Post Office Ltd. that the Permanent Agent is issued with a separate card and PIN number from the Primary Account Holder for security reasons. It ensures that every time the Permanent Agent accesses the Primary Account Holders account it is noted on the account history for audit purposes. This is clearly important as the Permanent Agent can make cash withdrawals.

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reasons a married couple are not permitted to open a joint Post Office card account. [134208]

Mr. Timms: The detailed operation of the Post Office card account is an operational matter for Post Office Ltd.

The Post Office card account has been designed as a simple account for the payment of benefits to individuals. It is not intended as a substitute for a current account and a joint account facility is not available on the Post Office card account. The Post Office card account is primarily for those who do not have, or choose not to use their current account, for whatever reason. However, access by someone other than the Primary Account Holder is incorporated as a facility as this is currently a vital component of benefit collection at the Post Office. Therefore, all card account applicants have the option of electing a Permanent Agent.

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what eligibility restrictions there are on a Post Office card account. [134209]

Mr. Timms: The Post Office card account is only available to benefit, pension and tax credit recipients. There are no other eligibility criteria.

Postcomm

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on how the principles of good regulation, set down by the Better Regulation Taskforce, of (a) proportionality, (b) accountability, (c) consistency, (d) transparency and (e) targeting are applied to Postcomm. [133464]

Mr. Timms: Postcomm must follow its statutory duties, and is accountable to Parliament for its decisions and activities. Its decisions are open to challenge via Judicial Review.

The Department has co-ordinated two progress reports documenting advances made by Government and regulators against the BRTF's recommendations. They have been sent to the Cabinet Office for onward circulation to the Panel for Regulatory Accountability.

The reports have found that Postcomm's activities fully respect the need for proportionality: are consistent with those of other economic regulators: are transparent, with all key decisions fully explained in published documents: and appropriately targeted in relation to their statutory obligations.

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if (1) she will take steps to strengthen Postcomm's penalty system for failure to achieve postal service quality targets; [133465]

(2) what research she has commissioned on penalty mechanisms used by postal regulators in other EU countries; [133466]

(3) to whom the financial penalty levied on Royal Mail announced by Postcomm on 30th September is payable; [133467]

(4) if she will make a statement on the financial penalty announced by Postcomm on 30 September levied on Royal Mail for failing first class business service targets. [133468]

Mr. Timms: The Postal Services Act 2000 establishes the framework under which the Postal Services Commission may impose financial penalties. It is for the Commission to decide on its policy within this framework, which was adopted in February 2002 following a public consultation. I consequently have no plans to commission research in this area. The Commission frequently liases with other industry regulators in the UK, as well as postal regulators in the rest of Europe on a range of postal regulation matters. The recent decision to impose a financial penalty on Royal Mail is a matter for the Commission and is still under a 28 day period for comment. Such financial penalties are payable to Postcomm in the first instance, and then transferred to the Treasury Consolidated Fund.

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the terms of reference she has laid down for Postcomm to guide its duties, purpose and activities. [133469]

Mr. Timms: The Postal Services Act 2000 ("the Act") sets out the purpose and duties of the Postal Services Commission ("the Commission"). The Act makes provision for the Secretary of State in certain circumstances to give directions and guidance to the Commission. On 14 March 2001, in exercise of her powers under section 41(1) of the Act, the Secretary of State gave directions to the Commission with regard to the provision of free postal services to blind and partially sighted persons. In accordance with section 43(2) of the Act the Secretary of State provided social and environmental guidance to the Commission on 22 March 2001.

Postal Services

Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will list the rural post offices in Shropshire which have closed in each year since 1990. [134321]

Mr. Timms: I am advised by Post Office Ltd that data on post office numbers has not been maintained on the basis of County as the company does not require this data for operational reasons. However, I understand that since March 2000 the company has recorded details of post office closures on the basis of Government

Region and in the West Midlands region as a whole, of which Shropshire is a part, the numbers of net closures were as follows:

2002–03 = 35

I understand that Post Office Ltd produces information on post office closures on a quarterly basis. There were 23 net closures of post offices in the West Midlands region to the end of June 2003, the latest quarter for which figures are currently available.

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will take steps to ensure that the Skegoneill Post Office in North Belfast remains. [134635]

Mr. Timms: Post Office Ltd's proposal to close the Skegoneill post office branch has been made under the company's urban reinvention programme.

Decisions on post office closures and relocations are an operational matter for the company. It would be inappropriate for the Government to intervene in determining individual closures.

In accordance with the Code of Practice on Post Office Closures and Relocations—agreed between Post Office Ltd. and Postwatch, the consumer watchdog for postal services, the company enters into consultation on all proposed closures. Postwatch are consulted on every post office closure proposal before a decision is made and there is every opportunity for those affected by a proposal, and the local MP, to make representations to the company or to Postwatch.

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many sub-post offices have closed within the Forest of Dean constituency in (a) each of the last 12 months and (b) the previous five years. [134205]

Mr. Timms: I am advised by Post Office Ltd. that data on post office numbers has not been maintained on the basis of local authority areas as the company does not require this data for operational reasons.

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many sub-post offices have closed in Gloucestershire in (a) each of the last 12 months and (b) the previous five years. [134206]

Mr. Timms: I am advised by Post Office Ltd. that data on post office numbers has not been maintained on the basis of county as the company does not require this data for operational reasons. However, I understand that since March 2000 the company has recorded details of post office closures on the basis of Government Region and in the West Midlands region as a whole, of which Gloucestershire is a part, the numbers of net closures were as follows:

	Number
2000–01	34
2001–02	24
2002–03	35

I understand that Post Office Ltd. produces information on post office closures on a quarterly basis. There were 23 net closures of post offices in the West Midlands region to the end of June 2003, the latest quarter for which figures are currently available.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if she will publish the classifications of sub-post offices in the Stroud constituency; and what discussions she has had with individual owners on that classification; [134254]

(2) if she will publish the criteria for the classification of sub-post offices; and what grounds there are for appeal against that classification; [134255]

(3) on what basis Cam Woodfield post office was classified as an urban neighbourhood post office. [134256]

Mr. Timms: I have had no such discussions on this issue. This is a matter that falls within the operational responsibilities of Post Office Ltd. and I have asked the Chief Executive to reply direct to the hon. Member.

Broadband

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many telephone exchanges in (a) the UK and (b) Scotland are broadband-enabled; what percentage this is of the total of telephone exchanges in each case; and which constituencies have less than 10 per cent. of their telephone exchanges broadband-enabled. [133856]

Mr. Timms: Broadband is provided over the telephone system by DSL technology, most commonly by ADSL. However, ADSL is not the only means of accessing broadband. According to BT the statistics for the UK and Scotland are as follows:

(a) 1827 telephone exchanges are broadband-enabled in the UK. This represents 32.65 per cent. of the total of telephone exchanges. 81 per cent of the UK population are served by telephone exchanges that have been upgraded for ADSL broadband;

(b) 148 telephone exchanges are broadband-enabled in Scotland. This represents 13.84 per cent of the total of telephone exchanges. 60.9 per cent of the population in Scotland are served by telephone exchanges that have been upgraded for ADSL broadband.

Information about which constituencies have less than ten per cent of their telephone exchanges broadband-enabled is not held within Government.

Retail Pharmacy Services

John Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the proposed exemption of large shopping developments from the control of entry requirements for retail pharmacy services will be restricted to bespoke shopping developments. [133276]

Ms Rosie Winterton: I have been asked to reply.

As part of the balanced package of measures, announced on 17 July 2003, the Government proposed that shopping developments over 15,000 square metres would be exempt from the control of entry requirements for national health service pharmaceutical services. Such developments include purpose-built named shopping developments in town centres, on edge-of-centre and out-of-centre sites, major regional shopping centres, retail warehouse parks and factory outlet centres. We are currently consulting on these proposals and would welcome views.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

River Pollution

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will take steps to reduce nitrate concentrations in English rivers. [132114]

Mr. Morley: The Government has taken, and is taking, a range of action to address nitrate pollution of English rivers.

The EC's Urban Waste Water Treatment Directive contains provisions designed to reduce the adverse impact of sewage discharges on the water environment. The Directive, and Government policy building on the Directive's requirements, establishes that all discharges from sewage treatment plants serving populations greater than 2,000 have secondary treatment by the end of 2005.

Secondary treatment reduces the total nitrogen present in sewage. The amount of this reduction is dependant upon the type of secondary treatment process applied, but reduction of total nitrogen achieved through secondary treatment is of the order of 20 per cent. on average.

The Directive also contains provisions that require further treatment of nitrates from sewage discharges to reduce the impact on freshwaters intended for abstraction for use as drinking water. These provisions require that where nitrate concentration levels in these waters exceed or could exceed 50mg/l, if no protective action is taken, then nitrate reduction is to be achieved through further treatment processes.

Between February 1997 and June 2002 eight water bodies in need of protection from excessive nitrates levels were identified as Sensitive Areas (Nitrate) in England. Relevant sewage works have been, or are being, built to provide the treatment needed to reduce nitrate levels in their discharges.

Action has also been taken to reduce nitrates in sewage discharges to estuaries in a number of Sensitive Areas (Eutrophic) where it is considered that these discharges contribute, or are likely to contribute, to the eutrophication of coastal waters.

Additionally the EU Nitrates Directive, an environmental measure designed to reduce current and prevent future water pollution by nitrate from agricultural sources, requires all known areas of land draining into nitrate-polluted waters to be designated as Nitrate Vulnerable Zones. The Nitrates Directive requires the identification of polluted waters using the following criteria: (a) surface and groundwaters which contain or could contain, if preventative action is not taken, nitrate concentrations greater than 50 mg/l; (b) surface waters which are eutrophic or could become eutrophic if preventative action is not taken. Around 55 per cent. of England has been designated as NVZs on the basis that it drains into these waters.

Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) if she will make a statement on (a) the process of establishing area of outstanding natural beauty conservation boards and (b) selecting Secretary of State nominees to area of outstanding natural beauty conservation boards; [133431]

(2) what mechanisms she will put in place to ensure that the appointment process for members of area of outstanding natural beauty conservation boards is (a) fair, open and transparent and (b) delivers boards that are well-balanced in terms of their skills, background and political interests. [133432]

Mr. Bradshaw: The process of establishing AONB Conservation Boards is laid down in section 86 of the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000. The Chilterns and Cotswolds AONBs are well advanced in the process. I intend to write to the Countryside Agency and the constituent local authorities of each AONB seeking their formal consent for the Establishment Orders to create the two Boards. In addition, we have just begun the same process for the High Weald AONB.

Secretary of State appointees will represent the national perspective on Conservation Boards. When the vacancies are advertised, I hope a variety of people will apply. To encourage this, Defra asked the Countryside Agency to organise a 'test day' to research the best ways of reaching a diverse range of people with the necessary skills. The results are now being considered. Appointments will follow the process of fair and open competition as described in Cabinet Office Guidance on public appointments.

The process for appointing parish members will be included in the Establishment Order for each Conservation Board. It will provide a democratic process for parishes to elect their appointees.

Each constituent local authority will be able to appoint a member to the two proposed Boards. How these appointees are selected will be a matter for each authority to decide but the appointee must be an elected member of the appointing authority.

Secretary of State appointees will be selected with a range of skills and experience in mind, including in land management, conservation, business and the community. Although it is for local authorities and parishes to chose who they want to represent them, I would expect them to appreciate the need for spread of skills and experience.

Atrazine

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs in which EU countries atrazine is banned. [134100]

Alun Michael: As I said in my reply to my right hon. Friend on 20 October 2003, Official Report, column 396W, Atrazine will be withdrawn in all member states over an 18 month period that will begin on final adoption of the relevant European Commission Decision, which we expect in the next few months. Certain "essential cases" will be allowed until the end of 2007 in respect of sweetcorn and forestry.

In advance of this, the most recent information from the European Commission indicates that Atrazine is currently not approved in Austria, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands and Sweden.

Beef Exports

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the earliest possible date is on which the beef export market could be opened; and if she will make a statement. [132390]

Mr. Bradshaw: It has been possible since 1 August 1999 to export cattle but only under the stringent rules of the Date-based Export Scheme (DBES).

The FSA have advised that we could replace the Over Thirty Months Rule by testing for cattle born after 1 August 1996 which could then enter the food chain from January 2004. Ministers are considering this advice.

If there were to be a change in OTM rule for domestic consumption the UK would wish to see a similar change in export controls. However it is not possible to give a precise date for any such relaxation of current beef export controls. An EFSA opinion is expected in early 2004. In addition an inspection by the EU FVO is likely to be required. We would then need agreement of other member states and changes to EU regulations. Export controls are therefore unlikely to change before mid 2004.

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much UK-produced beef was exported by (a) weight and (b) value in 2002; and what percentage of this was (i) beef of UK origin and (ii) beef of foreign origin. [132983]

Mr. Bradshaw: Data relating to the national origin of beef and veal exported from the UK are not available. However, it is possible to calculate the total UK exports as a percentage of the home fed production.

Data are provided as follows for UK beef and veal production and exports for the 2002 calendar year.

UK exports as a percentage of the home fed production

UK Home fed production (thousand tonnes, dcw[1])	692
UK exports to the EU[2]	11
UK exports to the rest of the world[2]	0
Total UK exports[2]	11
UK exports as percentage of UK home fed production[2]	1.6%
Total value of UK home fed production	£1,117 million
Total value of UK exports	£18 million

[1]dcw = dressed carcase weight
[2] Includes exports of non UK origin

BSE

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement about the reasons for the Government's decision to discontinue financial support for Professor Alan Ebringer's research into BSE. [132673]

Margaret Beckett: The proposal submitted by Professor Ebringer for Defra funding was assessed according to procedures that follow both departmental and Office of Science and Technology current recommendations for the evaluation and commissioning of research. This assessment, together with opinion from SEAC, advises that the proposed nature and scope of the work are not recommended for funding by Defra. Professor Ebringer has been advised of reviewers comments and has held discussions with Departmental officials.

Circo Atlas Circus

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make it her policy not to grant authorisations for exports to the Circo Atlas Circus in Portugal; and if she will make a statement. [132441]

Mr. Morley: The Department grants export licences for the movement of wild animals under two entirely separate areas of European legislation, namely the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora (CITES), and legislation relating to animal health and welfare.

Under CITES legislation, export permits are not issued for movements within the EU. Therefore, providing a specimen is legally acquired, is captive bred and has a certificate for commercial display, it can be moved freely within the EU and no paperwork would be required from UK authorities.

From an animal health perspective, animals may only be exported to destinations (including circuses) in EU member states if they meet the requirements of EU legislation relating to animal health and welfare. Where animal health rules are not harmonised under EU legislation, health conditions are agreed between the veterinary authorities of the exporting and importing member states. These health conditions are set out in official documents, known as export health certificates. They are issued by Defra's local Animal Health Divisional Offices and are signed by a veterinarian. Once signed, the document must accompany the animals to their destination. The suitability of a destination within the country of import is entirely a matter for their authorities and is not a matter for Defra.

Our records do not show any direct movements from UK to Portuguese circuses. However, animals may have been moved from the UK to Portugal via a third country.

Coastal Protection

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will list the grant funding paid to each local authority in each of the last 10 years for coast protection schemes. [132821]

Mr. Morley: Defra provides grant to local authorities for coast protection capital works which satisfy essential criteria. Authorities may claim grant on eligible expenditure during the construction of works. Details are provided in a table, which has been placed in the Library, for the grant paid to each authority for each of the last 10 years.

Figures will vary depending on the variety of local schemes which are promoted in any particular year.

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what information she has received in respect of properties lost as a result of coastal erosion in each of the last 10 years, broken down by coastal local authority. [132823]

Mr. Morley: Defra does not collect such information. Local authorities will hold information on their areas.

Environmental Sustainability

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs where the UK ranks in the Environmental Sustainability Index; and if she will list the rankings of other EU countries. [131062]

Mr. Morley: The UK ranks 91st in the 2002 Environmental Sustainability Index. The full list of rankings is shown in the following table. However, the UK and other countries believe this index is profoundly flawed, and therefore potentially misleading, for the following reasons. It is an aggregated indicator which aims to weight together many components into a single overall measure of 'environmental sustainability', an approach which as yet is not scientifically robust. The choice of components, and the way in which they are weighted together, is largely subjective. A different choice of components or weights would give different results, amply illustrated by the fact that the previous edition of this index, based on a different selection of components, placed the UK 16th. Furthermore, there are still many areas where data are not sufficiently comparable between countries, or are simply not available. The values of many of the variables used to compile this index are imputed. It should also be noted that the variables used in this index tend to measure circumstances at a single point in time rather than trends or changes, therefore to the extent the index measures anything at all, it measures the environmental situation which a country faces rather than its progress or performance in improving environmental sustainability.

EU Chemical Policy

Jonathan Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs pursuant to the Prime Minister's statement of 22 September, on the EU chemical policy, what impact the outcome of the e-mail consultation will have on the Government's stance. [134241]

Alun Michael: The Government strongly supports the development and delivery of an effective EU chemical policy. We have three overarching objectives for the proposals:

creating a fast, efficient and workable process of testing, screening and assessing substances of concern, starting with the most harmful, because of their impact on human health or the environment; keeping animal testing to the minimum necessary to protect human health and the environment; and maintaining or enhancing the competitiveness of the chemical industry and downstream users.

Details of the Government's response to the European Commission's internet consultation can be found at http://www.defra.gov.uk/environment/chemicals/reach/ukresponse.pdf

Following the Commission's consultations in May–July this year, the Commission has indicated its intention of making a number of changes to the proposals. The Government welcomes any changes intended to make the proposals more effective and workable, and will consider the revised proposals as soon as they have been adopted by the Commission. The Government will then carry out a separate UK consultation accompanied by a regulatory impact assessment.

Flooding

David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions she has had with parish councils on their ability to pay for flood prevention schemes. [132482]

Mr. Morley: Local authority responsibilities for flood defence measures on ordinary watercourses generally fall to district and unitary authorities rather than parish councils. Defra currently grant aids local authorities at a rate of 45 per cent. for flood defence capital works that meet specified criteria.

Local authority flood defence expenditure is also supported by funding delivered from ODPM as part of the local Government funding settlement. This expenditure falls into three categories:

councils' own expenditure on flood and coastal defence;

levies paid to the Environment Agency, and special levies paid to internal drainage boards.

My Department maintains a dialogue with the Local Government Association (LGA) on the funding needs in Local Authorities which are taken into consideration in our Spending Reviews. Recently we have worked with the LGA in the arrangements for introducing Defra grant in aid to the Environment Agency to replace most of the levies raised on local authorities.

Foot and Mouth

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs in how many cases her Department is withholding and offsetting the payment of fees to valuers because of disputes over valuations that took place during the 2001 outbreak of foot and mouth disease; what the total sum withheld and offset is; and if she will make a statement. [132746]

Margaret Beckett: My Department's policy is not to withhold or offset the payment of fees to valuers because of disputes that took place during the 2001 outbreak of foot and mouth disease.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many contractors have outstanding claims against her Department for invoices relating to work done and claimed to have been done in respect of the 2001 outbreak of foot and mouth disease and the subsequent clean up; what the total sum is of these claims; and if she will make a statement. [132747]

Margaret Beckett: My Department is pursuing those cases where it believes it was overcharged for goods, services and works during the FMD outbreak. Irregularities in contractors' claims have been and continue to be investigated. Defra will take all steps necessary to safeguard the public purse.

It is inappropriate for me to offer public comment on these disputes in advance of or during formal disputes resolution procedures.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs in how many cases her Department has refused to pay to livestock owners all or part of the sums due as compensation in accordance with assessments made of her Department's valuers in valuing stock to be slaughtered during the 2001 outbreak of foot and mouth disease. [132748]

Margaret Beckett: Under the Animal Health Act 1981, the compensation payable for animals slaughtered for disease control purposes is taken to mean their market value immediately before they were slaughtered or affected. A valuer appointed by Defra makes an assessment to determine a figure that represents the market value, and in the normal course, this is the amount of compensation Defra would pay. In a few cases during 2001, where it was apparent that the valuation and/or the figure was incorrect or flawed in some material way, Defra made an adjustment to ensure that the compensation paid to the owner properly represented the value of the slaughtered animals within the meaning of the legislation. Information on the number of cases where this occurred can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Genetically Modified Crops

Paddy Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what arrangements she intends to put in place to ensure co-existence between genetically modified crops and those produced by conventional or organic production methods. [133179]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 22 October 2003]: We will consider possible co-existence arrangements for GM and non-GM crops when we have a report on this issue from the Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission. Our current expectation is that this will be published next month. At this stage no GM crop has all the necessary approvals for commercial cultivation in the UK. The Government has not reached a final view on whether any specific GM crops should be approved for cultivation.

Mr. Swire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent discussions she has had with her European counterparts on the introduction of genetically modified crops in EU member states. [132651]

Mr. Morley: Ministers from the Department have regular discussions with their EU counterparts on issues relating to genetically modified (GM) crops. The issue has, in particular, featured on the agenda for several meetings of Councils of Agriculture and of Environment Ministers in recent years. Most recently, at a meeting of the Agriculture Council on 29 September there was a discussion on the European Commission's guidelines on the co-existence of GM and non-GM crops. Final EU decisions on pending applications for consent to grow GM crops are not expected until next year.

Mr. Swire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what role the Government has taken in the development of EU policy on genetically modified crops. [132652]

Mr. Morley: Since the late 1980s, the UK has played a full and active role in the development of EU policy on genetically modified organisms (GMOs), including GM crops. This has resulted in a strong, transparent and accountable regulatory framework, including the adoption in 2001 of an enhanced generic Directive (2001/18/EC) on the safety assessment of GMOs and in 2003 of specific measures on the traceability and labelling of GMOs, on genetically modified food and feed, and on exports of GMOs from the Community. Throughout, we have argued for an approach which is precautionary, evidence-based and proportionate, and which takes due account of international obligations under agreements such as the Cartagena Protocol on Biosafety. The Government has also paid particular attention to the practical aspects of implementation, with the UK, for example, being one of only four member states so far to have completed implementation of Directive 2001/18/EC.

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps the Department is taking to protect the interests of businesses from contamination by GM crops, with particular reference to organic farmers. [133408]

Mr. Morley: We will consider possible co-existence arrangements for GM and non-GM crops when we have a report on this issue from the Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission. Our current expectation is that this will be published next month. At this stage no GM crop has all the necessary approvals for commercial cultivation in the UK. The Government has not reached a final view on whether any specific GM crops should be approved for cultivation.

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the field scale evaluation GM crop trials in the management of individual crops. [133495]

Mr. Morley: The results of the spring-sown GM crop farm-scale evaluations were published on 16 October 2003. The results have now been passed to the Government's statutory advisory body—the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE)—who will advise on their implications. In the light of ACRE'S advice Ministers will decide the UK's position on whether these specific crops should be approved for commercial cultivation in the EU.

There are currently no GM crops being grown in the UK and none have all the approvals required for commercial cultivation. No GM crops can be sown without further regulatory approval which cannot take place until next spring at the earliest. We expect to receive ACRE'S advice in December or early January.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps her Department is taking to ensure that there will be no resumption of live exports of horses, ponies and donkeys for the meat trade from the United Kingdom. [134185]

Mr. Bradshaw: We are taking the opportunity offered by negotiation of new EU rules on the welfare of animals in transport, to consider the best way to protect British equines.

Organic Farming

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much the Government spent in 2002–03 on (a) research into and (b) support for (i) organic farming and (ii) GM crops. [132450]

Mr. Morley: The table as follows shows Defra spending in the financial year 2002–03 on support of and research into organic farming and GM crops respectively.

	Organic farming	GM crops
Support	£12,567,000 + £301,000 for the organic conversion information service	£0
Research for development purposes	£1,809,000	£0
Research for the purpose of environmental risk assessment	£0	£4,522,000

Recycling

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the steps being taken to increase recycling rates from (a) household waste, (b) business and industrial waste and (c) direct mail. [131904]

Mr. Morley: The Government have set targets to increase recycling and composting of household waste in England to 17 per cent. by 2003–04 and 25 per cent. by 2005–06. To underpin these national targets, we have required all local authorities to double their recycling, compared with 1999–2000, by 2003–04, and to treble their recycling by 2005–06. The Government have provided significant funding to enable local authorities to meet these targets.

In addition, Local Public Service Agreements provide a focus for local and central Government to encourage commitment to specific improvements over and above that which would normally be expected. To date, 83 waste related targets have been signed, including 41 targets which aim specifically to increase recycling performance above the statutory performance standard. As part of a Local PSA, the Government offer at the outset, a pump-priming grant, unsupported credit approvals and potential relaxations in statutory and administrative requirements. Typically, financial support has been used to improve enforcement and publicity; to develop civic amenity sites; and to initiate or expand kerb-side collection schemes.

The Household Waste Recycling Bill awaits Royal Assent and will become law next month. The Act will provide that where English waste collection authorities have a duty to collect waste they shall ensure, except in some circumstances, that by the end of 2010, they collect at least two recyclates separate from the remainder of the waste. The circumstances in which they would not have to comply would be where the cost of doing so was unreasonably high or where comparable alternative arrangements are available.

The Bill also now provides that the Secretary of State must report to Parliament on progress towards meeting this requirement, and local authority performance on meeting their recycling and composting standards, by the end of October 2004.

The Bill will apply to Wales if the Welsh Assembly feel it appropriate.

In "Waste Strategy 2000", the Government and the National Assembly for Wales set a target to reduce the amount of industrial and commercial waste sent to landfil in 2005 to 85 per cent. of that sent in 1998—reducing the amount from 42 million tonnes to 36 million tonnes. To reaffirm the target, the Government confirmed in the 2003 Budget that landfill tax will increase by £3 per tonne in 2005–06 and by at least £3 per year thereafter on the way to a medium to long-term rate of £35 per tonne. In addition, Envirowise is the main Government programme for providing advice on improving resource efficiency to businesses in industry and commerce increasing sustainable economic development.

The Government and the Direct Marketing Association signed a new agreement in July 2003 to increase the amount of recycled material used in the direct mail and promotions industry. Currently, 13 per cent. of direct mail is recycled, however, the agreement will raise recycling levels to 30 per cent. by the end of 2005, 55 per cent. by the end of 2009 and 70 per cent. by the end of 2013.

Regional Payments Agency

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much has been paid to food producers in the 2002 scheme year payments by the Regional Payments Agency in England, broken down by region; and what percentage of the 2002 scheme year payments budget these payments represent in each case. [134418]

Alun Michael: I have asked the Rural Payments Agency to produce an analysis of the relevant expenditure on a regional basis and send this directly to the hon. Member when ready.

Renardine 72–2

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the Government's policy on licensing Renodene for use as a badger deterrent. [132668]

Margaret Beckett: It is assumed that the question refers to the pesticide product, Renardine 72–2. This can be used as a badger deterrent in two circumstances:

(a) badgers and their setts are protected under the Protection of Badgers Act 1992, which makes it illegal to interfere with a sett. Deterring badgers from using a sett would constitute interference. However, there is provision in the legislation to allow the use of a deterrent such as Renardine 72–2 under a licence from my Department; and

(b) Renardine 72–2 is also specifically approved under the Control of Pesticides Regulations 1986 (as amended) for use as a badger deterrent where there is no interference with a sett.

Sheep Quota

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the market value of sheep quota per unit is; what the value of the annual payment from public funds per unit was in the last year for which figures are available; and what proportion of this total cost is met from UK public funds. [133221]

Mr. Bradshaw: Livestock Quotas were introduced in order to regulate production and expenditure under the Sheep Annual Premium Scheme (SAPS).

When the quota system was introduced, producers received an initial allocation based on the number of eligible sheep they received premium on in the 1991 reference year. The normal way in which producers may now acquire quota is by purchasing or leasing it on the open market. Transfer or lease of SAP quota may take place only during certain periods of the year—mid September to early February.

Values for sheep quota at the end of the 2003 trading period were as follows:

GB Lowland—£1.30 per unit (permanent transfer)

Leasing—£0.00 (quota was just given away)

England Less Favoured Area (LFA)—£9 per unit (permanent transfer)

Leasing—£1 per unit

Values at close of the 2002 trading period were as follows:

GB Lowland—£2 per unit (permanent transfer)

Leasing—30p

England LFA—£9 per unit (permanent transfer)

Leasing—£1 per unit

Values for both years have remained very low due to Foot and Mouth Disease. When the 2004 quota trading period opens on 11 November, it is expected that values will continue to stay low. This is because sheep quota will no longer be needed due to the reforms of the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP).

The sheepmeat regime of the European Union plays a significant role in the maintenance of the income of sheep farmers in the United Kingdom. The principal support mechanism of the regime is the Annual Ewe Premium, known in the UK as the Sheep Annual Premium (SAP)

From 2002, the SAP became a single fixed rate payment paid on breeding ewes. The new rate has been set at €21 (approximately £13) per eligible animal. In 2002 (the last year for which figures are available), SAP was paid on 16,546,384 animals in the UK. This amounted to a UK total of approx €34747,406 (£21,393,299).

The costs paid in relation to the Sheep Annual Premium came from EU Commission funding only.

Warm Front Grants

Mr. Goodman: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many people (a) in the UK and (b) in the Wycombe constituency who were declared eligible for warm front grants have not received them owing to temporary suspension of the scheme. [133598]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 21 October 2003]: Warm Front, Government's main fuel poverty programme in England, has not been suspended in this or any other area.

Waste Targets

Jonathan Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what research she used in drawing up the 2004 packaging waste targets; when the targets will be announced; and what progress has been made in reducing packaging waste. [131976]

Mr. Morley: The Department commissioned AEA Technology to design a model to produce target scenarios and assess the costs and benefits of these, using the most up-to-date information. The Department also uses its own model to exemplify targets using the most recent packaging data reported by business as well as the latest information on recycled packaging waste from reprocessors.

The Department expects to announce the changes to the packaging Regulations including the targets in late November 2003.

There has been a reduction in packaging waste since 1998. The Regulations include a cost incentive for businesses to reduce the amount of packaging they handle and to reuse packaging where they can. This is because the Regulations place tonnage recovery and recycling obligations on obligated businesses. The less packaging a business handles, the lower its obligation and thus its costs. Equally, where a business is reusing a tonnage of packaging, that tonnage does not have to be included in the calculation of the recovery and recycling obligations. In 2002, 4.9 million tonnes of packaging waste was sent to landfill compared with 6.9 million tonnes in 1998.

Water Bill

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what representations she has received from the farming sector about the proposal in the Water Bill for time-limited licences. [133477]

Mr. Morley: In 1998 the Government first consulted on proposals for all new licences to be issued with a time limit in the consultation paper 'The Review of the Water Abstraction Licensing System in England and Wales'. The majority of responses from the farming sector accepted that there was a need to time limit new abstraction licences. The majority of all the consultation responses received welcomed this proposal, and the Government subsequently included the proposal in the draft Water Bill.

There was similar feedback on our "Water Bill—Consultation on draft legislation" which was published in November 2000.

TREASURY

MRSA

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress the Department has made on implementing a system of enabling MRSA to be recorded on death certificates. [133849]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Paul Burstow, dated 27 October 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent question asking what progress the department has made on implementing a system of enabling MRSA to be recorded on death certificates. (133849)

MRSA can already be recorded on death certificates. Doctors are required to certify all deaths to the best of their knowledge and belief. They should start with the immediate cause of death, and then go back through the diseases or injuries which caused it, to the condition which began the sequence leading to death. The death certificate is designed to obtain this first 'underlying cause of death'. It is up to the doctor how many conditions in the sequence, other than the underlying cause, he thinks should be recorded. MRSA may contribute to death, but it is unlikely to be the first event in the sequence.

It is difficult to produce statistics on MRSA because there are no codes for antibiotic resistance in the International Classification of Diseases. ONS worked with the World Health Organisation to develop new codes in ICD-10 to identify antibiotic resistance. WHO has recommended that these codes may be used from 2006. ONS is working with the US National Centre for Health Statistics (NCHS) to ensure that these codes are implemented in NCHS systems used to code cause of death in the UK and many other countries.

Currently, to obtain figures on the number of deaths where MRSA contributed, it is necessary to identify all deaths with codes relating to staphylococcal infections and study the text of the death certificates. A special study was conducted by ONS and the Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre to do this, using data from 1993–1998. The results were published in the British Medical Journal in December 2002. The table below gives figures from this study for 1993 to 1998.

Number of deaths where MRSA was mentioned anywhere on the death certificate, England and Wales, 1993–1998

	Number
1993	47
1994	88
1995	187
1996	290
1998	398

ONS is currently carrying out work to update these figures to 2002, including identifying all possible codes for staphylococcal infections in ICD-10. The results of this analysis are not yet available.

Bechtel

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list contracts for consultancy or work carried out by Bechtel in each year since 1997 stating in each case (a) the nature of the work, (b) the value of the contract and (c) the duration of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [133855]

Mr. Boateng: The Chancellor's Departments have not had any contracts with Bechtel in this period.

Child Tax Credit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of child tax credit reassessments that will be required in 2003–04 due to rises in income in excess of the £2,500 disregard which occurred between the year of assessment and the award being made. [134108]

Mr. Boateng: The number of awards that are expected to be reassessed owing to rises in income above £2,500 are published in "The Child and Working Tax Credits". Copies are available on the HM Treasury website, www.hm-treasury.gov.uk/media//EE15F/new_tax_credits.pdf.

Correspondence

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the hon. Member for West Worcestershire will receive a response to his letter of 16 September. [134325]

John Healey: The hon. Member's letter was transferred to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. I understand a reply was sent 20 October.

Crown Estate Income

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much income has been received by the Crown Estate from rents paid for cables which use the seabed for each financial year since 1997. [134332]

Ruth Kelly: Since 1997 the following sums have been received by The Crown Estate.

£ million

Financial year[1]	Revenue
1997	1.22
1998	1.63
1999	2.65

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much income has been received by the Crown Estate from wind-powered electricity generating installations situated offshore for each financial year since 1997. [134333]

Ruth Kelly: Since 1997 the following sums have been received by The Crown Estate:

1998	0
1999	0

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much income has been received by the Crown Estate from rents paid by Scottish fish farmers for each financial year since 1997. [134334]

Ruth Kelly: The annual rent paid by Scottish salmon farmers for each financial year since 1997 is as shown in the following table. Separate figures for emerging species (cod and halibut) are not available but are currently calculated with reference to consented cage surface area rather than being linked directly to tonnage and price. The emerging species rent for 2003 was £9,800.

Emigration

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the number of UK citizens who have emigrated from the UK in each of the last five years, broken down by destination country. [134727]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. David Marshall, dated 27 October 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your question on the number of UK citizens who have emigrated from the UK in each of the last five years, broken down by destination country. (134727)

The most recent edition of the annual reference volume for international migration can be found by following the link to the National Statistics website at: http://www.statistics.gov.uk/downloads/theme_population/MN28.pdf.

This was published in September and includes data for the years 1992 to 2001. Data regarding country of next residence for 2002 will become available with the publication of the next edition of this volume in Spring 2004.

Table 2.2 of the volume shows estimates for country of next residence grouped as follows: European Union; Old Commonwealth (which includes Australia, New Zealand, Canada and South Africa); New Commonwealth (which includes all other Commonwealth countries); and Other foreign countries. Tables 2.3 and 2.4 show more detailed breakdowns of the data for the Old and New Commonwealth and the European Union and other foreign countries respectively.

At present, we are unable to break the data down to individual country beyond those countries included in these tables. The estimates are predominantly based on responses to the International Passenger Survey which samples 0.2% of international travellers using the principal routes to and from the UK. This sample size does not support the production of estimates for country of next residence to a greater level of detail than is currently shown.

Gold Sales

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the proceeds of gold sales from the UK reserves were in each year since 1997; and if he will estimate the value of that gold at today's prices. [133659]

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the total receipts for the gold reserves sold off by the Treasury over the past five years were; and what the value of those reserves would be at the afternoon fix of 20 October. [133974]

Ruth Kelly: The gold sales between July 1999 and March 2002 reflect a prudent decision to reduce over-exposure to a single asset in the net reserves portfolio. The total proceeds from the sale of 395 tonnes of gold during this period were US$3,496 million. At current market prices, the total value of this gold would be US$4,961 million. The difference between these two figures does not represent the real financial impact of the sales, as the proceeds from the gold sales were invested in euro, dollar and yen interest baring assets that have also increased in value over this period. The gold sales reduced risk by around 30 per cent. (as measured by value-at-risk) and are not expected to deliver a loss in return when measured over the medium to long-term; the appropriate time horizon for such a decision.

Government Buildings

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list vacant (a) Government owned and (b) Government leased buildings; and if he will make a statement. [132881]

Mr. Boateng: The list of holdings owned and leased by UK departments in England, Scotland and Wales that have recorded vacant space has been placed in the Library. This excludes accommodation that is the responsibility of the Scottish Executive and leases that have been transferred to PFI suppliers under the STEPS and PRIME contracts.

Government Rents

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent studies his Department has undertaken on rents paid by central Government buildings in London compared to alternative locations. [134705]

Mr. Boateng: The Chancellor's Departments have not undertaken any recent studies in this area. The Independent Review of Public Sector Relocation is examining the question of comparative accommodation costs.

Housing Market Statistics

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on (a) prices and (b) volumes of transactions in the housing market. [134420]

Ruth Kelly: The Government's forthcoming pre-Budget report will include an assessment of recent housing market developments.

Illegal Meat

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the occasions on which illegal meat has been seized by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise since 1 May; and what quantities were obtained in each case. [133976]

John Healey: Customs do not publish information in the format requested as there is a risk of prejudicing ongoing and future law enforcement operations; Exemption 4 (Law Enforcement and Legal Proceedings) and Exemption 7 (Effective management and operations of the public service) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information apply. Full-year figures are published by Defra in its Annual Review of Controls on Imports of Animal Products each July.

Income Distribution

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of national income accrued to the (a) top and (b) bottom (i) 1 per cent, (ii) 5 per cent. (iii) 10 per cent. and (iv) 20 per cent. of the income distribution in each year since 1979. [134101]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Meacher, dated 27 October 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent request for estimates of the .percentage of national income accrued to the (a) top and (b) bottom (i) one per cent., (ii) five per cent., (iii) 10 per cent. and (iv) 20 per cent. of the income distribution in each year since 1979. (134101)

Estimates for national income are not available but estimates for gross household income are shown in the following table. These are produced from the Office for National Statistics' analysis "The effects of taxes and benefits on household income" and the latest analysis for 2001–02 was published on 21st October 2003 on the National Statistics website. Results for earlier years are also published in Economic Trends, which can be can be obtained from the House of Commons library. The analyses for each year since 1997–98 can also be obtained from the National Statistics website at: http://www.statistics.gov.uk/CCI/SearchRes2.asp?IPS=5&CT=6&Term=taxes%20and%20benefits

The analysis includes measures of income inequality for the United Kingdom as a whole based on data from the Expenditure and Food Survey (EPS), formerly the Family Expenditure Survey (FES). Results for each quintile (including the top and bottom 20 per cent) are published in table 26 of the analysis. The Family Resources Survey would have been an alternative source with a larger sample size, however it would only have provided a time series from 1994/5.

The table shows the proportion of total gross income received by groups of households in different parts of the income distribution, where households are ranked by equivalised disposable income. Gross income includes income from earnings, occupational pensions and investments and cash benefits such as state retirement pensions and income support. It does not take account of deductions for taxes.

For the data that you have requested, sample sizes are only sufficient to allow a breakdown to be given by deciles and quintiles of income distribution and not for the top or bottom one per cent. or 5 per cent. Equivalisation is a standard methodology that takes into account the size and composition of households and adjusts their incomes to recognise differing demands on resources.

Investment Statistics

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of (a) non-residential business investment, (b) residential business investment, (c) public investment and (d) total investment in (i) 1995 market prices and (ii) current prices, as a proportion of GDP, since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [134134]

Mr. Boateng: Latest figures for investment by sector and GDP at current market prices were released by the Office for National Statistics (ONS) as part of the 2003 Blue Book dataset on 30 September. The ONS no longer publishes data at constant 1995 prices, having now replaced them with chained volume measures as indicators of growth in real magnitudes in the national accounts.

Liquefied Petroleum Gas

Mrs. Shephard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out the calculations on which the 40 p per litre duty rebate on liquefied petroleum gas are based. [134365]

John Healey: The Government offers lower duty rates for less environmentally-damaging fuels by offering duty differentials relative to the main road fuels. These differentials are intended primarily to reflect the relative environmental benefits individual. In determining the size of the duty incentive for liquefied petroleum gas (LPG), the Government took into account principally the environmental benefits of the fuel, such as local air quality improvements. It also took account of the significant market barriers faced by LPG: it requires a dedicated and separate re-fuelling infrastructure and vehicles have to be converted or specifically designed to use gaseous fuels.

In his 2003 Budget statement, my right hon. Friend, the Chancellor announced that the Government would consult on support for road fuel gases beyond 2004. The Department for Transport, HM Treasury and Customs and Excise published a consultation document in June inviting key stakeholders and users to express their views on how to ensure that both the duty payable and the purchase grants available for road fuel gases continue to reflect environmental and other policy objectives.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the national minimum wage was introduced; what the level was; what the (a) level and (b) date was of each increase; and what each of these levels was as a percentage of the national average wage. [133852]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Michael Meacher, dated 27 October 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent question about when the National Minimum Wage was introduced, what its levels have been over the years, and what percentage of the national average wage these levels represented. (133852)

Details of the different wage rate levels and when they were introduced are given in the attached tables. UK legislation covering minimum wage rates for employees over the age of 18 was introduced on 1 April 1999 (Table 1). Since 1999, the rates both for 18–21 year-olds, and for those over 21 have been increased.

Table 2 compares the threshold for the adult minimum wage with average pay for the nearest comparable age band for the New Earnings Survey, which is conducted in April each year.

Net Borrowing

Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he plans to review his forecasts for net borrowing before the forthcoming Pre-Budget Report. [135010]

Ruth Kelly: An interim forecast update for the public finances will be published as usual in the Pre-Budget Report.

Occupied Territories

Richard Burden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the total duty levied on goods marked as made in Israel but which originate from the Occupied Territories since the Treasury Statement of 3 April. [133958]

John Healey: Duty demands totalling £52,490.61 have been issued to UK importers since 3 April 2003.

Personal Debt

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what meetings have taken place in the last three months between the Treasury, the Bank of England and the Financial Services Authority to discuss (a) the sustainability of consumer debt and (b) house prices and mortgage lending. [134706]

Ruth Kelly: The Treasury, the Bank of England and the FSA hold regular meetings in a number of contexts to discuss important economic issues.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the percentage of all new capital assets used by the public sector and provided by private finance initiative in (a) 2002–03, (b) 2003–04 and (c) 2004–05. [134006]

Mr. Boateng: PFI/PPP represented 11 per cent. of total investment in public services in 2002–03. Projected figures for investment delivered through PFI/PPP as a proportion of total investment in public services in 2003–04 and 2004–05 are 11 per cent. and 8 per cent. respectively.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether in a private finance initiative contract including the use of physical property the property is retained by the private sector at the conclusion of the contract. [134007]

Mr. Boateng: The guidance issued by the Office of Government Commerce on the Standardisation of PFI Contracts makes clear that procuring authorities should consider whether or not retaining physical property at the conclusion of a contract offers the best value for money available.

The decision is for the procuring authority and should be made in light of its long-term objectives and the nature of the property involved.

Public Sector Pensions

Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in relation to the estimation of the cost of pensions under the Whole of Government Accounts, what excess of the discount rate over the rate of price inflation has been applied to future liabilities; and what the typical corresponding rate is that is used by the private sector under FRS17. [130884]

Ruth Kelly: In my answer of 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 5W, I said on advice that the majority of private sector schemes reporting under FRS17 used a discount rate clustered around 5.6 per cent. real. I have since been advised that this rate is, in fact, the nominal discount rate. The average real rate underlying this rate is 3.3 per cent. I very much regret having inadvertently given incorrect information in my earlier answer.

Registration (Births)

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress he has made in establishing a ceremony for the registration of births of children which records the mutual rights and responsibilities of the parents and the state. [134584]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the General Registrar. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. David Kidney, dated 27 October 2003:

As Registrar General for England and Wales, I have been asked to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question concerning what progress has been made in establishing a ceremony for the registration of births of children which records the mutual rights and responsibilities of the parents and the state. (134584)

There is no specific proposal to establish such a ceremony. However, in January 2001 the Government published a White Paper "Civil Registration: Vital Change" (CM 5355) containing proposals for the reform of the civil registration service in England and Wales. These proposals include the potential for the civil registration service to both provide celebratory services and to signpost other service and information sources. It is intended that the White Paper proposals are taken forward by means of an order under the Regulatory Reform Act 2001. The first phase of this process involves a mandatory public consultation. This was completed on 24 October.

Relocation (County Durham)

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received, and from whom, on relocation of government departments to County Durham. [134652]

Mr. Boateng: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has received three representations about the relocation of public sector activity to the County of Durham. These were submitted by interested individuals.

Retirement (Paid Employment)

Paul Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people who have retired in each of the last five years are still in paid employment. [133491]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Paul Flynn, dated 27 October 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your Parliamentary Question about retired people who are still in employment. (133491)

The attached table gives estimates of the number of people over state pension age who are in employment, for the three month periods ending August of each year from 1999 to 2003. These estimates are from the Labour Force Survey (LFS). The LFS does not collect information about the number of people who have retired in each of the last five years who are still in employment.

Stamp Duty Land Tax

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cost to business of implementing the stamp duty land tax regulations; and if he will make a statement. [134550]

Ruth Kelly: Businesses will notice little change in complying with the Stamp Duty Land Tax regulations as liability to Stamp Duty Land Tax should be reported and duty paid, as now, within 30 days of completion. The key change of Stamp Duty Land Tax will be that liability is notified by the completion of a Land Transaction Return. This removes the need to send documents to the Inland Revenue for the purposes of stamping. In addition, the regulations provide for the abolition of stamp duty on transactions involving property other than land, shares and interests in partnerships. This de-regulation will take many transactions out of stamp duty altogether.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Correspondence

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs when he will reply to the letter of 15 August from the hon. Member for Richmond Park on the Judicial Trustees Act 1896. [133990]

Mr. Leslie: The Secretary of State and Lord Chancellor wrote to the hon. Member on 22 October 2003.

Defamation

Bob Spink: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what plans he has to reform the law on defamation to enable quicker and less costly resolution of claims. [133867]

Mr. Lammy: The Government have no plans for further reform of defamation procedure. The Defamation Act 1996 introduced procedures to enable quicker and less costly resolution of claims. The 'summary procedure' allows straightforward cases to be dealt with without a jury; damages are limited to £10,000. The 'offer to make amends' strongly encourages a claimant to avoid a jury trial on the level of damages where the defendant admits an innocent mistake. Both these procedures were brought into effect on 28 February 2000.

The number of defamation actions started has dropped from 452 in 1997 to 128 in 2002.

Departmental Establishment Costs

Mr. Syms: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what estimate he has made of the costs that will be incurred in the setting-up of his Department. [125041]

Mr. Lammy: Further to my answer to the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight), on 1 September 2003, Official Report, column 779W, the Department for Constitutional Affairs has incurred costs of £40,000 in changing the Department's name (covering email and website changes, stationery and signage). An estimated £412,000 has been incurred in respect of relocation from the House of Lords to Selborne House and all the consequential changes following on from this.

Immigration

Mr. Malins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs how many immigration appeals were heard by the Immigration Appellate Authority in the last 12 months for which figures are available; how many of those were heard (a) within six months of and (b) over 12 months after the application was refused; and if he will make a statement. [134059]

Mr. Lammy: From the 1 October 2002 to the 30 September 2003 there have been 9,727 substantive Immigration hearings within the Immigration Appellate Authority. For the same period of time there have been 12,530 Family Visit Visa hearings (either oral or on papers). The Immigration Appellate Authority does not hold information on the length of time from the Immigration application being refused to a substantive appeal being heard.

Legal Aid

Huw Irranca-Davies: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what plans he has to increase the accountability of the Legal Services Commission for its decisions on the granting of legal aid. [133991]

Mr. Lammy: We have no plans to do so. Decisions on the granting of public funding (formerly legal aid) in civil cases are a matter for the Legal Services Commission (LSC), which is an independent body, free from political and Government influence in handling individual cases. Individuals denied funding by the LSC are entitled to have the decision reviewed by a funding review committee, an independent legal panel whose decisions on legal issues are binding on the LSC. Further, if a LSC funding decision is erroneous it may be challenged in court through judicial review.

Small Claims Courts

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what the minimum fee for enforcing a judgment in the small claims court is; and whether the fees increase according to the value of the judgment. [134292]

Mr. Lammy: The fee for enforcing a judgment is dependent on the method of enforcement chosen by the litigant. Fees do not increase according to the value of the judgment or the amount to be enforced except for a warrant of execution, which is the most common form of enforcement. The current issue fee for a warrant not exceeding £125 is £30, for a warrant exceeding this amount it is £50. The current scale of fees for enforcing judgments is contained in the County Court Fees Order 1999 as amended and is shown as follows.

Enforcement

4.1 On an application for or in relation to enforcement of a judgment or order of a county court or through a county court:

...by the issue of a warrant of execution against goods except a warrant to enforce payment of a fine

(a) Where the amount for which warrant issues does not exceed £125—£30

(b) Where the amount for which warrant issues exceeds £125—£50

4.3 On an application for an order requiring a judgment debtor or other person to attend court to provide information in connection with enforcement of a judgment or order—£40

4.4 On an application for a third party debt order or a charging order, or the appointment of a receiver by way of equitable execution—£50

4.7 On an application for an attachment of earnings order (other than a consolidated attachment of earnings order) to secure payment of a judgment debt—£60.

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what the Secretary of State's policy is on non-adjudicating staff in the small claims court giving assistance to parties to actions there. [134293]

Mr. Lammy: Court staff are not legally trained. They are, however, encouraged to be as helpful as possible to customers. They should not give legal advice or advise on procedures that are outside their normal jurisdiction. The distinction between legal and procedural advice can sometimes be very fine. Where the matter is difficult or complex, the distinction may not always be easy to grasp or to explain. In such circumstances, it is wholly proper that court staff should err on the side of caution and respectfully ask court users to seek legal advice.

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what plans the Secretary of State has to reform the small claims court. [134301]

Mr. Lammy: As part of the Department's rolling programme of improvements to civil court procedures, a pilot exercise, from 8 July 2002 to 21 February 2003, was initiated in a number of county courts. The pilot examined whether it would be possible to allocate cases to the small claims track without the use of an allocation questionnaire. The pilot collected a considerable amount of information, which indicated areas where changes to procedures might be appropriate. The Civil Procedure Rule Committee will be considering procedural issues and the Court Service the operational issues.

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what the minimum fee chargeable by the small claims court for issuing a claim is; and what the sliding scale of fees for claims of increasing value is. [134304]

Mr. Lammy: The minimum fee chargeable for a claim issued under the Small Claims procedure is £30. The current scale of fees for claims up to and including £5,000 is contained in the County Court Fees Order 1999 as amended and is shown as follows. The Order also makes provision for fees to be remitted in full or reduced where payment of the fee could cause financial hardship.

Commencement of proceedings

1.1 On the commencement of originating proceedings using the Small Claims Procedure, to recover a sum of money...where the sum claimed

(a) does not exceed £300—£30

(b) exceeds £300 but not £500—£50

(c) exceeds £500 but not £1,000—£80

(d) exceeds £1,000 but not £5,000—£120

1.3 On the commencement of originating proceedings for any other remedy or relief—£130

PRIME MINISTER

Biofuels

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Prime Minister which Government Department is responsible for the formulation of Government policy on biofuels. [134369]

The Prime Minister: This is a wide-ranging issue in which a number of Departments have an interest.

The Department of Trade and Industry, Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Department for Transport work closely in promoting the Government's policy objectives for the increased use of biofuels.

As with all tax issues, responsibility for the fiscal regime on biofuels rests with HM Treasury.

Confidential Material

Norman Baker: To ask the Prime Minister what mechanism exists to regulate individuals who are neither Ministers or civil servants but who are invited to undertake tasks for him which involve access to confidential material. [134491]

The Prime Minister: Access to sensitive material requires the appropriate level of security clearance. The Official Secrets Act also applies.

Iraq

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister pursuant to his oral answer of 22 October 2003, Official Report, column 636, to the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson), if he will place in the Library a note of the date when he was first informed that references in the Government dossier to 45 minutes and weapons of mass destruction were references only to battlefield weaponry. [134536]

Alan Simpson: To ask the Prime Minister pursuant to his oral answer of 22 October 2003, Official Report, column 636, on Iraq, on what date he was first informed that references to the 45 minute warning about Iraq applied only to battlefield weapons. [134537]

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs said on 28 January 2003, Official Report, column 769W, weapons of mass destruction are generally held to refer to nuclear, chemical and biological weapons. The term applies whether the weapons are delivered through battlefield or longer-range systems. As has been noted by the Intelligence and Security Committee in their report of 9 September 2003, the intelligence on the 45 minute point was issued by the Secret Intelligence Service on 30 August 2002. The Secret Intelligence Service report did not specify the particular delivery systems to which the time of 45 minutes applied. There was, therefore, no reference to battlefield or longer-range systems when the point was included in a formal classified Joint Intelligence Committee assessment issued on 9 September 2002, which I saw.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Central African Republic

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will make a statement on the diarrhoea epidemic in the north west region of the Central African Republic. [133765]

Hilary Benn: Several epidemics of diarrhoea have been reported in different regions of the Central African Republic. The most recent epidemic was confirmed north west of the capital, where at least 40 people died in late September 2003. A similar outbreak was detected and contained in August 2003.

Areas of the north were severely affected by six months of war between the Government and rebel troops, and this has adversely affected health and water facilities.

In response, the EC Humanitarian Office (ECHO) and the European Development Fund (EDF) launched a €1.77 million emergency programme to revamp and re-equip health facilities in nine war affected provinces of the Central Africa Republic, disbursing resources through international NGOs. This has involved rehabilitation of health facilities and equipment, the mobilisation of medical personnel and medical supplies, as well as the establishment of an efficient management system. UNICEF is also jointly involved in a six-month health project combating waterborne diseases, including the disbursement of drugs to six war affected regions.

A joint Government-NGO (Medicos Sin Fronteras MSF-Spain) medical team began work in July 2003, educating local leaders on water hygiene and providing local health centres with drugs to help fight the disease. Tests have also been undertaken on wells to check which need to be purified. Health authorities have since resumed the immunisation of children in the north west region of the Central African Republic.

Clean water supplies have now been restored in Bozoum and its surrounding areas since October 2003, which should help halt the spread of diarrhoea.

Democratisation

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how his Department is supporting the democratisation processes in poor countries considered to be committed to reform. [132097]

Hilary Benn: We support democratisation in poor countries in a wide variety of ways, both directly and indirectly. This includes assistance to Electoral Commissions, voter registration and awareness programmes and election monitoring; support for parliamentary Select Committees; assistance to strengthen financial and other accountability, and anti-corruption measures; programmes to make justice systems work better, especially for the poor; and work with the media and a wide range of civil society organisations to enhance their participation in public life and the political process.

Departmental Budget

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what percentage of the Department's budget in each of the last three years has been spent on programmes and projects with an explicit concentration on disabled people; and of that, what percentage has been concentrated on children. [133003]

Hilary Benn: These figures are not available without incurring disproportionate cost. We work closely with Governments, the voluntary and private sectors and the bilateral and multilateral donor communities to ensure that disability is addressed in the context of the fight against poverty and the realisation of human rights for all.

DFID's approach to disability issues was set out in a paper on 'Disability, Poverty and Development' in February 2000. An integrated approach is required, linking prevention and rehabilitation with empowerment and changes in attitude. DFID's approach is therefore to 'mainstream' disability issues, so that the needs of disabled people are taken into account by all staff in all aspects of DFID's work, and also to investigate further the links between poverty and disability and how they interact with each other.

Iraq

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many internally displaced persons of Iraqi nationality he estimates there are in UN administered camps in countries neighbouring Iraq. [133777]

Hilary Benn: Latest estimates indicate that the United Nations, in partnership with host Governments, currently supports a refugee caseload of approximately 210,000 in the countries neighbouring Iraq. The Department For International Development has provided £1.75 million to UNHCR since the start of the conflict to assist with their work in Iraq and neighbouring countries.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many internally displaced persons he estimates there are in UN-administered camps in Iraq. [133778]

Hilary Benn: A recent assessment by the International Organisation for Migration (IOM) places the number of registered internally displaced persons (IDPs) in Iraq at approximately 265,000. The full caseload of people displaced from their homes within Iraq has, however, been estimated at up to one million—the vast majority of these are long-term displaced and not as a direct result of the recent conflict. The majority of IDPs are unregistered and are not resident in organised camps.

Millennium Development Goals

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will make a statement on recent progress towards the Millennium Development Goals. [133140]

Hilary Benn: There has been mixed progress towards the 2015 targets associated with the Millennium Development Goals. The proportion of the developing world population living in absolute poverty, on less than $1 a day, fell from 28 per cent. in 1990 to 22 per cent. in 2000. Assuming global economic growth remains on track the headline target of halving absolute poverty between 1990 and 2015 will be met. However progress across regions is uneven. Good progress in Asia has been accompanied by little change in the proportion in absolute poverty in sub-Saharan Africa. The global target to halve the proportion of people without access to safe water between 1990 and 2015 is also on track.

Other targets, including universal primary schooling, gender equality in school, reductions in child and maternal mortality and combating HIV/AIDS, will require a significant increase in effort to be achieved. However, the substantial progress that individual countries have achieved demonstrates that the targets could still be reached with the right policies and political will.

The MDGs will only be achieved through a partnership between rich and poor countries. The final goal covers action needed by developed countries to increase and improve aid flows and reform the trade system. The recent breakdown of talks in Cancun aimed at achieving a fairer global trading system was a particular disappointment, and the UK Government are working hard to ensure an agreement can be reached.

DFID has put the achievement of the MDGs at the heart of its work, and we are working with our partners to do all we can to meet these targets. A particular concern is sub-Saharan Africa and supporting progress in this region is a priority for DFID.

A more comprehensive assessment of progress towards the goals is provided in the UN Secretary General's 2003 report on the implementation of the Millennium Declaration: http://ods-dds-ny.un.org/doc/UNDOC/GEN/N03/481/57/PDF/N0348157.pdf?OpenElement.

Reproductive Health

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development pursuant to his answer of 14 October 2003, Official Report, columns 70–71W on reproductive health, what the (a) structure, (b) aims and (c) methods of each of the projects in Nigeria listed under annex A to his answer are; when his Department last assessed the progress of each project; what the main conclusions of each assessment were; and if he will make a statement. [133193]

Hilary Benn: I will write to the hon. Member for Moray with details of the projects and programmes in DFID Nigeria that have a policy marker for Reproductive Health or HIV/AIDS, as listed previously (ref: 131641).

The health sector (including HIV/AIDS) continues to be our largest portfolio in DFID Nigeria in terms of financial commitment, and Reproductive Health and Rights are central to this. Furthermore, as we remain focused on helping Nigeria make accelerated progress towards the Millennium Development Goals, issues of maternal health, child health, access to comprehensive reproductive health services and the control of HIV/AIDS will increasingly be addressed through other programmes in the areas of governance, rights, education, infrastructure, poverty reduction and economic development.

Trade Liberalisation

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will assess the effect of full trade liberalisation by (a) all countries and (b) developed countries only on the distribution of welfare gains among (i) developed, (ii) non-least developed and (iii) least developed countries. [133416]

Hilary Benn: Estimates vary, but World Bank and IMF research shows that welfare gains from liberalising all trade range from US$250 billion to US$550 billion; one-third to two-fifths of these gains would accrue to developing countries. Because their economies are more highly protected, most studies find that developing countries gain more as a percentage of their GDP/GNP from liberalisation than industrial countries.

Low-income countries (a group that includes the least developed countries) gain most from industrial country liberalisation of agriculture, because of the greater relative importance of agriculture in their economies. In contrast, the larger and more advanced developing countries gain most from liberalisation in industrial goods because of the greater importance of manufacturing in their production and exports.

Uganda

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what action he is taking to tackle the health problems in the Teso region of Uganda. [133764]

Hilary Benn: DFID provides support to Health services in Uganda primarily through general budget support. The Ministry of Health allocates its budget resources to districts based on relative poverty, burden of disease, and other exceptional factors. This approach has led to significant improvements in health service provision throughout Uganda. Recent insecurity in the Teso region resulted in an increased demand for health services and in response the Ministry sent additional health workers and medical supplies. In addition DFID has also channelled extra resources through its wider programmes with UNICEF, the World Food Programme (WFP), and the Uganda Red Cross Society to support those displaced by the conflict.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Colombia

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the (a) purpose and (b) cost was of military and civilian assistance provided by the UK Government to Colombia in each of the last five years. [132681]

Mr. Rammell: Aid given via the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) is listed as follows. Total figures given in each year are funds allocated to projects within that year, although funding shown covered some projects in subsequent years.

1999: £1,545,000—on information services on sexual and reproductive health for internally displaced people; local initiatives for peace, strengthening NGOs in the rural sector.

2000: £621,163—on child abuse issues; witness and victim protection systems; strengthening prevention management of human rights violations; promotion of sustainable livelihoods and poverty reduction; public service conflict resolution training; internally displaced people; strengthening indigenous community institutions; environmental work by indigenous population.

2001: £344,712—rehabilitation of former child soldiers; promotion of sustainable livelihoods and poverty reduction; strengthening of fire service; humanitarian aid; human rights city campaign; child soldiers; biodiversity projects.

2002: £498,363—promotion of sustainable livelihoods and poverty reduction; public service conflict resolution training; civil society study tour; education on parliamentary system; security sector reform; humanitarian action cooperation; protection of women's human rights; environmental conservation; biodiversity projects.

2003 to date: £664,703—human rights training for Colombian Armed Forces; promotion of sustainable livelihoods and poverty reduction; community defenders for vulnerable communities; street children project; environmental projects.

During the past five years the FCO has also contributed over 3 million in counter-narcotics assistance to Colombia. We do not publicise details of such assistance to protect the safety of personnel involved and to avoid undermining its impact in future work in this area.

On aid via the Ministry of Defence, I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Ingram) gave on 16 October 2003, Official Report, columns 321–22W.

On aid via the Department for International Development I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for International Development (Clare Short) gave on 9 January 2003, Official Report, column 296W, and that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn) gave on 26 June 2003, Official Report, column 940W.

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will reply to the letter to him, dated 11 September 2003, from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mrs. K. Qureshi. [133845]

Mr. Mullin: A reply was sent to my right hon. Friend on 10 October 2003. I regret that because of significantly increased workloads at UKvisas, the department responsible for the entry clearance operation overseas, this reply was not sent within the usual deadline of seven working days.

Draft European Constitution

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the provision under Article IX of the draft European constitution for member states to withdraw from the constitution if no agreement is negotiated within two years would necessarily result in total withdrawal from membership of the EU and obligations under the treaties. [134142]

Mr. MacShane: Article I-59 of the draft EU Constitutional Treaty sets out the arrangements under which any member state so desiring could withdraw from the EU. Paragraph 3 states:

> "The Constitution shall cease to apply to the State in question from the date of entry into force of the withdrawal agreement or, failing that, two years after the notification referred to in paragraph 2, unless the European Council, in agreement with the Member State concerned, decides to extend this period."

The provision that the constitution would cease to apply to the member state in question would equate to total withdrawal from the European Union.

EU Diplomacy

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in what countries the UK relies on EU diplomatic representation; and what plans he has to rely on EU representation in two years' time. [134309]

Mr. MacShane: The United Kingdom's diplomatic representation overseas is carried out by British embassies, British High Commissions and British Consulates.

European Commission delegations currently represent the EU overseas in areas of Commission competence—external trade, European external assistance and some external aspects of Justice and Home Affairs.

The Inter Governmental Conference will consider proposals for Commission delegations to take on additional responsibilities to complement and work alongside national representations. No conclusions have yet been reached.

General Affairs Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the outcome was of the General Affairs and External Relations Council held on 13 to 14 October; what the Government's stance was on the issues discussed, including its voting record; and if he will make a statement. [134576]

Mr. MacShane: The information requested is as follows.

Outcome of the 13 October General Affairs and External Relations Council

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary represented the UK at the General Affairs and External Relations Council (GAERC) in Luxembourg on 13 October.

Conclusions on Wider Europe, Iraq, Iran, and Western Balkans were agreed by consensus.

General Affairs Session

Progress of work in other council configurations

The Presidency gave a standard progress report on work in other Councils (Agriculture, Finance and JHA).

Preparation of European Council (Brussels, 16–17 October)

This was a final discussion to confirm the annotated agenda for the European Council, the focus of which was on boosting growth. The agenda had already been agreed at the 29 September GAERC:

Relaunching the European economy

Strengthening the area of freedom, security and justice

External relations

MEP Statutes

Discussion centred on a letter from the President of the European Parliament on privileges and immunities. It was agreed that the Council should reply saying it was willing to work jointly for a solution but the EP would need to show flexibility.

External Relations Session

Wider Europe

Enlargement Commissioner Verheugen briefed on the progress on the Wider Europe/New Neighbourhood initiative endorsed by the Thessaloniki European Council in May 2003. Action Plans are to be developed for Russia, Ukraine, Moldova, Morocco, Tunisia, Jordan, and Israel. A package of proposals should be presented to the Council in spring next year.

Middle East Peace Process

Partners discussed their concerns over developments in the region, in particular the security wall. The Presidency called for high level attendance at the forthcoming EU/Israel Association Council.

Iran

Short Conclusions on the Iran nuclear situation were agreed without substantive discussion. Conclusions on Iran human rights were also agreed. These reaffirmed the Union's commitment to the human rights dialogue with Iran, the last round of which took place on 8–9 October 2003, as one of the means by which the EU can work to improve the human rights situation in the country. But Conclusions also stated that this dialogue was without prejudice to the possibility of promoting or co-sponsoring a Resolution at an UNGA session.

Iraq

The Council confirmed the indicative Commission pledge of 200m Euro for the 23–24 October Madrid Donors' Conference subject to budgetary process. Partners emphasised the importance of Madrid. The Commission indicated that this should not be seen as a standard donors' conference but more as an opportunity to agree on a multi-lateral framework for Iraqi reconstruction. The Presidency noted that aid and security improvements should be pushed forward in parallel.

Western Balkans

ICTY Chief Prosecutor, Carla Del Ponte, made a presentation on co-operation with the International Criminal Tribunal in Yugoslavia, based on 9 October statement made to the UN Security Council. She highlighted the connection between war criminals, organised crime, and support networks in the intelligence services, army, police and clerical institutions. Conclusions were also agreed on the launch of the Belgrade-Pristina Dialogue.

EU-Russia

There was a brief discussion of relations with Russia in the context of the forthcoming EU-Russia summit. The Council also took note of Trade Commissioner Lamy's briefing on his discussions with Russia on their WTO accession. Commissioner Lamy said that he would be returning to Moscow on 15 October to try to move some of these issues forward. There was no substantive discussion.

Hong Kong

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent assessment he has made of infringements of human rights in Hong Kong. [134204]

Mr. Rammell: The 1984 Sino/British Joint Declaration on the question of Hong Kong provides for the continuation in Hong Kong, after the handover, of the rights and freedoms previously enjoyed.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary continues to report to Parliament on the implementation of the Joint Declaration on Hong Kong. These reports always contain a section covering basic rights and freedoms. The Foreign Secretary's last report (Cmnd 5864), which covered the first six months of this year, assessed that, in general, the basic rights and freedoms promised to the people of Hong Kong in the Joint Declaration and the Basic Law, were upheld during that period.

Iran

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on discussions with the Government of Iran about nuclear weapons proliferation. [131992]

Mr. MacShane [holding answer 14 October 2003]: We have a regular dialogue with the Government of Iran on a range of issues of mutual concern. This includes discussion of Iran's nuclear programme.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, together with his colleagues from France and Germany visited Tehran last week for intensive discussion with the Iranian Government on the issue of Iran's nuclear programmes and the need for Iran to co-operate fully and actively with the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

The Foreign Secretary issued a written ministerial statement on 23 October about his visit.

Iraq

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will urge the UN Security Council to take steps to deploy human rights monitors throughout Iraq in line with General Assembly resolution 57/232 of December 2002. [133001]

Mr. Rammell: The Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) appealed in May for an initial US$1.5 million for the provision of Human Rights Officers in Iraq. The UK agreed to allocate £400,000 (US$650,000) towards the OHCHR's request, to fund 60 per cent. of the immediate start-up costs of deploying Human Rights Officers and supporting their work. Following the terrorist attack on the United Nations Headquarters in Baghdad on 19 August 2003, the UN's efforts in Iraq have inevitably been scaled back, and the five human rights monitors were withdrawn with other international staff. The majority are now deployed in the region or in Geneva and New York and working on Iraq-related human rights issues. We are in discussion with the UN on the security measures needed to ensure that the UN is able to strengthen its vital role in Iraq.

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his Department's support for the draft UN resolution on the political and economic reconstruction of Iraq. [134268]

Mr. Rammell: Security Council Resolution 1511, co-sponsored by the UK and unanimously adopted on 16 October, provides a further step forward in the international community's contribution to the political and economic reconstruction of Iraq. The Resolution has three main objectives:

to confirm and accelerate the transfer of power to the people of Iraq;

to send a clear signal that the international community is committed to the rapid political and economic reconstruction of a free Iraq which is secure and stable; to ensure, as conditions permit, a strengthened vital role for the United Nations, in partnership with the Coalition and with the Iraqi people.

In particular, the Resolution invites the Governing Council of Iraq to provide by 15 December a programme and timetable for the drafting of a new constitution for Iraq and for the holding of democratic elections. It also encourages farther international contributions to economic reconstruction, to the multi-national security force and to training and equipping of Iraqi police.

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to ensure that the draft resolution on the reconstruction of Iraq will be implemented by the United Nations Security Council. [134291]

Mr. Rammell: Security Council Resolution 1511, adopted on 16 October, sets out a number of areas requiring implementation by the Iraqi authorities, the Coalition Provisional Authority, the United Nations or the rest of the international community. The Security Council will regularly review implementation of the Resolution and the UK will work to ensure implementation by all those involved.

Japan

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department has made to the Japanese authorities concerning the imprisonment of Mr. Nicholas Baker; and if he will make a statement. [133626]

Mr. Mullin: We have raised Mr. Baker's case with the Japanese authorities at both official and ministerial level on a number of occasions. We continue to monitor the case and offer Mr. Baker consular assistance.

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of (a) the conditions in which Mr. Nicholas Baker is being held in Japan and (b) his level of access to legal representation prior to his trial. [133627]

Mr. Mullin: Mr. Baker is being detained under the same conditions as others in detention in Japan. We continue our dialogue with the Japanese authorities about prison conditions in general. Officials from the British embassy visited Mr. Baker soon after notification of his arrest, gave him a list of lawyers and helped to arrange the appointment of Mr. Baker's chosen lawyer. We continue to monitor the case and offer Mr. Baker consular assistance.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) which of the UK overseas territories he plans to visit in the next 12 months; [133205]

(2) what official visits he plans to make during the next 12 months. [133207]

Mr. Straw: It is not my practice to announce visits until they are firm. Because of the unpredictable nature of world events, final decisions on my overseas visits are often not possible until very shortly before the day of travel.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to discuss Gibraltar's sovereignty with the Government of Spain. [133206]

Mr. MacShane: There are currently no plans to do so.

Mr. Kenny Richey

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the United States Administration about the imprisonment on death row in Ohio of Mr. Kenny Richey; and if he will make a statement. [134819]

Mr. Mullin: Kenny Richey became a dual UK/US national with effect from 30 April 2003. Under international law we have no right to make formal demands on behalf of a dual national in the country of their other nationality. However, in cases of the death penalty, as a matter of principle, we will make representations in all cases at the appropriate time.

We are in touch with Mr. Richey's lawyers both in the USA and the UK, as well as Ohio state officials. Our Acting Consul General in Chicago attended Mr. Richey's Court of Appeals hearing earlier this year. We will continue to monitor his case closely to determine what representations could be made on his behalf, and we will do all we properly can to try to prevent his execution.

Pakistan

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of whether the Government of Pakistan is a sponsor of terrorism; and if he will make a statement. [133066]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: President Musharraf has said that he will not allow Pakistan's territory to be used by terrorists. We welcome the steps which the Government of Pakistan has taken so far in fulfilment of that commitment, including its co-operation in the campaign against Al Qaida and the measures it has taken to clamp down on extremist groups in Pakistan, including the banning of five such groups. We remain concerned about militant violence in Kashmir and look to Pakistan to discourage such acts and fulfil its commitment to stop infiltration across the Line of Control. We also remain concerned that Taliban and other extremist elements are still crossing between Afghanistan and Pakistan and we continue to encourage the Government of Pakistan to do all it can to prevent this.

Student Visas

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many student visas were granted in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [132920]

Mr. Mullin: The information is as follows:

	Student visas granted
Year
1998	69,607
1999	75,607
2000	99,559
Financial Year
2001–02	121,466
2002–03	132,890

The table shows the number of student visas issued at entry clearance posts worldwide each year since 1998. Since 2001, statistics have been collated by Financial Year (1 April to 31 March) rather than calendar year.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the 20 (a) further education institutions and (b) higher education institutions with the highest number of student visas granted for studying at that institution. [132921]

Mr. Mullin: We do not keep centralised records of further education and higher education institutions at which applicants for student visas wish to study. To obtain such figures would incur disproportionate costs.

Working Holidaymakers

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the process for considering applications for entry clearance as working holiday makers is the same for applicants from every Commonwealth country. [133074]

Mr. Mullin: Yes.

CABINET OFFICE

Civil Service Secondments (Science and Technology)

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many people from science and technology backgrounds have been seconded into the Civil Service following the recommendation of the Council for Science and Technology in its review in 1999 of Science and Technology Across Government. [133943]

Mr. Alexander: This information is not held centrally and could be collected only at disproportionate cost.

Flooding

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what discussions he has had with DEFRA on contingency plans for autumn flooding. [133587]

Mr. Alexander: My Department has held regular discussions with DEFRA about its contingency plans for flooding. It has contributed to a forthcoming DEFRA Plan for "Tidal and Fluvial Flooding in England". We are also working with DEFRA on a tabletop exercise to test its Lead Government Department responsibilities against a range of flooding scenarios.

Charter Mark

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will make a statement on Charter Mark awards. [133669]

Mr. Alexander: The Charter Mark scheme is an important element of the government's public service reform agenda.

The scheme continues to recognise success. We have worked to enhance and further develop Charter Mark as a national standard for customer service and an important tool for public sector organisations to use in addressing customer service issues. The new content of Charter Mark was published earlier this year.

In 2002, 949 organisations achieved the Charter Mark standard, taking the total number to more than 2,400.

As well as modernising the content of the scheme to reflect our customer focus approach to public services we have redesigned the assessment process to better meet the needs of those using the scheme, offering real choice and better value. Following piloting of these new arrangements we will open the scheme for new applications from January 2004 onwards.

The government strongly encourages organisations to strive towards the Charter Mark Standard as a means of improving customer satisfaction as an important element of delivering better public services.

Official Cars

Norman Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list the (a) make of and (b) engine size of and (c) type of fuel used by each official car, broken down by holder. [134366]

Mr. Alexander: The cars available to Ministers and others are set out in "Travel by Ministers". A breakdown of the car fleet is set out in the GCDA annual report and accounts which is available in the Library of the House. For reasons of security, it would not be appropriate to provide the details of cars used by individual holders.

Norman Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what mechanism exists to identify the improper use of Government cars; what procedure is used to notify the user of improper use; and on how many occasions this procedure has been used since 1 May 1997. [134492]

Mr. Alexander: Guidance to Ministers on the use of Government cars is set out in "Travel by Ministers". Similar rules apply to other office holders. As Travel by Ministers makes clear, individual Ministers are responsible for justifying their actions and decisions to Parliament.

TRANSPORT

Airport Capacity (South-East)

John McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport following the publication of the White Paper on the future of airport expansion in the UK, whether the chosen site for expansion in the South East will have to undergo a planning inquiry. [133335]

Mr. McNulty: No decisions have yet been taken on future airport capacity in the South East. The White Paper will not convey statutory authorisation for any development. That would need to be sought subsequently. Where an airport operator brings forward a planning application, under the major infrastructure projects provision in the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill currently before the House, the Government will have powers to call in planning applications which it considers to be of national or regional importance. A Planning Inspector will then be appointed to consider the application and make recommendations to Ministers.

John McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment his Department has made of the likely timescale between the publication of the White Paper on the future of airport expansion in the UK later this year and a final decision being taken on the location of expansion. [133336]

Mr. McNulty: The air transport White Paper will set out the Government's policies on any preferred locations for future airport capacity. Planning approval for any new capacity will need to be sought subsequently. For the purposes of the SERAS study, it was assumed that following the White Paper any new runway might require two years for detailed design and project definition and a further two years for authorisation.

Biofuels

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements he intends to put in place to meet European Union targets for biofuel use by (a) 2005 and (b) 2010. [134370]

Mr. McNulty: The European Union's Biofuels Directive requires member states to set their own indicative targets for sales of biofuels for road transport to be met in 2005 and 2010. The Government will be consulting early next year on the level of possible targets for the UK and on the steps it might take to meet them.

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to his answer of 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 165W, on biofuels, what assessment he has made of the costs if the UK were to set targets for sales of biofuels at (a) 2 per cent. by 2005 and (b) 5.75 per cent. by 2010. [134141]

Mr. McNulty: We have not carried out any detailed assessment of what the costs to the UK might be if we chose to set indicative biofuels sales targets at those levels. This sort of analysis will form part of the consultation paper on our plans for implementing the Directive which we plan to issue early next year, and will help inform the level of targets that we choose to set.

The costs to the UK will depend on a number of factors, including the level of Government support for biofuels. The Government currently provide a 20 pence per litre fuel duty incentive for biodiesel, with a similar duty incentive for bioethanol due to come into effect in January 2005. At these levels of duty incentive, if sales of biofuels were to reach 2 per cent. of total annual fuel sales (i.e. almost 1 billion litres), the fuel duty revenue forgone would be in the region of £200 million per annum. If they were to reach 5.75 per cent. of total fuel sales (or total sales of a little under 3 billion litres), the revenue forgone would be close to £600 million per annum. There may be other public costs too, including any grants that help support the production of biofuels, or any subsidies provided under the Common Agricultural Policy.

Concessionary Travel Schemes

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with representatives of local government about the possibility of changes to the national minimum standards for concessionary travel schemes; and if he will make a statement. [134271]

Mr. McNulty: There have been no recent discussions with local authorities regarding the possibility of changes to the current national minimum standards for concessionary travel schemes.

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the additional payments were in each year since 2001–02 from central Government to (a) local government in England and (b) each local authority and London borough to reimburse local government for the cost of the national minimum standards for concessionary travel schemes introduced under the Transport Act 2000. [134272]

Mr. McNulty: The Government have provided an additional £54 million each year since 2001–02 to local government for the cost of the national minimum standards for concessionary travel schemes introduced under the Transport Act 2000, with effect from June 2001. That expenditure, along with other costs falling on local authorities, is provided as part of the contribution that Government make to local authorities through the annual grant settlement.

Figures for the amounts received by each local authority in England, including London boroughs, are not available, as the additional funding for concessionary fares has been included in the total amount of grant distributed to local authorities.

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the cost of concessionary travel schemes was (a) in England and (b) in each local authority and London borough for (i) the elderly and (ii) the disabled in each year since 2001–02. [134273]

Mr. McNulty: The amount spent by local authorities on concessionary travel schemes for older and disabled people in England as a whole, in London, the metropolitan areas and the rest of England in 2001–02 and 2002–03 is summarised in the table. The amount for each authority has been placed in the Libraries of the House. From the data available it is not possible to separate the concessionary spending for older people and disabled people.

	2001–02	2002–03
England	487	515
London	162	169
English metropolitan areas	203	216
English unitary, district and county areas	122	130

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the administration costs of implementing national minimum standards for concessionary travel schemes were for (a) local government in England, broken down by local authority and London borough, and (b) his Department in each year since 2001–02. [134274]

Mr. McNulty: Implementation of the national minimum standard for concessionary travel schemes is a matter for local authorities. Information on the administration costs of implementation is not held centrally.

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the national minimum standards for concessionary travel schemes; and if he will make a statement. [134275]

Mr. McNulty: Last year the Department published the Transport Statistics Bulletin, "Concessionary Bus Fare Schemes England 2001", which provided a survey of the provision of all the concessionary fares schemes in England following the introduction of the statutory minimum standard in June 2001.

This showed that over half of local authorities had a more generous concessionary fare scheme for elderly and disabled people compared with the position before the statutory minimum standard came into effect. This included 17 local authorities where there had been no concessionary fare scheme previously.

Correspondence

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the hon. Member for West Worcestershire will receive a response to his letter of 26 June 2003, reference AD/MC/011086/03. [134331]

Mr. McNulty: I refer the hon. Member to my letter to him of 10 July 2003, reference AD/MC/011086/03.

Entry Clearance

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether, in respect of applications for entry clearance from working holiday makers, identical requirements and conditions are applied for applicants from each Commonwealth country. [133077]

Mr. Mullin: I have been asked to reply.

Yes.

Traffic Management Bill

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the Regulatory Impact Assessment on local government and the utility companies of the proposed Traffic Management Bill will be made available to Parliament. [134102]

Mr. McNulty: As and when the Traffic Management Bill is introduced we intend to publish and make available to Parliament a Regulatory Impact Assessment at the same time.

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the impact of the introduction of broadband has been taken into account in the Regulatory Impact Assessment on local government and the utility companies of the proposed Traffic Management Bill. [134103]

Mr. McNulty: In drawing up Regulatory Impact Assessments on the proposed Traffic Management Bill and secondary legislation flowing from it we will be taking into account, amongst other things, the possible impact on the rollout of broadband as well as on the work programmes of other utility sectors including gas, water and electricity.

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the parties who have been asked by his Department to contribute to the Regulatory Impact Assessment on local government and the utility companies of the proposed Traffic Management Bill. [134104]

Mr. McNulty: We have consulted a wide range of different bodies on the measures under consideration for inclusion in the proposed Traffic Management Bill. In particular, in February this year we set up a working group, on which various Government Departments were represented, together with the utility regulators—OFWAT, OFGEM and OFTEL—and representatives of utility companies and local authorities. In drafting a Regulatory Impact Assessment for the proposed Bill, we are taking account of the different views put forward in the working group together with written contributions which we have received from utilities, highway authorities and others. We would also propose to consult widely on the secondary legislation which we envisage would be needed following the Bill to set out the detailed changes to the existing legislative regime.

Vehicle Excise Duty Offences

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many unlicensed vehicles he estimates the DVLA will (a) wheel clamp and (b) crush in 2004. [134748]

Mr. Jamieson: So far in 2003–04, DVLA has clamped 46,302 vehicles. In addition, the 14 local authorities that now have devolved powers to clamp and impound on behalf of the Secretary of State have clamped an additional 6,601—a total of 52,903. We expect that to rise to 65,000 by the end of the financial year.

The number of vehicles crushed by DVLA is 21,144 so far, with the 14 local authorities crushing an additional 3,052—a total of 24,196. We expect that figure to rise to 30,000 by the end of the financial year.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Direct Payment

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what consultations he has had with the Banking Association to ensure that pensioners required to open bank accounts to receive their state benefits do not incur extra charges on temporary overdrafts greater than their benefit. [132562]

Mr. Pond: Customers are being provided with detailed information on the account options available to them. It is for customers to decide which account best meets their needs and circumstances. 87 per cent. of benefit customers and 90 per cent. of pensioners already have access to a bank account. The move to Direct Payment will give people more choice about where and when they collect their money—including from the Post Office.

Officials have had a number of discussions with the British Bankers' Association about the move to Direct Payment of benefits and pensions. The features of individual accounts (including charges and overdraft facilities) are a matter for the account provider. There is a wide range of accounts available which are free to operate and do not offer overdraft facilities. Some account providers do charge their customers if there is not enough money in their account to cover direct debits. Account providers make their customers aware of these charges and leaflets provided to benefits customers and pensioners also set out the possibility of charges in these circumstances.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many housebound, disabled and blind pensioners not in possession of a bank account he estimates will be able to receive state benefits over the counter after 2005. [132564]

Mr. Pond: With direct payment, customers can still collect their benefit or pension at the Post Office, if they choose to do so, by using some current bank accounts, basic bank accounts or the Post Office card account.

Already 87 per cent. of all customers and over 90 per cent. of pensioners have access to an account that can receive direct payment. And for those who do not, the new easy to operate accounts, which are accessible at the Post Office, are widely available.

We have always recognised that there will be a small group of people who we cannot pay directly into an account. We are developing an exceptions method of payment to pay this group, which can be accessed at Post Office branches. This will be based on an understanding of the individual problems such customers will face.

Mr. Horam: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what recent consultations the Government has undertaken on the circumstances in which it will permit pensioners to retain their pension books under the direct payment scheme; and if he will make a statement. [133890]

Mr. Pond: The order book system is outdated, inefficient, open to fraud and abuse, and costly to administer. It needs to be modernised to keep in step with changing customer needs and to reflect the fact that most people now have and use a bank account. Already 87 per cent. of all customers and over 90 per cent. of pensioners have access to an account that can receive Direct Payment. And for those who do not, new easy to operate accounts, which are accessible at the Post Office, are widely available. Everyone who wishes to do so will be able to withdraw their money at post office branches by choosing an account, which is accessible at the Post Office.

We are consulting with Specific Interest Groups such as Age Concern, Help the Aged, Citizens Advice, and the National Pensioners Convention about an alternative method of payment, which is likely to be cheque based, for those who are genuinely unable to operate any type of bank account. Payment outlets for this exceptions method of payment will include Post Office branches. We expect this service will be in place from October 2004.

Child Support Agency

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many complaints were received per month from Child Support Agency clients (a) in the six months previous to the introduction of the new child support system and (b) in the last three months, in the latter case identifying how many of the complaints came from (i) clients of the old system and (ii) clients of the new system; what percentage of total clients the complaints represented per month; and if he will make a statement. [131447]

Mr. Pond: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mr. Doug Smith. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Doug Smith to Angus Robertson, dated 27 October 2003

The Secretary of State, in replying to your recent Parliamentary question about the Child Support Agency promised a substantive reply from the Chief Executive.

You asked about the numbers of complaints received by the Agency in the 6 months prior to the introduction of the new child support system and in the last three months (identifying the number received from clients on the old and new systems) and what percentage of our total clients these figures equate to.

The figures you requested are summarised in the following tables:

Complaints received prior to the introduction of the new child support system

Month	Number of complaints received	Percentage of total clients
September	1,238	0.11
October	1,318	0.12
November	1,263	0.12
December	958	0.09
January	1,316	0.12
February	1,515	0.15
Monthly Average	1,268	0.12

In April 2003 we changed our complaints handling processes. This has ensured the more accurate recording of complaints and ensured the recording for the first time of telephone complaints. I have included below information on written complaints only, for a more representative comparison.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions whether the Child Support Agency has referred recipients of CSA payments back to their ex-partner in order to sort out future payments. [131469]

Mr. Pond: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mr. Doug Smith. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Doug Smith to Mr. David Drew, dated 27Ooctober 2003.

The Secretary of State in replying to your recent Parliamentary question about the Child Support Agency promised a substantive reply from the Chief Executive.

You ask whether the Child Support Agency has referred recipients of child support payments back to their ex-partner in order to sort future payments.

In all cases we aim to arrange maintenance payments through discussions with both the parent with care and the non-resident parent. If there is to be any delay in making these arrangements we would suggest to both parties that voluntary payments are made to avoid arrears building up.

Disability Appeals Tribunals

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many disabled people have sat as a panel member of a disability appeal tribunal in (a) 2000–01, (b) 2001–02 and (c) 2002–03. [132565]

Maria Eagle: This is a matter for Christina Townsend, Chief Executive of the Appeals Service. She will reply to the hon. Member.

Letter from Christina Townsend to Mr. Roger Berry, dated 27 October 2003

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question regarding the number of disabled people who have sat as a panel member of a disability appeal tribunal in 2000–01,2001–02 and 2002–03.

We do not have information for the years 2000–01 and 2001–02. The first disability survey of panel members was carried out last year. During the year 2002–03 there were 226 disabled people who sat as on a disability appeal tribunal drawn from a total of 2074 members of the appeals tribunal.

I hope this reply is helpful.

Fibromyalgia Syndrome

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans the Government has to include fibromyalgia syndrome in the list of diseases which enable industrial injury payments. [133405]

Malcolm Wicks: We have no plans to recognise fibromyalgia syndrome as a prescribed industrial disease. A disease may only be prescribed if there is a recognised risk to workers in an occupation, and the link between disease and occupation can be established or reasonably presumed in individual cases.

Food Expenditure

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how much was spent on food by his Department and by each of the agencies for which it is responsible in (a) 2001–02 and (b) 2002–03; what proportion of that food by value was produced in the United Kingdom; what guidance he has issued to encourage the procurement of home-produced food; and if he will make a statement. [129374]

Maria Eagle: Expenditure on food in DWP is mainly limited to official hospitality, working lunches and canteen subsidies. The expenditure figures that are available are in the following table.

Our main canteen catering service provider has estimated that, where they have total control over the source and origins of products, approximately 75 per cent. of fresh produce, by quantity, is of UK origin. It is not possible to provide a similar estimate for food provided for official hospitality and working lunches due to the large number of suppliers involved.

DEFRA are currently working with DWP private sector partners and canteen catering service providers to raise awareness of sustainable purchasing practices and to highlight local sourcing issues. We are also working with our partners to develop an action plan to implement the Sustainable Food Procurement initiative recently introduced by DEFRA.

	[1] Official hospitality and working lunches (£)	Canteen subsidies (£ million)
2002–03	569,000	3.6

[1] The figures provided for official hospitality and working lunches relate only to that included in the former DSS financial management system. They exclude any expenditure funded by the former Employment Service as the current financial systems do not enable the spend on food to be identified. DWP is currently implementing a new financial management system which will identity all such spend in future.

Full Employment

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what progress is being made in achieving full employment; what further plans he has to assist people into work; and if he will make a statement. [132946]

Mr. Browne: Our aim is to deliver work for those who can and security for those who cannot.

We are well on our way to getting three quarters of people of working age people into work—not just in one year but year on year. Through a combination of economic stability and radical labour market reforms, we have achieved a lot. There are more than 1.5 million more people in work now than in 1997 and unemployment is at its lowest levels since the mid 1970s. Both the UK employment rate and ILO unemployment rate are the best of all of the major industrialised (G7) countries. Claimant long term (one year plus) unemployment has been virtually eradicated for young people and has fallen by three-quarters for adults.

But there is still more to do. High levels of employment are not enough. We need to provide employment opportunities for all groups of people who want to and can work in all parts of the country.

Through Jobcentre Plus, we are providing everyone of working age—the unemployed, lone parents, sick and disabled people—with advice and guidance on the full range of support available to help them move into work.

In areas with higher levels of worklessness we have introduced Action Teams for Jobs. From April 2004, we are also introducing a programme of intensive support in neighbourhoods with very high concentrations of worklessness. Local Worklessness Pilots will operate in 12 neighbourhoods for 2 years testing a new approach to offering intensive support to local residents to help them overcome barriers to employment.

We are also providing more help for those who face the greatest barriers to work. We now have programmes to help, for example, former drug mis-users, the long term unemployed, people from minority ethnic communities and we are piloting reforms to Incapacity Benefit in order to give more opportunities to this group of people as well.

Income Support

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will issue guidance for determining when it is reasonable not to be paid for voluntary work, in relation to entitlement to income support. [132678]

Mr. Pond: For benefit purposes, the legal definition of a volunteer is "someone who is engaged by a charity or voluntary organisation or is a volunteer where the only payment received or due is the reimbursement of actual expenses incurred during their activity". Volunteers need to continue to satisfy the conditions of entitlement to benefit but subject to this can do voluntary work. Actual expenses incurred or to be incurred can be disregarded for benefit purposes.

Guidance relating to people receiving benefit who engage in voluntary work is contained in Volume 4, Chapter 21, Paragraph 21168 and Volume 5, Chapter 28, paragraph 28389 of the Decision Makers Guide copies of which are in the Library.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many lone parents are in receipt of income support where the youngest child is 11 or above; and what the average weekly amount is of (a) income support and (b) housing and council tax benefits which are paid to such lone parents. [132486]

Mr. Pond: The information requested is in the table.

Lone parents receiving Income Support whose youngest child is aged 11 or over, Great Britain May 2002

	Thousand	£ per week
Income Support recipients	156,200	—
Income Support average amount	—	96.20
Housing Benefit average amount	—	63.50
Council Tax Benefit average amount	—	11.60

Notes:

1. Of the 156,200 lone parents receiving Income Support, 128,000 also received Housing Benefit and 114,000 Council Tax Benefit.
2. Income Support recipients have been rounded to the nearest hundred, average weekly amounts to the nearest 10 pence.
3. Figures are based on 1 per cent. and 5 per cent. samples and are therefore subject to sampling variation.
4. Lone Parents are defined as single claimants with dependants not receiving the disability or pensioner premium.
5. Housing Benefit figures exclude any Extended Payment cases, Council Tax Benefit totals exclude any Second Adult Rebate cases. Figures for any non-responding authorities have been estimated.

Post Office Card Account

Mr. Horam: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners have opened a Post Office card account since April. [133084]

Mr. Pond: Information is not available in the format requested. Key figures on the progress of conversion to Direct Payment are available in the Library updated every four weeks.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what proportion of customers his Department estimates will open a Post Office card account (a) in total, (b) for each benefit and (c) in each income decile. [133385]

Mr. Pond: It is impossible to predict accurately how many customers (a) in total, (b) for each benefit and (c) in each income decile, will eventually open a Post Office card account as this will be based on customer choice. However, the card account is proving very popular with customers. Over one and a quarter million people have already requested a Post Office card account, which suggests that customers are fully aware of the account's availability and how to open one.

Key figures on the progress of conversion to direct payment are available in the Commons Library, updated every four weeks.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many inquiries about Post Office card accounts have been received; how many applications to open an account have been received; how many accounts have been opened; what the average time taken to process applications is; what steps are being taken to publicise the accounts; which organisations were consulted on the accounts; and how take up of accounts will be monitored. [133390]

Mr. Pond: We do not have the information in the format requested.

Key figures on the progress of conversion to direct payment are available in the Library, updated every four weeks.

Information regarding the number of Post Office card account applications received, opened, length of the application process and the development of the card account are matters that fall within the responsibilities of Post Office Ltd. (POL).

The Departments information campaign, to support the move to direct payment, provides customers with all the information they need on all of their "account options", including which accounts can be used at Post Office branches. It will be up to the customers themselves to decide which type of account they wish to have their money paid into, and those people who want to open a Post Office card account will be able to do so.

Poverty

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many children in Leeds, West have been lifted out of poverty since 1997. [132742]

Mr. Pond: The fifth annual 'Opportunity for all' report (Cm 5956) sets out the Government's strategy for tackling poverty and social exclusion and presents information on the indicators used to measure progress against this strategy.

Information in respect of Leeds West is not available, as data for these indicators goes down only to national or regional level. Below that, it would not be statistically robust.

This publication is available in the Library.

Tax Credits

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many lone parents have (a) moved off income support and on to the working families tax credit and (b) left the working families tax credit to return to income support in each year since the working families' tax credit was introduced. [131092]

Mr. Pond: In April 2003, building on the success of working families tax credit, we introduced child tax credit and working tax credit to provide a single seamless system of support for children, and tackle in-work poverty and improve work incentives by making work pay.

The information requested is in the table.

Lone parents leaving income support (IS), moving to working families tax credit (WFTC) and subsequently returning to IS in Great Britain, 1 October 1999–31 March 2003

	All lone parents leaving IS	Moving to WFTC within 40 days of leaving IS	Subsequently returning to IS from WFTC
October 1999–September 2000	299,500	120,900	51,800
October 2000–September 2001	268,600	111,800	40,800
October 2001–September 2002	263,500	110,300	29,600
October 2002–March 2003	131,300	56,200	8,700

Notes:
1. Figures give lone parents leaving IS during the periods shown, while 'returns' refer to the whole lifetime of WFTC. Earlier periods will therefore show higher proportions returning to IS than later years.
2. Figures include those who were classed as lone parents' on leaving IS but are no longer categorised as such on return to IS.
3. As no new claims to WFTC were allowed after 1 April 2003, people leaving IS in this year had less opportunity to move to WFTC. However, some of these IS terminations may have since moved onto child tax credit.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Broadcasting

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps she is taking to ensure that the regulation of radio and television broadcasting is transparent and effective; and if she will make a statement. [134229]

Estelle Morris: The Communications Act 2003 puts in place a framework for the effective regulation of the communications sectors, including radio and television broadcasting, by the new communications regulator, OFCOM. The Act makes it explicit that, in carrying out their duties, OFCOM must have regard in all cases to the Better Regulation Task Force's five principles of good regulation, which include transparency, and other principles of good regulatory practice.

In addition, the process of reviewing the BBC's Royal Charter will begin before the end of the year. The review will cover the full range of the BBC's role, structure and function, including the arrangements for ensuring effective and transparent regulation.

Departmental Expenditure (Official Residences)

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much the Department spent on (a) maintenance, (b) renovation, (c) council tax and (d) running costs of residential properties used by Ministers and officials in each year since 1997. [134683]

Mr. Caborn: DCMS has no responsibility for any such properties.

Football

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many football clubs with grounds in inner urban areas (a) have relocated since 1997 and (b) intend to relocate to new sites on the urban periphery or beyond; and if she will make a statement. [134608]

Mr. Caborn: This is not a matter for the Government, and this information is not held by my Department. According to Football Association figures, there are approximately 40,000 amateur, semi-professional and professional football clubs in England. A high proportion of these are located in urban areas. The re-location of amateur clubs is a matter for County Football Associations; re-locations of professional clubs are matters for the Premier and Football Leagues.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what funding she gives to support the maintenance of football pitches in public ownership in (a) England and (b) Kent. [134768]

Mr. Caborn: All public funding for football in England is channelled through the Football Foundation. The Foundation will receive approximately £60 million from each of the Government, the Football Association and the FA Premier League over the period 2000–04.

Funding from the three partners is not hypothecated. However, since 2000 the Foundation has made 154 grants totalling £10.94 million in respect of projects involving football pitches in public ownership. Three of these grants, totalling £790,353, involved pitches in Kent.

Licensing Act

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport whether, under the Licensing Act 2003, a licensing authority which is aware that a bar or pub has been a source of complaint by nearby residents because of the playing of noisy recorded music, will be empowered to impose a noise-limiting condition on such premises when the licensee converts his existing licence to a new premises licence during the transition period. [133946]

Mr. Caborn: No. Following an application for conversion of an existing licence or licences to a premises licence during the transition period, the licensing authority must grant the application if it is made in accordance with the provisions of Part 1 of Schedule 8 to the Licensing Act 2003. This is unless an appeal is pending against a decision to revoke or reject an application for the renewal of an existing licence and the chief officer of the police to whom the application has been copied under paragraph 3(1) of Schedule 8 gives notice that he is satisfied that the conversion of the existing licence would undermine the crime prevention objective, or the chief officer of police is satisfied that there has been a material change in circumstances since the grant of the existing licence or its last renewal such that the conversion of the existing licence would undermine the crime prevention objective, in which case the application may be refused following a hearing.

The new premises licence will be subject only to conditions which reproduce the effect of the conditions or restrictions in the existing licence or licences as well as the mandatory conditions.

Following the second appointed day, any responsible authority or interested party, such as a local resident, may seek a review of the new licence, which could, if necessary for the promotion of the licensing objectives lead to the imposition of new Department for Culture, Media and Sport Parliamentary Unit 2–4 Cockspur Street London SW1Y 5DH www.culture.gov.uk conditions.

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when she will issue the statutory guidance and regulations relating to the Licensing Act 2003. [133973]

Mr. Caborn: The statutory guidance relating to the Licensing Act 2003 will be presented to Parliament shortly.

The regulations relating to the Licensing Act 2003 will be issued over the next few months.

Travel Agents (VAT)

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport whether she and her officials have met their counterparts in the Treasury to discuss the implications of the changes proposed by the European Commission to the special travel agents VAT scheme contained in Directive 77/388/EEC; what her Department's stance is on these proposals; and what recommendations were made to the Treasury. [133148]

Mr. Caborn: Neither my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State nor officials have met HM Treasury counterparts on this issue. However, this Department has remained in close discussions with HM Customs and Excise who have the lead for this issue in Europe. My Department has listened and is sympathetic to the Tourism industry's concerns and we will continue to discuss this with HM Customs and Excise. HM Customs have met and discussed this issue with the industry and will continue to work hard to ensure that UK business interests are given full weight in EU negotiations.

TV Licensing (Prosecutions)

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what system is used by TV Licensing in Northern Ireland to record and monitor where prosecutions are being brought. [133240]

Mr. Caborn: TV Licensing, who administer the television licensing system as agent for the BBC, record the total number of prosecutions for licence evasion in Northern Ireland but do not maintain a localised breakdown of these figures.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Child Abuse

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what therapeutic services are available for abused children; and if he will make a statement. [133134]

Margaret Hodge: A range of therapeutic services for abused children is provided by statutory agencies as well as by the private and voluntary sectors. If a child is assessed by social services as being a child in need (as defined in the Children Act 1989), social services, together with other relevant agencies, would provide help as part of that child's plan.

Capital Projects

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many Government capital projects for schools had as a requirement that the school reduce its size, in the last year for which figures are available. [134666]

Mr. Miliband: My Department has no records of having provided capital funding with the requirement that a school be reduced in size. Most capital funding is now allocated by formula to local education authorities (LEAs) or schools for them to invest in their school buildings. Decisions on building priorities are made locally, in the context of asset management plans and reflecting Government priorities. It is, therefore, up to LEAs to decide on their priorities in consultation with local schools, including where surplus places can be reduced where it is economical to do so. Overall capital investment is set to rise from £3.8 billion this year to over £5 billion in 2005–06, compared to under £700 million in 1996–97.

Chemistry Teachers

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many teachers were in training specialising in chemistry in each of the last five years. [133864]

Mr. Miliband: The information is not available in the form requested. Numbers of funded initial teacher training places are set annually by my right hon. Friend for science as a whole. The Teacher Training Agency's annual census of recruitment to initial teacher training also collects only aggregate recruitment data for science.

The table shows the number of entrants to initial teacher training courses in science since 1998/99.

	Postgraduate	Undergraduate	Total
1998/99	2,058	221	2,279
1999/2000	2,149	213	2,362
2000/01	2,219	191	2,410
2001/02	2,444	150	2,594
2002/03	2,568	133	2,701
2003/04[1]	n/a	n/a	n/a

Connexions

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to the answer of 15 July 2003 to the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Valerie Davey), Official Report, column 141W. on Connexions, what assessment he has made of whether Connexions is offering a universal service to young people who do not fall into the Not Engaged in Education, Employment or Training category. [134109]

Margaret Hodge: All partnerships will be inspected by Ofsted on a four-yearly cycle and are required to conduct an annual self-assessment of performance based on the Ofsted inspection framework. One question in the Ofsted inspection framework focuses on the responsiveness of the Partnership to the range and diversity of young people in the area. It addresses whether the partnership has effective strategies to enable all young people to gain access to support and provision responsive to their needs. Government Offices also assess this aspect by monitoring partnerships' self-assessment. Of the 12 inspection reports so far published, eight partnerships have been rated overall as good or very good.

An independent survey of 16,000 young people comprising those with all types of need who had been in contact with Connexion services showed minimal differences in awareness of or ability to access the service. Only 12 per cent. of those requiring least intensive support disagreed with the statement, "It is easy to get hold of people at Connexions when you need to", compared with 11 per cent. of those requiring more intensive support and 13 per cent. of those requiring most intensive support. 87 per cent. of those requiring least intensive support agreed that: "Connexions helps me to see all the options available to me".

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of people aged 13 to 19 in England were (a) being educated in a school or college and (b) not engaged in education, employment or training in the last year for which figures are available. [134111]

Mr. Miliband: Participation rates are not produced by the Department for 13 to 15-year-olds. As at January 2002, there were 1,892,259 pupils aged 13 to 15 across all schools in England. The number of 11 to 15-year-olds being educated within local education authority areas otherwise than at school was 15,390. This will include, for example, pupils being educated at home, or non-statemented pupils in hospital.

Participation rates are available for 16 to 18-year-olds. The proportion of 16 to 18-year-olds in England that were being educated full-time in a school, college or higher education institution at end 2001 (end of calendar year) was 55.5 per cent. A further 8.9 per cent. were in part-time education.

The proportion of 16 to 18-year-olds in England not in education, employment or training at end 2001 was 9 per cent.

Citizenship Curriculum

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will require responsible consumption and its effects on the environment and society to be included within lessons on citizenship. [131451]

Mr. Miliband: The Citizenship curriculum includes teaching pupils about issues that impact on the society and the environment. Pupils are taught about the rights and responsibilities of consumers, to recognise the difference between the economic choices they can make, and how they impact on society and the environment. Many schools explore this with pupils through activities which examine the impact of consumer behaviour on other people, locally, nationally and globally.

QCA has sent detailed guidance to schools to help them to explore these issues, including a unit—'Choices' for use with 5 to 11-year-olds. Similarly, "Consumer Rights and Responsibilities" is aimed at discussions with 14 to 16-year-olds. These units are available at: www.standards.dfes.gov.uk/schemes

Mental Health

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what guidance his Department issues to (a) schools and teachers and (b) the Connexions Service on depression in children and young people. [134040]

Margaret Hodge: The Government are committed to promoting mental health of children and young people within schools. In June 2001, the DfES published guidance, "Promoting Children's Mental Health within Early Years and Schools Settings". The guidance is designed to help teachers and others, working alongside mental health professionals, to promote mental health and to intervene effectively with children experiencing problems. The guidance offers advice on specific mental health problems and useful approaches that schools can take. This includes emotional disorders such as depression.

The Connexions Service National Unit issued guidance, "Making a Difference—Emerging Practice—Connexions and Mental Health Services", to Connexions Partnerships in March 2003 about supporting young people with mental health problems.

Education Act (Innovation)

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list schools which have applied for exemptions from statutory requirements relating to innovation under the Education Act 2002, giving in each case (a) the nature of the exemption sought and (b) the outcome of the application. [133941]

Mr. Miliband: The Department plans to lay before Parliament its first annual report under section 5 of the Education Act 2002 on 30 October 2003. The report will outline details of the three applications that the Secretary of State has received during the first academic year of the Power and will detail for each application the nature of the exemption sought and the outcome of the application. These have been:

Application	Innovation facilitated	Relevant Legislation	Details of the order granted by the Secretary of State	Date that the order was made
Langley Junior School, Pendeen Crescent, Southway, Plymouth PL6 6QS	The order permitted the school to extend the length of the school day mid academic year, rather than have to wait until the beginning of the new school year. The purpose of the innovation was to provide extra curricular activities for pupils on a Wednesday afternoon freeing up time for teachers to work on planning and preparation, and drawing up education plans for individual pupils.	Changing of the School Session Times Regulations	Statutory Instrument 2002 No. 3063 Langley Junior School (Change to School Session Times) Order 2002	11 December 2002
Grinling Gibbons Primary School, Clyde Street, Deptford, London SE8 5LW	The order permitted the school to extend the length of the school day mid academic year, rather than have to wait until the beginning of the new school year. The purpose of the innovation was to provide extra curricular activities for pupils on a Wednesday afternoon freeing up time for teachers to work on planning and preparation, and drawing up education plans for individual pupils.	Changing of the School Session Times Regulations	Statutory Instrument 2003 No. 716 The Grinling Gibbons Primary School (Change to School Session Times) Order 2003	12 March 2003
Norton College, Langton Road, Norton, Malton, N Yorkshire YO17 9PT	The order permitted the school to change the timings of the school day without the requirements set out in regulations: to give the minimum of three months notice to parents; and to consult parents at a meeting (instead parents were consulted by correspondence). The order facilitated the college's plan to end the school day one hour early on alternate Wednesdays from September 2003, allowing staff to have a dedicated two-hour period once a forthnight for planning, preparation, assessment, and to hold meetings.	Changing of the School Session Times Regulations	Statutory Instrument 2003 No. 1671 The Norton College (Change to School Session Times) Order 2003	2 July 2003

As of 22 October 2003 two further applications have been received by the Department. These are currently being processed. Details are:

Applicant	Details of exemption, relaxation or modification of existing educational legislation sought	Relevant Legislation
Elloughton Primary School, Stockbridge Road, Elloughton, Brough, East Riding of Yorkshire HU15 1HN	Seeking exemption from some elements of the KS2 SATs whilst replacing them with ongoing teacher assessment procedures	The Education (National Curriculum (KS3 Assessment Arrangements) (England) Order 2003
The Cardinal Wiseman School, Greenford Road, Greenford, Middlesex, UB6 9AW	To deliver the National Curriculum over four extended days freeing up Fridays to offer targeted activities.	The Education (School Day and School Year) (England) Regulations 1999

Examination Results

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the local education authorities in the (a) first decile and (b) tenth decile for results at (i) Key Stage 2, (ii) Key Stage 3 and (iii) GCSEs for each year since 1997. [133675]

Mr. Miliband: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Foster Carers

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how the national award scheme for foster carers envisaged in the Green Paper 'Every Child Matters' will be assessed; and what the scheme will award. [133123]

Margaret Hodge: A national award scheme for outstanding foster carers is one of the proposals in the Green Paper, "Every Child Matters" to improve the recruitment and retention of foster carers. The Green Paper is now out for consultation until 1 December 2003 and we look forward to receiving views from the consultation both on the merit of this proposal and how such a scheme might best operate in practice.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what framework regulates private fostering; and what definition he uses of private fostering. [133132]

Margaret Hodge: Private arrangements for fostering children are covered in Part IX of the Children Act 1989, and The Children (Private Arrangements for Fostering) Regulations 1991.

A 'privately fostered child' means a child who is under the age of 16 (or 18 if disabled) who is cared for, and provided with accommodation by, someone other than a parent of his; a person who is not a parent of his but who has parental responsibility for him; or a relative of his. A child is not a privately fostered child if the person caring for and accommodating him has done so for a period of less than 28 days; and does not intend to do so for a longer period.

In practice, children in a variety of different circumstances will fall within this definition.

GNVQ Courses

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his answer of 14 June 2003, Official Report, column 100W, on GCSE/GNVQ point scores, what the uptake was of full-time intermediate GNVQ courses in each year since 1996; and what percentage of pupils achieved (a) 5 A+–C grades at GCSE level and (b) the equivalent GNVQ level in each such year. [133492]

Mr. Miliband: Information on the uptake of full-time intermediate GNVQ courses has been provided by the Labour Force Survey and covers males aged 16–64 and females aged 16–59.

The number of people of working age[1] working towards a GNVQ Intermediate

England, 1996–2003

	GNVQ intermediate	Total people studying towards a qualification
1996	47,335	3,576,776

Finance (Essex)

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when he expects to respond to the request for additional financial resources made on 26 September by the Essex Secondary Headteachers' Association; and if he will make a statement. [134465]

Mr. Miliband: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 22 October 2003, Official Report, column 500W.

Key Stage 2

Jonathan Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will allow local education authorities to renegotiate their targets for key stage two. [134324]

Mr. Miliband: Changes to the Key Stage 2 target setting arrangements were announced in "Excellence and Enjoyment: A strategy for primary schools", published in May 2003. For 2005 onwards, primary schools will set their own targets for the achievement of their 11-year-old pupils in English and mathematics, with local education authorities (LEAs) setting their targets for Key Stage 2 performance afterwards.

The Secretary of State has already approved Key Stage 2 targets for all LEAs for 2004, which form part of their Educational Development Plans. The Department has issued guidance indicating that LEAs may feel it appropriate to review their 2004 Key Stage 2 targets in the light of the changes to the primary school target setting arrangements. We expect this to apply to only a small number of LEAs.

Languages Pathfinders

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many Languages Pathfinders have been established in (a) West Sussex and (b) England so far this year; and if he will make a statement. [133828]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: English for Speakers of Other Languages (ESOL) Pathfinders were established in 10 English regions (and one in the prison service) in September 2002 to run for approximately a year.

There is not an ESOL Pathfinder in West Sussex (there was not a bid from West Sussex). However, there is a Pathfinder in East Sussex and some of its partners have been working with colleagues at the West Sussex Lifelong Learning Partnership. The locations of the 10 Pathfinder partnerships are as follows.

Burnley and Pendle
East London and Lewisham
East Sussex, Thanet and Medway (South East Coast Pathfinder)
Exeter
Liverpool, Blackburn and the Wirral
Norfolk and Buckinghamshire
South Thames
Walsall and Birmingham
West London
West Yorkshire

Mathematics Teachers

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many teachers were in training specialising in mathematics in each of the last five years for which records exist. [134220]

Mr. Miliband: The following table shows the number of entrants to initial teacher training courses in secondary mathematics since 1998/99.

	Postgraduate	Undergraduate	Total
1998/99	928	192	1,120
1999/2000	1,109	198	1,307
2000/01	1,142	147	1,289
2001/02	1,403	150	1,553
2002/03	1,527	146	1,673
2003/04[1]	n/a	n/a	n/a

Ofsted

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many Ofsted inspectors are qualified teacher trainers; and if he will make a statement. [134193]

Mr. Miliband: This is a matter for Ofsted. HM Chief Inspector, David Bell, will write to the hon. Member and place a copy of his letter in the Library.

PFI Projects (Jarvis)

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many PFI school projects operated by Jarvis have been halted because contractors have not been paid for work completed. [133836]

Mr. Miliband: We are not aware that any schools PFI projects involving Jarvis have been halted, for any reason.

PGCE (Foreign Languages)

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many (a) places and (b) entrants for the modern foreign languages Post Graduate Certificate in Education course there were in each year since 1995; and if he will make a statement on the number of teachers trained to teach modern foreign languages at primary school level. [133827]

Mr. Miliband: The table shows the number of entrants to Postgraduate Certificate in Education courses in modern languages and the number of places allocated to institutions in England by the Teacher Training Agency since 1995/96.

	Places	Entrants[1]
1995/96	1,980	1,722
1996/97	2,128	1,673
1997/98	2,239	1,732
1998/99	2,161	1,606
1999/2000	1,986	1,431
2000/01	1,961	1,610
2001/02	2,006	1,689
2002/03	1,929	1,725
2003/04[2]	2,014	n/a

[1] Does not include trainees on the Fast Track scheme and trainees on the Graduate Teacher Programme.

No data are available on the numbers of teachers trained to teach modern languages at primary school level who are currently in service.

Residential Care (Children)

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many children were in residential care in (a) England and (b) the East Riding of Yorkshire in each of the last two years. [134051]

Margaret Hodge: The latest information available on looked after children in residential care in (a) England and (b) the East Riding of Yorkshire is shown in the table.

Number of children in residential care[1] in England and the East Riding of Yorkshire at 31 March 2001 and 2002[2]

	2001	2002
England	8,500	8,600
East Riding of Yorkshire	35	30

[1] Includes secure units, children's homes and hostels, residential schools and other residential settings
[2] All data are rounded—national figures to the nearest 100 and local authority figures to the nearest 5

Rural Schools

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what has been spent since 1997 on projects to increase standards in rural schools. [133695]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Aggregated data on funding to increase standards in rural schools is not collected in the form requested. Funding is focused on improving standards in all schools, irrespective of whether they are based in rural or urban areas.

Specific contributions to rural schools have included some £56 million of funding for rural Excellence Clusters and rural Education Action Zones. Many rural schools are small schools and benefited from the small schools fund which was set up in 2001. The Education Formula Spending system includes a sparsity element to reflect the fact that rural and other sparsely populated areas face extra costs in providing a common standard of service.

School Companies

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what approaches have been made to his Department regarding the establishment of school companies. [133938]

Mr. Miliband: The Department has received many enquiries about school companies from school staff, LEAs and solicitors, and has accepted a number of invitations to address seminars. Information is not collected about the number and nature of specific inquiries.

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the school companies which have been established under the Education Act 2002. [133939]

Mr. Miliband: No notification of the establishment of a school company, as required by Regulation 25 of The School Companies Regulations 2002 and Regulation 17 of The School Companies (Private Finance Initiative Companies) Regulations 2002 has yet been received.

School Funding

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when he will make a statement on the future payment of educational transitional funds to Worcestershire county council. [134585]

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) if he will take measures to compensate Hampshire schools for the loss of grant in 2004–05 and 2005–06; [134670]

(2) what estimate he has made of the potential shortfall of schools' funding settlement for Hampshire for (a) 2004–05 and (b) 2005–06. [134672]

Mr. Miliband: In his statement to the House on 17 July, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State outlined the initial steps he is taking to respond to the practical concerns raised about the present system of funding schools, and promised a further report in the autumn. He expects to make that report shortly.

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the funding increase is (a) in money terms and (b) as a percentage on 2002–03 for Hampshire schools this year, without transitional protection. [134669]

Mr. Miliband: The increase in Education Formula Spending in Hampshire between 2002–03 and 2003–04 was £60.3 million, or 11.6 per cent. This increase includes transfer of Nursery Education and class size grants and funding in respect of the increase in teachers' pension contributions into EFS for 2003–04.

Schools (Earned Autonomy)

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list schools which have applied for earned autonomy under the Education Act 2002, indicating in each case (a) the project covered by the application and (b) the outcome of the application. [133940]

Mr. Miliband: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) on Earned Autonomy on 23 September 2003.

Sector Skills Council Boundaries

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his Answer of 17 September, reference 129985 what plans he has to harmonise reporting of work-based participation and success rates with sector skills council boundaries. [131571]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: This is a matter for the Learning and Skills Council (LSC). Mark Haysom the Council's Chief Executive will write to the hon. Member with the information requested and a copy of his reply will be placed in the Library.

Sixth Forms

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many schools have (a) opened and (b) closed sixth forms since 1997. [133693]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Since 1997 73 new school sixth forms have opened and 26 school sixth forms have closed.

Skills Councils

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills which sector skills councils are (a) licensed, (b) due to be licensed by 31st December and (c) due to be licensed by 30 June 2004. [133422]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: We are making good progress in setting up Sector Skills Councils (SSCs). I expect the network of around 25 SSCs will be in place by summer 2004, as outlined in the recently published White Paper, '21st Century Skills. Realising Our Potential.' Between April and October this year, four SSCs have been awarded full five year licenses to operate. They are e-skills UK covering IT, Telecommunications and Contact Centres; SEMTA covering Science, Engineering and Manufacturing Technologies; ConstructionSkills covering Construction and Skills Active UK covering Active Leisure and Learning. A total of nine are expected to be licensed by the end of this year. Plans are well advanced to licence a further 16 SSCs including the five trailblazer SSCs by summer 2004.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what percentage of the total UK work force will be covered by each proposed sector skills council. [133423]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: There are currently four SSCs that have been awarded full five year licences to operate. Together they cover approximately 20 per cent. of the UK workforce. It is expected that the full network of around 25 Sector Skills Councils (SSCs) will be in place by Summer 2004 as outlined in the recently published White Paper, '21st Century Skills. Realising Our Potential'. This will provide a total coverage of up to 75 per cent. of the workforce. This is expected to rise to 85 per cent. over the next three years as the SSDA continues to work with other sectors to put in place suitable arrangements for engagement with the Skills for Business Network.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills which sector skills council will have a remit for careers advice and guidance services. [133425]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: It is within the remit of each individual Sector Skills Council (SSC) to provide specific careers information for jobs in their sector. The former Employment National Training Organisation (ENTO) currently has stewardship of occupational standards for advice and guidance. No formal decisions have yet been taken on which SSC will represent careers advice and guidance employer interests in the Skills for Business Network.

Specialist Schools

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his answer of 25 June 2003, Official Report, column 783W, on specialist schools, if he will assess, with reference to sports specialist colleges, the finding in the report by Professor David Jesson that small differences of up to plus or minus 2.5 percentage points between predicted and actual levels of performance are not statistically significant. [133415]

Mr. Miliband: In his report, Professor David Jesson found that 'small differences of up to plus or minus 2.5 percentage points between predicted and actual levels of performance are not statistically significant for schools of average size'. This means that differences of less than 2.5 percentage points are within the uncertainty of the predicted level and therefore should not be heeded at a single school level. Uncertainty in statistical estimates generally decreases with the square of the sample size. For example, increasing a sample 100-fold will generally decrease the uncertainty of estimates from that sample by a factor of 10. Given this, when comparing the difference in performance between groups of schools such as Specialist Sports Colleges with non-selective other schools (95 and 2,342 schools respectively), a difference of plus or minus 2.5 percentage points is statistically significant due to the large number of schools involved.

Supply Teachers

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many supply teachers were employed in each year since 1997, and what proportion of those had qualified teacher status, broken down by local education authority. [133692]

Mr. Miliband: The table, which has been placed in the Library, shows occasional teachers in each local education authority in the maintained sector in January of each year and the percentage of those teachers who had qualified teacher status (QTS) in 2003. Data on the percentage of occasional teachers with qualified teacher status is not available for years prior to 2003.

Teacher Costs

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what his Department estimates to be the total average annual salary cost to (a) schools, (b) his Department and (c) local education authorities of (i) a newly qualified teacher, (ii) a teacher with five years experience in teaching and (iii) a teacher nearing retirement in 2002–03. [133668]

Mr. Miliband: For England and Wales, estimated average costs of the specified categories of teachers in England and Wales as at March 2002 (the latest available data) are as follows:

Average salary of full-time qualified regular teachers in the maintained schools sector in England and Wales, March 2002

Teacher group	Average salary[4] (£)	On-costs in 2001–02[5] (%)	Average cost as at March 2002 (£)
(i) Newly qualified teacher[1]	18,100	14.2	20,700
(ii) Teacher with five years service[2]	25,300	14.9	29,100
(iii) Teacher nearing retirement age[3]	32,900	15.5	38,000

[1] Includes all those gaining Qualified Teacher Status in 2001 who were then in full-time regular service in the maintained schools sector in England and Wales at 31 March 2002. Includes those with some previous experience before gaining QTS. Figures rounded to the nearest hundred pounds.
[2] Includes qualified teachers in full-time regular service in the maintained schools sector in England and Wales who had between 5 and 6 years' service in the maintained schools sector at 31 March 2002.
[3] Includes qualified teachers in full-time regular service in the maintained schools sector in England and Wales who were aged between 55 and 60 years at 31 March 2002.
[4] Average salary figures include any allowances paid. Figures are provisional.
[5] On-Costs were calculated using the 2001–02 Secondary Threshold, Lower and Upper Earning Limits and National Insurance Contribution Rates.
Source:
DfES Database of Teacher Records

Schools responsible for their own budgets pay the whole employment cost of their teachers; LEAs pay the salaries of unattached teachers. The Department pays a number of grants which contribute to various teachers' salary costs, but these cannot be separated out in these figures.

Teacher Training

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of students (a) started and (b) completed teacher training courses for each yearly intake between 1995 and 2001. [134191]

Mr. Miliband: Course length data for new entrants is not available for all years and so it is not possible to match completers, entrants to give a meaningful proportion of completers to entrants in each year.

The data which is available is shown as follows:

Table 1: The number of entrants to postgraduate and undergraduate teacher training courses

	Undergraduate	Postgraduate	Total
1995/96	10,820	18,010	28,830
1996/97	10,110	18,920	28,430
1997/98	9,620	18,100	27,720
1998/99	8,790	17,420	26,210
1999/2000	8,510	17,460	25,970
2000/01	8,100	19,620	27,720

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the pass/fail rate was of teacher trainees sitting the (a) basic literacy test and (b) basic numeracy test set by the Teacher Training Agency each year between 1996 and 2002. [134192]

Mr. Miliband: The numeracy skills test was introduced in the summer term of 2000 and the literacy test was introduced for those seeking qualified teacher status (QTS) from 1 May 2001. Of those who sat the tests, the statistics in the following table show the pass rates:

Percentage

	2000/01	2001/02
Numeracy skills test	98	98
Literacy skills test	99	99

Teacher Vacancies

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many vacant teacher posts existed in (a) primary schools, (b) secondary schools and (c) special schools in each year since 1997, broken down by local education authority. [133678]

Mr. Miliband: The teacher vacancies in maintained nursery/primary, secondary and special schools by local education authority in January of each year since 1997 are contained in tables, copies of which have been placed in the Libraries.

Teenage Pregnancies

Jim Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills for what reasons 1998 was used as the baseline year for calculating teenage pregnancy rates since the launch of the teenage pregnancy strategy. [133146]

Margaret Hodge: In 1998, the Social Exclusion Unit (SEU) was asked by the Prime Minister to study the causes of teenage pregnancy and to develop a strategy to reduce the high rates of teenage pregnancy and parenthood in England. Following the publication of the SEU report on Teenage Pregnancy in June 1999, the Teenage Pregnancy Unit was set up in the Department of Health. 1998 was used as the baseline year for calculating teenage pregnancy rates as data for that year were the latest available at the time the Teenage Pregnancy Unit began implementing the Strategy's 30 point action plan in 2000.

Training and Enterprise Council

Paul Holmes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his Answer of 1 September 2003, Official Report, column 774W, on the Training and Enterprise Council, when he intends to publish the consolidated accounts for the Training and Enterprise Councils for 2001; and if he will make a statement. [132858]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Only the TECs who operated Group structures produced consolidated accounts for the period April 2000 to March 2001, copies of these are held by the Department. The Department has only ever provided aggregate TEC/CCTE Income and Expenditure Accounts (for England and Wales). The last set covering 1999–2000 were published and laid in the House on March 2002. Due to reduced resources within the TEC network and the work being undertaken by many of them prior to entering liquidation, there was insufficient information available within the necessary timescale to provide the aggregate Income and Expenditure account for April 00 to March 01.

Truancy

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many children have played truant in each month of the academic year 2002–03 in each local education authority. [133694]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 30 April 2003, Official Report, column 413W.

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what has been spent since 1997 on projects to reduce truancy in schools. [133699]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 30 April 2003, Official Report, column 414W.

HEALTH

Assisted Death

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures are in place to ensure that medical staff do not perform procedures to assist dying; and if he will make a statement. [133201]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Medical treatment which is either omitted or given to a patient with the specific intention of hastening or inducing death, whether at the patient's wish or not, is an illegal act, and is subject to a charge of murder or manslaughter. Assisted suicide is unlawful in the United Kingdom. Anyone alleged to have undertaken it would be open to penalties of up to 14 years' imprisonment under the Suicide Act 1961. As such, there is an obligation on anyone, including health professionals, to report to the police any suspicions that a crime has been committed.

The General Medical Council, The Nursing and Midwifery Council and other UK health care regulatory bodies place a requirement on health professionals to act to identify and minimise risk to patients and clients.

Autism

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research into autism has been supported financially by his Department in the last 18 months; and how much money was allocated in each case. [132584]

Dr. Ladyman [holding answer 20 October 2003]: In February 2001, the Department commissioned the Medical Research Council (MRC) to undertake a detailed review of the epidemiology and causes of autism. The MRCs report, published on 13 December 2001, outlines what scientific research has revealed about the occurrence and causes of autistic spectrum disorders, identifies gaps in knowledge and makes recommendations for the future research strategy on autism for the United Kingdom.

The MRC spent £1.25 million on autism research in 2001–02 and £1.3 million in 2002–03. In February 2002, the Department allocated £2.5 million to the MRC to help it to take forward the recommendations in the report. These funds will complement and add to the MRCs current support for research in this field. Between December 2002 and July 2003, the MRC held a series of seminars and, jointly with the National Autistic Society, the first annual autism research forum, to stimulate further high-quality research proposals from the research community.

This money will be used to further research into autism through the MRC's normal mechanism of a peer reviewed grants system. The MRC is aware that there are a number of research proposals currently being developed in this area, but it takes time to develop high quality research proposals in any area of research.

Cancers

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the number of cancers caused by the emission of carcinogens from petrol and diesel vehicles in the latest year for which information is available; and if he will make a statement. [132839]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 21 October 2003]: The Department has not estimated the number of cancers caused by the emission of carcinogens from petrol and diesel vehicles. The number is expected to be declining as emissions of carcinogens from petrol and diesel vehicles are declining.

Care Homes

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many publicly-funded care home places there were in London in each year since 1997. [133744]

Dr. Ladyman: Information on the number of local authority funded care home places in London is shown in the table for 31 March, 1997 to 2001. Figures for later years have been collected by the National Care Standards Commission, which plans to publish the national data this autumn.

Number of places in local authority care homes at 31 March, 1997 to 2001, London.

Year (31 March)	Number of places
1997	8,170
1998	7,740
1999	6,690
2000	6,350

Department of Health form RA Part A.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 25 September 2003, Official Report, column 1268W, on care homes, what his assessment is of (a) the reasons for the drop in the number of care home places available since 1998, (b) future trends in the numbers of places available and (c) the impact this will have on (i) this sector and (ii) the NHS; and if he will make a statement. [133397]

Dr. Ladyman: There are a variety of reasons for the overall reduction in the number of care home places since 1998.

The decline since 1998 is a continuation of a trend that began in the mid 90s with the implementation of the NHS and Community Care Act 1990. Since then the care home market has been contracting. This trend has been reinforced by increased support for alternative models of care, such as intensive home care packages, introduced since 1997. Local councils are responsible for the commissioning of a range of care options that are made available for older and disabled people, and the availability of care home places, therefore, is a matter for local councils to determine.

The Government believe that people should be given a real choice of care options as far as possible in each locality. While the number of available care home places has decreased since 1998, in the same period there have been 20,900 more households receiving intensive home care, a 34 per cent. increase. Additionally, we are investing in extra care housing in order to offer people greater choice in the future.

Finally, the number of people aged 75 and over delayed awaiting discharge from hospital has reduced from 6,219 in September 1998 to 4,147 in September 2002 and 3,151 in June 2003. The downward trend should continue with the implementation of the Community Care (Delayed Discharges etc) Act (2003).

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 20 October 2003, Official Report, column 453W, on care homes, how many (a) nursing home and (b) residential home places there were in Gloucestershire in (i) 1997 and (ii) the most recent year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [134708]

Dr. Ladyman: The table shows the number of care places in Gloucestershire, as at 31 March 1997 to 31 March 2001. Figures for later years have been collected by the National Care Standards Commission and are not yet available.

Number of places in residential and nursing care homes at 31 March 1997 to2001, Gloucestershire

I understand that Gloucestershire has worked very closely with all stakeholders to maintain the independence of service users. Following independent research by Laing and Buisson, which was joint funded by Gloucestershire county council, the council has made a three year commitment to allocate an additional £1 million per year towards fees over and above inflation. In the current financial year, fees have risen in some cases by 27 per cent.

Cataract Operations

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average unit cost of a cataract operation at each trust within the Thames Valley Strategic Health Authority Area has been in 2003; and what the estimated average unit cost of a cataract operation to be provided by the proposed diagnostic and treatment centre for Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire is. [131398]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer Tuesday 14 October]: The information for the average cost of a cataract operation at each trust within the Thames Valley area for 2003 is not collected centrally.

However, the costs shown in the table represent the national average cost in the national health service for all NHS patients treated as an inpatient or day case. These costs are collected using healthcare resource groups (HRGs), which are groups of treatments that are clinically homogeneous and have similar costs. Therefore, the treatments the HRGs contain are less specific than those listed in the question. The most up to date costs published by the Department are for the financial year 2001–02.

HRG code	HRG label	Average
BO2	Phakoemulsification cataract extractions with lens	971
BO3	Other cataract extraction with lens	740

It is not possible to estimate the average unit cost of a cataract operation to be provided by the proposed diagnostic and treatment centre as this is still under negotiation. However, the primary care trust will only pay the tariff figure for procedures carried out there. Value for money is one of the key concerns for the negotiators.

Corneal Grafts

Lembit Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what targets he has set for UK Transplant to increase the number of corneal grafts available for transplant in the UK; and if he will make a statement; [132510]

(2) how many corneal graft donations there were in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement; [132511]

(3) what measures his Department has taken over the last three years to increase the number of corneal graft donations available for transplant; and if he will make a statement; [132512]

(4) what procedural reforms his Department has initiated over the last three years to increase the number of corneal grafts available for transplant; and if he will make a statement. [132513]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Although no specific targets have been set to increase the number of corneal grafts available for transplant in the United Kingdom, UK Transplant aims to provide sufficient corneas to allow 2,500 grafts per year. The transplant framework, published in July 2003, sets out the key aims for transplantation over the next 10 years and describes good practice, which the national health service, organisations and individuals can use to maximise the benefits of transplantation.

The table shows the number of corneas donated and grafted in each of the last five financial years, from 1 April to 31 March. Not all corneas retrieved are suitable for transplantation. Medical contra-indications and endothelial deficiency account for the majority of corneas that are unable to be used.

	Corneas donated	Corneas grafted
1998–99	3,434	2,262
1999–2000	3,646	2,245
2000–01	3,808	2,264
2001–02	3,280	2,056
2002–03	3,469	2,299

Dental Practice Board

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of the Dental Practice Board. [132641]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Clause 177 of the Health and Social Care (Community Health and Standards) Bill, currently before Parliament, provides for the abolition of the Dental Practice Board (DPB). The DPB will be replaced by a special health authority (SHA), established under section 11 of the 1977 Act by the Secretary of State and the Assembly. The new SHA will be cross-border, undertaking functions in relation to both England and Wales. The assets, liabilities and staff (subject to consultation) of the DPB will be transferred under section 11 powers to the new SHA. The new SHA will undertake monitoring and quality assurance functions in relation to the new primary dental services regime.

The DPB is currently subject to the Lyons review, which is examining the scope for relocation of public sector work from London and the south east. The outcome of the review is expected at the end of November 2003.

Dental Technicians

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what financial resources are allocated from the NHS budget for the recruiting and training of dental technicians during the next three years. [133245]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Local work force development confederations are responsible for commissioning education and training for dental technicians. Their aggregate business plans indicate that nationally they are forecasting to spend £1.5 million in 2003–04, £1.7 million in 2004–05 and £1.8 million in 2005–06 on pre-registration dental technician training. We value highly the contribution that dental technicians make to the dental team and are working with the profession to see how training opportunities might be expanded.

Depression

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many 11 to 17-year-olds are diagnosed as suffering from depression; what proportion of that age group this figure represents; and how many of those diagnosed are being prescribed anti-depressants, broken down by age. [134039]

Dr. Ladyman [holding answer 23 October 2003]: Information is not collected in the form requested. A study undertaken by the Office of National Statistics in 1999 found that 1.8 per cent. of children aged 11 to 15 suffer from depression.

The table shows the estimated number of prescription items of anti-depressants issued in the community for children in 2001 and 2002. Children are defined as 0 to 15-year-olds and those aged 16 to 18-year-olds in full time education. They form approximately one per cent. of the total number of prescriptions issued for anti-depressants.

Estimated number of prescription items of anti-depressant drugs dispensed in the community in England for children in 2001 and 2002

Thousands

	Prescription items

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what research his Department has commissioned into links between the consumption of anti-depressants by young people and the risk of suicide; and if he will make a statement; [134041]

(2) what restrictions there are on the prescription of anti-depressants to under 18s. [134042]

Dr. Ladyman [holding answer 23 October 2003]: No antidepressants are licensed for the treatment of depressive illness in children and adolescents in the United Kingdom. Doctors are able to legally prescribe medicines outside their licensed indications if they consider it is in the best interests of their patient.

On the basis of advice from their independent expert working group on selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors (SSRIs), the Committee on Safety of Medicines (CSM) has issued advice that paroxetine (Seroxat) and venlafaxine (Efexor) should not be used in the treatment of depression in children and adolescents under 18 years. This followed review of clinical trial data which suggested an increased risk of self harm and potentially suicidal behaviour in those treated with paroxetine or venlafaxine, compared with those given placebo.

The safety and efficacy of other SSRIs in children and adolescents is under review by the expert working group. The working group is also providing input to the Europe-wide consideration of the safety of paroxetine, which is being led by the Netherlands and the UK on behalf of the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products.

As part of the review of the safety of SSRIs, the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency has commissioned a study using general practitioner records to investigate whether there is an association between the consumption of antidepressants, including SSRIs, and suicide. This study includes children and adolescents. Interim guidance has been provided to all doctors and pharmacists in the CSM's bulletin, "Current Problems in Pharmacovigilance." The National Institute of Clinical Excellence is in the process of drafting guidelines on the treatment of depression in children and adolescents.

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on (a) the Government's policy on tackling depression in young people and (b) the steps he is taking to raise awareness of depression in young people. [134043]

Dr. Ladyman [holding answer 23 October 2003]: The Department, together with the Welsh Assembly, has asked the National Institute for Clinical Excellence to develop a clinical guideline on the management of depression in children and young people in primary, community and secondary care for use in the National Health Service in England and Wales. The guideline will provide recommendations for good practice that are based on the best available evidence of clinical and cost effectiveness.

The Department has also commissioned the "Mind Out of Mental Health" campaign to work with its partners in the voluntary sector, the media, employers and youth student organisations to raise awareness of mental health problems, as well as combating the stigma and sidcrimination surrounding mental health. They provide advice and information on a range of mental health problems including depression. The "Wired for Health website at www.wiredforhealth.gov.uk/ is another useful source of information.

Diabetes

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to introduce an insulin user's identity card for diabetics; and if he will make a statement. [133092]

Ms Rosie Winterton: There are no plans to introduce identity cards for people with diabetes who use insulin. However, such cards are available from Diabetes UK. We are also aware of companies that offer jewellery, such as bracelets, pendants and watches that can be used for the purpose of conveying medical information.

Essex Ambulance Service

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the names of those people who were considered for the post of Chairman of the Essex Ambulance Service NHS Trust. [132820]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The National Health Service Appointments Commission now has responsibility for all chair and non-executive appointments to NHS boards. The Commission owes a duty of confidentiality to all candidates for appointments. Only the names of successful candidates are published.

Gosport War Memorial Hospital

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from relatives of deceased patients in the Gosport War Memorial Hospital in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [132643]

Ms Rosie Winterton: In the last 12 months, we have received seven letters from relatives of patients who died at Gosport War Memorial Hospital. As the hon. Member is aware, there is an on-going police inquiry into the deaths of patients at the hospital and it would therefore not be appropriate for me to make any further comments.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made towards the target for extra hospital beds in the NHS. [132353]

Mr. Hutton: The latest available statistics for 2002–03 showed that general and acute beds increased by 1,600 to 136,679 over the previous three years. This represents 75 per cent. of the target set out in the NHS Plan.

Inpatient Treatment

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people are waiting for inpatient hospital treatment in the Mid-Essex Hospital Trust area. [132931]

Dr. Ladyman [holding answer 23 October 2003]: The number of patients waiting for elective inpatient admission at Mid Essex Hospital Services National Health Service Trust was 8,120 at 31 August 2003.

Department of Health form KH07.

Local Pharmacy Services Pilots

John Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which services are included in Local Pharmacy Services pilots. [133269]

Ms Rosie Winterton: All local pharmaceutical services (LPS) pilots include the dispensing of some prescriptions. Beyond that, the services provided vary from one pilot to another. Examples of LPS pilot schemes approved to date include provision of pharmaceutical services (including translation service where required) to a local ethnic minority, medication reviews for the elderly, liaison and support in medication taking upon discharge from secondary care, out-of-hours services, access to minor ailment schemes, provision of compliance aids and health promotion and advice, as well as needle exchange, dispensing and supervision of consumption for drug misusers.

John Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many Local Pharmacy Services pilots are running; and which areas they serve. [133270]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The tables show the locations of local pharmaceutical services (LPS) pilots which have commenced. 2002 was the first year of the scheme and there were two waves (1A and 1B) of LPS pilots. A further three pilots were approved and will start in the near future. Three proposals received preliminary approval and full proposals are awaited for these.

Long-term Care

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the comments of the Royal Commission on long-term care of 29 September 2003, with special reference to the Government's policy on means testing personal care; and what plans he has to meet the members of the Royal Commission to discuss the issues which they have raised. [132640]

Dr. Ladyman: The Government have accepted each of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on long-term care except the recommendation to provide free personal care. We stand by that decision.

Our decision has allowed us to invest an additional £1 billion by 2006 towards the care of older people in a variety of ways, including measures to support more older people to continue to live in their homes. If we had implemented the recommendation of the Royal Commission, we would not have been able to provide increased domiciliary care for older people, nor would we have been able to provide additional care home places and alternatives such as extra care housing or additional support for carers.

I have no plans to meet the members of the Royal Commission to discuss the issues they have raised.

Mental Health

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each primary care trust the number of mental health patients. [132220]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Department does not centralise information about the diagnoses given to patients; exact information about the number of people with a mental health problem in each primary care trust is therefore not available.

However, the Office for National Statistics (ONS), which is responsible for compiling, analysing and disseminating information relating to United Kingdom economic, social and demographic statistics, reports that about one in six adults were assessed as having a neurotic disorder in the week before interview. The ONS report, "Psychiatric morbidity among adults living in private households, 2000" is available at www.statistics.gov.uk. It gives an indication of the factors with which variations in the prevalence of mental health problems are associated.

Midwifery

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether independent midwives will be included within the scope of the NHS Litigation Authority; and if he will make a statement. [133329]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The NHS Litigation Authority administers the clinical negligence scheme for trusts. Advice to the national health service in "Health Service Guideline (96)48: NHS Indemnity, Arrangements for Clinical Negligence Claims in the NHS", states that independent midwives are responsible for making their own indemnity arrangements, as are other self-employed health care professionals. A review of NHS indemnity is about to commence and the status of all health care professionals under NHS indemnity will be examined. No decision has been made concerning independent midwives.

NHS Senior Management

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) pursuant to his Answer of 1 September 2003, Official Report, column 948W, on NHS senior management, if he will list the headings of the record fields held in the database of senior leaders compiled by the NHS Appointments Commission; [133609]

(2) pursuant to his Answers given on 1 September 2003, Official Report, column 948W, on NHS senior management and of 6 October 2003, Official Report, column 1345W, whether the NHS Appointments Commission records (a) the service of all chairs and non-executives to the NHS and (b) individuals who resign from the boards of NHS trusts. [133621]

Ms Rosie Winterton: I have asked the Chairman of the National Health Service Appointments Commission to write to the hon. Member on these questions. A copy of his letter will be placed in the Library.

Parliamentary Questions

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the hon. Member for West Worcestershire will receive a response to PQ1035099. [134328]

Ms Rosie Winterton: This letter was transferred to the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. My hon. Friend the Minister for Environment and Agri-Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley) wrote to the hon. Member on Wednesday 22 October.

Patient Deaths

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many and what proportion of patients' deaths occurred within 30 days of surgery in Hull and the East Riding in (a) 2002 and (b) 2003. [132399]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Figures on the number and proportion of patient deaths within 30 days of surgery are compiled by the Commission for Health Improvement (CHI) and included on its website.

Figures for 2002 for Hull and East Yorkshire Hospitals National Health Service Trust are available on the CHI website at http://www.chi.nhs.uk/Ratings/Reports/AcuteTrustDetail.asp?TrustCode=RWA

Data for the calendar year 2003 will not be available until the year is complete and will be published in the 2004 NHS star ratings.

Personal Dental Services Pilots

John Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in which areas Personal Dental Services pilots have been introduced. [133271]

Ms Rosie Winterton: There were 95 personal dental service (PDS) pilots supplying data to the Dental Practice Board at the end of September 2003. The table shows the primary care trusts in which each of them were operating.

Pharmaceutical Products (Embryos)

Jim Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans the Government has to require manufacturers of pharmaceutical products derived from human embryos or foetuses to label their products. [133145]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The statutory labelling particulars are set out in Title V of Council Directive 2001/83/EEC. These apply across all member states of the European Union. The unilateral imposition of additional labelling requirements by the United Kingdom would constitute a breach of EU and international law. To include a statement of the type proposed would therefore require amendment to all EU Directives that regulate labelling and packaging, plus amendments to any international agreements on labelling and packaging.

The Government have no plans to introduce additional labelling requirements.

Post-operative Deaths

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the research undertaken by University College, London, and Columbia University, New York, into the relative death rates between the Queen Alexandra Hospital, Portsmouth, and Mount Sinai Hospital, Manhattan. [129653]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 15 September 2003]: The research study reported that a comparison between two cohorts of patients undergoing major surgery between August 1996 and May 1998 showed 'risk-adjusted' death rates for major surgery in Portsmouth Hospitals that were approximately four times higher than Mount Sinai Hospital in the United States.

Considerable caution should be exercised over these findings. There is insufficient information in the research paper to be sure that the two hospitals (in Portsmouth and New York) are truly comparable in terms of their patient mix. As the researchers acknowledge, conclusions about national differences cannot be properly based on a comparison between just one hospital in each country. Also, the number of critical care beds in the national health service has significantly increased since these patients were studied during 1996–98 and this is likely to mean that the mortality rates for Portsmouth found in the study would not be applicable today. For example, the Commission for Health Improvement 2002 performance ratings for Portsmouth had a 28 day post surgical death rate of 4.5 per cent., for patients admitted as emergencies. However, we recognise that there may be some lessons to be learned from this research, despite its limitations.

Proton Therapy (Clatterbridge Hospital)

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on investment in proton therapy at Clatterbridge hospital. [132279]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The cost of cyclotron equipment was approximately £5 million and originally installed by the Medical Research Council. The facilities to provide proton therapy for eye tumours were funded by the Imperial Cancer Research Fund at a cost of approximately £1 million.

The cyclotron and the proton therapy facility were donated as a charitable gift to the Clatterbridge hospital, part of the Clatterbridge Centre for Oncology National Health Service Trust. The equipment is not subject to capital charges arrangements, with its running costs met through income generated from the treatment of NHS and overseas patients. Income is also generated from the supply of radioactive isotopes to Christie hospital. The cyclotron equipment has also attracted charitable funding, which is used in part to re-develop parts of the equipment and to fund some of the research activities.

Shropshire Central Services (Staffing)

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many staff worked in Central Services for Shropshire County Council in each year since 1997. [132292]

Mr. Raynsford: I have been asked to reply.

The number of staff working in Central Services for Shropshire County Council in each year since 1997 is tabled:

Year	Central Service
1997	[1]
1998	[1]
1999	412
2000	414
2001	418
2003	415

[1] Comparable figures for 1997/98 are not readily available. Significant changes arose at that time because of Local Government re-organisation, when some 35 percentage of the Council's staffing transferred to Telford & Wrekin Council.

Public Interest Disclosure Act

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his Department's obligations under the Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998; how many complaints were made concerning his Department in the last 12 months; and how long it took to resolve each complaint. [132324]

Ms Rosie Winterton [holding answer 16 October 2003]: The Department has no record of any complaints under the Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998.

Strategic Health Authorities

Jonathan Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the Kent and Medway strategic health authority will be required to passport to hospices in Kent all of the £1.5 million funding which he recently announced for palliative care; and if he will instruct the strategic health authority to consult with hospice managers on how that funding should be spent. [134323]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The additional £50 million per annum central budget, the allocation of which was recently announced by my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Health, is for specialist palliative care services in their entirety and not for voluntary hospices alone. The level of funding for hospices, both from local allocation from the additional £50 million and from local resources, is a matter for local discussion and agreement.

All 34 cancer networks were asked to submit their proposed investment plans for the use of their allocation from the £50 million to the National Partnership Group (NPG) for palliative care which is made up of representatives from the voluntary sector (including hospices), the national health service and the Department. The NPG set out clear criteria for the use of the funding, which included evidence of local consultation and partnership working between all stakeholders in deciding how the additional funding should be invested.

Stroke

Mr. Baron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of specialised stroke units are (a) acute care units, (b) rehabilitation stroke units and (c) both acute care and rehabilitation stroke units. [133010]

Dr. Ladyman: The most comprehensive source of information on stroke is the national sentinel stroke audit, carried out by the Royal College of Physicians. 235 hospitals, 95 per cent. of those caring for patients after a stroke in England, Wales and Northern Ireland, took part in the third round of the audit in 2002. The audit shows that 73 per cent. of trusts who participated in the audit had a stroke unit. Of those, 46 per cent. only had rehabilitation stroke beds and three per cent. only had acute stroke beds. The remainder had both rehabilitation and acute stroke beds.

Vehicle Emissions

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the common carcinogens emitted from petrol and diesel vehicles in the UK; and the tonnages of each emitted in the latest available year. [132759]

Mr. Bradshaw: I have been asked to reply.

Emissions from petrol and diesel vehicles are included in the National Atmospheric Emission Inventory. This inventory, available on-line (http://www.naei.org.uk/) compiles air pollutant emissions for the United Kingdom. The air pollutants emitted in 2001 from road transport that are known carcinogens or potential carcinogens are listed below, including the total emission and the percentage of the total UK emission from road transport for each pollutant.

Pollutant	Sector	Emissions in 2001 in Kilotonnes	Proportion of total (percentage)
1,3-Butadiene	Road Transport—Petrol	2.33	52
	Road Transport—Diesel	1.15	26
	Total (All sources)	4.48	—
Benzene	Road Transport—Petrol	5.31	34
	Road Transport—Diesel	0.22	1
	Total (All sources)	15.39	—
Dioxins & Furans	Road Transport—Petrol	3.79	1.1
	Road Transport—Diesel	J0.42	0.1
	(Total (All sources)	[1]341.28	—
16 Polycyclic Aromatic Hydrocarbons[2]	Road Transport—Petrol	0.02	1
	Road Transport—Diesel	1.10	52
	Total (All sources)	2.10	—

[1] Total excludes natural fires and vehicle fires)

[2] Polycyclic Aromatic Hydrocarbons (PAHs) are a large group of chemical compounds with a similar structure, although individual PAHs differ in their capacity to damage human cells. This data provides emissions of the 16 PAHs commonly found in ambient air. They include emissions of benzo[a]pyrene, benz[a]anthracene and dibenz[a]janthracene, which are the three potent animal carcinogens that are classified as 'probably carcinogenic to humans'.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Contracts (Bechtel)

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list contracts for consultancy or work carried out by Bechtel in each year since 1997 stating in each case (a) the nature of the work, (b) the value of the contract and (c) the duration of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [133898]

Yvette Cooper: Since the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister was established in May 2002, there have been no contracts with Bechtel.

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he will reply to the letter to him dated 15 September from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton, with regard to Sylvia Mason. [133840]

Yvette Cooper: I replied to the right hon. Member on 20 October.

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when the hon. Member for West Worcestershire will receive a response to his letter to the Minister of State for Local and Regional Government of 22 September. [134329]

Phil Hope: I replied to the hon. Member on 22 October.

Council Housing Stock

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the total impact on employment in local housing authorities has been where transfers of all or part of the housing stock have taken place. [133773]

Keith Hill: The information requested is not held centrally and could only be provided at disproportionate cost. Large Scale Voluntary Transfer (LSVT) Staff Impacts and Implications Research Report suggests there is no evidence of job losses, rather that some local authorities need to recruit new staff to undertake their strategic housing role post transfer. However, where a local authority transfers all or part of its housing and the local authority considers the sale amounts to a transfer of undertaking, the authority and the new landlord would have to have regard to the Transfer of Undertakings (Protections of Employment) Regulations 1981 (as amended).

Councillors (Tenure)

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister pursuant to the Answer of 20 October 2003, Official Report, column 403W on councillors (tenure), whether this change will be enacted by primary legislation. [134724]

Mr. Raynsford: The Local Government Act 2003 allows my right. hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister, by order, to move the date of local government and Greater London Authority elections in 2004 so that they can be held on the same day as the European Parliamentary election, making voting more convenient for voters. The Government will shortly be consulting on the Statutory Instruments which give effect to the Government's stated policy as set out in my previous reply.

Electoral Registration Departments

Chris Ruane: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list the budgets allocated to electoral registration departments by each local authority (a) in total and (b) per head of population in descending order according to the amount spent per head of population. [133047]

Keith Hill: The latest figures for English local authorities are available in the Library of the House.

Energy Performance

Gregory Barker: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he plans to set requirements for entire renovated buildings over 1,000 sq m as proposed under Article 6 of Directive 2002/91 on the Energy Performance of Buildings. [134545]

Phil Hope: Article 6 indicates that, when buildings with floor areas over 1000 square meters undergo major renovation, "the requirements may be set either for the renovated building as a whole or for the renovated systems or components when these are part of a renovation to be carried out in a limited time period". The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister shall decide on which of these options to pursue during the course of the review of the Building Regulations announced in the Energy White Paper earlier this year.

Equity Loans Scheme

Tim Loughton: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many social workers will benefit from interest-free mortgages under the equity loans scheme announced by his Department. [134835]

Keith Hill: The balance of products taken up by individual key worker groups will depend on the severity of recruitment and retention problems in their sector, the level of employer contribution and the personal circumstances of individual key workers. Full details of the operation of the scheme will be announced by the beginning of March.

Ex-firefighters (Pensions)

Mr. McWalter: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many ex-firefighters are being paid a pension because of early retirement through ill health; and what monitoring systems are in place to ensure that the ill health is not transient. [134547]

Mr. Raynsford: The information concerning the number of ex-firefighters being paid ill-health pensions is not held centrally, and could only be provided at disproportionate cost as individual Fire Authorities administer the Firefighters' Pension Scheme. Fire Authorities have discretion to review the payment of ill-health pensions to determine whether they should remain in payment for so long as firefighters are below the age at which they could or should have retired with ordinary pensions. The Office of theDeputy Prime Minister has recommended Fire Authorities to carry out regular reviews.

Homeless Households

Bob Spink: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he will publish a summary of information being collected from local authorities on the (a) type and (b) sex of members of homeless households in bed and breakfast accommodation as at 31 March. [133862]

Yvette Cooper: Specific information about the household type and gender of homeless applicants, and those in various forms of temporary accommodation such as bed and breakfast, is included in an annual return supplied by local authorities, using the classifications as follows:

Couples with dependent children
Lone parent—female applicant
Lone parent—male applicant
Single person—female applicant
Single person—male applicant
All other household types

No information is collected about individual household members.

Final responses to the return are still being received. Data are currently being validated and provisional analyses are expected to be available before the end of the year.

Housing

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what financial allocations have been made to each of the housing renewal pathfinders in England; and if he will make a statement. [134402]

Keith Hill: All of the nine pathfinder areas have been allocated £2.66 million for preparation of a strategic scheme and where considered by the pathfinder appropriate some early projects.

Birmingham Sandwell, East Lancashire, Oldham Rochdale, Merseyside, NewcastleGateshead, North Staffordshire, and South Yorkshire have been allocated £4 million to begin action on the ground ahead of scheme agreement.

Manchester Salford is the first pathfinder to complete and agree their strategic scheme. They have been awarded £125 million over the next two and a half years to implement its scheme.

Further funding for other pathfinders will be negotiated on completion of their scheme.

Local Elections

Dr. Pugh: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister for what percentage of the electorate in the North West Region all ward memberships will be up for election at the local elections scheduled for June 2004. [134280]

Mr. Raynsford: Approximately 80 per cent. of the electorate in the North West Region will be voting at the elections for local government in 2004.

Dr. Pugh: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many councils in the North West Region have elections of all members scheduled for June 2004. [134281]

Mr. Raynsford: There are 18 local authorities that are due to have whole council elections in 2004.

Local Government (Compensation Claims)

Simon Hughes: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how much compensation has been paid in claims against local government in London in each of the last six years. [135160]

Mr. Raynsford: The information requested is not held centrally and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Local Government Finance

David Wright: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister which local authorities in England and Wales were affected by the floors and ceilings in the local government settlement for 2003–04; and how much grant each one gained or lost. [132547]

Mr. Raynsford: All authorities in England were affected by the floors and ceilings in the local government settlement for 2003–04.

In order to pay for the cost of the floor authorities are subject to a ceiling. However because the money raised from ceiling authorities does not entirely pay for the cost of the floor, middle authorities (i.e. those not subject to either the floor or the ceiling) are subject to a scaling factor on any increase above the floor. The amount raised from both middle and ceiling authorities equals the amount needed for floor authorities.

A table showing the actual benefit from cost to authorities of the floors and ceilings in the local government settlement for 2003–04 is available in the Library of the House.

Public Services (Co-payments)

Angela Eagle: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to introduce co-payments for the public services for which he is responsible. [102201]

Mr. Raynsford: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister aims to deliver high quality public services in the most cost-effective way. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister currently has PFI projects that deliver investment in affordable housing, fire stations and joint service centres. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will continue to consider PPPs and PFIs where they minimise financial risk and maximise benefit to the public.

Regional Assemblies

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will include maps showing options for the proposed new local government areas with the postal ballot papers to be sent out in the referendums on regional assemblies. [134590]

Mr. Raynsford: Once decisions have been taken about the options that are to be subject to local government referendums, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will consider how best to present those options to the electorate. As required by section 3(7) of the Regional Assemblies (Preparations) Act, we will consult the Electoral Commission about the text of the options to be inserted in the question appearing on the ballot paper and any explanatory material, including maps, that is to be made available to voters at the time that they vote.

Revenue Support Grant

Mr. Spring: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list the revenue support grant per head for 2003–04 in each English county council. [134408]

Mr. Raynsford: A table showing revenue support grant per head is available in the Library of the House.

Please note that the original mid-2001 population estimates have been used as these formed the basis of the calculations. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will in due course be making an Amending Report for 2003–04 which will take into account the revised mid-2001 population estimates.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what discussions he has had with Suffolk county council regarding the revenue support grant settlement in the past 12 months. [134409]

Mr. Raynsfordr My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has not had formal discussions with Suffolk county council within the last 12 months about the Local Government Finance Settlement.

Surveys/Questionnaires

Tim Loughton: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister (1) which local authorities have sent out surveys to their residents as a requirement by his Department in the last 12 months; and on what issues; [134815]

(2) how many people in England have received questionnaires from local authorities as a requirement by his Department within the last 12 months; and at what cost. [134816]

Mr. Raynsford: It is important that all service providers have a clear understanding of the views of their users. Local authorities have for many years sought the views of residents on the quality and delivery of local services using a variety of different methods.

Since 2000–01, authorities have been required to conduct a survey following a common methodology and containing a fixed set of questions. However, there is scope for authorities to include some questions on specific local issues. The surveys are run at three yearly intervals, the second full round is being run during 2003–04.The surveys provide authorities with a ready means to obtain the views of local people. By adopting a common methodology and common questions a national picture can be obtained on the issues of most concern to local people.

The surveys measure the level of satisfaction with the general services provided by an authority and provide the opportunity for feedback about local community issues. In addition, specific questions are asked about residents' views on the benefits, planning, libraries and housing services.

In order to ensure that the results of the surveys are statistically valid, authorities are required to ensure that a minimum sample level is achieved.

As the surveys are conducted by local authorities, either in-house or through an external commission, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister does not have figures for the cost of the 2000–01 survey. However, as part of the information that is being collected on the operation of the 2003–04 survey, authorities have been asked to provide details of the cost of carrying out their survey. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister have also taken steps to reduce local authority costs by setting up a dedicated website which, amongst other things, avoids the need for authorities to produce their own population sample database. It also provides guidance and templates for running the survey and carries a list of frequently asked questions.

Tenant Management

Ian Lucas: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many tenant management organisations have been wound up in the last three years for which figures are available. [133979]

Keith Hill: In England there are currently in the region of 250 tenant management organisations managing around 80,000 council dwellings. To the knowledge of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister three have been wound up or have ceased to operate in the last three years. As a Welsh Member my hon. Friend will be aware that in Wales the responsibility for tenant participation and tenant management policy rests with the Welsh Assembly.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Asylum Seekers

14. Jeremy Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, how many asylum seekers are held in detention under immigration law. [134171]

Beverley Hughes: As at 28 June, the most recent date of which published figures are available, there were a total of 1,690 individuals detained solely under Immigration Act powers. Of these, 1,355 were asylum seekers.

17. Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what change there was in the number of asylum applications between October 2002 and September 2003. [134174]

Beverley Hughes: In June 2003, the most recent month for which published figures are available, there were 3,610 asylum applications, 59 per cent. lower than the 8,770 in October 2002[1]. Figures for July-September have not yet been finalised but we are confident that we will meet our commitment to halve intake in September 2003 compared with last October.

[1] All figures exclude dependants.

Special Constables

21. Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many special constables there were in each of the last three years. [134178]

Ms Blears: The latest police service strength figures for the year ending 31 March 2003 were published on 1 October 2003 in Home Office Statistical bulletin 11/03. The number of Special Constables in England and Wales was 11,037. The equivalent figures for 2002 and 2001 were 11,598 and 12,722 respectively.

Border Controls (Northern France)

22. Laura Moffatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he will make a statement on the development of UK border controls in Northern France. [134179]

Beverley Hughes: The introduction of UK Border Controls in northern France should be viewed in the context of a wider package of measures, developed in close co-operation with the French government, aimed at reducing illegal immigration. The closure of Sangatte, for example, which 67,000 people passed through in the last three years, has also had a major impact, reducing illegal immigration into the UK and ensuring that fewer potential illegal immigrants are drawn to Northern France.

In this context we are pleased with the further steps we are taking, in co-operation with the French, in extending UK Border Controls in France. Such controls have proved effective in the past in relation to rail routes, stopping many illegal immigrants before they reach the UK. Since August 2002 we have had UK immigration officers in Calais acting in an advisory capacity to the Police Aux Frontieres, and in February we agreed a treaty which will enable these officers to exercise their full powers at Calais and Dunkerque. This treaty will be implemented shortly. Boulogne will follow when services to the UK begin in spring next year.

In addition to juxtaposed border controls we are also loaning UK personnel-detection technology to Calais port. As a result the port now has the capacity to screen 100 per cent. of freight traffic embarking to the UK. We intend to roll out similar technology to other UK-serving ports in northern France in the New Year.

Anti-social Behaviour

23. Mr. Challen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he will make a statement on the role of local communities in tackling antisocial behaviour. [134180]

Ms Blears: Local communities have a critical role. The Anti-Social Behaviour Plan places communities at the heart of its agenda. It seeks to shift the culture from one where people accept anti-social behaviour to one where communities are helped and supported to seek and uphold standards. Part of our work to support communities includes tackling those barriers which prevent victims and witnesses from coming forward.

Communities should also hold local agencies to account for the way they address anti-social behaviour and how they use the wide range of interventions available.

24. Mr. Tony Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, what anti-social behaviour measures his Department will introduce to tackle the problem of abandoned cars. [134181]

Ms Blears: In our Anti-Social Behaviour Action Plan, launched on 14 October, we announced that we will establish trailblazers to tackle abandoned cars in London and Liverpool, in partnership with the Association of London Government and Liverpool city council respectively. From October 2004 these projects will ensure that all vehicles confirmed as untaxed or abandoned will be removed within 72 hours of reporting. This work will be shared with communities across the country.

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the cost of (a) producing and distributing the tackling anti-social behaviour action plan booklet and (b) related promotional costs for this initiative, including employment costs. [132580]

Ms Blears: An estimate of £11,000 has been made for the production and distribution of the action plan booklet including design, printing and delivery and distribution. A total of £135,000 has been spent on the launch event and associated launch materials. This includes costs of support from the Central Office of Information (COI). Civil servants from the Home Office press office, marketing department and Anti-social Behaviour Unit produced the Action Plan and organised the event as part of their daily duties.

Crime Detection

25. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his Department's role in assisting the police to improve detection of crime. [134182]

Ms Blears: Latest figures show that the number of detections rose in the last year, and that the detection rate remains stable. We are working with the police to improve rates. For example:

we are helping the police to exploit the advances in Science and Technology;

we have record police numbers—136,386 officers in England and Wales at the end of August 2003; with the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO), we are promoting intelligence-led policing. The National Intelligence Model is being implemented in all forces across England and Wales, and the National Policing Plan requires National Intelligence Model (NIM) to be implemented in all forces by April 2004.

Asbestos

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much has been spent by his Department and its agencies on (a) asbestos surveys and (b) the management and removal of asbestos since 1 January 2001; and what budget is available to (i) commission asbestos surveys and (ii) manage and remove asbestos from buildings in (A) 2003 and (B) 2004. [130919]

Fiona Mactaggart: No central records are kept on the costs and budgets for asbestos surveys or the management and removal of asbestos. This information could be obtained only at disproportionate costs. However, we can more readily provide information on the costs that the Prison Service have incurred in undertaking asbestos surveys and the necessary remedial work.

Since July 2001, the Prison Service has spent £1.85 million to manage their asbestos strategy, which has included undertaking surveys to identify the location and condition of asbestos on the prison estate and establish the risks. Since May 2002, the Prison Service has spent a further £1.7 million on remedial work on managing and removing asbestos where this was identified as being necessary by the surveys. In addition, asbestos will have been removed as part of various works projects to refurbish, demolish or upgrade existing accommodation. These costs would have been recorded in the relevant individual capital schemes and could be extracted only at a disproportionate cost. The Prison Service has a further £300,000 allocated for additional remedial work for the remainder of this financial year.

Asylum and Immigration (Publicly Funded Work)

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the results of the consultation paper, Proposed Changes to Publicly Funded Immigration and Asylum Work will be published. [133850]

Mr. Lammy: I have been asked to reply.

We received over 260 responses to the consultation paper. These have now been collated and analysed. The Constitutional Affairs Select Committee has also undertaken an inquiry into our proposals and is due to report shortly. We will be considering their report along with all other responses before any final decisions on future policy are made.

Bechtel

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the contracts for consultancy and other work carried out by Bechtel in each year since 1997 stating in each case (a) the nature of the work, (b) the value of the contract and (c) the duration of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [132594]

Fiona Mactaggart [holding answer 20 October 2003]: The available information held by the Home Office on contracts for consultancy and other work shows that the Home Office has not had any contractual agreements with Bechtel from 1997 to the present time.

Charity Commission

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to the Answer of 4 July 2003, Official Report, column 549W, on the Charity Commission, when the Charity Commission will write to the hon. Member for Aylesbury; and if he will make a statement on the reasons for the delay. [130716]

Fiona Mactaggart [holding answer 16 September 2003]: This is a matter for the Charity Commission as the Government Department responsible for the regulation of charities in England and Wales. The Director of Operations wrote to the hon. Member on 5 August and a further copy of this letter will be sent to him and placed in the Library.

Community Support Officers

Mr. Bryant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he will make a statement on the recruitment of community support officers. [134175]

Ms Blears: Last year 27 police forces made successful bids for a share of the £19.5 million fund which enabled them to recruit, train and deploy 1,222 Community Support Officers (CSOs). This year £41 million was made available to continue paying for these and to recruit a further 1,234 CSOs. We are on course to reach the target of 4,000 CSOs by the end of 2005–06.

Recruitment standards are set by individual forces but there is comprehensive Association of Chief Police Officers, (ACPO) guidance available to assist them.

Correspondence

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the reasons were for the delay in transferring the letter of 3 July, on behalf of Mr. R. A. Forde, from the hon. Member for Christchurch to the Department for Constitutional Affairs. [133536]

Caroline Flint: The letter was received in the Home Office on 8 July 2003. The delay in transferring the letter to the Department of Constitutional Affairs was principally due to officials wrongly identifying the appropriate Department to which the case should be transferred. Additional delays were caused by a failure to obtain a swift response from the other Departments when they were invited to accept the correspondence.

I am determined to see an improvement in the Home Office's performance in this respect. Officials are now reviewing the department's systems to prevent this sort of unacceptable delay from recurring. More widely, the Home Office is working with other departments so that robust protocols are in place for dealing with the effective and timely transfer of correspondence.

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will reply to the letter to him dated 11 September from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton, with regard to Mr. Muhammad Rafique. [133838]

Mr. Blunkett: I wrote to my right hon. Friend on 23 October 2003.

Criminal Records Bureau

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 1 September 2003, Official Report, column 974W, on criminal records checks, how many representations he has received; and from what organisations. [130657]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 17 September 2003]: We have received written representations from 32 bodies in the voluntary and community sector, about the increase in fees charged by the Criminal Records Bureau.

Representations have been received from the following:

Adele House

'Castel Froma' Royal Midland Counties Home for Disabled

Catholic Children's Society

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 3 June 2003, Official Report, columns 141–42W, on Criminal Records Bureau unit costs, what the agency's latest estimate of unit costs in 2003–04 is. [131049]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 18 September 2003]: Based on the projections in the Criminal Records Bureau's Corporate and Business Plans 2003–04, the individual unit costs are estimated as:

Standard Paper Application	25.00
Standard Telephone Application	20.00
Enhanced Paper Application	31.00
Enhanced Telephone Application	26.00
Basic Disclosure	n/a

Standard and Enhanced Disclosures are issued free of charge to volunteers.

Dog Thefts

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many instances of the theft of pet dogs have been recorded in each of the last five years (a) in England and Wales and (b) in each police authority area. [132837]

Ms Blears [holding answer 21 October 2003]: The requested information is not collected centrally.

Extradition

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what level of evidence is required for an extradition order to be granted to extradite an individual (a) to the USA from the UK and (b) from the UK to the USA; and what plans he has to change such requirements. [132775]

Caroline Flint: Extradition relations between the UK and the United States of America are currently governed by the 1976 bilateral treaty (as amended in 1986). The present treaty requires that if the request relates to an accusation case (that is a case where the person has not been convicted) it must be accompanied by:

> "A warrant of arrest issued by a judge, magistrate or other competent authority in the territory of the requesting Party and by such evidence as, according to the law of the requested Party, would justify his committal for trial if the offence had been committed in the territory of the requested Party, including evidence that the person requested is the person to whom the warrant of arrest refers".

On 31 March 2003, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and the US Attorney General, John Ashcroft, signed a revised bilateral extradition treaty, which we hope to bring into effect shortly. Article 8 of the Treaty provides that the evidential requirements in an accusation case are as follows:

(a) a copy of the warrant or order of arrest issued by a judge or other competent authority;

(b) a copy of the charging document, if any; and

(c) for requests to the United States, such information as would provide a reasonable basis to believe that the person sought committed the offence for which extradition is requested.

Firearms Offences

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many offences were committed in which (a) a firearm and (b) a replica firearm was used in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement; [133830]

(2) how many crimes involving firearms were recorded in each police force area in 2002–03. [133968]

Caroline Flint: Final figures for firearms offences for 2002–03 will be published in January. While a provisional overall total for England and Wales for recorded crimes involving firearms other than air weapons was published on 16 October, the individual data are still subject to further checking, and so further details are not yet available.

The numbers of recorded crimes involving firearms in England and Wales over the last 10 years are as follows:

	Firearms excluding air weapons	Air weapons
1992	7,243	6,098
1993	7,730	6,337
1994	6,002	7,165
1995	5,866	7,568
1996	6,063	7,813
1997	4,904	7,506
1997–98	4,903	7,902
1998–99	5,209	8,665
1999–2000	6,843	10,103
2001–02	9,974	12,340

It should be noted that there was a change in counting rules for recorded crime on 1 April 1998, which tended to increase the number of crimes recorded. Also, some police forces implemented the principles of the National Crime Recording Standard in advance of its national implementation on 1 April 2002, and this will also have tended to increase the number of crimes recorded.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the level of gun crime is in the United Kingdom. [133996]

Caroline Flint: Provisional figures released on 16 October show that the total number of firearms offences in England and Wales in 2002–03 (excluding those involving air weapons) was around 10,250. This represents a 3 per cent. increase from 2001–02. The increase in the preceding year was 35 per cent. In 2002–03 the number of fatal injuries from firearms went down to 80, from 95 in 2001–02.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on gun crime in the United Kingdom. [133997]

Caroline Flint: Although the incidence of firearms offences is low compared to recorded crime as a whole, too many people are still being killed and injured by firearms. This is unacceptable.

We are taking forward a programme to tackle gun crime on a number of fronts. This includes:

tackling the links to drug supply and crime through initiatives such as the Criminal Justice Interventions Programme and the National Crack Plan;

reducing the supply and availability of firearms;

effective police operations to drive down firearm offences;

tough laws and effective enforcement;

engaging the worst affected communities to address the underlying gun culture.

The firearms amnesty during April this year resulted in 44,000 guns and over a million rounds of ammunition being handed in. This included 5,700 handguns, the weapons most often used in gun crime, and 795 other prohibited weapons.

The Criminal Justice Bill includes proposals for a five-year minimum sentence for anybody convicted of illegally possessing, selling or manufacturing prohibited firearms.

This will send a clear message that we will not tolerate the illegal proliferation of guns within our society.

Gun Trade

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he is taking to prevent the illegal trade in guns. [134002]

Caroline Flint: We are taking forward a programme to tackle gun crime on a number of fronts. This includes:

tackling the links to drug supply and crime through initiatives such as the Criminal Justice Interventions Programme and the National Crack Plan;

reducing the supply and availability of firearms;

effective police operations to drive down firearm offences;

tough laws and effective enforcement;

engaging the worst affected communities to address the underlying gun culture.

The firearms amnesty during April this year resulted in 44,000 guns and over a million rounds of ammunition being handed in. This included 5,700 handguns, the weapons most often used in gun crime, and 795 other prohibited weapons.

This will send a clear message that we will not tolerate the illegal proliferation of guns within our society.

Gwent Police Authority

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received a recommendation from Gwent Police Authority to issue a certificate of forfeiture for all or part of the pension of an employee whose name has been communicated to him. [132679]

Ms Blears: Our records, which go back to 1987, show that the Secretary of State for the Home Department has received one application for a certificate of forfeiture of pension from Gwent Police Authority.

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many investigations an employee of Gwent Police whose name has been communicated to him has been the subject of; and what the investigations related to. [132680]

Ms Blears: Based on previous questions tabled by my hon. Friend, and assuming I have understood your question correctly, Gwent Police informs me that there were five separate investigations regarding a former officer whose name has been communicated to the Secretary of State for the Home Department:

three of those investigations concerned the officer's role as the disciplining authority and the oversight of complaints' investigations; and two concerned the officer's role as the disciplining authority and the oversight of discipline investigations.

None of these investigations revealed any matters that required further action.

Iraq

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the timescale for the secondment of the police personnel to Iraq; how many have been recruited to date; and what the costs of the programme are. [133160]

Caroline Flint: A pool of 200 volunteers from the police service of England and Wales has been created to assist in the reform of the Iraqi Police Service. The pool is intended to sustain the deployment of up to 100 police officers at any one time. I have agreed to a request from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Jack Straw) to the deployment of 75 of those officers before the end of the year to a secure training facility in Jordan for the purpose of training Iraqi police recruits.

A further 24 officers are about to undergo training with a view to possible deployment to Basra, when the Regional Police Training Academy is ready to receive them. Officers will only be deployed to Iraq when we are satisfied that the security conditions are right. The security position will be reviewed regularly. The advice of the two secondees from the Association of Chief Police Officers presently serving in Iraq will inform any decision on the timing of a deployment.

The full costs of the programme, which will be c. £10 million per financial year, will be met from the joint Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO), the Department for International Development (DFID), and the Ministry of Defence (MOD), Global Conflict Prevention Pool. This includes reimbursing to police forces the full costs of training, equipping and deploying police officers.

Jamaican Prisoners

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of women prisoners are (a) Jamaican nationals and (b) Jamaican nationals convicted of drug-trafficking offences in each of the last five years. [132317]

Paul Goggins: The information on the percentage of women prisoners who are (a) Jamaican nationals and (b) Jamaican nationals convicted of drug-trafficking offences in each of the last five years is provided in the following table.

Population in Prison Service establishments in England and Wales—as at 30 June each year

	Percentage of female prisoners who are:
	Jamaican nationals	Jamaican nationals convicted of drug-trafficking offences[1]
1998	4.4	3.1
1999	5.3	4.0
2001	8.9	6.8
2002	11.5	9.9

[1] Drug-trafficking offences are defined here as unlawful import/export, possession with intent to supply and unlawful supply.

National Criminal Intelligence Service

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for how many staff at the National Criminal Intelligence Service have monitoring of allegations of bribery of foreign public officials is specifically as part of their job description; what percentage of time they are recommended as part of their job description to give such monitoring; and in which department of NCIS they are based. [132370]

Ms Blears: The National Criminal Intelligence Service has one member of staff who acts as the point of contact for allegations of bribery of foreign public officials. This role is included in the individual's job description although no recommended time is allocated to fulfil the role. These arrangements have been sufficient to discharge properly the responsibilities involved. The individual is a member of the International Division of the National Criminal Intelligence Service.

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many allegations of corruption the National Criminal Intelligence Service has received since (a) 14 February 2002 and (b) January 2003 following the Memorandum of Understanding on Implementing Part 12 of the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001; how many of these allegations have resulted in investigations; and whether any charges have been brought or arrests made under Part 12 of the Act. [132371]

Ms Blears: The National Criminal Intelligence Service has logged the following notifications of corruption:

(a) Four in total since 14 February 2002.

(b) Two since January 2003.

One allegation has been forwarded for investigation. No charges have been made.

Police Forces (DNA Samples Retention)

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, what assessment his Department has made of the extent to which the extension of powers for police forces to retain DNA samples of suspects could (a) help prevent miscarriages of justice and (b) increase detection rates. [134177]

Caroline Flint: Proposals in the Criminal Justice Bill to allow the police to take and retain DNA from persons arrested for a recordable offence will help contribute to the prevention of miscarriages of justice by eliminating suspects from police inquiries at an early stage of an investigation.

It is estimated that in the first year of implementation using current National DNA Database statistics and police performance rates, there will be nearly 2,000 additional detections as a result of these proposed changes.

Prisons

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether it is his policy that the Prison Service should promote the procurement of British food; what guidance he has issued to the prison service about food procurement; and if he will make a statement; [129363]

(2) how much the Prison Service spent on food in (a) 2001–02 and (b) 2002–03; how much food was wasted in each year; and if he will make a statement. [129365]

Paul Goggins: The Prison Service procures food using contracts awarded in accordance with European Union (EU) procurement regulations, taking account of quality of product, cost and availability. The EU regulations are designed to support fair and open competition, allowing British suppliers to compete for business with other members of the Community.

The Prison Service is working with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on the Sustainable Food Procurement Initiative, which is part of the Government's Strategy for Sustainable Farming and Food. This is intended to encourage the public sector to procure food in a manner that promotes sustainable development and does not discriminate against local and UK suppliers. As part of this, the Prison Service has developed an action plan that will be used to measure progress towards meeting the initiative's objectives.

The Prison Service spent £40,155,638 on food in 2001–02 and £42,357,666 in 2002–03. We have no estimate for the amount of food wasted in 2001–02, but the indicative figures for the current year suggest that waste is currently about 8 per cent.

Professional Footballers

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice he has issued to chief constables on invoking legislation relating to assault, violent behaviour and anti-social behaviour involving professional footballers during football matches; and if he will make a statement. [132833]

Ms Blears [holding answer 20 October 2003]: Individuals playing in football matches and other sports events are subject to the same laws and police powers as other citizens. Following consultation with the football authorities and other agencies, the Association of Chief Police Officers has issued guidance on the involvement of the police on the field of play. That guidance makes clear that while match officials are responsible for dealing with incidents on the pitch, the police retain the right to intervene should it be necessary in the interests of safety or the maintenance of public order. Incidents which may lead to the involvement of the police include violent or abusive behaviour directed to other persons on the playing surface and words or behaviour by players or club officials which are likely to inflame spectators. A decision on whether to intervene, or charge any individual for an offence committed, during a football match is an operational matter for the local police force concerned.

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department under what powers professional footballers may be charged for offences of assault, violent behaviour and anti-social behaviour during a football match. [132834]

Ms Blears [holding answer 20 October 2003]: Individuals playing in football matches and other sports events are subject to the same laws and police powers as other citizens. Following consultation with the football authorities and other agencies, the Association of Chief Police Officers has issued guidance on the involvement of the police on the field of play. That guidance makes clear that while match officials are responsible for dealing with incidents on the pitch, the police retain the right to intervene should it be necessary in the interests of safety or the maintenance of public order.

Remand Prisoners

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 23 June 2003, Official Report, column 603W, on remand prisoners, (1) how many (a) unconvicted and (b) convicted unsentenced prisoners have been held in prison for more than 24 months in each of the last five years; [131768]

(2) what assessment he has made of the reasons for the recent change in the number of prisoners held on remand for more than 24 months. [131651]

Paul Goggins: I refer the hon. Member to my letter of 16 October 2003.

Victim Support

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, what progress has been made in taking forward the recommendations on recruiting volunteers to provide support to victims in high crime areas made in the Committee of Public Accounts' 17th report of 2002–03 'Helping Victims and witnesses: the work of Victim Support'. [134176]

Paul Goggins: The Home Office is actively considering the recommendations made both in the National Audit Office Report 'Helping victims and witnesses: the work of Victim Support', and in the 17th report of the Committee of Public Accounts. Regular meetings are held between Victim Support and the Home Office to address these issues, including looking at how to increase the number of volunteers in higher crime areas. We are considering ways to establish stronger links with minority ethnic and inner city community based organisations, making more effective use of paid staff and more imaginative approaches to volunteering, such as linking volunteering to accredited educational programmes.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Belfast Regeneration Office

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what approach will be taken to applications for Belfast Regeneration Office Action Plan funding which were solicited by the Belfast Regeneration Office and subsequently prepared by other agencies. [133030]

Mr. Spellar: The future of the Belfast Regeneration Office Action Plan has been under consideration by Government.

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the draft strategy for Belfast Regeneration Office. [133031]

Mr. Spellar: The Belfast Regeneration Office (BRO) consulted widely on its draft strategy document between April 2002 and July 2002. The key issues to emerge from this consultation are relevant to the implementing of the Neighbourhood Renewal Strategy, "People and Place" in Belfast.

Child Care

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many residential child care places there are in each Northern Ireland parliamentary constituency. [132791]

Angela Smith: The number of residential child care places in children's homes in each Northern Ireland parliamentary constituency at 31 March 2003, the latest date for which information is available, is shown in the following table.

Number of residential child care places, by parliamentary constituency, 31 March 2003

Crime (Belfast)

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the clear-up rate is for crime in each (a) ward and (b) district council unit in Belfast in each of the last three years. [133239]

Jane Kennedy: The table below sets out the clear up rate for each of the District Command Units within Belfast in each of the last three years. Statistics in respect of clear up rates per ward are not readily available and the provision of such information would be disproportionate to the cost.

2000–01

	Recorded crime	Crimes cleared	Clearance rate (percentage)
East Belfast	6,950	1,623	23.4
North Belfast	10,029	2,245	22.4
South Belfast	14,664	3,288	22.4
West Belfast	7,254	1,810	25.0

2001–02

	Recorded crime	Crimes cleared	Clearance rate (percentage)
East Belfast	7,164	1,240	17.3
North Belfast	12,605	1,265	10.0
South Belfast	18,191	2,399	13.2
West Belfast	6,511	1,191	18.3

2002–03

	Recorded crime	Crimes cleared	Clearance rate (percentage)
East Belfast	8,429	1,395	16.6
North Belfast	12,137	1,899	15.6
South Belfast	18,389	2,917	15.9
West Belfast	6,346	1,253	19.7

Crime (Racism)

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of crimes committed in Northern Ireland in each year since 1997 were racially motivated; what steps he is taking to reduce these figures; and if he will make a statement. [133189]

Mr. Paul Murphy: It is not possible to provide statistics in the precise format requested. However, the table sets out the number of racial incidents reported to, and the total number of crimes recorded by, the police in Northern Ireland since 1997.

This Government condemns all racially motivated crimes and is committed to tackling such intolerance. Later this year I hope to publish a proposal for a draft Order in Council to enable the courts to deal more severely with crimes motivated by racist, sectarian, and homophobic hatred.

This measure will send out a clear message that racism has no place in our society.

Number of racial incidents reported and total number of crimes recorded in Northern Ireland, 1997–2002/03

	Number of racial incidents reported	Number of recorded crimes
1997	25	62,222
1998–99	93	109,053
1999–2000	237	119,111
2000–01	260	119,912

Disability Rights Task Force

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many of the recommendations of the Disability Rights Task Force have been implemented in Northern Ireland and how many are still outstanding; and if he will list the recommendations in each case. [133238]

Mr. Spellar: It will not be possible to collate the information requested by the hon. Gentleman within the accepted timescale. I will write as soon as possible and place a copy of that letter in the Library.

E-commerce

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Northern Ireland-based businesses he estimates trade using e-commerce website technology. [133868]

Mr. Pearson: It is estimated that 21 per cent. of businesses in Northern Ireland are trading online.

Source:
October 2002 DTI Annual Benchmarking Study, October 2002)

In response to the e-commerce needs of client companies, Invest Northern Ireland has developed a portfolio of support solutions to assist clients with the adoption of e-business technologies, both advisory and financial.

Fire Escapes

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what building regulations relating to fire escapes apply to (a) dwellings and (b) offices with three or more floors in Northern Ireland; [132089]

(2) what requirements relating to fire escape equipment are placed upon property developers building multi-floored (a) dwellings and (b) offices in Northern Ireland. [132090]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Building Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2000 came into operation on 1 April 2001 and, with certain exemption, they apply to new buildings and existing buildings being altered or undergoing a material change of use, As such, they apply to dwellings and offices with three or more floors.

The regulations impose mandatory requirements and Part E of the regulations relates to fire safety. Regulation E2 (c) (Means of escape) requires that a building must be so designed and constructed that in the event of a fire there is adequate means of escape, which can be safely and effectively used at all material times.

In addition Regulation 5 of the Fire Precautions (Workplace) Regulations (NI) 2001 sets out the conditions to which employers must ensure emergency routes and exits in the workplace comply and the Fire Services (Northern Ireland) Order 1984 stipulates that District Councils should consult with the Fire Authority before approval is granted for certain planning applications.

Fort George (Derry)

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make it his policy that the purchase of Fort George in Derry from the integrated development fund does not detract from the overall investment available for Derry. [133006]

Mr. Pearson: As announced, at the launch of Ilex Urban Regeneration Company on 9 October 2003, the Department for Social Development and the Londonderry Port and Harbour Commission have reached agreement, in principle, on the purchase of Fort George and the case has been sent for urgent economic appraisal.

This investment, if confirmed, will be a call on the Integrated Development Fund (IDF). Any further calls on IDF will be assessed on a merit basis in line with the principles of IDF and the overall resources available, and must be fully supported by accompanying business case and appraisal. The purpose of the Integrated Development Fund is to provide additional support to strong wide-ranging partnerships initially in a small number of areas, one of which is the north west. This will enable the production and implementation of agreed comprehensive plans to develop and rejuvenate the area and communities in an integrated way.

I can confirm that the Fund's role is to remove blockages where there are no resources available from any other sources and it is not intended to be a replacement or substitute for existing mainstream funding which is in place or planned for Derry.

GM Crop Trials

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent discussions he has had with ministers in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on holding GM crop trials in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [134828]

Angela Smith: There have been no discussions with Ministers in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on holding crop trials in Northern Ireland.

Individual Learning Accounts

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the organisation of (a) revised individual learning accounts and (b) career development loans in Northern Ireland. [132787]

Jane Kennedy: The information is as follows:

Individual learning accounts

You will be aware that provision was not made in the Northern Ireland budget for a replacement ILA scheme in the 2003–04 financial year. The development work on a replacement individual learning account (ILA) scheme will be taken account of in the light of the Review of Further Education and the development of the Skills Strategy. Consequently, the provision of adult learning in Northern Ireland will be reviewed in line with the recommendations contained in both documents. Despite the much-publicised difficulties with individual learning accounts, the approach proved popular and successful with learners and, for this reason, I anticipate that the model will be considered alongside other funding support mechanisms in the review of adult learning.

Career development loans

Work to date has indicated that the scale of potential demand in Northern Ireland for Career Development Loans Scheme renders a separate local arrangement unviable. Representatives from the Department have been in liaison with their counterparts in Great Britain to ascertain how we can work together to determine how Career Development Loans can be introduced into Northern Ireland. Great Britain has embarked upon a major review of adult learning that includes Career Development Loans. In light of this, I have asked the Department to keep abreast of developments, and await the outcome of the major review work prior to embarking on detailed plans to extend the GB scheme here.

Integrated Development Fund

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the progress of plans for the Integrated Development Fund announced in March 2003 and on the quality of engagement with local key bodies and individuals; whether there will be technical support provided by the Departments; and whether there are safeguards to ensure that the fund is treated as additional rather than mainstream spending. [133008]

Mr. Pearson: The purpose of the Integrated Development Fund (IDF) is to provide additional support to strong wide-ranging partnerships initially in a small number of areas. On 12 August 2003, I formally invited bids from the Integrated Development Fund in the context of integrated development plans for the North West, West Belfast and Greater Shankill and the South Down fishing villages.

I can confirm that all the key local partner organisations have been engaging positively in each of the three areas to progress the development of integrated plans and identify the resources which may be required to support the plans.

Relevant Government Departments, in their role as active partner organisations, are involved in providing the necessary information and support, and helping to ensure that plans are consistent with existing Government strategies.

I have made clear that the monies available to the Fund are additional and intended to be used to remove particular blockages where there is compelling evidence that there are no resources available from any other sources, including Departments' own spending plans, for the purpose. The removal of such blockages should be seen to enable the full implementation of plans to go forward. The Fund is not intended to be a replacement or substitute for existing mainstream funding.

International Bodies

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the total cost of (a) the British-Irish Intergovernmental Conference, (b) the British-Irish Council and (c) the North-South Implementation Bodies has been since April 1998. [132095]

Mr. Paul Murphy: A breakdown of the costs in each year since December 1999, when these bodies were established, is set out as follows:

(a) The information requested by the hon. Member for Strangford on the total cost of the British-Irish Intergovernmental Conferences since 1999 can be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The expenditure of the British-Irish Intergovernmental Secretariat is met by the two governments and the cost to the British Government since 2 December 1999 is as follows:

1999–2000	[1]232
2000–01	488
2001–02	554
2002–03	539
2003–04	[2]287

[2] Provisional figure (April to September 2003).

(b) Each member of the British-Irish Council is responsible for the costs of its participation. The British and Irish Governments provide the secretariat for the Council, in co-ordination with officials of each of the other members, and bear the costs between them. It is, therefore, not possible to provide the total cost of the Council since its inception in December 1999.

(c) I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 7 July 2003, Official Report, column 596W.

North/South Ministerial Council

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the total cost has been since April 1998 of the North/South Ministerial Council. [132093]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The information requested in respect of the North/South Ministerial Council is set out in the table.

Period	Total cost
December 1999 to December 2000	1,027,000
January 2001 to December 2001	2,025,000
January 2002 to December 2002	1,525,790

The first meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council took place in December 1999. Financial information for the calendar year 2003 is not yet available.

Pension Credits

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the take-up rate for pension credits is in each Northern Ireland parliamentary constituency. [132792]

Mr. Spellar: Take-up refers to the percentage of those eligible who are actually claiming pension credit. As the number eligible for pension credit is not known, the take-up rate is also unknown. The numbers currently receiving pension credit and the numbers of people of pensionable age are shown in the table.

Parliamentary Constituency	Number of Pension Credit Claimants	Number of Persons aged 60 and over (Census 2001 data)
Unallocated	426
Belfast East	3,742	19,076
Belfast North	5,848	18,745
Belfast South	3,194	16,989
Belfast West	5,867	13,725

West Tyrone	4,779	13,481
Northern Ireland	76,877	296,912

Police Service Training College

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what funding has been made available for the new Police Service of Northern Ireland training college; what progress has been made in identifying a site for the college; and if he will make a statement. [134821]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The project for the provision of a new police college is of key importance and has the Government's full commitment to see the project through to completion.

The project is being progressed by the Police College Project Board (chaired by the PSNI and with representatives from the NIO and Policing Board) and an Outline Business Case was recently approved by Treasury, allowing the project to proceed to procurement stage.

The procurement is to take the form of a Public Private Partnership (PPP), wherein the successful developer will incur all of the costs associated with the design, build and maintenance of the premises in return for an annual fee over the lifespan of the facility. Consultants have been appointed to project manage the scheme, for which full funding has been provided.

In relation to the site of the new college, the PSNI and the Policing Board have carried out an exercise to identify a suitable site for the location of the facility and this process is due to reach a conclusion shortly. Provision for funding has been made for the purchase of the site.

Public Disorder

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many public disorder incidents there were in the Cluan Place/Short Strand area from 1 June to 30 September in (a) 2003 and (b) 2002; and what (i) police man hours and (ii) the number of arrests were during the two periods. [132950]

Jane Kennedy: The table below lists the statistics requested in relation to Cluan Place/Short Strand for the years 2002 and 2003.

Year	Incidents	Arrest	Man Hours
2002	673	42	57,280
2003	141	5	14,373

School Pupil Statistics

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many pupils have been (a) identified as persistent non-attendees, (b) suspended and (c) expelled from school in each of the last five years, broken down by education and library board. [133879]

Jane Kennedy: Information on the number of pupils who have been referred because of poor attendance or suspension has be collected, on an agreed basis, from the education and library boards since 2000–01. Data for 2002–03 school year are not available yet and the following table is based on returns provided for the relevant school years.

	BELB	NEELB	SEELB	SELB	WELB

Skills Shortages

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) enrolments and (b) graduations there were in each of the last three years in Northern Ireland further education colleges in (i) construction, (ii) computing, (iii) software engineering, (iv) electronics, (v) manufacturing engineering and (vi) hospitality, tourism and catering. [132795]

Jane Kennedy: The following tables show a breakdown of the requested statistics. The tables are independent of each other. The enrolment data relates to all students within each academic year. The achievement information is for students who gained their qualifications in the courses which they studied over one/two/three year's duration and took their examinations in the years detailed.

Tuesday 28 October 2003

SCOTLAND

Electronics Industry

6. David Cairns: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, recent discussions he has had with ministers in the Scottish Executive concerning the future of the Scottish electronics industry. [133811]

Mr. Darling: I have regular contact with Scottish Executive Ministers to discuss a wide range of issues affecting the Scottish economy.

Pension Rights

7. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, what discussions he has had with the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department for Work and Pensions about assistance for workers in Scotland whose companies are in receivership and whose pension rights might be jeopardised. [133813]

Mrs. McGuire: My right hon. Friend and I have regular discussions with ministerial colleagues on a variety of issues of relevance to Scotland.

On 11 June, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions announced government proposals to introduce a range of measures on occupational pensions. In insolvency cases, the Pension Protection Fund will guarantee pension scheme members a specified minimum level of pension. The Government will also introduce a full buy-out provision for solvent companies who decide to wind up their schemes.

Pension Credit

8. Mr. Savidge: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, if he will make a statement on the uptake of pension credit in Scotland. [133814]

10. Rosemary McKenna: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the take-up of pension credit in Scotland. [133816]

Mrs. McGuire: My right hon. Friend launched the Pension Credit in Scotland on 3 October. Around 201,000 pension credit awards have been made to pensioner households in Scotland, benefiting approximately 235,000 individuals.

We are making every endeavour to ensure that all those eligible for Pension Credit take up their entitlement.

9. Jim Sheridan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he is taking to promote pension credit uptake in Scotland. [133815]

Mrs. McGuire: My right hon. Friend launched the pension credit in Scotland on 3 October 2003.

The Pension Service will have written to every pensioner household by June 2004 to tell them about pension credit and help them decide whether to apply. To support this process, the Government are running a major TV and press advertising campaign.

Air Traffic Control

11. Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on proposed changes to the air traffic control infrastructure in Scotland. [133817]

Mr. Darling: I was pleased to be at Prestwick to welcome the recent announcement by National Air Traffic Services that they are to re-start works on the new Prestwick centre in the near future. Their two-centre strategy, based on Swanwick and Prestwick, will ensure that the UK continues to have one of the most modern, efficient and safe air traffic systems in the world.

Motoring Taxation

12. Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he proposes to meet (a) the Treasury and (b) the Scottish Executive to discuss motoring taxation as it affects Scotland. [133818]

Mrs. McGuire: My right hon. Friend and I have regular discussions with both the Treasury and the Scottish Executive about a variety of issues affecting Scotland.

Carlisle Airport

13. Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with public sector bodies in Dumfries and Galloway about Carlisle airport and a possible financial contribution by them towards the airport's costs. [133819]

Mrs. McGuire: The Scotland Office has not taken part in any such discussions. Responsibility for economic development in Dumfries and Galloway rests with Scottish Ministers.

I understand that Scottish Enterprise Dumfries and Galloway are involved with the North West Development Agency in looking at the issues surrounding the financing of airport and route development at Carlisle.

Asylum Seekers (Dungavel)

14. Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the Home Office about the continued use of Dungavel for the detention of asylum seekers' children. [133820]

Mrs. McGuire: I have regular discussions with Home Office Ministers on asylum issues, including the operation of Dungavel Immigration Removal Centre. I most recently visited Dungavel on 20 October 2003 and was impressed by the high quality of the facilities for the children there and the conscientious and caring attitude of the staff.

Post Offices (Banking Services)

John Thurso: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has held with (a) the Royal Bank of Scotland, (b) Halifax Bank of Scotland and (c) Clydesdale Bank concerning the provision of banking services in the Post Office; and if he will make a statement. [133526]

Mrs. McGuire: No recent discussions have taken place between Scottish banks and the Scotland Office on this subject. Scotland Office Ministers have taken a specific interest in the provision of banking services in Scotland and have also had discussions with Post Office Ltd. in relation to this.

Discussions are on-going between the Post Office and the banks to improve the level of services currently offered.

Water Industry

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met members of the Scottish Executive to discuss employment in the water industry in Scotland. [134003]

Mrs. McGuire: Scotland Office Ministers have discussions from time to time with members of the Scottish Executive across a wide range of issues affecting Scotland. Management of the water industry is a devolved matter.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

Aviation

37. David Taylor: To ask the Leader of the House what plans he has to bring forward proposals for pre-legislative scrutiny of a draft bill on aviation. [134533]

Mr. Woolas: My hon. Friend will be aware that I cannot reveal the Government's future legislative plans or pre-empt the contents of the Queen's Speech.

Information Technology

38. Kevin Brennan: To ask the Leader of the House what proposals he will put before the Select Committee on the Modernisation of the House of Commons on the use of information technology in Standing Committees. [134534]

Mr. Woolas: My right hon. Friend is conscious of the benefits which information technology can bring to Members serving on Standing Committees, as in other aspects of our work, but has no immediate plans to put proposals to the Modernisation Committee on this subject.

Pre-legislative Scrutiny

39. Vera Baird: To ask the Leader of the House what criteria he proposes for selecting draft legislation to be subject to pre-legislative scrutiny. [134535]

Mr. Woolas: My right hon. Friend's wish is that bills should be published in draft for pre-legislative scrutiny whenever time and the preparedness of the bill permits, as long as this is consistent with the overall interests of the legislative programme.

Conservative Party Funding

Norman Baker: To ask the Leader of the House how much he estimates will be paid to the Conservative Party out of public funds in the year 2003–04. [135097]

Mr. Hain: Short Money is allocated under three headings: general funding, travel expenses and the costs of the office of the Leader of the Opposition. The amounts available in the first two categories are determined by a formula based on the number of votes cast and the number of seats won in the last general election. The amounts available in 2003–04 for general funding and the office of the Leader of the Opposition are £2,935,041 and £548,102 respectively. Full travel expenses have yet to be claimed.

Cranborne Money is the House of Lords equivalent of Short Money. It must be used by the Official Opposition exclusively in relation to their parliamentary business. The amount available to the Official Opposition in the House of Lords for the 2003–04 financial year is £402,662.

In addition, section 12 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 established a policy development grant, which is a grant to a represented registered political party which meets the qualifying conditions to assist the party with the development of policies for inclusion in any manifesto. The total fund for 2003–04 is £2 million, the amount stipulated in the legislation, of which the Conservative Party will be paid £438,603[1]. The fund is administered by the Electoral Commission.

[1]Source:
Electoral Commission.

Official Transport

Norman Baker: To ask the Leader of the House if he will list the transport arrangements for which payment is made out of public funds to (a) the Prime Minister, (b) the Leader of the Conservative Party and (c) the Leader of the Liberal Democrats in their respective capacities; and what payments were made in each case in 2002–03. [135096]

Mr. Alexander: I have been asked to reply.

The travel arrangements for Ministers are set out in Travel by Ministers, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. The Leader of the Official Opposition is provided with a car for official duties associated with that office. The leader of the Liberal Democrats is not provided with an official car. For details of costs, I refer the hon. Member to the answer provided to the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart), on 3 March 2003, Official Report, column 783W.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Archbishop of Canterbury

Norman Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what proportion and how much of the total costs of the visit by the Archbishop of Canterbury to Rome in the first week of October were paid by the Church Commissioners; and of that sum, what proportion and how much relates to the cost for staff members, excluding the Archbishop, his wife and chaplain. [134346]

Mr. Bell: The total cost met by the Commissioners from within an annual budget set aside for the Archbishop for overseas travel was £2,100.

Of this amount, £227 (11 per cent. of the total) related to the cost for staff members.

Other members of the party and supporters were paid for by their respective offices or travelled at their own expense.

Church of England

Norman Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, how much the Church of England has contributed since 1 June 2002 towards the costs of (a) the Anglican Commission, (b) the Anglican Consultative Council and (c) the Anglican Consultative Centre in Rome. [134345]

Mr. Bell: The Anglican Communion (not Commission) comprises 38 self-governing Anglican churches, including the Church of England. Each church is responsible for its own costs.

The member churches of the provinces of the Anglican Communion meet 85 per cent. of the Anglican Consultative Council's core budget income and the Church of England's contribution is provided by parishes via the Archbishops' Council. I understand from the Council that the current amount paid is £359,700 a year, which would amount to some £509,000 from 1 June 2002 to the present.

The Anglican Centre in Rome is financed by fundraising and is not a responsibility of the Church Commissioners. However, the Archbishop made a contribution of £2,500 from his discretionary funds in 2002.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Criminal Justice Boards

23. Mr. Allen: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what steps the Lord Chancellor is taking to involve hon. Members in the work of local criminal justice boards. [134518]

Mr. Leslie: Local Criminal Justice Boards are newly formed partnership comprising key stakeholders including the Police, the Crown Prosecution Service, Probation and the Courts. As executive boards focused on improving the local criminal justice system, they need the ability to meet in private to discuss sensitive policy matters. However, it is possible for there to be more regular consultative discussions with hon. Members in particular, and for non-sensitive minutes of meetings to be published.

Legal Services (Consumer Choice)

24. Ross Cranston: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what recent progress the Lord Chancellor has made in increasing consumer choice in legal services. [134519]

Mr. Lammy: The Government have commissioned an independent review of the regulation of legal services aimed at promoting competition and innovation and improving services for consumers and we are reviewing future demand for legal services and the suppliers needed particularly in the publicly funded sector. We have already decided to open up the probate market to new providers, which should enable consumers to benefit from better and more cost effective services.

Stipendiary Magistrates

26. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs how many stipendiary magistrates there are in England and Wales; and what the figure was in 1995. [134521]

Mr. Leslie: Stipendiary magistrates are now known as "District Judges (Magistrates' Courts)", and there are currently 108 in England and Wales, including the Senior and Deputy Senior District Judges. At the end of 1995, 92 full-time stipendiaries were in post.

House of Lords

27. Ian Lucas: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs if the Secretary of State will bring forward proposals for an indirectly elected second chamber for the UK Parliament. [134523]

Mr. Leslie: As I announced to the House on 18 September, the Government proposes to introduce legislation, when parliamentary time allows, to put the House of Lords on a stable basis for the medium term. We are consulting on the details of our proposals and recognise that there is more to be done on Lords Reform after the removal of the remaining hereditary peerages.

Financial Penalties

29. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what progress has been made in (a) improving the payment rate for financial penalties imposed by the courts and (b) implementing the recommendations made by the Committee of Public Accounts in its 68th Report, Session 2001–02, on the collection of fines and other financial penalties in the criminal justice systems. [134525]

Mr. Leslie: Sustained improvement in the fine payment rate is a key priority, and to deliver that my Department has established a wide-ranging programme of change to implement my 7-point action plan and to address the recommendations of the Public Accounts Committee. Furthermore I have now set a revised target for 2003–04 which gives a clearer focus to those involved in enforcement.

Land Registry

30. Jim Knight: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what progress has been made with putting the Land Registry on-line. [134526]

Mr. Lammy: Land Registry's key information services are already available online. The Department is also progressively enabling customers to make land registration transactions electronically, the culmination of which will be the introduction of a full electronic conveyancing system in England and Wales from 2006.

Legal Aid

31. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what plans the Lord Chancellor has to amend the workings of the legal aid system. [134527]

Mr. Lammy: The Government has a clear responsibility to ensure that we achieve value for money from the legal aid system. It seeks to achieve this through active monitoring and a programme of work which includes a major review of the demand, supply and purchasing arrangements for legal services, which will report in December.

Community Legal Service

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what assessment the Lord Chancellor has made of the effectiveness of community legal service partnerships in promoting increased access to legal advice and assistance. [134520]

Mr. Lammy: Since the launch of the CLS in April 2000 more than 200 Community Legal Service Partnerships have been set up, covering more than 99 per cent. of the population of England and Wales. These partnerships have been effective in identifying priority areas of unmet need for legal and advice services in their locality. The extent to which these Partnerships have been effective in getting advice to the right people at the right time will be folly examined by the Independent Review of the CLS, which is due to report in April 2004.

Judges' Lodgings

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs if he will make a statement on the judges' lodgings system. [134524]

Mr. Leslie: As I confirmed to the hon. Member in my written answer of 6 October 2003, it is our policy intention to introduce further efficiencies, particularly on rationalisation of Lodgings' ownership. I still hope to be in a position to make a more detailed statement later this year.

TRANSPORT

Imports

Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage by volume of the goods imported into the United Kingdom in the latest available financial year were transported by (a) sea, (b) rail and (c) air. [133901]

Dr. Howells: In 2002[1], the estimated shares of goods (tonnes lifted) imported into the United Kingdom were as follows:

[1] Information is not available on a financial year basis.

	Percentage
Sea	95
Rail[1]	4
Air	Less than 1 per cent.

[1] Goods transported through the Channel Tunnel on through trains or on the freight shuttle.

Aviation Fuel

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking in (a) European and (b) international forums to promote a common approach to imposing tax on aviation fuel. [133959]

Mr. McNulty: This matter was last raised internationally at the ICAO 33rd Assembly in 2001, when the overwhelming majority of States spoke out against the introduction of a tax on aviation fuel. Analysis by the European Commission has also suggested that an EU-wide tax would deliver minimal environmental benefit. However, the Government remain committed to finding alternative ways of applying the 'polluter pays' concept to civil aviation. Information is contained in the joint HM Treasury/ Department for Transport discussion document "Aviation and the Environment: Using Economic Instruments", published in March 2003.

Bus Services

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what conclusions he has reached following his review of fuel duty rebate for operators of bus services. [134266]

Mr. McNulty: The Chancellor's Budget statement in April 2003 announced that the review of bus subsidies would be continuing in the context of the review of the 10-year transport plan. This is being taken forward in line with Spending Review 2004 and is expected to conclude next summer.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to his answer of 16 June 2003, Official Report, column 26W, on transport policies, what measures he has taken to disseminate good practice in the bus sector to (a) individual authorities, (b) bus companies, (c) regulators and (d) professional and trade bodies, including trade unions, listing the (i) cost, (ii) means of dissemination and (iii) what assessment has been made in each case; and if he will make a statement. [133985]

Mr. McNulty: The Department takes many measures to disseminate good practice in the bus sector, both alone and in partnership with other stakeholders. It is not possible to allocate costs and benefits in the form set out in the question.

For example, the Department has published:

(a) good practice guidance on Quality Bus Partnerships, aimed at both local authorities and operators (2001); and

(b) "Get on Board: an Agenda for Improving Personal Security in Bus Travel" (April 2002), including guidance and best practice case studies on measures that can be taken by bus companies and local authorities concerning crime and anti-social behaviour in bus travel.

The Bus Partnership Forum, which I chair, brings together senior representatives from the bus industry, central and local government and has produced:

(a) a report on Understanding Customer Needs, of value to both operators and local authorities;

(b) a code of conduct on Service Stability to encourage local authorities and operators to agree to limit timetable changes to specific dates; and

(c) an information pack, "Bus Priority: The Way Ahead", to help local authorities get the most out of bus priority measures.

The Government have established the Safer Travel on Buses and Coaches Panel (STOP), bringing together bus operators, local authorities, police, unions, and other stakeholders to exchange and disseminate best practice in tackling problems caused by crime and anti-social behaviour around bus and coach travel.

The Department will shortly be publishing three further good practice guides:

(a) "Rural Bus Service Provision", drawing on experience with Rural Bus Grant and the Rural Bus Challenge, and aimed at local authority officers and elected Members, transport operators and other local interest groups;

(b) guidance on local authority procurement of local bus services, replacing existing guidance published in 1999, and aimed chiefly at local authorities; and

(c) protecting bus and coach crews, updating the 1995 booklet which advises bus drivers and crews, operators and local authorities on measures they can take to reduce the incidence and fear of crime and anti-social behaviour in bus travel.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what measures he has taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to promote the use of quality bus corridors; and if he will make a statement; [133986]

(2) if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies involved in quality bus corridors, listing the (i) number of passengers carried (A) before and (B) after implementation, (ii) number of services run and (iii) length of the schemes involved; and if he will make a statement; [133987]

(3) what specific measures have been taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to enter into a quality bus partnership; and if he will make a statement; [134024]

(4) if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies which have entered into a quality bus partnership; how many passengers have been carried; how many services have been run; and if he will make a statement. [134025]

Mr. McNulty: The Department provides funding to local authorities for bus priority measures such as quality bus corridors which, in 2002–03, put in place almost 900 kilometres of improved bus routes.

The Department has published Good Practice Guidance on Quality Bus Partnerships and has facilitated their provision on a statutory basis through powers in the Transport Act 2000, making them enforceable by traffic commissioners. Many such partnerships comprise one or more bus corridor improvements.

The Bus Partnership Forum has published an information pack, "Bus Priority: The Way Ahead", to help local authorities get the most out of bus priority measures including bus corridors.

Research shows that quality partnership schemes typically increase bus patronage by between 5 per cent. and 20 per cent. within the first 12 months of operation. These schemes also contribute towards modal shift, with surveys showing that around 33 per cent. of new users had previously undertaken their journey by car.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what measures have been taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to simplify fare structures on buses to a flat-rate for all inner-city single journeys; and if he will make a statement; [133988]

(2) if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies that have simplified their fare structure on buses to a flat-rate for all inner-city single journeys, listing (i) the number of passengers carried (A) before and (B) after implementation and (ii) the number of services run; and if he will make a statement. [133989]

Mr. McNulty: The setting of bus fares in a deregulated market is a matter of commercial decision for bus operators. The appropriateness of a flat-rate fare system (with concessions for those statutorily entitled to them) will depend on the size of the urban area concerned and on travel patterns within it. Many operators are simplifying their fare structures in the light of evidence that this is what customers prefer.

The Department's booklet, "Protecting Bus and Coach Crews", advises that simplifying fare structures can reduce the scope for disputes between passengers and drivers. This booklet is currently being revised by the Safer Travel on Buses and Coaches Panel (STOP).

In April 2002, the Department published "Get on Board: an Agenda for Improving Personal Security in Bus Travel", including advice to operators and local authorities on using fare structures to reduce the scope for conflict between drivers and passengers.

The Government do not collect data on flat-rate fare schemes.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what measures have been taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to create integrated bus/rail links; and if he will make a statement; [134015]

(2) if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies which have created integrated bus/rail links; how many passengers were carried on the bus services

(i) before and (ii) after implementation; how many bus services have been run; and if he will make a statement. [134016]

Mr. McNulty: The Department's Local Transport Plan (LTP) funding provides local authorities with the resources from which they can develop bus/rail interchange facilities. The LTP guidance highlights the benefits of developing seamless travel conditions at interchange points where rail and bus services can dovetail to enable fully integrated journeys.

The West Yorkshire Passenger Transport Authority which has Centre of Excellence status, has, for example, developed a network of modern bus interchanges in the major urban centres of the county many of which provide bus/rail links. These have the latest designs which have resulted in significant improvements in user satisfaction, and increases in passenger throughputs. They are also developing a significant number of bus/rail interchange facilities at smaller rail stations.

The statistical information requested here is not available.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies operate a hail-and-ride system, broken down by (i) number of passengers carried, (ii) length of schemes and (iii) number of services run; and if he will make a statement. [134021]

Mr. McNulty: Hail-and-ride has been in common use for many years outside main urban centres. Registration documents lodged with the Traffic Commissioners record the stopping arrangements for services, including whether they are wholly or partly operated on a hail-and-ride basis, but the statistical information requested here is not available.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what measures have been taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to operate a buy before boarding ticket system; and if he will make a statement; [134026]

(2) if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies which operate a buy before boarding ticket system, providing details of (i) the number of passengers carried (A) 12 months before and (B) after implementation and (ii) the number of services run; and if he will make a statement. [134027]

Mr. McNulty: Information about where bus tickets are sold is not held centrally. This is essentially a matter for local decision. Multi-journey tickets, particularly weekly and monthly travelcards and carnets, are commonly sold off the vehicle.

The Department's booklet "Protecting Bus and Coach Crews" advises that the use of pre-paid tickets reduces the scope for disputes between passengers and drivers and the risk of theft created by carrying large amounts of cash on the bus. This booklet is currently being revised by the Safer Travel on Buses and Coaches Panel (STOP).

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what measures have been taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to offer combined ticketing for bus, rail and taxi journeys; and if he will make a statement; [134028]

(2) if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies that offer combined tickets for bus, rail and taxi journeys; how many (i) passengers use the joint service and (ii) services run; and if he will make a statement. [134029]

Mr. McNulty: The Transport Act 2000 empowers local authorities to make ticketing schemes covering local bus services which may include travel on connecting rail or tram services. Operators themselves may agree inter-available tickets within the terms of the Public Transport Ticketing Schemes Block Exemption Order. This Order covers journeys by bus, rail, tram or ferry.

The "Plus-bus" scheme run by "Journey Solutions" and funded by transport operators, provides an add-on bus option to rail tickets at either or both ends of a train journey. Plus-bus is currently available at 135 stations across the rail network, and is being rolled out to every major town and city in Great Britain.

Various other combined ticketing schemes are available, particularly in major conurbations. Their terms and conditions vary from time to time and it would not be practical for central Government to collect data on them, or the number of passengers using them.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies which provide a route from rural train stations to towns not served by rail; and how many (i) passengers are carried and (ii) services there were; and if he will make a statement; [134030]

(2) what measures have been taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to implement hub-and-spoke rural bus systems; and if he will make a statement; [134036]

(3) if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies which operate hub-and-spoke rural bus systems; how many (i) passengers were carried and (ii) services were run (A) 12 months before and (B) after implementation; and if he will make a statement; [134037]

(4) what measures have been taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to set up bus routes from rural train stations to towns not served by rail; and if he will make a statement. [134099]

Mr. McNulty: The Department is providing significant funding to improve rural bus services through the Rural Bus Subsidy Grant (RBSG) and Rural Bus Challenge (RBC). This has enabled local authorities to address the transport needs of rural communities, including where necessary the provision of services from rural train stations.

The Department has recently conducted research on the impact of RBSG and RBC funding. This showed, for example, that in allocating RBSG, several authorities gave attention to reducing barriers to travel and promoting social inclusion, by considering access and interchange requirements. More than a quarter of the authorities responding to the study's survey, specifically sponsored services that provided improved bus-rail interchange.

The research also showed that RBC funding has allowed and encouraged the development of complex schemes involving feeder services to main routes. In Lincolnshire, for instance, the Interconnect scheme has sought to remove barriers to travel by combining infrastructure and vehicle improvements with new service patterns revolving around guaranteed interchange and, increasingly, demand responsive transport.

The Department's Local Transport Plan funding has also enabled examples of good practice in rural rail/bus links. Cornwall which is one of the Centres of Excellence has established the first "bus branch line" in the UK. Work on the project, which fully integrates rail and bus services was completed in September 2000 and the service now operates between Redruth train station and Helston.

The statistical information requested here is not available.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures have been taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to install seating on buses where seats face each other; and if he will make a statement. [134031]

Mr. McNulty: No measures have been taken to encourage either local authorities or bus companies to install seats that face each other. It is for the operators and those requiring the service to determine the best design for the seating arrangements that will get the optimum use on the route the vehicle is required for.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures have been taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to enforce bus lane restrictions with (i) staff and (ii) cameras; and if he will make a statement. [134032]

Mr. McNulty: The use of bus priority measures, including bus lanes, as a way of providing attractive and reliable bus services has been encouraged by Local Transport Note 1/97 "Keeping Buses Moving", Traffic Advisory Leaflet 6/01 "Bus Priority" and the Bus Priority Resource Pack "The Way Ahead" published in September this year. Each of these publications points to the importance of enforcement to the extent that the priority measures in question are not self-enforcing.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies that have enforced their bus lane restrictions with (i) staff and (ii) cameras; how many (A) prosecutions for infringement there are (1) 12 months before and (2) after implementation, (B) staff are employed and (C) cameras are set up; and if he will make a statement. [134033]

Mr. McNulty: Responsibility for enforcement of bus lanes rests with the police or local authorities with civil enforcement powers. Information in the form requested is not collected centrally.

Civil enforcement of bus lanes in London by London local authorities and Transport for London (TfL) has been enabled by powers contained in Part II of the London Local Authorities Act 1996. Such enforcement is carried out using bus mounted cameras, roadside cameras and closed circuit television cameras. Under the bus lane enforcement camera project run by TfL, 836 buses have been equipped with cameras and 46 roadside cameras have been installed to date. In addition, the following 12 London authorities are currently using closed circuit television cameras to enforce bus lanes in their areas: Bexley, Camden, Croydon, Ealing, Enfield, Hammersmith and Fulham, Haringey, Lambeth, Newham, Southwark, Waltham Forest and Wandsworth. In 2001–02, 290,231 penalty charge notices were issued by London local authorities and TfL for bus lane contraventions.

Regulations under section 144 of the Transport Act 2000 enabling civil enforcement of bus lanes by local authorities outside London are in preparation.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what measures he has taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to improve the regularity of bus timetabling for rural services; and if he will make a statement; [134034]

(2) if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies that have improved the regularity of bus timetabling for rural services; how many (i) passengers were carried and (ii) services were run (A) 12 months before and (B) after implementation; and if he will make a statement. [134035]

Mr. McNulty: The Bus Partnership Forum encourages operators and local authorities to agree to limit the dates on which timetable changes are made and has produced a Code of Conduct on Service Stability for implementation locally, which was placed on the Department's website in May 2003. This code should help to stabilise the timetabling of services in rural areas, among others, but it is too soon to monitor any improvement.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what measures have been taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to offer reduced-rate tickets for (i) pensioners, (ii) people with disabilities, (iii) children under 16 and (iv) people between the ages of 16 and 19 in full-time education; and if he will make a statement; [134078]

(2) if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies which have implemented reduced-rate tickets for (i) pensioners, (ii) people with disabilities, (iii) children under 16 and (iv) people between the ages of 16 and 19 in full-time education in the last five years; how many passengers were carried (A) before and (B) after implementation; and if he will make a statement. [134079]

Mr. McNulty: From June 2001 the Transport Act 2000 provides a standard minimum requirement for concessionary travel in England which guarantees half fares for all pensioners and disabled people on local buses, with no charge for the pass. Local authorities may make more generous provision at their discretion. From 1 April this year concessionary travel schemes are available to men aged 60 to 64, bringing them into line with women of the same age.

Free travel to and from school is provided by local education authorities under the education acts for schoolchildren up to the age of 16 living more than the statutory walking distances from school. Under the Transport Act 1985 local authorities have a power to provide concessionary travel for school children, and for young people aged 16 to 19 who are undergoing full-time education (see table). That power applies to all journeys, not just those to or from school. Some bus operators offer reduced fares for young people on a commercial basis. These schemes will vary from time to time. In addition the Connexions Card project offers a range of commercial discounts for all 16 to 19-year-olds and the card is capable of carrying existing travel concessions.

We do not collect information on what bus companies offer for these groups of people, nor on how many passengers were carried before and after implementation of any discount schemes, many of which have been in place for many years.

In 2001 the Department carried out a survey about local authority concessionary travel in England. This survey showed that in 2001 the following authorities provided concessionary travel, at their discretion, for children and young people of the following age categories:

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures have been taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to use low-emission buses; and if he will make a statement. [134080]

Mr. McNulty: The Powering Future Vehicles strategy set a target that:

> "By 2012, 600 or more buses coming into operation per year will be low carbon".

I recently announced a Low Carbon Bus Challenge, offering financial support under the DfT's TransportEnergy programme for bus operators to introduce and demonstrate fleets of low carbon buses. Bus operators are invited to submit expressions of interest by the end of the year.

In addition, TransportEnergy provides grants for cleaner fuelled buses and for the retrofitting of pollution reducing equipment to existing buses and are providing funds for the CUTE (Clean Urban Transport for Europe) Hydrogen bus project in London. They have also produced and widely distributed "The Route to Cleaner Buses: A Guide to Operating Cleaner, Low Carbon Buses".

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies using low-emission buses; what the level of emissions was (i) before and (ii) after implementation; and if he will make a statement. [134081]

Mr. McNulty: The Department has, through the TransportEnergy programme, given financial support for the purchase of 38 cleaner fuelled buses and the fitting of 4,898 buses with pollution reducing equipment. The Energy Saving Trust, which manages the programme, estimate that over the life time of these vehicles, emissions of NOx will be 4,340 tonnes less and PM10 will be 709 tonnes less. The Energy Saving Trust do not hold information on other operators using such buses.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what measures have been taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to increase public awareness through improved advertising of bus services; and if he will make a statement; [134082]

(2) if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies which have improved advertising of bus services in the last five years; what estimate he has made of the number of passengers carried (i) before and (ii) after advertising campaigns; and if he will make a statement. [134083]

Mr. McNulty: The Bus Partnership Forum recently produced a report, "Understanding Customer Needs", which was placed on the Department's website in May 2003, and has been widely publicised among operators and local authorities. The report gives many examples where intelligent marketing and branding of bus services has increased public awareness, and hence patronage of the services.

The Department does not evaluate the effect of advertising campaigns by local authorities or bus companies.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what measures have been taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies, to introduce yellow school buses; and if he will make a statement; [134084]

(2) if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies which have introduced yellow school buses; how many (i) passengers were carried and (ii) services were run in the last period for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [134085]

Mr. McNulty: The Department for Transport has commissioned an independent evaluation of yellow school bus schemes. The evaluation is now almost complete and we expect to publish the final report, which will include an analysis of the various dedicated school bus schemes currently in operation, within the next few weeks. We will make a statement at that time.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what measures have been taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to fit bicycle racks on buses; and if he will make a statement; [134086]

(2) if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies which have fitted bicycle racks on buses; what estimate he has made of the number of passengers carrying bicycles (i) before and (ii) after implementation; and if he will make a statement. [134087]

Mr. McNulty: The Department recognises that combined bicycle and bus journeys have the potential to increase the market of operators as well as enabling people to use bicycles for part of a longer journey. It has encouraged local authorities and bus operators to improve the provision of cycle and bus journeys.

The Department has funded the production of advice leaflets on combined cycle and bus journeys. The National Cycling Forum (since renamed as the National Cycling Strategy Board for England) has published:

"Issues for Public Transport Planners and Operators"—advising public transport operators of the commercial gains that can be made by encouraging combined cycling and public transport;

"Combined Bicycle and Bus or Coach Journeys"—a good practice guidance on all aspects of cycle and bus journeys including carriage, access and information and cycle parking at bus stations; and

"Model Conditions of Carriage—Accommodating the Bicycle on Bus and Coach", that provides a basic model for operators to adopt on carriage.

The Department has also commissioned research on the implications of fitting bicycle racks to the fronts of buses, the results of which are expected to be published later this year.

We have also funded a number of schemes involving cycle racks on buses, for example, through the Rural Bus Challenge competition in separate projects in Cornwall, Shropshire and Cumbria.

The statistical information requested here is not available.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what measures have been taken to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies to provide seat belts on buses; and if he will make a statement; [134088]

(2) if he will list the (a) local authorities and (b) bus companies that have fitted seat belts on buses in the last five years; how many (i) deaths, (ii) serious injuries and (iii) injuries there were (A) before and (B) after implementation; and if he will make a statement. [134089]

Mr. McNulty: This information on individual local authorities and companies is not available. However, there has been a progressive increase in the provision of seat belts on buses over the last six years. This has been due to:

(i) legislation implemented from February 1997 to require children on organised trips in minibuses and coaches to be provided with seat belts, and

(ii) legislation requiring all buses registered since October 2001 (apart from those specifically designed for standing passengers) to have seat belts provided for all forward and rearward-facing seats.

Figures for fatal, serious and slight injuries to seated bus and coach passengers in Great Britain over the last 10 years are given in the table.

	Killed	Serious	Slight
1993	17	264	4,357
1994	11	320	5,039
1995	28	350	4,430
1996	4	264	4,800
1997	6	209	4,865
1998	10	242	5,216
1999	4	278	5,707
2000	4	255	5,477
2001	4	231	5,466

Concessionary Travel Schemes

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what estimate he has made of the potential costs to (a) each local authority, (b) London boroughs and (c) local government as a whole, of replacing the national minimum standards for concessionary travel schemes for people over the age of 60 with a 100 per cent. discount on fares for people over the age of 70; [134384]

(2) what estimate he has made of the change in the local government finance settlement necessary fully to reimburse local government for the costs of replacing the national minimum standards for concessionary travel schemes for people aged over 60 with schemes providing travel tokens worth (a) £25 and (b) £50 to (i) to people aged over 60, (ii) all pensioners and (iii) to people aged over 70; [134385]

(3) what estimate he has made of the potential cost to (a) each local authority, (b) the London boroughs and (c) local government as a whole of replacing the national minimum standards for concessionary travel schemes for people aged over 60 with schemes providing travel tokens worth (i) £25 and (ii) £50 to (A) to people aged over 60, (B) all pensioners and (C) to people aged over 70; [134386]

(4) what estimate he has made of the change in the local government finance settlement necessary to reimburse fully local government for the costs of replacing the national minimum standards for concessionary travel schemes for people over the age of 60 with a 100 per cent. discount on fares for people over the age of 70. [134387]

Mr. McNulty: The extension this year of the minimum statutory requirement to men aged 60–65 cost £50 million per year. The Government does not plan further extensions of concessionary fares. We estimate that free concessionary travel for pensioners in England (women aged 60 and over, men aged 65 and over) would cost in excess of an extra £300 million a year. We have not costed all the variants listed in the question and could do so only at disproportionate cost.

Cycling

Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consultations were held during the preparation of the school based cycle helmet awareness programme booklet with the (a) Schools Travel Advisory Group, (b) Health Development Agency, (c) Sports and Physical Activity Board, (d) National Cycling Strategy Board, (e) cycle user groups and (f) other bodies. [135018]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department has not produced a school based cycle helmet awareness programme booklet. However the Bicycle Helmet Initiative Trust has produced, "Guidelines for setting up a successful school based helmet awareness programme" booklet with Government grant financing some of the costs. The principal aims of the BHIT guidelines, to encourage school children to wear cycle helmets, are consistent with Government policy.

Dealing with Disadvantage Project

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the local authorities which have applied to his Department for special Dealing with Disadvantage grants; and if he will set out the criteria used in deciding upon the successful applications. [134745]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 27 October 2003]: Applications for Dealing with Disadvantage funds have been made by:

Blackburn with Darwen, Blackpool, Bolton, Bury, Manchester, Oldham, Rochdale, Salford, Tameside, Wigan.

Further applications have been invited from:

Bradford, Liverpool, Nottingham, Sandwell.

The criteria by which applications are judged are: a clear understanding of the road safety problems associated with disadvantage in the council's area; the relevance of the proposals to those problems; the likelihood of those proposals addressing the issues; the extent to which other programmes, such as Neighbourhood Renewal, have been linked to the proposal.

Dover Harbour Board

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many members of the Dover Harbour Board are appointed by his Department; and if he will make a statement on future policy relating to such appointments. [135032]

Mr. Jamieson: Seven board members, including the Chairman, are appointed by the Secretary of State to the Dover Harbour Board (DHB).

Government appointments to the DHB are made in strict accord with its policy on the appointment of all non-executive directors and board members of public bodies and we abide by guidelines set out by the Office of the Commissioner for Public Appointments (OCPA). We have no current plans to alter this policy.

Driving Licence Applications

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what his target is for the time taken to process a provisional driving licence application from the date of receipt to the applicant receiving the licence, in cases where the applicant indicates that they have a relevant medical condition; and what proportion of licences were issued within this target in each of the last three years. [134663]

Mr. Jamieson: The Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency's published charter standards for dealing with applications, where a medical condition has to be considered, are as follows:

(a) if a decision can be made based on the information originally provided by the applicant, the Agency aims to make a decision on 97.5 per cent. of cases within 15 working days;

(b) if further information is needed about the medical condition from the applicant, his doctors or other sources, the Agency aims to make a decision on 80 per cent. of cases within 90 working days.

The Agency has reported against these standards since April 2002. In financial year 2002–03, the cumulative performance was for (a) 98 per cent. of cases were cleared within 15 working days and for (b) 80.2 per cent. of cases were cleared within 90 working days.

Since April this year, the cumulative performance is for (a) 95.4 per cent. of cases have been cleared within 15 working days and for (b) 78.7 per cent. of cases have been cleared within 90 working days.

No separate figures are available for provisional driving licence applications.

Road Deaths

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to his answer of 15 October 2003,

Official Report, column 240W, on road deaths, whether the information provided by the Dutch on new traffic arrangements at various sites in North Holland indicated decreases in casualties; and what reasons were given by the two UK authorities for considering more familiar techniques rather than the measures used in North Holland. [134106]

Dr. Howells: Information was supplied on 15 locations in North Holland that had been treated in innovative ways. Only two of the locations had an injury accident record showing more than one injury per year (one had two in a single year, one had three). Of the 15 treatments, 13 were neutral in their influence on injuries, one may have saved injuries and one may have put injuries up. In all cases, though, the casualty numbers are very small.

No specific reasons were given by UK authorities, in discussion with Department officials, for not including measures used in North Holland. The discussions took place while the authorities were considering various approaches in the design of traffic management for the areas under consideration. Removing traffic signals was just one technique in the approach used in North Holland for sharing space. We are not aware that either of the UK sites had traffic signals but the authorities were considering a range of techniques similar to those used in North Holland. Lower vehicle speeds plays a key part in this. Reducing the dominance of motor vehicles allow alternative urban treatments aimed at providing a more equal allocation of space for all road users.

Road Vehicles Construction and Use Regulations

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library a regulatory risk assessment of the proposal to amend the Road Vehicles Construction and Use Regulations in respect of tinted windows. [135029]

Mr. Jamieson: No assessment was produced because the regulation amendment did not change anything—it merely clarified an existing provision of law.

US Reserve Fleet

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what communications he has received, and on what date, from the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) in respect of the proposal to bring ships from the US Reserve Fleet to Teesside for disposal; and if he will make a statement. [133292]

Mr. McNulty [holding answer 20 October 2003]: Correspondence between the Department and its correspondents is treated in confidence unless the originator chooses to make it public.

Vehicle Excise Duty Offences

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library the terms of the netting off arrangement agreed between his Department and Her Majesty's Treasury in relation to the costs and penalty income arising from vehicle excise duty offences. [134746]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The terms of the netting off arrangement are contained in the "Proposed governance arrangements for the cost recovery system for continuous registration" document which has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the components of the cost estimate over three years to the DVLA in implementing continuous registration; and what he estimates will be the gross proceeds from penalties levied on vehicle excise duty offenders. [134747]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The components of the cost estimate over three years in implementing continuous registration are contained in the "Proposed governance arrangements for the cost recovery system for continuous registration" document which will be placed in the Library of the House. The cost information appears on page 1–9 paragraph 1.3.

Vehicle Registration

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many vehicles are outside the vehicle registration system; and how many of these will be brought back into the system through the measures set out in the Regulatory Impact Assessment for the Road Vehicles (Registration and Licensing) (Amendment) (No 3) Regulations 2003. [134749]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 27 October 2003]: These are currently 2.1 million vehicles on the vehicle record with no current keeper details, although not all of these will be in use on our roads.

As I announced on 22 May, I have set the DVLA tough new targets in relation to Continuous Registration, which have to be achieved by 2007. One objective is to halve the number of vehicles outside the system, either by relicensing them or by removing them from the road.

The purpose of the regulations is to stop further seepage out of the system by making keepers of vehicles responsible for taxing them until the DVLA are informed that the vehicle has been sold or taken off the road. This will be assisted by enhanced checking procedures for the identity of new keepers when DVLA is informed of a change of keeper.

In addition, as a result of the publicity that will accompany the new arrangements, it is anticipated that many unlicensed vehicles will be brought back onto the register by their keepers relicensing them.

Vehicles outside the system will be dealt with through enhanced enforcement measures—mainly wheel clamping and removal—undertaken by the DVLA. Since April 2002 local authorities can now take on the powers of DVLA in clamping unlicensed vehicles. 14 authorities have these powers already, three are being inducted into their use currently and a further 27 are in talks with DVLA about taking on these powers. This will complement DVLA's own wheel clamping capacity and will ensure that vehicles currently outside the system are properly dealt with.

WALES

Asbestos

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales pursuant to his answer of 1 July 2003, Official Report, column 258W, on asbestos, if he will list the buildings which have been identified as containing asbestos. [130944]

Mr. Touhig: Following the Asbestos Survey of 2002, Gwydyr House was found to contain asbestos.

Miners' Compensation

Donald Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much has been paid under the (a) chronic obstructive pulmonary disease and (b) vibration white finger schemes in Wales, broken down by constituency. [133248]

Mr. Touhig: I will write to my right hon. Friend as soon as possible and place a copy of the letter in the House of Commons Library.

DEFENCE

Draft EU Constitution

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what commitments of capability the UK plans to make to the EU under Articles III—210 to 214 of the Draft EU Constitution. [134312]

Mr. Hoon: The EU's Headline Goal, towards which the UK has offered a substantial military contribution, is due to be reviewed. The review will need to take account of the strategic environment, including the outcome of negotiations on the draft Treaty. The Government will then consider whether any changes to the UK contribution are appropriate. Under the draft Treaty, the commitment of national resources by Member States to ESDP operations will as now be based on their sovereign decisions.

European Armaments Agency

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what budget is planned for the first year of the European Armaments, Research and Military Capabilities Agency. [134313]

(2) what level of (a) financial and (b) personnel commitment the UK plans to make to the European Armaments, Research and Military Capabilities Agency. [134314]

Mr. Hoon: The organisational and financial arrangements, including the contributions to be made by individual Member States, for the proposed European agency in the field of defence capabilities development, research, acquisition and armaments are under discussion with European partners.

Ex-service Personnel

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what help is given to ex-service personnel who have difficulty in returning to civilian life; and if he will make a statement on his assessment of the emotional changes that can result. [121522]

Mr. Caplin: In my statement of 17 September 2003, Official Report, column 51WS, I drew Member's attention to the King's College London research paper published on the same day. It confirmed the MOD's assessment that although joining the armed forces is generally a positive experience, with the overwhelming majority of Service Personnel who have difficulty making the transition back to civilian life. Personnel most vulnerable to problems of transition include those discharged for medical reasons, including mental health conditions, as well as those dismissed for disciplinary reasons, premature leavers and those discharged as temperamentally unsuitable.

The MOD has a comprehensive range of measures to prevent or help deal with these potential difficulties. All Service Personnel who are medically discharged are entitled to the full resettlement package available to personnel serving prescribed lengths of service, including a career transition workshop, financial and housing briefings and individual interviews with a career consultant who is available for up to two years after discharge. When Service Personnel are medically discharged, the Veterans Agency automatically considers entitlement to pensions and allowances under the War Pension Scheme. Disablement pensions are tax-free and not income-related. The scheme includes a range of supplementary allowances to address the disabling effects of accepted disorders, for example, mobility and care. The War Pensioners' Welfare Service, located throughout the United Kingdom, provides war pensions advice, information and help to access appropriate services. When personnel leave the armed forces, their medical management becomes the responsibility of the national health service (NHS). Since the 1950s war pensioners have been entitled to NHS Priority Treatment for their accepted disorders.

The MOD has recently developed an Early Service Leavers Initiative which involves a programme to improve the transition process for those who leave early for whatever reason and are not eligible therefore, for the full resettlement package. The overarching aim is to create a resettlement umbrella that will cover all Service leavers. The Initiative provides for a range of measures that will include a mandatory resettlement interview to assess vulnerability, provide guidance on access to Job Centre Plus and Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) benefits, housing associations, financial matters and give contact details for the ex-Service charities and other welfare organisations.

As part of the Veterans Initiative, projects are in place or being developed on housing and homelessness and employment issues. Many of these involve the voluntary sector. Close contact is also being maintained with the DWP Pathways to Work Project and MOD is represented on the Social Exclusion Unit's Mental Health Project. This is inter-Departmental and is looking at how to improve employment rates for adults with mental health problems, both in terms of take-up and retention of jobs and how to promote greater social participation and access to services for this group. The Department of Health (DoH) has designated mental health in the community at large as one of its key priorities. MOD is working closely with DoH colleagues to explore better services including delivery of mental health services for veterans and improved access to services. This will include work to increase Service leavers' and veterans' awareness of NHS facilities and services and to brief health professionals on military matters and culture.

Service Accommodation

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many units within his Department's married quarters estate will be upgraded in each of the next five years. [133372]

Mr. Caplin: For financial year 2003–04,1 refer the hon. Member to my Written Ministerial Statement on 2 July Official Report, columns 18–19WS. Planned targets for financial years 2004–05, 2006–06 and 2006–07 were published in this year's Ministry of Defence Departmental Plan. Copies are available in the Library of the House. No target has yet been identified for financial year 2007–08, but will emerge from the decisions made in the MOD's Short Term Planning process.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the cost was in each of the last five years of upgrading properties in his Department's married quarters estate; and what the planned expenditure is for this financial year. [133376]

Mr. Caplin: The cost of upgrading Service Family Accommodation to Standard 1 for condition in mainland United Kingdom in each of the past five financial years was:

Year	£ million
1998–99	2.14
1999–2000	48
2000–01	56.7
2002–02	78.0
2002–03	52.7
Total	256.8

For the current Financial Year the estimated outturn on upgrade projects is £40.4 million.

These figures include capital projects where new properties replace demolished properties. The cost of new build stock provided through PFI projects is not included.

In addition to the above, a number of properties benefited from improvements and partial upgrades through property management contracts.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he estimates his Department's upgrade programme for the married quarters estate will be completed by November 2005; how many units are part of this upgrade programme; how many units have been upgraded so far; and if he will make a statement. [133379]

Mr. Caplin: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on 13 May 2003, Official Report, column 153W, by my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie).

Over 8,800 properties have been upgraded to Standard 1, the highest standard, since 1999 and over 90 per cent. of Service families now live in properties at either Standard 1 or 2.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Combined Heat and Power

Jonathan Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps she is taking to ensure that the EU Emissions Trading Scheme benefits combined heat and power systems. [131970]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 14 October 2003]: The Government are aware of concerns that the EU Emissions Trading Scheme may act as a disincentive for the installation of combined heat and power (CHP) technologies. For this reason we are considering options for the treatment of CHP plants in the process of developing the National Allocation Plan.

The CHP industry believe that supplying operators in this situation with allowances for free from a limited CHP set-aside may act as an incentive. In this case operators installing new CHP plants would be provided with allowances equal to the difference in emissions between their existing or proposed traditional boiler and the proposed CHP plant. We are considering this and other options in the draft National Allocation Plan which we intend to publish for consultation in early December, giving industry an opportunity to comment on the various options.

Fuels Protocol

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans she has to seek to amend the substitute Fuels Protocol; and if she will make a statement. [133105]

Mr. Bradshaw: The Environment Agency asked its Regional Environment Protection Advisory Committees (REPACS), in June, to consider the need for review of the Substitute Fuels Protocol and their views are being taken into account in the preparation of a formal consultation paper, which the Agency hopes to publish in November. Interested stakeholders will have three months from publication in which to respond to the consultation.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many authorisations for export have been granted by the animal exports division for captive wild animals in each of the last three years, broken down by (a) breed and (b) destination; and if she will make a statement. [132443]

Mr. Bradshaw: The information is not available in the form requested. However according to our computer systems used for issuing export health certificates and CITES certificates, the following numbers of export certificates and permits have been issued during the last three years for categories of animals which exclude livestock, horses and pets.

CITES certificates are issued under the "Washington" Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora, more commonly known as CITES. The aim is to protect certain plants and animals by regulating and monitoring their international trade to prevent it reaching unsustainable levels.

Animal health

	To EU countries	To non-EU countries
2001	382	237
2002	504	283
2003	419	229

CITES

	Exports (non-EU)
2001	1,726
2002	1,324
2003	1,509

The records for these exports are not kept in a format which readily shows a breakdown by breed and destination. For CITES specimens the main exports are of falcons to Middle East destinations.

Beef

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what timetable she has set for the resumption of unrestricted beef exports to the EU when BSE cases in the UK have fallen to below the moderate risk status threshold. [133858]

Mr. Bradshaw: It is not possible to give a precise date for any such relaxation of current beef export controls. We have submitted papers to the European Commission to support our case for lifting restrictions and these are now being considered by the European Food Safety Authority (EFSA). EFSA's opinion is expected in early 2004. In addition an inspection by the EU Food and Veterinary Office is likely to be required. We would then need agreement with other member states and changes to EU regulations. Export controls are therefore unlikely to change before mid 2004.

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what targets have been set for the introduction of (a) beef from cattle born after August 1996 onto the UK market from 24 April 2004 and (b) moderate risk status beef onto the UK market before autumn 2004; and if she will make a statement on progress towards these targets. [133859]

Mr. Bradshaw: Ministers are currently considering Food Standard's Agency recommendations on changes to the Over Thirty Month rule. Beef from over thirty month cattle born after August 1996 will not therefore be allowed onto the UK market before April 2004.

We have worked closely with the Meat and Livestock Commission to examine how the domestic market can absorb the extra beef from cattle born after 1 August 1996 and the balanced view of the industry is that this can be achieved by import substitution and increases in processed product consumption. We are also pressing the commission to introduce market support arrangements should there be a short term need.

With regards to moderate risk status, the commission has sought advice from the European Food Safety Authority (EFSA) on amending the Date-based Export Scheme (DBES) for UK beef and our methodology of scaling up testing results to support our claim that export restrictions should be lifted so that the UK can trade on the same basis as other member states. An EFSA opinion is expected in early 2004.

Ian Lucas: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent discussions her Department has had with the United States Department of Agriculture on United Kingdom beef exports. [133982]

Mr. Bradshaw: We lobbied the United States Department of Agriculture in October 2002, in collaboration with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, as part of a wider lobbying strategy of third countries to lift their bans on UK beef exports. Plans for further such lobbying are kept under continuing review in the light of developments with the associated EU rules.

Common Agricultural Policy

Hugh Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent representations her Department has received from the horticultural industry over Common Agricultural Policy Reform. [134140]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The department has received a number of representations from the horticulture industry in response to our consultation on the implementation options under the CAP reform agreement. Most of these representations have argued in favour of an area based approach in implementing the new Single Payment Scheme.

Dairy Farms

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what estimates she has made of the (a) average net value and (b) average net profit of dairy farms in the (i) 12 months to March 2002 and (ii) 12 months to March 2003. [134378]

Mr. Bradshaw: Results from the Farm Business Survey published earlier this year show that the average net worth of full-time dairy farms in the year ending March 2002 to be £415,000. The average Occupiers Net Income for the same period was £22,200. The data for the year ending March 2003 will be published in March 2004.

Occupiers net income is defined as the return to the farmer and spouse for their manual and managerial labour and on all their capital invested in the business. This is the most appropriate income measure to compare with net worth.

EU Directives

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs which EU directives relating to environmental matters would incur a financial penalty if the commitments were not met; and how much each fine would be, per annum. [133261]

Mr. Bradshaw: Failure by any part of the UK to observe EU obligations may lead to enforcement action being taken by the European Commission in the European Court of Justice (ECJ).

If a member state fails to take the necessary measures to comply with the judgment of the European Court of Justice within the time limit specified, the member state may incur either a lump sum penalty or a daily penalty payment. The penalty payment would be based on a uniform flat rate amount, multiplied by two coefficients, one reflecting the seriousness of the infringement, and the other the duration. This would then be multiplied by a factor reflecting the ability of the member state to pay and the number of votes it has in Council.

Fallen Stock Scheme

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when details on the application of the National Fallen Stock Scheme will be announced; and what consultation there has been with farmers on the scheme. [133597]

Mr. Bradshaw: Rapid progress is now being made on the establishment of this Scheme. We have recently announced the names of the Directors who will sit on the Board of the company that will run the Scheme. These were selected by organisations representing the farming industry and cover regional and sectoral interests. They are now addressing key issues associated with Scheme rules. The Scheme administrators are developing the necessary computer software for recording farmer details and registration. If things go according to plan we hope that the Scheme will be up and running early in the New Year.

Farming

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what research she has commissioned into the age profile of those in the farming community; and what measures she is taking to encourage younger people into the agriculture industry. [133891]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The Government recognise the importance of encouraging new entrants into farming. The Strategy for Sustainable Farming and Food sets out how industry, Government and consumers must work together to secure profitable and internationally competitive farming and food industries, which are attractive to those already engaged in them and to potential new entrants.

This Department has commissioned research which will seek to identify the existence and nature of any artificial barriers to new entrants, and the potential means by which such barriers might be overcome.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions she has had with non-farming commercial interests regarding loss insurance in the event of a disease outbreak in (a) farmed livestock and (b) crops. [134506]

Mr. Bradshaw: The discussions are the same ones referred to in the answer I gave to my right hon. Friend on 6 October 2003, Official Report, column 1185W.

Fisheries

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs whether (a) the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea and (b) the Scientific, Technical and Economic Committee for Fisheries has scientific evidence on the connection between fishing effort by the UK fishing fleet and the levels of fish stocks in UK national waters; and if she will review fisheries management systems including those applied by the Faeroese and Icelandic industries. [133991]

Mr. Bradshaw: In recognition of the migratory behaviour of the fish species concerned, stock assessments and related work are carried out on identifiably discrete stocks of fish, rather than according to national boundaries. For the same reason they are carried out by independent international organisations, which combine data from most of the main countries and fleets that exploit each stock in order to assess their impact on stocks. As part of this process, the scientists from the UK who attend the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea (ICES) and the Scientific, Technical and Economic Committee for Fisheries, (STECF) therefore submit data on our national catch, and on fishing effort, to inform the discussions. I expect the report being prepared on fisheries by the Prime Minister's Strategy Unit to cover a broad range of issues related to fisheries management, including possible alternative management systems.

Fruit Marketing Standards

Hugh Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what progress has been made with EU negotiations over the marketing standard for apples and pears. [134139]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The EU Commission's proposals to amend the marketing standard for apples are expected to be presented at the November meeting of the Fresh Fruit and Vegetables Management Committee.

Biofuels

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what quantity of biofuel the United Kingdom imported from (a) Germany and (b) France in the last year for which figures are available. [134371]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 27 October 2003]: Currently, around 2 million litres of biodiesel are sold each month in the UK. Around half of this is imported but information is not collected on the country of origin.

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the effect of the duty reduction to 20 pence a litre for biofuels. [134372]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The cut in the duty on biodiesel has already brought forward production of biodiesel from recycled vegetable oil. This offers waste reduction benefits as well as savings in carbon dioxide emissions. Currently, around 2 million litres of biodiesel are sold each month from over 130 filling stations in the UK. Companies are actively considering the production of biodiesel from UK-grown oilseed rape.

Mr. John Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the Government's estimate is of (a) the percentage of the United Kingdom's farmland suitable for growing biofuel crops and (b) the quantity of biofuel that could be produced from this land. [134373]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 27 October 2003]: As biofuels can be produced from mainstream arable crops, a large proportion of the UK's 4.2 million hectares of arable land (2001–02 figures) is suitable for growing biofuel feedstocks. The key factor in determining the amount of land used is the need for the market return to the farmer to be sufficient to motivate diversion from production for established food and animal feed markets. Achieving the Biofuels Directive's reference target of 5.75 per cent. use of biofuels by 2010 would require the production of biofuels from waste vegetable oil, plus feedstocks from around 1 million hectares of agricultural land.

Greyhounds

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what actions her Department is taking to tackle abuse of greyhounds. [134187]

Mr. Bradshaw: Officials are discussing with the racing industry and welfare organisations possible measures to improve the welfare of greyhounds under the proposed Animal Welfare Bill.

Shooting/Fishing

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make it her policy to maintain the existing regulatory framework not to introduce further restrictions on (a) fishing and (b) shooting laws. [133515]

Mr. Bradshaw: Within our manifesto is a firm commitment not to introduce further restrictions on the sports of fishing or shooting. The Government recognises the significant contribution that shooting can give to the social, economic and environmental well-being of rural areas, where it can provide a supplement to incomes and jobs, and contribute to conservation of landscapes, habitats and wildlife.

When undertaken correctly, we fully recognise the usefulness of shooting as a wildlife management measure. For species such as deer and foxes, lawful shooting is one of the recommended methods of population control and can be very effective. In addition the Government fully supports The Code of Good Shooting Practice, launched by the County Land and Business Association earlier this year, which is based on the following "golden rules":

> To ensure safe conduct, those involved in shooting must show respect for the countryside and consideration for others.
> Shoot managers must endeavour to deliver enhancement of wildlife conservation, habitat and the countryside.
> Reared gamebirds should be released before the start of their shooting season.
> Respect for quarry is paramount. It is fundamental to mark and retrieve all birds. Shot game is food and must be treated as such.
> Game management and shooting must at all times be conducted within the law and the principles of the Code of Practice.

Angling provides an easily accessible activity that can bring people of all ages, especially the young, into a sport that teaches discipline, respect for the environment and helps them to realise their potential. It is one of the UK's most popular sports in terms of participation with more than two million people involved.

Angling and shooting—as with all sports—have an important role to play in the life of this country, and in helping to tackle some of the our major problems, such as crime, social problems and regeneration. This Government remains committed to angling and shooting, and to working with the governing bodies in the best interests of anglers and shooters for the overall development of those sports.

Illegal Meat Imports

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on her Department's progress in tackling illegal meat imports. [134004]

Mr. Bradshaw: Progress against the Government's Action Plan on illegal imports in the financial year 2002–03 is reported in the Annual Review of Controls on Imports of Animal Products. Copies have been placed in the House Libraries.

The 2003–04 Action Plan is appended to the Review, and we are working with HM Customs and other responsible parties to implement it. HM Customs took over responsibility for anti-smuggling controls at the border on 11 April this year. Progress will be reported in the next Annual Review, to be published after the end of this financial year.

Japanese Knotweed

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what research her Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on the spread of Japanese knotweed; and if she will make a statement. [134228]

Mr. Bradshaw: I am aware of the problems caused by the spread of Japanese knotweed. The Department commissioned a new survey of plants in Britain and Ireland between 1987 and 1999 to produce updated 10-km square distribution maps of all plant species found in the wild. The results of this research were published in the New Atlas of the British and Irish Flora in September 2002. This included information on the spread of non-native plants such as Japanese knotweed.

The Botanical Society for the British Isles continues to collect records for all native and the majority of non-native species (including Japanese Knotweed) in the UK and submit them to the Biological Record Centre at the Centre for Ecology and Hydrology.

This Department is collaborating with a consortium led by Cornwall county council to undertake a four year project researching the biological control of Japanese knotweed. The study will undertake the necessary research to establish whether biological control is a feasible method for the long-term, sustainable management of Japanese knotweed in the UK.

Livestock Markets

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) how many livestock markets there were in 1997, broken down by county; how many of them closed during the foot and mouth outbreak of 2001; how many markets (a) did not open after the outbreak and (b) have closed since; and how many livestock markets there are in each county; [134404]

(2) which livestock markets have closed in each of the last six years. [134406]

Mr. Bradshaw: The information in the format requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, based upon information provided by the Livestock Auctioneers Association, in 1997 there were 199 livestock auction markets in England and Wales compared with 140 currently. Of the closures 40 have been since February 2001.

Official Visits

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what official overseas visits she made in 2002. [132158]

Margaret Beckett: In addition to regular Agriculture and Environment Council Meetings in Brussels and Luxembourg, I made official visits to the following countries:

January: Germany and Poland—Bilaterals

February: India—World Summit on Sustainable Development (WSSD)

March: Denmark—CAPRI (CAP Reform Meeting) and South Africa—WSSD

April: USA and Canada—WSSD and Spain—Informal Agriculture Council

June: Indonesia—WSSD

July: France—OECD and Denmark—Informal Environment Council

August: South Africa—WSSD

September: Denmark—Informal Agriculture Council

October: France—The Global Food Marketplace (SIAL), Germany—Bilateral and India—Trade Visit

Renewable Energy

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what additional incentives will be made available to the forestry industry to produce renewable products for use in power stations. [133883]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 22 October 2003]: Defra, in association with the devolved administrations and the Forestry Commission, is setting up a £3.5 million UK-wide Bio-energy Infrastructure Scheme. This scheme will help develop the supply chain required to harvest, store, process and supply biomass, such as energy crops and forestry woodfuel, to energy end-users. The European Commission's approval of the scheme is currently being sought. Subject to this, Defra hopes to launch the scheme in early 2004. Markets for woodfuel in heat, combined heat and power, and power generation are being developed through the Department of Trade and Industry/New Opportunities Fund's Bio-energy Capital Grants Scheme.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on further assistance for the agriculture industry in producing biomass for use in power stations. [133884]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 23 October 2003]: This Department is committed to supporting biomass for energy use. In addition to Defra's existing Energy Crops Scheme, which provides funding to support the planting of energy crops and the setting up of producer groups, there are several new initiatives which will support biomass.

Under the reform of the Common Agricultural Policy, crops for energy use can continue to be grown on both set-aside and non set-aside land and will receive payments under the new Single Payments Scheme. An additional Euro 45 per hectare will be available from 1 January 2004 for energy crops grown on non set-aside land. A maximum guaranteed area of 1.5m hectares is fixed for the EU for this additional payment and aid will be reduced if production exceeds that area. Defra, in association with the devolved administrations and the Forestry Commission, is setting up a £3.5 million UK-wide Bio-energy Infrastructure Scheme. This scheme will help develop the supply chain required to harvest, store, process and supply biomass to energy end-users.

Markets for biomass in heat, combined heat and power, and power generation are being developed through the Department of Trade and Industry/New Opportunities Fund's Bio-energy Capital Grants Scheme. The Department of Trade and Industry is currently consulting stakeholders on changes to the rules for co-firing biomass with fossil fuels in conventional power stations. The proposed changes will give longer timescales for the use of biomass, thereby making co-firing a more attractive option for both farmers and power generators.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions her Department has had with other Government Departments on the potential for future expansion in the use of biofuels. [134189]

Mr. Bradshaw: The Department has had a number of discussions, both at ministerial and official level, with the Treasury, HM Customs and Excise, the Department for Transport, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Inland Revenue. The potential for biofuels has also been considered by the Ministerial Low Carbon Group and the Ministerial Group on the Implementation of the Energy White Paper.

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions she has had with the farming industry about the opportunities for growers to produce biofuel crops. [134374]

Mr. Bradshaw: The Department has had a number of discussions, both at ministerial and official level, with the National Farmers Union, the Country Land and Business Association and with trade organisations, such as the British Association for Biofuels and Oils and British BioGen, which include farming industry representatives amongst their members. Officials have also had discussions with many individual farmers, plant breeders, agricultural suppliers, farming consultants, other agricultural businesses and potential project developers.

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what quantity of palm oil the United Kingdom imported for use in the biofuel industry in the last year for which figures are available. [134375]

Mr. Bradshaw: Total imports of palm oil in 2001, the latest year for which figures are available, amounted to 1.28 million tonnes. Information is not collected on the use of the oil. Some palm oil is known to be used in the production of biodiesel.

Research and Development

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what factors explain the difference between the figure of £131 million stated in Press Release 133/03 from her Department to be the spending on research and development by her Department during financial year 2002–03 and the figure of £174 million presented in the publication Forward Look (Cm 5877). [133942]

Mr. Bradshaw: The figure of £131 million stated in Press Release 133/03 correctly reflects the Department's baseline for R&D expenditure in 2002–03. This is funding that the Department spends directly on R&D services to support its policies. The R&D figure provided in the Government's Forward Look of Science, Engineering and Technology includes the DEFRA R&D baseline of £131 million, but also incorporates indirect expenditure by DEFRA Agencies and NDPBs (Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew; English Nature; Environment Agency; and Countryside Agency) leading to the higher overall figure for DEFRA.

Smog

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what her estimate is of the contribution of conventionally powered vehicles to (a) summer smog and (b) winter smog. [133280]

Mr. Bradshaw: The most important component of summer smog is ground level ozone. Ozone is not emitted directly by vehicles. It is a secondary pollutant formed from precursor gases. Due to the complexities of the chemistry of ozone formation it is not possible to provide a quantitative estimate of the contribution of conventionally powered vehicles to summer smog.

The major chemical precursors for ground level ozone in industrialised nations are oxides of nitrogen and hydrocarbons produced mainly by conventionally powered motor vehicles and industry. Ozone and its precursors can be transported over hundreds of kilometres making ozone a transboundary pollutant. Local emissions of precursors do not generally make a significant contribution to local ozone concentrations in the UK.

The most important components of winter smog are particulate matter (PM_{10}) and nitrogen dioxide (NO_2). PM_{10} is a complex mixture of local primary combustion particles, mechanically generated particles and secondary particles formed in the atmosphere from oxides of nitrogen and sulphur dioxide and transported over hundreds of kilometres. 18 per cent. of UK PM_{10} emissions are from road traffic sources and 42 per cent. of NO_X emissions are from road traffic sources. The contribution from road traffic sources to ambient concentrations in cities during winter smog episodes is likely to be higher than implied by national emission totals. Studies suggest that between 25 per cent. and 40 per cent. of PM_{10} concentrations and 50–70 per cent. of oxides of nitrogen concentrations are likely to be derived from road traffic in urban areas.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Call Centres

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether her Department plans to outsource call centre work to premises outside the United Kingdom. [132109]

Ms Hewitt: There are no plans to outsource overseas the call centres operated by my Department, ACAS, the Small Business Service or British Trade International (which brings together the work of my Department and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in support of British trade and investment overseas).

The Chief Executives of my Department's other Agencies will reply direct to my hon. Friend.

Combined Heat and Power

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the allocation of allowances under the EU Emissions Trading Scheme will benefit low carbon technologies such as combined heat and power. [133115]

Mr. Bradshaw: I have been asked to reply.

The Government are aware of concerns that the EU Emissions Trading Scheme may act as a disincentive for the installation of combined heat and power (CHP) technologies. For this reason we are considering options for the treatment of CHP plants in the process of developing the National Allocation Plan.

The CHP industry believe that supplying operators in this situation with allowances for free from a limited CHP set-aside may act as an incentive. In this case operators installing new CHP plants would be provided with allowances equal to the difference in emissions between their existing or proposed traditional boiler and the proposed CHP plant. We are considering this and other options in the draft National Allocation Plan which we intend to publish for consultation in early December, giving industry an opportunity to comment on the various options.

Construction Industry

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will commission research into the impact of the practice of retentions in the construction industry on the continuing viability of companies and individual traders; and what plans she has to promote legislation on this subject. [134238]

Nigel Griffiths: The DTI reviews all key research on retentions and has no plans to incur expenditure on duplicating independent research. The Government agree with the Trade and Industry Select Committee's views on legislation on retentions in that there is:

> "no attraction in the prospect of engineering their abolition through legislation".

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of the number of employers in the construction industry who pay (a) less than the agreed national rate and (b) less than the national minimum wage; and what steps she is taking to prosecute employers who pay less than the legal minimum. [134240]

Nigel Griffiths: The Government does not have information on the number of employers paying less than the nationally agreed rate or the national minimum wage in the construction industry.

We are not being complacent on the enforcement of the national minimum wage. The Inland Revenue completed over 6,200 investigations in 2002–03, identifying more than £3.5 million in minimum wage arrears on behalf of underpaid employees in the economy as a whole. The National Minimum Wage (Enforcement Notices) Act 2003 also came into force on 8 July 2003. The Act makes it absolutely clear that Revenue officers can issue enforcement notices (an instruction to employers requiring them to start paying the minimum wage to workers and make good any arrears of pay) on behalf of former workers as well as current ones thus closing an enforcement loophole.

Consumer Direct

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the cost has been of the Consumer Direct initiative. [134413]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The cost of the Consumer Direct initiative to date is £1,150,000.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the purpose of (a) Consumer Direct and (b) the Consumer Gateway. [134481]

Mr. Sutcliffe [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The purpose of Consumer Direct is to increase the provision, quality and consistency of consumer advice across England, Scotland and Wales. Current unmet demand for consumer advice is estimated at up to 1.5m calls per annum ("DTI Consumer Helplines Study", February 2002).

The Consumer Direct approach is to empower consumers to make the right choices and to resolve problems themselves, so placing more effective pressure on companies to improve. Consumer Direct will also increase the quality and coverage of information for those enforcing consumer legislation.

The Consumer Gateway acts as a portal to consumer information available online. It provides links to a variety of relevant information sources. Consumer Gateway will be subsumed by Consumer Direct Online when it goes live next summer.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether it is the policy of the Government to provide advice on individual consumer (a) problems and (b) complaints; and if she will make a statement. [134482]

Mr. Sutcliffe [holding answer 27 October 2003]: It is Government policy to increase people's access to quality consumer advice and information through Consumer Direct. Local Authorities, working in partnership within the English Government Office regions, Scotland and Wales, will be responsible for running Consumer Direct contact centres. These centres will provide advice on individual consumer problems and complaints via telephone or e-mail, or will refer consumers to local Consumer Support Network members if further help is required, or to other organisations who are better placed to assist. Consumer Direct will allow existing advice services to focus their skills and resources where they can add most value, in particular helping vulnerable consumers, providing face-to-face advice, implementing education programmes and clamping down on rogue traders and scams.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many staff of her Department were redeployed out of London and the South East in the last five years. [125358]

Ms Hewitt: There have been no major redeployments of DTI staff out of London and the South East in the past five years. We are unable to provide figures for individual members of staff who have moved to the Department's numerous offices outside London and the South East in the same period without incurring disproportionate cost. Support work on Finance and Human Resources has, however, been moved to Billingham and Cardiff over the past two years.

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) special advisers, (b) press officers, (c) civil servants, (d) advisers to civil servants and (e) permanent staff were working for her Department in each year since 1996. [126475]

Ms Hewitt: I refer the hon. Member to Table C of the annual publication, "Civil Service Statistics", which covers Permanent Staff Numbers in each Department and agency from 1995 to 2002. Copies of the publication are held in the Libraries of the House. The latest edition was published on 24 July 2003. These figures include press officers.

Information is also available at the following address on the Cabinet Office Statistics website: http//www.civil-service.gov.uk/statistics/css.htm My special advisers are currently Jim Godfrey, Kitty Usher, Deborah Lincoln and Roger Sharp. Roger Sharp is part-time.

Exports

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the value is at current prices of United Kingdom (a) exports to and (b) imports from (i) Europe, (ii) Africa, (iii) Australasia, (iv) North America, (v) South America, (vi) the Middle East and (vii) Asia in each year since 1973; and what percentage of (A) UK and (B) world trade UK trade with these regions constituted in each of these years. [132936]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: An answer to the question could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Information on UK trade, published by HM Customs and Excise, gives figures for selected regions of the world but these do not correspond to the regions required. It would, therefore, be necessary to use data for UK trade with individual countries and aggregate them to arrive at the totals for the required regions. UK trade data prior to 1988 are not available electronically so compiling this part of the answer would require manual entry of 6,000 numbers. Another 6,000 items of data would have to be downloaded from the trade database for more recent information on UK trade. Downloading recent data is complicated by various political changes that have taken place over the period in question, such as the break up of the Soviet Union, Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia, as well as the German unification. As a result of these changes, several countries did not exist in the earlier years but do now, while some that did exist earlier no longer do so. Finally, the combined set would have to be aggregated to provide trade statistics for the specified regions.

The second part of the question requires a comparison of trade by the UK and the World. Information on world trade is available from the International Monetary Fund (Direction of Trade Statistics), but again, their regions do not correspond to those required to answer the question. For example, the IMF grouped centrally planned economies together, as a separate "region", although geographically they were in (Eastern) Europe, Asia and Central America. It would be necessary to calculate regional totals from those for individual countries. The IMF data are not available in electronic form so this procedure would entail manually compiling a database consisting of 30 years' worth of data for around 200 countries for two trade flows (imports and exports).

For strict comparability, it would be advisable to use the IMF source for UK trade rather than Customs' figures. In all, this would entail manually compiling a data set of around 24,000 figures, which would then need to be processed to arrive at the information required.

Fireworks

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what efforts are being made to reduce the risks that are present when consumers purchase fireworks from illegitimate outlets; [134335]

(2) what guidance she gives to the public on ensuring that the fireworks that they buy are from legitimate sources. [134336]

Mr. Sutcliffe: Under the Explosives Act 1875, which is the responsibility of the Health and Safety Executive, retail premises are required to be registered with the local authority in order to store and display fireworks for sale. The 1875 Act also makes it illegal to sell fireworks in the street. Trading standards departments are responsible for enforcing these measures giving them particular priority during the firework season.

The Department, through the annual fireworks safety campaign, urges the public to take care when using fireworks and make sure when buying fireworks they are marked as complying with British Standard 7114, the British safety standard for consumer fireworks.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what action her Department is taking with the Home Office to keep fireworks from being a nuisance; [134337]

(2) what plans her Department has to enable authorities to keep track of fireworks once they have left the port of entry. [134338]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The Fireworks Act 2003, which received the Royal Assent on 18 September, will allow the Department to make regulations covering a range of firework issues which we are currently unable to regulate under the Consumer Protection Act 1987. These include restricting firework sales and use, licensing of retailers, controlling noise and nuisance and the importation of fireworks.

We hope to implement the part of the Act concerning the creating an offence for possession of fireworks by those under 18 years of age by Christmas. The Department is currently having discussions with the Home Office.

We will start implementation of the part of the Act in relation to the importation of fireworks in the New Year. This relates to the giving of information on firework imports to help keep track of fireworks once they have left the point of entry.

Ross Cranston: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when she will lay regulations under the Fireworks Act 2003. [131661]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The majority of regulations to be made under the Fireworks Act 2003 are expected to be laid in the summer of 2004.

The Department is also looking into the possibility of implementing certain parts of the Act that deal with the anti-social use of fireworks—possibly before Christmas, in which case regulations could be laid in December.

Mr. Truswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultations will take place on regulations to be introduced under the Fireworks Bill; with whom consultations will be held; and over what period. [131405]

Mr. Sutcliffe [holding answer 14 October 2003]: The Department has begun preliminary consultations with key stakeholders on the form that Fireworks Regulations will take. Draft Regulations will be published, along with a Regulatory Impact Assessment, in spring 2004. Therefore, we expect Regulations to become law in Summer 2004?in good time for next year's fireworks season.

In the immediate term, the Department is also looking into the possibility of implementing those parts of the Act identified as dealing with the anti-social use of fireworks, which, if judged suitable, will be implemented before the end of the year. We have already had preliminary consultations on this and, if Regulations are to be made, we will consult on these shortly.

Our stakeholders include other Government Departments; the Police Service; trading standards; religious groups; the industry and retailer representatives; and, interested groups such as the RSPCA and the Guide Dog for the Blind Association.

Mr. Truswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether she was consulted about the statement made by a Department official to the Yorkshire Evening Post and published on 15 September 2003, concerning Regulations under the Fireworks Bill and the absence of limitations on the period of sale of fireworks; and if she will make a statement. [131407]

Mr. Sutcliffe [holding answer 14 October 2003]: The statement made is fully in line with the Department's current thinking on the form that Fireworks Regulations may take.

The question of limitations on periods of sale requires careful consideration given the culturally diverse celebrations involving the use of fireworks. The Department is still formulating Regulations with regard to specific sections of the Act and will be consulting widely.

Government Regulations

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what research her Department has conducted on the average number of man hours each business spends on dealing with Government regulations. [133411]

Nigel Griffiths: The DTI has never conducted research on the number of 'man' hours devoted to this.

Industrial Participation Programmes (South Africa)

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many officials from her Department assisted in the negotiations with the (a) National Industrial Participation and (b) Defence Industrial Participation programmes with South Africa; what their role was in these negotiations; and what posts they held in her Department at the time of the negotiations. [134540]

Ms Hewitt: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on 20 October 2003, Official Report, column 448W.

Late Payment

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of the effectiveness of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996 on reducing late payment; and if she will make a statement. [134235]

Nigel Griffiths: The Government continue to monitor the effectiveness of Part II of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act, in partnership with the construction industry umbrella bodies. The Act provides clearer payment terms and a statutory right to adjudication in construction contracts to reduce late and non-payment and resolve payment disputes.

The Government have supported the work of the Construction Umbrella Bodies Adjudication Task Group to produce guidance on the Adjudication process for users and adjudicators.

Miners' Compensation

Jeff Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much has been spent on the coal health compensation schemes; and what percentage of the total has gone to (a) claimants, (b) solicitors and (c) other organisations. [134398]

Nigel Griffiths: To date, the total amount spent in respect of the respiratory disease and vibration white finger (VWF) schemes is £2.2 billion. 77 per cent. of the total spent has been paid as compensation to the claimants, 10 per cent. has been paid in solicitors' costs and 13 per cent. to contractors.

Respiratory disease and vibration white finger

Percentage	£ million
77	1.694
13	286

Jeff Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many former miners have received a final settlement of less than £200 in compensation for (a) chronic bronchitis emphysema and (b) vibration white finger; and what the average fees paid (i) to solicitors and (ii) for medical examinations have been for processing these claims. [134399]

Nigel Griffiths: The figures are as follows:

	COPD	VWF
Settlements of less than £200	3,162	10
Average fee to solicitors	£2,143	£465

Medical assessments: £865 Live respiratory including record collection and lung function testing.
£571 deceased including record collection.
Vibration white finger: £190 (Live only).

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people will benefit from the latest rise in the national minimum wage in (a) the North West and (b) the UK. [134439]

Mr. Sutcliffe: Based on the Office for National Statistic's Low Pay data for 2002, the DTI estimates that between 180,000 and 220,000 people in the North West can expect to benefit from the increase in minimum wage rates in October 2003; DTI estimates that between 1.3 and 1.6 million people can expect to benefit in the UK as a whole.

Staff Numbers

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many staff the Department and each agency and non-departmental public body for which the Department is responsible had in each year since 1997; and what the cost of those staff was in each of those years. [122264]

Ms Hewitt: Data on staffing levels in the Civil Service is collected from departments and agencies twice-yearly, in April and-October. Headline figures are published under National Statistics guidelines via a press notice. Those for October 2002 were published on 27 February 2003.

A copy of the press notice, accompanying media brief and supporting tables is available on the world wide web at www.civil-service.gov.uk/statistics. Copies of these documents are also placed in the Libraries of House.

More detailed information on the Civil Service is published annually in 'Civil Service Statistics', copies of which are laid in the Libraries of the House. The last edition, based on April 2002 data, was published on 24 July 2003.

The Cabinet Office publishes information on non-departmental public bodies in its annual publication 'Public Bodies'. The information includes details of the number of staff employed by each NDPB at 31 March each year. 'Public Bodies 2002' was published in January 2003. Copies of 'Public Bodies' published each year since 1997 are available in the Libraries of House.

Information on costs cannot be provided without incurring disproportionate cost.

Unqualified Mechanics

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what research her Department has conducted into the effect on the motor industry of the number of unqualified mechanics operating within it; and what plans she has to take steps to improve the situation. [133409]

Mr. Sutcliffe: In 2002 the Department carried out a mystery shopping exercise into the car servicing and repair sector following a study of the sector carried out by the OFT in 2000. Both studies showed high consumer detriment and shortfalls in delivering acceptable levels of customer service.

A number of DTI-led and joint DTI/DfES skills related initiatives are underway to reduce skills gaps and shortages for the automotive industry as a whole. Sector Skills Councils are being set up to achieve four key goals: reducing skills gaps and shortages; improving productivity, business and public service performance; increasing opportunities to boost the skills and productivity of everyone in the sector's workforce; and improving learning supply, including apprenticeships, HE and national occupational standards. For the automotive industry, SEMTA (for the science, engineering and manufacturing technologies sectors including automotive) and Automotive Skills Ltd. for the automotive retail, servicing and repair sectors will be looking to achieve these goals.

One of the first tasks of these new bodies will be to undertake a detailed skills audit, which will bring into focus the issue of qualified mechanics within the industry.Linked with SEMTA will be the recently launched Automotive Academy, which will provide a comprehensive range of support to enhance process improvement activities in the automotive manufacturing sector. DTI has committed £15 million over 5 years to support the establishment of the Academy which will kitemark existing courses where these meet the needs of industry and will commission new material where necessary to fill gaps in provision.

In addition to these initiatives the DTI and industry has developed a new Motor Code for which the main retail trade associations in the UK are seeking Office of Fair Trading approval. This focuses on customer service and provides an opportunity for the industry to show collective responsibility for enhancing its reputation with its customers.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

Visitors Centre

36. Mr. Luff: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, if he will make a statement on the progress of plans for the establishment of a parliamentary visitors' centre. [134532]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: Following two feasibility studies, and wide consultation in both Houses, the Commission is, with the authorities in the House of Lords, now looking at ways of taking forward the development of new visitor facilities.

Palace of Westminster Art Collection

Norman Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, how many works of art from the Palace of Westminster Collection are (a) on public display in the House, (b) on display in the House in areas to which the public do not have regular access, (c) on loan and (d) in storage. [135094]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: The House of Commons Commission is responsible only for matters affecting this House. However, I understand that there are 6,708 works of art in the permanent collections of the House of Commons and the House of Lords, of which approximately 10 per cent. is in storage at any one time. One work is currently on loan from the House of Commons collection.

There are 417 works of art on display on the route taken by visitor tours, in the committee rooms and committee corridor in the Palace, and in the committee rooms and surrounding areas in Portcullis House. These areas may be visited by unaccompanied members of the public or by members of the public on organised tours. Many works of art are on display in catering facilities or other areas to which the public may have access if accompanied by a passholder. If any member of the public wishes to view a specific work of art from either of the collections, efforts are made to arrange this.

Norman Baker: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, how much has been spent by the Speaker's Advisory Committee on Works of Art on the acquisition of works of art in each year from 1997 to date; and how much has been realised through sales of works of art. [135095]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: Expenditure from the House of Commons Administration Estimate since 1997 on acquisitions for the House of Commons collection is shown in the following table:

1997–98	50,126.16
1998–99	50,138.28
1999–2000	49,792.62
2000–01	50,001.65
2001–02	50,000.00
2002–03	86,697.91

Expenditure from the House of Commons Administration Estimate since 1997 for works of art for Portcullis House is shown in the following table:

1997–98	3,778.05
1998–99	18,500.00
1999–2000	90,711.30
2000–01	99,823.80
2001–02	96,497.16
2002–03	500.00

There have been no sales of works of art since 1997.

MINISTER FOR WOMEN

Pregnancy Discrimination

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Minister for Women what measures are in place to prevent pregnancy discrimination at work. [133470]

Ms Hewitt: Discrimination on the ground of pregnancy or maternity is a form of direct discrimination on the ground of sex. The courts have interpreted the Sex Discrimination Act as meaning that discrimination on the ground that a woman is, or might become, pregnant is unlawful. This is reinforced by the amended Equal Treatment Directive published on 5 October 2002, which says that less favourable treatment on the grounds of pregnancy and maternity within the meaning of the Pregnant Workers Directive constitutes sex discrimination.

In 1999, the Government introduced specific protections to prevent women from suffering detriment and from being unfairly dismissed or selected for redundancy for reasons connected with their pregnancy, childbirth or maternity leave. We have also ensured a women has a clear right to return to her job after maternity leave, on the same terms and conditions as if she had not been away.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Licensing Act

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate has been made of the additional cost to local authorities of implementing the Licensing Act 2003; and how much this will add to the average council tax bill. [134850]

Mr. Caborn: There will be no additional cost to local authorities resulting from the implementation of the Licensing Act 2003. Fees will be set by the Secretary of State at a level that will allow the full recovery of all costs relating to their duties under the Act. There will therefore be no additional cost to council-tax payers as a result of the new regime.

HOME DEPARTMENT

OSIRIS II

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to carry out exercises similar to OSIRIS II in other cities. [134115]

Mr. Blunkett: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) on 16 October 2003, Official Report, column 314W.

Airguns

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions he has had with gun trade associations on the (a) sale and (b) criminal use of airguns; and if he will make a statement. [134596]

Caroline Flint [holding answer 27 October 2003]: We have discussions with the gun trade associations on a range of issues. Most recently we have been discussing the problems which have arisen as a result of criminals converting air weapons which use the self-contained gas cartridge system to fire conventional ammunition. It was not possible to modify these guns to prevent conversion and we have therefore made provision in the current Anti-Social Behaviour Bill for future manufacture, importation, transfer or sale to be prohibited. Existing owners will be able to retain their guns provided they obtain a firearms certificate.

Car Insurance (Fines)

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many times in each of the last 10 years the maximum fine for driving without insurance has been imposed by the courts; and in how many cases the fine was paid in full. [133018]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 21 October 2003]: Information collected centrally in the Home Office Court Proceedings Database shows that for the offence of using a motor vehicle uninsured against third party risks, the maximum fine of £5,000 (Level 5) has been imposed in England and Wales on seven occasions from 1992 to 2001. Five times in 1996 and twice in 1997.

An amendment to the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988, s.143 has now made using a motor vehicle while uninsured against third party risks a fixed penalty offence from 1 June 2003. Initially, offenders will be subjected to a £200 fixed penalty, which can be increased to a maximum fine of £5,000 if the matter goes to court. Information is not collected centrally on the amount of fines paid by the type of offence.

Correspondence

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Totnes of 14 October 2002, concerning Mr.David Copeland of Brixham; and if he will make a statement on the reasons for the delay. [93883]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 27 January 2003]: I replied to the hon. Member on 8 July 2003

Data Protection

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what redress is available to private citizens (a) whose private activities have been monitored and on (b) whom private data has been collected without their permission by individuals acting on behalf of corporate entities. [133401]

Mr. Blunkett: Private individuals whose activities are monitored, or their personal data collected, without their consent by another private individual (whether acting alone or on behalf of a private enterprise) may seek assistance from the police if the conduct of that monitoring has involved, or is suspected of having involved, the commission of a criminal offence.

Where personal data has been, or is suspected of having been, processed contrary to the provisions of the Data Protection Act 1998, any directly affected person may ask the Information Commissioner to make an assessment. It is open to the Commissioner to take enforcement action if he concludes that the Act has been breached and for individuals to claim compensation through the Courts if damage has been caused as a result of any breach of the Act.

Where the monitoring has been undertaken by a broadcast organisation the individual may seek redress from the Broadcasting Standards Commission or from the Press Complaints Commission where a member of the press has undertaken the monitoring.

Domestic Violence

Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what nationally accredited programmes are available in prison to address issues related to domestic violence. [134848]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The Prison Service has developed a programme for domestic violence offenders, which it has been piloting in two establishments, and which was accredited by the Correctional Services Accreditation Panel in October 2003.

Drug-related Offences

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been imprisoned in each of the last 15 years for offences related to (a) dealing in cannabis and (b) using cannabis; and if he will make a statement. [133902]

Caroline Flint: The table shows the number of people sentenced to custody in England and Wales for drugs offences involving cannabis, from 1993 to 2001. Before 1993 offences relating to cannabis were not separately identified.

Number of offenders sentenced to immediate custody at all courts for drug offences involving cannabis[1,2]

[1] These data are on the principal offence basis.
[2] This relates to drug offences where cannabis can be separately identified.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many arrests of cannabis users were made in each of the last 15 years; what he estimates the cost to police resources was of making these arrests; and if he will make a statement. [133904]

Caroline Flint: The data available centrally on arrests for drug offences do not give details of the type of drug for which an individual was arrested, so information on the number of arrests for cannabis offences, together with costs, is not currently available.

We do have data on the number of persons dealt with for possession of cannabis. This is the closest approximation to the number of arrests. The figures appear in the table.

The figures are taken from the annual Home Office Statistical Bulletin. They are available on the RDS website http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/pdfs2/hosb402.pdf and in the Library.

Persons found guilty, cautioned, given a fiscal fine or dealt with by compounding for possession of cannabis by year, 1986 to 2000.

Gun Crime

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps the Government is taking to tackle gun crime. [132676]

Caroline Flint: The Government are taking a wide range of action to tackle gun crime.

This includes:

Proposing a mandatory, minimum five-year sentence for those convicted, on indictment, of possessing prohibited firearms;

Proposing to ban the carrying of replicas or air weapons in a public place without reasonable excuse;

Proposing to raise the age limit for owning an air weapon from 14 to 17 and restricting their use without adult supervision as 77 per cent. of airgun crimes are criminal damage;

Proposing a ban on the sale, manufacture and import of tandem air cartridge systems, and the licensing of those already held as they can be readily converted into lethal firearms;

Publishing a new strategy for witnesses to increase the numbers of people who come forward when they witness a crime;

The national firearms amnesty, held during April, in which over 43,000 weapons and 1 million rounds of ammunition were handed in.

Legislation and law enforcement alone cannot solve the problem and it is vital that community groups, local authorities and those involved in service provision, including education, engage with us in taking action to deal with this problem. Community groups have therefore been involved in the two national meetings my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has chaired, with a third meeting due to be held on 25 November. We are planning a community engagement event in January, to bring together community activists, representatives of voluntary organisation, law enforcement and policy officials to take forward this dialogue and support community involvement in tackling gun crime. The Government have also made available £1.5 million of recorded assets receipts to support community involvement.

We are also working with the Disarm Trust which will support the victims of, and communities working against gun crime.

The police have established dedicated teams, such as Operation Trident in London and Operation Stealth in Nottingham, working against particular groups of criminals involved in armed violence. Many of these Operations have forged good links with the communities they serve by establishing Independent Advisory Groups, made up of members of the local community.

Home Detention Curfews

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners released on home detention curfew in the last 12 months have been (a) prosecuted and (b) convicted for breaching the conditions of their licence, broken down by each police force area in England and Wales; and how many of those who were convicted received a custodial sentence. [134382]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The table shows the number of people recalled from home detention curfew, by reason for recall, in the 12-month period January 2002 to December 2002. This information is not available by police force area.

Recalls from home detention curfew: January to December 2002

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offenders sentenced to a curfew order in the last 12 months have been (a) prosecuted and (b) convicted for breaching the conditions of the order, broken down by each police force area in England and Wales; and how many of those who were convicted received a custodial sentence. [134383]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The attached table gives the number of persons who were proceeded against at magistrates' courts, found guilty and sentenced to immediate custody at all courts for breach of a curfew order (with or without electronic monitoring), for each police force area in England and Wales 2001.

Inquests

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many inquests due to be held have been outstanding for over five years; and if he will make a statement. [134489]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 27 October 2003]: This information is not held centrally.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it a requirement on coroners to conduct inquests required of them within two years of a person's death. [134490]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 27 October 2003]: No. While we encourage coroners to hold inquests as quickly as possible, there will always be some circumstances where it may not be sensible for the inquest to be held within a prescribed period, for example where other relevant legal proceedings are outstanding.

Prisoners (Revocation of Licence)

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were returned to custody owing to a revocation of licence in the last year for which figures are available. [134184]

Paul Goggins: The number of prisoners returned to custody due to a revocation of licence for the period 1 April 2002 to 30 March 2003 was 7,849.

Terrorism

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) of 15 October 2003, Official Report, column 260W, on terrorism, when section 44 powers were first used in London; on how many occasions and on what dates the powers have been confirmed since the Terrorism Act 2000 came into force; and whether the use of section 44 powers relates to specific areas of London or to the whole of the Metropolitan police area. [133966]

Mr. Blunkett: The Metropolitan police and City of London have authorised the use of stop and search powers under the Terrorism Act since it came into force on 19 February 2001. The powers have been authorised in respect of the whole of each force area since that time in accordance with the statutory procedures.

The decision to authorise use of the powers is made against the background of the current threat level and the assessment of the risk to any designated or whole force area. Authorisations are only confirmed on a monthly basis if the Secretary of State is satisfied that their use is necessary to prevent acts of terrorism.

Young Offenders (North Wales)

Ian Lucas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what secure accommodation provision is in place for young offenders from North Wales. [133980]

Paul Goggins: In general, young people from North Wales who have been placed in custody by the courts are accommodated in secure facilities in North West England, although they may sometimes be placed elsewhere depending on the availability of places and other factors.

Young Offenders from North Wales aged 18–20 are normally allocated to the following Young Offender Institutions: Stoke Heath in Shropshire (sentenced males), Altcourse in Merseyside (remanded males), and Styal in Cheshire (sentenced and remanded females).

Responsibility for the commissioning and purchasing of all secure accommodation for juvenile offenders (i.e. for those below the age of 18), and for the placement of juveniles sentenced to a detention and training order, rests with the Youth Justice Board for England and Wales. The Board's policy in relation to the placement of juvenile offenders from North Wales is as follows:

Remanded and sentenced males aged 15 to 17 will normally be placed in Stoke Heath Young Offender's Institute or, if this establishment is full, in Werrington Young Offender's Institute (Stoke-on-Trent) or Hindley Young Offender's Institute (Wigan). Thorn Cross Young Offender's Institute, an open establishment near Warrington, is also available, subject to a proper risk assessment of the individual.

Males below the age of 15 or those assessed as vulnerable will normally be placed in one of two Secure Training Centres, Rainsbrook in Warwickshire or Hassockfield in Durham, or in a local authority secure community home. The closest of these to North Wales are Barton Moss (Greater Manchester), Dales House (Lancashire), Dyson Hall (Merseyside), Red Bank (Merseyside), Redsands (Cheshire) and Hillside (West Glamorgan).

Females aged 17 are normally placed in New Hall Young Offender's Institute, near Wakefield. Those aged under 17 are normally placed in either Rainsbrook or Hassockfield Secure Training Centre or one of the local authority secure community homes that accommodate females. Those nearest to North Wales are St. Catherines (Merseyside), Redsands and Hillside.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Bribery

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many allegations of bribery of a foreign public official have been received from diplomatic posts overseas since 14 February 2002. [132369]

Mr. MacShane: Reports on bribery and corruption overseas are received from time-to-time from diplomatic posts and after validation these are passed on to the appropriate authorities in the UK. Four such reports, specifically related to guidance on the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act, have been received since 14 February 2002.

British Missions (USA)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on how many locally-engaged staff working in British missions in the United States pay cuts have been imposed; what the largest percentage pay cut is; what the average cut is; and what negotiations have taken place on the matter. [135031]

Mr. MacShane: No pay cuts have been imposed.

Burundi

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the peace accord signed in October 2003 by the President of Burundi and Pierre Nkurunziza of the Forces for the Defence of Democracy; what assessment has been made of the viability of the accord; and if he will make a statement. [134432]

Mr. Mullin: The UK welcomes the signing of the Pretoria protocol on 8 October between the Force pour la Defense de la Democratic (FDD) (Nkurunziza) and the Government of Burundi. This is a positive step towards implementation of the 2 December 2002 ceasefire agreement between the two parties. Further talks to resolve outstanding issues including an implementation timetable, immunity, army integration and registering the FDD as a political party, are due to take place soon. The UK is working with the Government of Burundi and our international partners to ensure momentum is not lost.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions (a) he, (b) members of his Department and (c) representatives of the UK Government have had with the (i) Government of Rwanda, (ii) Government of Tanzania, (iii) Government of Uganda, (iv) Government of France, (v) governments of other European Union member states, (vi) governments of EU candidate countries and (vii) Government of the United States of America concerning the (A) security situation in and (B) political stability of Burundi; what issues were raised; what actions were agreed on during these meetings; and if he will make a statement. [134433]

Mr. Mullin: The UK remains active in the Burundi peace process in a range of international fora. The UK maintains a dialogue on Burundi with our EU partners, the Regional Initiative chaired by Ugandan President Museveni, the South African led Facilitation and our key international partners in Burundi.

Key issues of concern include bringing the Forces Nationales de Liberation (FNL) into the peace negotiations, ensuring the Forces pour la Defense de la Democratic (FDD) and the Government of Burundi honour their ceasefire commitments, supporting the AU peacekeeping force (AMIB), laying the foundations for a sustainable democracy and providing vital humanitarian assistance.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions (a) he, (b) members of his Department and (c) representatives of the UK Government have had with (i) representatives of the United Nations, (ii) representatives of the European Commission, (iii) representatives of African multilateral organisations and (iv) European and African non-governmental organisations concerning the human rights situation in Burundi; what issues were highlighted during these discussions; what concerns were voiced; what action was (A) formulated and (B) implemented directly addressing those issues and concerns; and if he will make a statement. [134434]

Mr. Mullin: The UK is in contact with a range of partners on the human rights situation in Burundi including the EU, AU and UN. The UK also maintains a dialogue with national and international human rights NGOs. We are concerned at the impact of the war on the human rights of the civilian population, particularly women and children. The UK is actively working with our international partners in promoting peace in Burundi as the key to protecting their human rights.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the impact of the Forces for the National Liberation's absence from the peace talks leading up to the October peace accord in Burundi on the long-term viability of the peace accord; what discussions (a) he, (b) members of his Department and (c) representatives of the UK Government have had with the Government of Burundi on the inclusion of the Forces for National Liberation in the peace process; and if he will make a statement. [134444]

Mr. Mullin: An all-inclusive cease-fire in Burundi is vital for the long-term stability of Burundi. UK officials remain in regular contact with the Government of Burundi on the need to engage the Forces Nationales de Liberation (FNL) in peace negotiations. Most recently, our Ambassador in Kigali raised this issue on 23–24 October with the President and Foreign Minister of Burundi.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the impact of the internal conflict in Burundi on the (a) security and (b) stability of border regions in (i) Tanzania, (ii) Rwanda and (iii) the Democratic Republic of Congo since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [134445]

Mr. Mullin: The 10-year civil war has had a destabilising effect on neighbouring countries. There are nearly 500,000 Burundi refugees in Tanzania. Some Burundi rebel forces remain in the Democratic Republic of Congo.

The UK is committed to supporting implementation of the Arusha agreement of 2000 and the transitional government institutions in Burundi as an integral part of achieving security and stability in the Great Lakes Region.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the developments in the security situation in (a) Burundi and (b) Rwanda since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [134446]

Mr. Mullin: We continually monitor the security situation in Rwanda and Burundi. The Government of Rwanda has made a concerted effort to bring security to the country. In this they have been broadly successful. However, the conflicts in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Burundi make the border areas potentially dangerous. The security situation in Burundi is unstable. But, there has been a positive development recently in Burundi with the signing of the Pretoria Protocol on 8 October on power sharing between the Force pour la Defence de la Democratie (FDD) (Nkurunziza) and the government of Burundi. Only the Forces Nationales de Liberation (FNL) (Rwasa) lies outside the peace process.

Convention on the Future of Europe

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions the Secretary of State has had about the impact on UK constitutional arrangements of the work of the Convention on the Future of Europe. [134522]

Mr. MacShane: The Government believes that there is a strong case for a single, coherent constitution for the European Union. In effect, the existing treaties already make up a constitutional structure. However, they are overly complex and unclear. For this reason, the Government supports redrafting, restructuring and consolidating the treaties.

The draft Constitution as it stands is not perfect. It contains points which we want to examine in more detail. And we could only accept a final text that made it clear that issues like tax, defence and foreign policy remained the province of the nation State. Provided there is clarity on these points, the reforms proposed by the Convention should be welcomed. They do not alter the fundamental constitutional relationship between the UK and the Union.

The Government published in September Command Paper 5934, setting out its views on the draft Treaty prepared by the Convention, and its implications. This followed detailed discussion and consideration of the draft, both within Government and, for example, in Parliament itself. Members of Parliament took part in the Convention, and committees of Parliament have issued so far this year over a dozen reports on the Convention text.

Cyprus

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer of 16 October 2003, Official Report, column 336W, on Cyprus, what concerns over the Cyprus settlement negotiations were raised during the most recent EU Working Group on south-east Europe; what decisions were taken to address these concerns; and if he will make a statement. [134428]

Mr. MacShane: Member states agreed at the 8 October Working Group that the EU should continue to do all in its power to bring about the conditions necessary for a resumption of talks on the basis of the UN Secretary-General's comprehensive proposals. We continue to share the Secretary-General's judgment about what those conditions are, including the clear demonstration of sufficient political commitment by the parties concerned. The EU has already made a key contribution to the settlement process by signalling its willingness to accommodate the terms of a Cyprus settlement arrived at under UN auspices.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports (a) he, (b) his Department and (c) representatives of the United Kingdom Government have received of incursions of Rwandan troops into the Democratic Republic of the Congo; what discussions he has had with representatives of the Government of Rwanda concerning these reports; what assurances were (i) requested and (ii) offered during these discussions; and if he will make a statement. [134469]

Mr. Mullin: We are aware of continuing reports of incursions of Rwandan troops into the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC). These reports have been investigated by the UN Mission in the DRC (MONUC) and found to be unsubstantiated. We discuss such reports with the Government of Rwanda, at both Ministerial and official level. They have assured us their armed forces withdrew from DRC in October 2002, as provided for in the Pretoria Agreement of 30 July 2002, and have not re-entered.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports (a) he, (b) his Department and (c) representatives of the United Kingdom Government have received on the regrouping of Interahamwe militia groups in the Democratic Republic of the Congo; what assessment his Department has made of the impact on security in the region; and if he will make a statement. [134470]

Mr. Mullin: We are aware of reports that Interahamwe militia and ex-Forces Armees Rwandaises (ex-FAR/I) in the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) are regrouping. While these reports are difficult to verify, the ex-FAR/I pose a real threat to the security of Rwanda and the stability of the region as a whole. Their disarmament, demobilisation, repatriation, resettlement and reintegration (DDRRR) is crucial to long-term stability. The UN mission in the DRC (MONUC) is mandated to undertake voluntary demobilisation of the ex-FAR/I and other foreign armed groups in DRC and we fully support their efforts. We are encouraged by the recent statement of the Transitional National Government (TNG) in Kinshasa, that the TNG would no longer tolerate the presence on its national territory of the ex-FAR/I. The recent visit to Kinshasa by a high-level Rwandan delegation to discuss how the two countries can work together to help resolve this problem is a further positive sign.

EU External Action Service

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what budget, and how many staff, are planned for the EU External Action Service, as defined in the Declaration attached to the Draft Constitution. [134310]

Mr. MacShane: The Inter Governmental Conference has not yet discussed the issue of the proposed European External Action Service. Firm decisions on the budget and staff numbers will depend on the outcome of the Inter Governmental Conference.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contribution in (a) money and (b) personnel the UK plans to make to the European External Action Service under the Declaration to the Draft EU Constitution. [134311]

Mr. MacShane: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave to him today (UIN 134310). The United Kingdom contribution to the European External Action Service will depend on the decisions taken on the service's budget and staff.

EU Working Group on South East Europe

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the EU Working Group on South East Europe last met; where it met; what issues were on the agenda; and if he will make a statement. [134427]

Mr. MacShane: The Working Group last met in Brussels on 8 October. Topics discussed included the state of the Cyprus settlement process, political developments in the north of Cyprus, the EU's trade and aid package for the north of Cyprus, education for Greek Cypriots in the north of Cyprus, Turkey's internal situation, Turkey's EU accession course and the Loizidou case.

The Government are determined to do all they can to achieve peace, prosperity and security in south-east Europe. We believe that a Cyprus settlement on the basis of the Annan plan and Turkey's fulfilment of the requirements for EU membership, followed by Turkish accession to the EU, are fundamental to that goal.

European Agencies

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer of 16 October 2003, Official Report, column 332W, on European Agencies, which other countries have bid for the location of European Maritime Safety Agency (EMSA); and if he will make a statement. [134424]

Mr. MacShane: Four other countries have bid to host the European Maritime Safety Agency (EMSA): Portugal, Greece, Italy and France. No agreement on the location of the EMSA is yet in sight.

Iraq

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how long the search in Iraq for weapons of mass destruction will continue. [132313]

Mr. MacShane: No time limit has been set for completion of the search. It will continue for as long as it is necessary to satisfy ourselves that no weapons or associated programmes remain in Iraq.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made by the Consular Assistance Group in recovering a constituent, Mr. Raeid Jewad's, camcorder that was confiscated by US soldiers in Iraq; and what progress has been made to secure Mr. Jewad compensation for the loss of his possession. [132994]

Mr. Mullin: We have made inquiries with US military authorities. They have assured us that they are looking into the matter. We shall continue to press them for a formal response.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British personnel are part of the Iraq Survey Group (ISG); who commissioned the ISG report; and if he will make a statement. [133779]

Mr. Straw: As at 20 October there were 65 UK personnel under the control of the Iraq Survey Group. The Iraq Survey Group's interim report presented on 2 October was produced on the basis of an understanding by Dr. Kay that a progress report should be produced. There is no formal requirement on the ISG to report according to a particular timetable.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department has received the full version of the Iraq Survey Group report; and if he will make a statement. [133780]

Mr. Straw: A full copy of the interim report of the Iraq Survey Group was passed to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office at the time of its presentation.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I have both publicly stated the Government's position with regard to the report and the continuing search for Iraqi weapons of mass destruction.

Malaysian Prime Minister

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the speech by the Malaysian Prime Minister at the opening of the Organisation of the Islamic Conference Summit in Kuala Lumpur on 16 October; what discussions (a) he (b) members of his Department and (c) representatives of the United Kingdom Government have had with (i) members and (ii) representatives of the government of Malaysia regarding this speech; and if he will make a statement. [134431]

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: Dr. Mahathir's comments about Jews in his speech to the Organisation of the Islamic Conference Summit on 16 October were totally unacceptable. I summoned the Malaysian high commissioner on 17 October, and made our position clear. I said it was particularly regrettable that some welcome messages in Dr. Mahathir's speech—such as negotiation as the path to peace, and the futility of terrorism—had been overshadowed by his outburst about Jews.

On 20 October the British high commissioner in Kuala Lumpur repeated our position to the Secretary General of the Malaysian Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The Secretary General argued that Dr. Mahathir had made clear repeatedly that he was not anti-Semitic, and that the speech showed his unequivocal opposition to terrorism and the use of violence in Palestine, including suicide bombings.

The EU Presidency issued a statement on 16 October condemning Dr. Mahathir's remarks on behalf of all member states.

Pamplona Bull Run

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Spanish Government in respect of the welfare implications of the running of the bulls in Pamplona. [135093]

Mr. MacShane: The Government takes seriously reports of cruelty to animals. Where appropriate, our Embassies overseas, including our Embassy in Madrid, bring such issues to the attention of the government concerned, and encourages them to adopt acceptable standards of animal welfare. They also convey the strength of public opposition in the UK to the exploitation of animals overseas.

Passport Renewal (Harare)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the cost is for renewal of a British passport at the British High Commission in Harare; and what the cost was on (a) 1 January 1997, (b) 1 January 2000 and (c) 1 January 2003. [135030]

Mr. Mullin: The fee charged by any British Diplomatic Mission to issue a standard adult passport is currently £56.50. The fee has previously been set at:

(a) 1 January 1997—£18.00
(b) 1 January 2000—£49.00
(c) 1 January 2003—£54.40

The fee recovered would have been the local currency equivalent of the above sterling amounts.

Proliferation Security Initiative Group

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what (a) matters were discussed, and (b) decisions were taken, at the meeting of the Proliferation Security Initiative Group of States in early October; what resources are committed in support of this initiative; when future meetings will be held; and if he will make a statement. [133311]

Mr. MacShane: The Chairman's conclusions from the meeting were published on 10 October, and can be found on the Foreign and Commonwealth Office website at www.fco.gov.uk/internationalsecurity. I refer my hon. Friend also to the written statement that I made to this House on 22 October.

For the present, work on the initiative is being funded from within existing resources. Any decisions regarding the commitment of additional resources to the initiative will be taken on a case-by-case basis dependent upon future operational requirements. The next meeting of the Proliferation Security Initiative will be held in Portugal early in 2004.

Rebel Groups (Kenya)

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the progress of the discussions between the Sudanese Government and rebel groups in the Kenyan town of Naivasha; what assessment he has made of the likelihood of significant progress in 2003; and if he will make a statement. [134718]

Mr. Mullin: We are optimistic about the prospects for peace between the Government of Sudan (GoS) and the Sudanese People's Liberation Movement (SPLM). We assess that there is a good chance of agreement this year or early next year. The latest round of talks adjourned on 26 October for the month of Ramadan. There are outstanding problems which need to be resolved, on power and wealth sharing, the three conflict areas (of Southern Blue Nile, the Nuba Mountains and Abyei) and ceasefire and security issues. Discussion of these issues is expected to resume on 1 December. We are confident that, with the continued commitment of both parties, there will be no barriers to signing a peace deal. On 25 September, the parties signed a Framework Agreement on Security Arrangements during the Interim Period.

We continue to offer the parties and mediators our full support and advice and remain actively involved in helping them reach a comprehensive peace agreement.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Access to Work Programme

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people with disabilities enrolled in the Access to Work Programme in Northern Ireland in each of the last three years. [133875]

Jane Kennedy: The number of people with disabilities on the Access to Work programme in each of the last three years is as follows:

2000–01—495
2001–02—540
2002–03—620

Energy Industry

Lembit Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to the Answer of 11 June 2003, Official Report, column 957W, on the energy industry, what mechanisms for reducing energy costs in Northern Ireland are planned to enable a more efficient means of financing energy assets and contracts; and if he will make a statement. [122807]

Mr. Pearson: A working group of economists is examining a range of mechanisms, including a legislative low cost borrowing option, for reducing energy costs in Northern Ireland and is due to report shortly. The outcomes of discussions on the consultation papers "Competition and Customer Empowerment" published by the Regulator on 4 March 2003 and "Towards a New Energy Strategy for Northern Ireland", published by the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment on 17 April 2003, will also shape future announcements in this area.

Lembit Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what targets he has set for the working group set up to examine practical options for reducing energy costs in Northern Ireland; when the working group is due to report; and if he will make a statement. [122808]

Mr. Pearson: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my reply to PQ Written No 122807. No targets have been set for the working group which is expected to report shortly.

Lembit Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Government will make a decision on the introduction of legislation to reduce the cost of borrowing in the Northern Ireland energy market sector; and if he will make a statement. [122809]

Mr. Pearson: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to PQ Written No 122807. A legislative low cost borrowing mechanism is one of the options being examined by the working group of economists which will report to me shortly.

Saville Inquiry

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will estimate the costs of the Saville Inquiry, broken down by the cost of (a) instructing solicitors, (b) instructing counsel, (c) inquiry accommodation, (d) travel and accommodation for (i) relatives of the victims and (ii) other witnesses and (e) other costs. [129905]

Mr. Spellar: Up to end August 2003 the cost of the Bloody Sunday Inquiry was £119.7 million. The cash spend by the Northern Ireland Office on the Inquiry was a total of £94.6 million. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence advises me that his Department has spent £25.1 million. Breaking these down in the categories requested gives the following figures:

	NIO	MOD
(a) Instructing Solicitors	24,160	7,300
(b) Instructing counsel	15,630	15,400
(c) Inquiry Accommodation	13,517	330
(d) Travel and Accommodation for
(i) relatives of the victims	467
(ii) other witnesses	32	44
(e) Other costs	[1]40,801	[2]2,100

[1] Figure includes salary costs of Tribunal members (except Lord Saville) and Inquiry staff, IT equipment, expert witnesses, office services and security, telecommunications and other miscellaneous office expenditure.
[2] For the MOD the figure includes Inquiry related staff and support costs, an MOD Police Investigation and other miscellaneous fees and expenses.
Totals may not be exact due to rounding.

Vocational Courses

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many further education students enrolled in vocational courses in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years. [133874]

Jane Kennedy: The following table provides information relating to vocational enrolments in Northern Ireland Further Education Colleges from 1998/99 to 2001/02. The data details all enrolments on vocational courses at levels of study 1–5, over the entire academic year. Full year data has only been collected since 1998/99, and 2001/02 is the most recent year for which this information is available.

	Enrolments
2001/02	121,930
2000/01	130,744
1999/2000	124,219
1998/99	117,376

Note:
The drop in enrolments for 2001/02 can be attributed to: (i) the reduction in the number of Further Education Colleges from 17 to 16 (following the merger of NIHCC with the University of Ulster) and (ii) changes regarding the re-alignment of vocational/non-vocational computing courses.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Executive Agencies

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the executive agencies that have been established by his Department since 1997; and how much has been spent on (a) staffing and (b) resourcing these agencies. [134851]

Mr. Charles Clarke: None.

Fairtrade Products

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) if he will take steps to encourage more schools to establish Fairtrade tuckshops; and if he will make a statement; [132985]

(2) what steps he will take to encourage the use of Fairtrade products in school meals. [132986]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: Nutritional standards prescribe the types of food that should be available from the four main food groups, but the content of the school meal and what is sold in tuck shops is decided by the LEA or the governing body of a school. However, in the Sustainable Development Action Plan that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State launched on 23 September, we have made clear the importance we attach to all forms of sustainable food procurement, including fair trade products, and are committed to disseminating good practice.

Homebuy Scheme

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills whether eligibility for Key Teacher Homebuy loans will be affected by total family income. [134603]

Mr. Miliband: The package of assistance announced by the Secretary of State on 21 October is designed to help retain good teachers within London with the potential to rise to leadership positions within the profession, by enabling them to purchase the types of homes that suit their needs but which may have been beyond their means until now. Although we are still in the process of finalising full details, it is very likely that teachers will only be eligible if their total family income is below a certain level.

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills whether the Key Teacher Homebuy scheme will be available to teachers in all subjects. [134604]

Mr. Miliband: The package of assistance announced by the Secretary of State on 21 October is designed to help retain good teachers within London with the potential to rise to leadership positions within the profession, by enabling them to purchase the types of homes that suit their needs but which may have been beyond their means until now. Although we are still in the process of finalising full details, it is very likely that teachers in any subject will be eligible to apply.

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills whether Key Teacher Homebuy loans will be repayable in the event of teachers (a) taking a sabbatical, (b) taking a period of secondment and (c) moving to employment in (i) an independent school and (ii) an academy in London. [134605]

Mr. Miliband: The package of assistance announced by the Secretary of State on 21 October is designed to help retain good teachers within London with the potential to rise to leadership positions within the profession, by enabling them to purchase the types of homes that suit their needs but which may have been beyond their means until now. Eligible teachers will be required to demonstrate an ongoing commitment to working within maintained sector schools (as well as Academies) within London. However, in the case of sabbaticals, secondments and work in the independent sector, periods of up to two years will be permitted before loans become repayable.

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills whether teachers will have to repay equity loans under the Key Teacher Homebuy scheme (a) on retirement, (b) on retiring on grounds of ill-health and (c) when made redundant. [134612]

Mr. Miliband: The package of assistance announced by the Secretary of State on 21 October is designed to help retain good teachers within London with the potential to rise to leadership positions within the profession, by enabling them to purchase the types of homes that suit their needs but which may have been beyond their means until now. Although details are still to be finalised, we would normally only expect loans to be repaid when a property is sold or if a teacher is no longing teaching in London for more than two years, or if a teacher wishes to own the property outright and chooses to repay the loan.

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what criteria he will use to assess a teacher's suitability for an equity loan under his Department's Key Teacher Homebuy Scheme. [134613]

Mr. Miliband: The package of assistance announced by the Secretary of State on 21 October is designed to help retain good teachers within London with the potential to rise to leadership positions within the profession, by enabling them to purchase the types of homes that suit their needs but which may have been beyond their means until now. We are currently working with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to develop a system that will enable us to be able to identify and prioritise those teachers who might be eligible. We expect to be able to publicise this information before the end of the year.

Modern Apprenticeships

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what plans he has to encourage the creation of modern apprenticeships in the photographic sector; and if he will make a statement. [133703]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The Government are firmly committed to their Modern Apprenticeships (MA) programme across all sectors, including the photographic sector in England. We have demonstrated that by first commissioning and then, jointly with the Learning and Skills Council, implementing the recommendations of the Modern Apprenticeship Advisory Committee. Photography featured in the Modern Apprenticeships TV advertisements last year aimed at young people. Under Sir Roy Gardner a business-led Modern Apprenticeship Task Force is taking a key role in promoting MA to employers and thereby contributing to increased take-up. In doing so we are able to raise both the quality and expand the number of opportunities available. This action supports the Government's broader aims announced in our Skills Strategy White Paper "21st Century Skills" published recently.

The Learning and Skills Council in England determines the allocation of MA places for each sector based on local labour market needs. It is working closely with the Connexions Service, the new Sector Skills Councils (SSC) and others to increase demand for places from both young people and employers. While the number of MAs in the photographic industry is currently small, it is planned that Skillset the Trailblazer SSC for the Audio Visual Industries will shortly include Photo-Imaging, offering an exciting opportunity to further develop effective training for the sector. The number of MAs in learning are at the highest level since they were introduced in 1994—at 234,100. Over 750,000 have started since 1997.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many young people in (a) Birkenhead and (b) Wirral have entered (i) an advanced modern apprenticeship and (ii) a foundation modern apprenticeship since the schemes' inception. [134343]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The information is not available for the areas requested by my right hon. Friend. However, information is available for old Training and Enterprise Council (TEC) areas and new Learning and Skills Council (LSC) areas. The table below shows the number of starts on modern apprenticeships in Greater Merseyside Learning and Skills Council (LSC) between the 26 March 2001 and the end of July 2003, as well as the number of starts from the inception of the programmes until 25 March 2001 in the four TEC areas that became part of Greater Merseyside LSC area.

Time period	TEC/LSC	Advanced MA	Foundation MA
Inception to March 01	CEWTEC[1]	5,500	2,500
	Merseyside	11,900	8,800
	St. Helens CCTE	1,800	1,000
	North & Mid Cheshire[1]	5,300	1,636
March 01 to July 03	Greater Merseyside LSC	4,600	11,000

[1] Some of the old TEC area became part of Greater Merseyside LSC, but some of the old TEC area also became part of Cheshire and Warrington LSC.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) when he will reply to the question tabled by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead on 8 September, reference 129229; [133832]

(2) when he will reply to the question tabled by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead on 8 September, reference 129168; [133833]

(3) when he will reply to the question tabled by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead on 8 September, reference 129169. [133834]

Margaret Hodge: I refer my right hon. Friend to the answer given on 20 October.

School Budgets (Lincolnshire)

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the schools in (a) North Lincolnshire and (b) North East Lincolnshire which ran a deficit budget in the year ending 31 March; and how much each deficit was. [132650]

Mr. Miliband: Information on those schools with deficits in the financial year 2002–03 will be contained in the outturn statement which all local education authorities are required to publish under section 52 of the School Standards Framework Act 1998. Figures for the year ending 31 March 2003 are not yet available for North Lincolnshire and North East Lincolnshire: I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as they are.

School Exclusions

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many (a) temporary and (b) permanent exclusions were made by (i) primary, (ii) secondary schools and (iii) all schools in each year since 1997, broken down by local education authority. [133690]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Information on fixed term exclusions is not yet available centrally. The Department has recently started to collect information from local education authorities on both fixed term and permanent exclusions on a termly basis. However, reliable findings from this data collection exercise are not expected to be available until next year.

A table showing information requested on permanent exclusions has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

School Setting (West Sussex)

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his Answer of 6 October 2003, Official Report, column 1142W, on school setting, what percentage of maintained schools in West Sussex LEA inspected by Ofsted between 1995 and 2002 in (a) year 7, (b) year 8, (c) year 9, (d) year 10 and (e) year 11 were recorded as set by ability in (i) maths, (ii) English, (iii) science and (iv) modern foreign languages. [135026]

Mr. Miliband: This is a matter for Ofsted. HM Chief Inspector, David Bell, will write to the hon. Member and place a copy of his letter in the Library.

School Funding

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many Kent schools have made recent representations to him about school funding; and what response he has made. [134730]

Mr. Miliband: We have received a number of recent representations from Kent schools about education funding issues. In response, we have referred to the Secretary of State's statement on 17 July when he announced the changes we propose to make to restore stability to school funding in 2004–05 and 2005–06. We have been working with national partners on the detail of his proposals and the Secretary of State will be announcing the outcome shortly.

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the salary costs for each local education authority of (a) all staff, (b) all school staff, (c) school teaching staff and (d) school non-teaching staff were in each year since 1997. [133697]

Mr. Miliband: I refer the hon. Member to his previous question on 30 April 2003, Official Report, column 419W, for the reply. Figures for the year ending 31 March 2003 are not yet available: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as they are.

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what further measures he proposes to take to protect school budgets from the effects of the changes to the grant formula. [134673]

Mr. Miliband: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced, in his statement to the House on 17 July, that in each of the next two years, every local authority will receive an increase in its Formula Grant from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister which is at least as large as the increase in its Schools Formula Spending Share (SPSS). He expects to make a further announcement on schools funding in 2004–05 and 2005–06 shortly.

Each local authority's provisional Formula Grant and SPSS increases for 2004–05 will be announced as part of the provisional Local Government Finance Settlement in mid-November.

Standard Attainment Tests

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when he will publish the findings of the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority investigation into the Standard Attainment Test at 7, 11 and 14 submitted to the QCA in January 2002. [135020]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: The Qualifications and Curriculum Authority (QCA) will make the report available before the end of the year and I have asked the Chief Executive of the QCA to write to the hon. Member about this matter.

Student Loans

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the income starting point for repayment of student loans by new graduates was in each of the last 10 calendar years. [134505]

Alan Johnson: There are two types of student loan. Borrowers who started their courses before the 1998/99 Academic Year are liable to repay fixed-term (mortgage-style) loans. Income contingent loans apply to the vast majority of borrowers who entered higher education from the 1998/99 Academic Year.

Under the mortgage-style loans scheme, a student can apply to defer their loan repayments for a year at a time if their income is not more than 85 per cent. of national average earnings. This deferment threshold is recalculated annually in line with figures published by National Statistics, and is currently £21,364 for the year starting 1 September 2003. Any change to the 85 per cent. threshold would require primary legislation and we have no plans to make such a change.

The threshold for repaying income contingent loans is an annual income of £10,000. Borrowers over this threshold are liable to repay 9 per cent. of their income over £10,000. The repayment scheme came into effect in April 2000. The level of the threshold will rise to £15,000 from April 2005.

The information requested is provided in the table for both mortgage style and income contingent loans:

Income contingent loans repayment threshold	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	10,000	10,000	10,000

Teachers' Income Tax

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimate he has made of the (a) number and (b) percentage of teachers who pay income tax at the higher rate. [134342]

Mr. Miliband: The amount of income needed for a teacher to become a higher rate tax payer will depend on their own and their family's circumstances. As we do not collect information on teachers' financial and family circumstances we are unable to make a reliable assessment of the number or percentage of teachers paying income tax at the higher rate.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Bond Security Scheme

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what research his Department has carried out to assess the feasibility of launching a bond security scheme for tenants in rented property; and what studies he has received of bond security schemes for tenants in rented property in Australia. [135039]

Keith Hill: Cost-benefit assessments of intervention measures were carried out for the consultation on protection of tenancy monies, based on research by the University of York and data from the pilot Tenancy Deposit Scheme. In 1998, a review of deposit schemes operating in Canada, New Zealand and Australian states was carried out.

Correspondence

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he will reply to the letters from the hon. Member for West Worcestershire of 4 June and 22 August. [134511]

Yvette Cooper: I replied to the hon. Member on 27 October 2003.

Council Housing

Mr. Steen: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will take steps to enable elected members of district councils to view the names of those on the councils' housing waiting lists; and if he will make a statement. [134832]

Mr. Raynsford: There are no plans to enable elected members of district councils to view the names of those on the councils' housing waiting lists. There is no legislative provision for such access, and it is difficult to see how it is compatible with the provisions of the Data Protection Act.

Mr. Purchase: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will estimate the impact of an additional £50 million per annum investment on housing rents of a local authority owning 25,000 properties, managed by (a) the local authority and (b) an arm's length management organisation. [135198]

Keith Hill: There should be no impact on rents on properties managed by either a local authority or an arm's length management organisation provided that the managing organisation is implementing the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's proposals on rent restructuring.

Council Housing Stock

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether Government grants to local councils are affected by whether they have retained control of council housing stock. [133770]

Keith Hill: Housing Revenue Account (HRA) subsidy is payable to all housing authorities who retain control of their housing stock, including those who have set up an Arms Length Management Organisation (ALMO) or entered into a Private Finance Initiative (PFI) contract. HRA subsidy entitlement is calculated on the basis of assumed need. An authority that has no housing stock, and has closed its HRA, will not therefore be entitled to HRA subsidy.

Funding provided to support housing investment by local authorities is based on indices which reflect a range of housing needs including the renovation backlog in the council housing stock. Again, these indices will be adjusted when stock is transferred to a registered social landlord.

Council Tax

John Mann: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how much the Band D council tax is for each constituency in England. [134997]

Mr. Raynsford: Figures for the average Band D council tax for each parliamentary constituency in England are not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. This is because the boundaries of most constituencies do not coincide with those of local authorities, and figures are not collected in such a way as to allow reliable estimates for constituency areas to be produced.

It is possible, however, to provide figures for the average Band D area council tax for 2003–04 for each of the billing authority areas lying partly or wholly within each English parliamentary constituency. A table giving this information is available in the Library of the House.

Councillors (Tenure)

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister pursuant to the answer of 20 October 2003, Official Report, column 403W, on councillors (tenure), when he expects to bring forward legislation to extend the tenure of those councillors affected. [134937]

Mr. Raynsford: The Government will shortly be launching a consultation paper on drafts of the relevant Statutory Instruments. It hopes to be able to lay a final draft before the House by the end of this year, and subject to parliamentary approval, make the order by the end of January 2004.

Family Houses

Bob Russell: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister (1) how many family houses for rent he estimates will be built in the Colchester constituency in the next two years from the funds he has provided for the east of England; [135089]

(2) how many family houses for rent he estimates will be built in the east of England over the next two years from funds he has allocated. [135090]

Keith Hill: It will be for Regional Housing Board to prioritise the use of resources the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has provided to the east of England amounting to £3[illegible] million over two years (2004–05 to 2005–06). Where funding is being provided by the Housing Corporation, registered social landlords (RSLs) will be expected to bid for funds in line with both regional and local priorities, the latter being set by the local authorities.

At this stage we expect that funding over this period will provide around 5,500 completions of homes in the east of England. These homes will be for rent or for low cost home ownership.

The Housing Corporation launched their bidding round on 24 October under which they will be allocating the resources for 2004–05 and 2005–06 to RSLs

Figures at constituency level are not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Bob Russell: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many families in the east of England he estimates are living in accommodation of a size below recommended standards. [135091]

Keith Hill: There are no recommended standards for occupancy but the "bedroom standard" has been used as a statistical measure of under-occupancy/overcrowding since the 1970's. Using data from the Survey of English Housing, averaged over the years 2000–01, 2001–02 and 2002–03 in order to provide a sufficiently large sample, the estimated number of households in overcrowded accommodation (i.e. one or more bedrooms below the standard) in the east of England was 35,000 households or 1.6 per cent. of all households in the region. For the whole of England there were estimated to be 501,000 households i.e. 2.4 per cent.

Green Belt

Mr. McWalter: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will take steps (a) to conserve the green belt in Hertfordshire and (b) to ensure that towns to the north of the M25 retain their distinctive character and are not joined together by ribbon development. [134544]

Keith Hill: Hertfordshire is an area with strong housing pressures and very high house prices. Much of the county is covered by green belt. Through the Communities Plan the Government are committed to addressing the housing shortage in the greater south east by ensuring house building rates in existing plans are met and, where appropriate—with a strong emphasis on the growth areas—such rates are increased.

Government policy is that the essential characteristic of green belts is their permanence, that established boundaries should only be reviewed in exceptional circumstances, and that at the regional level the extent of green belt should at least be retained.

Notwithstanding the presumption that capacity within urban areas should be used first and the exemplary approach of Hertfordshire county council towards developing urban capacity, we accept that in the Hertfordshire context some limited local releases of green belt are likely to be required. The location of these will be defined through the regional planning and local planning processes. This will not lead to changing the distinctive character of individual towns and will ensure they are not joined by ribbon development.

Local Elections

Dr. Pugh: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what percentage of councils, excluding parish and town councils, are under Labour majority control in England, broken down by region. [134344]

Mr. Raynsford: The information requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Local Government Formula

Mrs. Calton: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the real terms percentage change in (a) local government formula and (b) one-off grant funding was, broken down by (i) spending area and (ii) council, in each year since 1997–98. [133608]

Mr. Raynsford: Figures for English local authorities are available in the Library of the House.

London Bridge Tower

Simon Hughes: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he will make a final decision on the planning application for the London Bridge Tower. [135159]

Keith Hill: The Inspector's report is currently under consideration and a decision will be issued as soon as possible.

Millennium Dome

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what public money has been used to support the Millennium Dome since its closure. [133542]

Keith Hill: The New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) was responsible for maintaining the Dome, and decommissioning its contents, from its closure on 31 December 2000 to end of June 2001. During this period, NMEC incurred expenditure of £8.2 million funded by the Lottery, although partially offset by net income of £3.9 million from the sale of assets following closure.

English Partnerships (EP) took over responsibility in July 2001, since when it has incurred expenditure of £6.3 million on maintaining the Dome, up to the end of August 2003. EP has also incurred expenditure of £6.7 million on decommissioning the Dome's contents and site preparation for its long-term use, and £7.4 million in connection with the current sale process, from February 2001 to the end of August 2003. £6.7 million was spent by EP on the earlier competition to find a long-term use for the Dome, which began in March 1999 and ended in February 2001. EP has received income, net of VAT, of £0.9 million for events held at the Dome since it became available for such use at the end of 2001, thereby reducing the amount of public money used to support the Dome. The remaining EP expenditure, and their future costs, will be recovered from eventual sale proceeds.

Mobile Phone Masts

Bob Russell: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will grant local authorities more powers to refuse applications by mobile telephone companies to erect telephone masts; and if he will make a statement. [132819]

Keith Hill: On 22 August 2001, the Government significantly strengthened the planning arrangements for telecommunications development. There are no plans to change these arrangements at present.

Park Homes

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will introduce a separate band of council tax for people who live in park homes; and if he will make a statement. [135004]

Mr. Raynsford: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is aware of the concerns about the current width of band A from people who live in lower value dwellings like park homes. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has announced that it will have a council tax revaluation in England in 2007 based on 1 April 2005 values and ahead of that will listen to the views of local government and taxpayers about council tax bands. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will decide on any changes to the banding structure nearer to the time of the revaluation.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to introduce legislation to regulate park home sites, with particular reference to the purchasing and selling of homes; and if he will make a statement. [135005]

Keith Hill: The Select Committee's report on the draft Housing Bill recommended that the Government should commit to introducing new legislation on park homes within the next two years. I cannot pre-empt the Government's response to the Select Committee's report, which will be published next month, nor the contents of the Queen's Speech.

Planning

Tim Loughton: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to amend the Town and Country Planning General Permitted Development Order 1995 to include an additional condition to prevent development on grounds of intrusion; and if he will make a statement. [134796]

Keith Hill: As part of the planning reform agenda, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is undertaking a review of the permitted development rights granted by the Town and Country Planning (Permitted Development Rights) Order 1995. A research report commissioned from Nathaniel Lichfield and Partners Ltd. (available on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister website) makes a number of recommendations to address concerns about privacy and overlooking. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will be seeking views on these recommendations as part of a wider consultation on possible changes to the Order.

Planning Legislation (Northern Ireland)

Lembit Öpik: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the role of the planning system in delivering sustainable development in Northern Ireland. [100175]

Angela Smith: I have been asked to reply.

The Regional Development Strategy for Northern Ireland 2025, which was formulated by the Northern Ireland Assembly on 20 September 2001, sets new directions to achieve a more sustainable pattern of development in the interests of future generations. The Department of Environment in Northern Ireland has a programme to provide a full suite of Planning Policy Statements by the end of 2005 and complete up-to-date Area Plan coverage by the end of 2006.

The Planning (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order 2003 requires all Planning Policy Statements and Area Plans to be in general conformity with the Regional Development Strategy.

In Northern Ireland, statutory provisions therefore ensure that the promotion of more sustainable forms of development is embedded in all emerging Planning Policy Statements and Area Plans.

Lembit Öpik: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to introduce a statutory Purpose for Planning requirement into Northern Ireland planning legislation based on principles of sustainable development; and if he will make a statement. [100176]

Angela Smith: I have been asked to reply.

The Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill imposes a statutory duty on persons and bodies responsible for preparing Regional Spatial Strategies and Local Development Documents in England and Wales to contribute to the achievement of sustainable development.

In Northern Ireland, statutory provisions already require Planning Policy Statements and Area Plans to be in general conformity with the Regional Development Strategy 2025, which was formulated by the Northern Ireland Assembly in September 2001 and sets new directions to achieve a more sustainable pattern of development.

I can assure you, however, that consideration will be given to the need to include further provision in future planning legislation for Northern Ireland.

Regional Assemblies

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister on which dates he intends to hold the referenda on the proposed regional assemblies in (a) the North West, (b) the North East and (c) Yorkshire and Humberside; and if he will make a statement. [134403]

Mr. Raynsford: No dates have been decided for the referendums on whether to establish elected regional assemblies in the North West, North East and Yorkshire and Humberside regions.

My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister cannot order referendums until six weeks after he receives the Boundary Committee for England's recommendations on options for restructuring two-tier local government in the regions, planned for 25 May 2004.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the expected cost (a) by region and (b) in Pendle is of the postal ballot in the referendums on regional assemblies. [134611]

Mr. Raynsford: Information in the Electoral Commission's report "The shape of elections to come" suggests that the direct cost of postal referendums on elected assemblies would be around £1.10 per elector.

On this basis the cost by region of the elected assembly referendum would be £5.7 million in the north west, £4.1 million in Yorkshire and Humberside and £2.1 million in the north east. These figures assume that everyone eligible to vote returns a ballot paper. In practice costs will depend upon turnout, as this will affect postal and processing costs. There will be some additional costs in those parts of the region which also have a local referendum.

It is too soon to estimate the costs in Pendle.

Geraldine Smith: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what his latest estimate is of the cost of holding a referendum on regional government in (a) the north west region and (b) the three northern regions, including the costs of postal ballots. [134661]

Mr. Raynsford: Information in the Electoral Commission's report "The shape of elections to come" suggests that the direct cost of postal referendums on elected assemblies would be around £1.10 per elector

On this basis the cost by region of the elected assembly referendum would be £5.7 million in the north west and £11.9 million in the three northern regions.

These figures assume that everyone eligible to vote returns a ballot paper. In practice costs will depend upon turnout, as this will affect postal and processing costs. There will be some additional costs in those parts of the region which also have a local referendum.

Regional Housing Boards

Laura Moffatt: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what role the regional housing boards will play in ensuring that housing development takes place throughout the South East region. [135006]

Keith Hill: The South East Regional Housing Board will encourage local landowners, developers, registered social landlords and local authorities to work even more closely together to ensure that the region delivers the right type of housing development, in the right location, to meet the strategic needs of the region and maximise the level of public funding.

Starter Homes

Tim Loughton: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many social workers, broken down by local authority area, have benefited from the Starter Home Initiative. [134812]

Keith Hill: The priority groups for assistance under the Starter Home Initiative (SHI) are teachers, police, nurses and other essential health workers. A small number of other key workers are being helped, including social workers in some areas. Funding was allocated in 2001 and 2002 based on the bids received, the recruitment and retention difficulties being experienced across different areas and the relative cost of housing. As at 30 September 2003, 45 social workers have been helped to purchase homes under the SHI.

The following table sets out the breakdown by local authority.

Local Authority	Number of social workers assisted
Barnet	1
Basingstoke and Deane	5
Bexley	1
Brighton and Hove	4
Bristol	3
Broxbourne	1
Cambridge	5
Chichester	2
Ealing	3
Eastbourne	1
Guildford	1
Hackney	1
Hammersmith and Fulham	2
Harrow	1
Hastings	2
Kensington and Chelsea	1
Lewes	1
Oxford	1
Reading	2
Reigate and Banstead	1
St. Albans	1
Southampton	1
Watford	1
Woking	1
Wokingham	2
Total	45

Tim Loughton: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many public service workers have been assisted by the Starter Home Initiative, broken down by profession. [134813]

Keith Hill: As at 30 September 2003, over 4,500 key workers have been helped to purchase homes under the Starter Home Initiative. The following table sets out the breakdown by key worker group.

	Number of key workers helped to purchase homes
Health workers	1,961
Teachers	1,896
Police	571
Other[1]	99
Total	4,527

[1] Other key workers being helped under the Starter Home Initiative are social workers, care workers, fire fighters, transport workers, occupational therapists and (from July 2003) prison and probation service staff.

TREASURY

Bond Payment Schemes

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 6 October 2003, Official Report, column 1097W, on bond payment schemes, if he will make such an assessment. [135105]

John Healey: There are no plans to make such an assessment on bond payment schemes.

Efficiency Review

Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will publish the findings of the Efficiency Review consultation; and what recent discussions he has had with Mr. Peter Gershon, Head of the Office Government Commerce, regarding the progress of the Efficiency Review. [135009]

Mr. Boateng: The Review of Efficiency in Public Services is being independently led by Peter Gershon and it is for him to decide when to publish the results of the consultation.

Discussions with Peter Gershon and his team are held on an ongoing basis as required.

Football Clubs

Mr. Betts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which premier league and football league clubs have reached agreement with Customs and Excise over the last five years to pay off debts of less than their full value; and what the nature was of the agreement in each case. [135085]

John Healey: HM Customs and Excise are statutorily debarred from disclosing information relating to the tax affairs of individuals and of public and private sector bodies. Exemption 15 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information applies.

Homebuy Scheme (Teachers)

Mr. Brady: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in what circumstances equity loans under the Key Teacher Homebuy Scheme will be treated as a taxable benefit. [134602]

Dawn Primarolo: A loan to a teacher, as to any employee, will be a taxable benefit if it is on beneficial terms and made, or arranged, guaranteed or facilitated in any way, by the employer.

Ports of Entry (Controls)

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to introduce container and goods vehicles scanning to detect illegal entry of (a) persons and (b) goods at ports of entry. [134117]

John Healey: Mobile freight scanners were introduced by HM Customs and Excise in a phased roll-out between November 2000 and April 2003 for the detection of smuggled goods. There are currently 13 Customs scanners deployed at ports around the country.

The UK Immigration Service (UKIS) currently operates a Gamma Scanner at the port of Dover for the detection of clandestine entrants. The scanner is deployed jointly with Customs and is capable of finding clandestine entrants and goods.

A second gamma scanner, owned by UKIS, was loaned to the Belgian Federal Maritime Police in August 2003. It is operated jointly by the Belgian Federal Police and the UK Immigration Service at Zeebrugge and Ostende, and on the approach routes to both ports.

Royal Forest of Dean College

Diana Organ: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Speedwell building at the Royal Forest of Dean College is classified as a charity annex in respect of VAT; and whether its usage qualifies it for zero-rating for VAT. [134200]

John Healey: Annexes to buildings constructed by charities for non-business use can be zero-rated in certain circumstances.

I understand that Customs and Excise are currently discussing the VAT treatment of the Speedwell building with the Royal Forest of Dean College.

Second World War Debt

Tim Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much debt has yet to be repaid to the US by the UK Government in settlement of military equipment provision during World War II. [134817]

Ruth Kelly: The Supplementary Statements to the Consolidated Fund and National Loans Fund Accounts for 2001–02, presented to Parliament on 19 December 2002, provides the latest published data on these loans. As at 31 March 2002 principal of $289,985,203 (£203,641,294 at the exchange rate on that day) was outstanding on the loans provided by the United Sates Government in 1945. A further repayment of principal, amounting to US$66,381,002.61, was made at the end of December 2002, which reduced this figure. The new figure for the principal amount outstanding as at 31 March 2003 will be published in the 2002–03 Accounts in December 2003.

Taxes

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his estimate is of the proportion of (a) income tax and (b) taxes paid by each income decile in 2002–03; and if he will make a statement. [134277]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. David Laws, dated 28 October 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent question asking for an estimate of the proportion of (a) income tax and (b) taxes paid by each income decile in 2002–03. (134277)

Estimates for 2002–03 are not yet available but the attached table is based on the analysis "The effects of taxes and benefits on household income 2001–02" produced by the ONS and published on the National Statistics website on October 21st 2003. The analysis can be obtained from the House of Commons library or from the National Statistics website at http://www.statistics.gov.uk/taxesbenefits. It includes measures of income inequality for the United Kingdom as a whole based on data from the Expenditure and Food Survey.

The table shows estimates of the proportion of total tax paid by households in each income decile group where households are ranked by equivalised disposable income. Tax is defined as direct and indirect taxes. Equivalisation is a standard methodology that takes into account the size and composition of households and adjusts their incomes to recognise differing demands on resources.

The table also shows the equivalised disposable income decile points, which have been calculated separately for each year. For example, the 1st decile point is the income below which one tenth of all households are estimated to lie.

VAT

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he plans to raise rates of value added tax. [134417]

John Healey: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General gave on 15 September 2003, Official Report, column 595W, to my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan)

WORK AND PENSIONS

Hospital-acquired Infections

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many investigations by the Health and Safety Executive there have been into infections in NHS hospitals in each of the past five years. [132307]

Mr. Browne: The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) has investigated the following numbers of reportable infections to staff in NHS hospitals over the last five years:

1998–99—8

1999–2000—10

2000–01—10

2002–03—7.

With very few exceptions, infections to patients do not have to be reported to HSE. HSE has investigated some such cases, for example as a result of complaints or outbreaks affecting both staff and patients. The number of these investigations is not readily obtainable, but is likely to be fewer than the above figures.

National Insurance

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the cost to the Exchequer is of the granting of automatic national insurance contribution credits to those aged between 60 and 65 years. [133534]

Mr. Pond: These credits were introduced in 1983 to remove the need for many men in the 60 to 65 age-group, whose occupational retirement age was 60, to register as unemployed solely in order to obtain unemployment credits. These automatic credits effectively replaced unemployment credits for the majority of these men. We are unable to estimate the cost because not all people who are awarded these credits need them for benefit purposes.

Bechtel

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will list contracts for consultancy or work carried out by Bechtel in each year since 1997 stating in each case (a) the nature of the work, (b) the value of the contract and (c) the duration of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [133897]

Mr. Browne [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The Department for Work and Pensions was formed in June 2001 and has had no contracts with Bechtel.

Benefit Payments

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (1) what percentage of (a) child benefit recipients and (b) pensioners have chosen to receive their payments into (i) a normal bank or building society account, (ii) a basic bank account and (iii) a Post Office card account; [134953]

(2) how many (a) pensioners and (b) child benefit recipients have been contacted regarding the new direct payment arrangements; how many are yet to be contacted; and what deadline the Government have set for contacting these recipients. [135000]

Mr. Pond: Key figures on the progress of conversion to Direct Payment are available in the House of Commons Library, updated every four weeks. It should be noted that for statistical purposes, we cannot differentiate between a current bank account and a basic bank account.

The huge number of customers involved in the conversion process, some 13 million, means that the changes are being phased in over a two-year period.

Carers

Paul Farrelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to grant (a) the carers' allowance and (b) other financial assistance to carers over 65 years irrespective of other benefit entitlements. [133956]

Maria Eagle: The upper age limit for carer's allowance was abolished with effect from 28 October 2002. The allowance for those over 65 years is subject to the same rules as those which apply when a person below the state pension age is entitled to more than one Social Security benefit.

Only one benefit at a time can be paid in full for income maintenance. Both state pension and carer's allowance provide a measure of income replacement for individuals who have reached pension age. In these circumstances one benefit has to be adjusted by reference to the other.

As to other financial assistance, even if carer's allowance is not payable under these rules, a carer entitled to state pension credit will receive the carer premium worth £25.10 a week. There are no plans to change these arrangements.

Correspondence

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions when he will reply to the letter from the hon. Member for West Worcestershire of 20 August 2003. [134512]

Maria Eagle: I regret we have no record of the hon. Member's letter. If he would like to send a further copy, I will arrange for it to be considered urgently.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the arrangements are for piloting new disability living allowance claim forms. [132677]

Maria Eagle: On 22 September 2003, we began testing a new, shorter and simpler, postal Disability Living Allowance claim form at Wembley Disability Benefit Centre. We plan to run the test until the end of the calendar year and the findings will be evaluated in the New Year. Before starting the test at Wembley, we communicated widely with local groups representing customers with disabilities, to encourage them to cooperate in the use of the test form and to provide feedback, which will form a valuable part of the evaluation process. No decisions will be taken on further use of the new form until after the test results have been evaluated.

Job Grant

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions who will be able to apply for the job grant; how much it is worth; for how long the grant will be available; and if he will make a statement. [132949]

Mr. Browne: The Job Grant is intended to help people manage until they receive their wages when moving from benefits into work and was introduced in April 2001. It is a flat rate one-off payment of 100 payable to people aged 25 and over who have been in receipt of Income Support, Jobseeker's Allowance, Incapacity Benefit or Severe Disablement Allowance continuously for the last 52 weeks and who are moving into work of at least 16 hours a week.

From 25 October 2004, the Job Grant will be available to people receiving Job Seekers Allowance aged 25 and over, lone parents, and people of any age receiving Income Support, Incapacity Benefit or Severe Disablement Allowance. The amount payable to lone parents and couples with children will be increased to 250. In addition, the qualifying period of benefit receipt will be reduced from the current 52 weeks to 26 weeks. Access has also been extended to partners of eligible benefit recipients who take up work of 24 hours a week or more, which takes the household off benefit. Full details of Job Grant eligibility conditions have been placed in the Library.

There are no plans to discontinue the Job Grant and we regularly review our package of work incentives, of which Job Grant is an integral part, to ensure that it works effectively to help people moving from benefits into employment.

Jobcentre Plus

Mr. Francois: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many full-time workers were employed by Jobcentre Plus in Essex on 1 September. [132633]

Mr. Browne: The administration of Jobcentre Plus is a matter for the Chief Executive of Jobcentre Plus, David Anderson. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from David Anderson to Mr. Mark Francois, dated 28 October 2003:

As Jobcentre Plus is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question concerning the number of Jobcentre Plus staff employed in Essex. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

In answer to your question, a total of 1,080 full time and 433 part time staff were employed by Jobcentre Plus in Essex on 1 September 2003. This equates to 1,371 full time staff.

I hope this is helpful.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Pope: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will change jobseeker's allowance from a means-tested benefit to one based solely on contributions. [133525]

Mr. Pond: Both contribution-based and income-based jobseeker's allowance provide support to people while they are looking for work. We have no plans to change this.

Pensions

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many staff (a) from his Department and (b) not from his Department work in each local pension advice surgery. [128743]

Malcolm Wicks: Information surgeries have been set up in partnership with various organisations to provide a service in locations where customers are most comfortable conducting their business with our staff. We do not have this information in the format requested as the staffing varies from area to area, but the usual arrangement is that one member of local service staff from The Pension Service and one person from the partnering organisation run each surgery session. The latest data available shows that there are currently 2,650 weekly surgeries in place with an average session time of 1.5 hours per week. Currently, there are 2,795 (whole time equivalent) field staff employed in The Pension Service local service nationally.

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what percentage of pension credit applications to date have elected to pay into (a) post office card accounts, (b) bank accounts and (c) benefit books. [132322]

Malcolm Wicks: The information is not available in the format requested. From November, it will be possible to provide some information on the number of pension credit awards by method of payment. I will write to the hon. Member when the information requested becomes available and place a copy of my letter in the Library. Key figures on the progress of conversion to direct payment (payment into accounts) are placed in the Library and updated every four weeks.

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what (a) his estimate of the number of residents in the Manchester, Gorton constituency who qualify for pension credit and (b) the number in that constituency who have so far applied for that credit is. [134222]

Malcolm Wicks: The information is not available in the format requested. As at May 2003, the number of Minimum Income Guarantee recipients in Manchester Gorton was around 4,400. These are the latest figures available.

We intend from November to publish monthly reports on the progress of Pension Credit take-on, which will include information on the number of applications.

Notes:

1. Figures have been rounded to the nearest hundred and are expressed in thousands.
2. Figures are based on a 5 per cent. sample, and are therefore subject to a degree of sampling variation.
3. Government Office Region/Parliamentary Constituency is assigned by matching postcodes against the relevant ONS postcode directory.
4. MIG recipients are defined as Income Support benefit units where the claimant, and/or partner is aged 60 or over.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions whether, when submitting a pension credit claim form, an individual has to provide details of a capital sum expected to be received in future. [134411]

Malcolm Wicks: On applying for Pension Credit from age 65, pensioners are asked about any changes they expect to their pension income, annuities and capital over the next 12 months. If they expect to receive a lump sum payment during this period, for example, but the amount is not yet known, their award may be fixed for reassessment at the date of the expected change. If a change is expected in more than 12 months, their assessment will be fixed for the full five-year period allowed, during which time any increases in capital will be ignored.

Pensioners aged 60 and over but under 65 will not have an assessed income period set. This means that changes in circumstances will need to be declared as and when they occur in the same way as was the case under the Minimum Income Guarantee.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners are receiving pension credit in (a) Chorley, (b) the North West and (c) the UK. [134441]

Malcolm Wicks: The information is not available in the format requested. As at May 2003, the number of Minimum Income Guarantee recipients in Chorley was around 2700, in the North West was 248,600 and in Great Britain was 1,778,100. These are the latest figures available.

We intend from November to publish monthly reports on the progress of Pension Credit take-on, which will include information on the number of applications.

Notes:
1. Figures have been rounded to the nearest hundred and are expressed in thousands.
2. Figures are based on a 5 per cent sample, and are therefore subject to a degree of sampling variation.

Mr. Horam: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what representations the Government has received about the collection of a pension by a third party under the direct payment arrangements; and if he will make a statement. [133355]

Mr. Pond [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The Department regularly consults with a range of Specific Interest Groups, including Age Concern, Citizens Advice and Help the Aged to discuss issues surrounding Direct Payment.

We are committed to ensuring that all people have reasonable access to their benefits and pensions, including the collection of benefits and pensions by a third party.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions pursuant to his answer of 18 September 2003, Official Report, column 915W, on pension investment, what public education campaigns the Department has undertaken aimed at those aged 25 to 34 about the benefits of property vis-a-vis other savings products. [135037]

Malcolm Wicks: None.

Pulling Together

Paul Holmes: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how much money has been spent on the Pulling Together programme within the Department, broken down by region; and if he will make a statement. [133498]

Mr. Browne: The administration of Jobcentre Plus is a matter for the Chief Executive of Jobcentre Plus, David Anderson. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from David Anderson to Paul Holmes, dated 28 October 2003:

As Jobcentre Plus is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question concerning the amount of money spent on the Pulling Together programme. This is something that falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

The Pulling Together programme is a highly successful initiative, unique to Jobcentre Plus within the Department. It was launched in April 2002 with the formation of Jobcentre Plus which combined two distinct businesses; the Employment Service and the working age parts of the Benefits Agency. This involved bringing together around 80,000 staff, almost 1,000 Jobcentres, over 400 social security offices and many different jobs and roles whilst simultaneously introducing an entirely new way of doing business.

We introduced Pulling Together to support all our staff through this period of great business change, cementing the new organisation together through harnessing the ideas and energy of our staff. The response was enthusiastic and activities spanned a broad range from estates work to improve offices for both customers and staff, to putting active labour market information points in social security offices, to instigating a new recognition award and many, many more.

The amount spent on the Pulling Together programme, broken down by region, including the amount allocated for this year is shown in the table:

Region/country	Total
North West	2,240,000
North East	1,040,000
Yorkshire & Humberside	1,540,000
East Midlands	1,040,000
East of England	1,040,000
West Midlands	1,390,000
South East	1,240,000
South West	1,090,000
London	2,290,000
Wales	1,140,000
Scotland	1,890,000
PullingTogether central team	860,000
Total	16,800,000

The largest portion of this spend was incurred last year in the setting up of new processes and different ways of working that had to happen in order for us to deliver our new business in the most customer focused and joined-up way possible.

I hope this is helpful.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action the Government is taking to ensure that deaf people are not discriminated against in accessing mainstream primary and secondary health care. [134940]

Dr. Ladyman: Action the Government are taking to help eliminate discrimination in all its forms from health services, which includes discrimination against deaf people, includes:

The NHS Plan, which commits the Department to ensuring that public services are equitable and accessible for disabled people.

The Department of Health and the Department for Work and Pensions are co-operating on the draft Disability Bill, which will mean a significant extension of rights for disabled people in the United Kingdom.

The Department is working on a partnership framework for action on disability with the Disability Rights Commission. This will help ensure that the national health service and social care are ready to meet the requirements of the Disability Discrimination Act physical access duties from 2004.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what incentives he is giving to health trusts to ensure that deaf people are able to (a) express their consent to treatment and (b) make meaningful treatment choices. [134944]

Dr. Ladyman: Health trusts are expected to make suitable provision to ensure that all patients who cannot easily access spoken English, including those who are deaf, are enabled to make informed consent to treatment and to make meaningful choices.

It is not considered that trusts need incentives to do this but, to encourage services to become more equitable and responsive, the Department is currently undertaking a national consultation, called 'Choice, Responsiveness and Equity', which will improve patient and user experience and build new partnerships between those who use health and social care and those who work in them.

Children's Trusts

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those authorities taking part in pilot schemes for children's trusts; when the pilots (a) start and (b) finish; and what the procedure for (i) reporting on the pilots and (ii) influencing future legislation is. [134778]

Dr. Ladyman: The following authorities are children's trust pathfinders: Barnsley, Bexley, Blackburn with Darwen, Bolton, Brighton and Hove, Calderdale, Cambridgeshire, City of York, Croydon, Darlington, Devon, Ealing, East Yorkshire, Essex, Gateshead, Greenwich, Hammersmith and Fulham, Hampshire, Hertfordshire, Leicester, Newcastle, North Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, Portsmouth, Redbridge, Sandwell, Sheffield, Solihull, South Tyneside, Sutton, Telford and Wrekin, Tower Hamlets, Trafford, West Sussex and Wokingham.

The children's trust pathfinders were announced on 10 July 2003 and will run for three years as pathfinders. They will be independently evaluated over the three years and reports will be made during that period. Information from the pathfinders, including evaluation reports and the work of the national network will identify issues for any future legislation.

General Practitioners

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of GP practices in the United Kingdom that have registered children as temporary rather than permanent patients to avoid losing funding if they have a certain percentage of children registered who are not immunised. [134853]

Mr. Hutton: Everyone, including children, has the right to be registered with a general practitioner for free national health service treatment. We have no estimate of the numbers of GPs who de-register children from their patient lists in order to exclude them from the calculation of target payments for childhood immunisations. The General Medical Council and the profession itself opposes such actions and the Government expects primary care trusts to investigate any such cases.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Truswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 20 October 2003, Official Report, column 463W, on housing benefit, whether (a) his Department has responsibility for the implementation of the Care Standards Act 2000, (b) his Department has responsibility for the National Care Standards Commission that inspects and registers accommodation under the Care Standards Act 2000, (c) the form of registration applied under the Act has a direct bearing on whether residents are eligible for housing benefit and (d) his Department will liaise with the Department for Work and Pensions to ensure that people with learning disabilities capable of holding individual tenancies do not lose their entitlement to housing benefit as a result of the registration process. [135098]

Dr. Ladyman: The Department has responsibility for the implementation of the Care Standards Act 2000.

There was no intention through the Care Standards Act 2000 to widen the scope of regulation to new types of accommodation that had not previously been required to register as care homes under the Registered Homes Act 1984. Supported housing type establishments which did not need to register as care homes under the previous regulatory arrangements should not, therefore, need to register now.

The National Care Standards Commission (NCSC) was established under the Act as part of the Government's reforms to modernise the regulatory system for care services and independent healthcare. The NCSC is an independent, non-departmental public body, acting at arm's length from the Department. It regulates statutory and independent sector care services in accordance with the regulations and national minimum standards that flow from the Care Standards Act, to ensure consistency and improve the quality of life and level of protection of some of the most vulnerable people in society.

The interpretation and implementation of the regulations and standards is a matter for the NCSC, as the independent regulator, based on appropriate legal advice. It is for the NCSC, as the regulator, to satisfy itself that care home providers have complied with the regulations to ensure that care home residents' health, welfare and well-being are being protected. Providers have a right of appeal to the independent Care Standards Tribunal against the decisions of the regulator.

It is, therefore, for the NCSC to decide whether a particular establishment needs to register as a care home. Statutory guidance was issued to the NCSC in August 2002, explaining in broad terms where registration as a care home is required and how to distinguish care homes from supported housing of various kinds. Providers have a right of appeal to the Care Standards Tribunal against the decisions of the NCSC.

The Department of Work and Pensions has overall responsibility for the scope and structure of the housing benefit scheme. I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Pond), gave to him on 21 October 2003, Official Report, column 512W. We are aware that, in some cases, problems have arisen at a local level. The Department is liaising with the Department of Work and Pensions about these cases.

Nursing Homes

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the powers used by the Government on which it bases the system for the payment of the nursing element of a patient's nursing home fees. [134218]

Dr. Ladyman: The National Health Service has a general duty under section 3 of the National Health Service Act 1977 to provide nursing services to such extent as it considers necessary to meet all reasonable requirements. This duty has been delegated by the Secretary of State to primary care trusts (PCTs) pursuant to section 16B of the 1977 Act and section 17 of the same Act gives the Secretary of State the power to direct a PCT about the exercise of those functions. The National Health Service (Nursing Care in Residential Accommodation) (England) Directions 2001 directed the NHS to provide nursing care for all care home residents, where nursing care had the same meaning as in section 49(2) of the Health and Social Care Act 2001. PCTs are required to follow these Directions and guidance has been issued to PCTs about the practical operation of the system

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will issue guidance on the funding of nursing care in residential and nursing homes following the Coughlan case. [134219]

Dr. Ladyman: Guidance on the provision of National Health Service-funded nursing care in nursing homes, Guidance on NHS funded nursing care, was published on 12 March 2003. Guidance on the issues raised by the Coughlan judgement, Continuing care: NHS and Local Councils' responsibilities, was issued on 28 June 2001. There are no current plans to issue new guidance.

Radiotherapy

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what recent representations he has received about average waiting times for radiotherapy treatment; [134640]

(2) what recent representations he has received about shortages of (a) radiographers and (b) radiologists; and if he will make a statement. [134641]

Mr. Hutton: The Department has received representations from the Royal College of Radiologists, the Society of Radiographers and others about waiting times and staff shortages in radiotherapy. We are working with the Society of Radiographers and the Royal College of Radiologists to look at all ways of increasing the radiotherapy work force. We have increased the number of therapy radiographers by 10 per cent. since 1997 and to ensure future growth, we have more than doubled, by 111 per cent., the number of training places at universities. We are also extending the careers of radiotherapy staff through new ways of working, which will allow staff to develop and extend their roles in the profession. We have also increased the number of clinical oncologists by 28 per cent., with numbers set to rise further.

We are also making improvements in radiotherapy services by investment in replacement and additional radiotherapy equipment and streamlining and re-designing care processes through the cancer services collaborative.

Speech and Language Therapy

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS speech and language therapy staff have been employed in each of the last seven years. [135167]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is shown in the table. Between September 1997 and 2002, the number of qualified speech and language therapists employed in the national health service has increased by 1,089, or 22 per cent.

NHS hospital and community health services: Qualified speech and language therapy staff in England as at 30 September each specified year

	Headcount	Whole-time equivalents
1996	4,705	3,585
1997	4,871	3,742
1998	5,031	3,831
1999	5,185	3,939
2000	5,430	4,066
2001	5,685	4,207
2002	5,960	4,365

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the vacancy rates for speech and language staff, broken down by primary care trust area. [135168]

Mr. Hutton: Information on the rate of vacancies lasting three months or more for speech and language therapists for each primary care trust organisation has been placed in the Library. As at March 2003, the three-month vacancy rate in England was 3.2 per cent., a fall from 5.2 per cent. in the previous year.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hours per child subject is spent on average a year by speech and language therapists. [135169]

Dr. Ladyman: Information is not collected centrally which would enable an estimate to be made. Time spent will vary widely between different children, depending on their clinical needs.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children in England are receiving therapy from NHS speech and language professionals in England, broken down by primary care trust area. [135170]

Dr. Ladyman: Information on the numbers of children receiving therapy is not collected centrally. Information on initial contacts, to new episodes of care, is available for the age group 0–15 years, but is broken down by provider, not by primary care trust area.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many speech and language therapy sessions there were on average per week for each NHS patient receiving such treatment in each of the past five years. [134855]

Dr. Ladyman: This information is not collected centrally.

DEFENCE

Armed Forces Pensions

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what pension entitlements are available for members of (a) the reserve forces and (b) the regular forces; and if he will make a statement. [134916]

Mr. Caplin: Pension entitlement for reservists is determined by the type of Reserve Service undertaken. Members entering Full-Time Reserve Service (FTRS), and those undertaking part-time reserve service on an Additional Duties Commitment (ADC), may be entitled to pension benefits under the reservists' section of the Armed Forces Pension Scheme. Members of the Volunteer Reserve Forces are not entitled to membership of the Armed Forces Pension Scheme, except when they are called-out or mobilised for permanent service; in these circumstances, the Department will alternatively, if they so wish, pay the employer contribution to their civilian pension arrangement. Members of the regular forces are entitled to membership of the Armed Forces Pension Scheme. All members of the armed forces, whether regular, FTRS, ADC or volunteer reserve, may be entitled to benefits for an injury, illness or death that is due to military service; in these circumstances, arrangements are designed to provide that there is, at least, a broadly comparable level of benefit.

Breast Implants

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the cost to his Department of providing female soldiers with breast implants was in each of the last five years. [131913]

Mr. Caplin: The numbers of breast implant operations undertaken on female Service personnel, in Ministry of Defence Hospital Units, in each of the last five calendar years is detailed in the table.

	Number of operations undertaken
1999	7
2000	7
2001	6
2002	16
2003	4

The costs of providing each operation was not recorded separately. Such operations would be carried out for clinical reasons, such as breast reconstruction following accident or cancer treatment, and not for purely cosmetic reasons.

The numbers and costs of female Service personnel receiving breast implants in the NHS but outside of MOD Hospital Unit arrangements are not held centrally.

Cadet Forces

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much his Department will spend in 2003–04 on cadet forces; and what percentage of the overall budget of his Department that represents. [133752]

Mr. Caplin: The funding for the financial year 2003–04 is £80.5 million. This is less than one per cent. of the overall defence budget.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much his Department will spend in 2003–04 in wages for those that help out with the cadet forces; and what percentage of the overall budget of his Department that represented. [133753]

Mr. Caplin: The funding for financial year 2003–04 is £36 million. This is less than one per cent. of the overall budget.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has ever ceased to offer payment to those that assist in running the cadet forces. [133755]

Mr. Caplin: This information is not held centrally, but indications are that any cases for ceasing to offer payment are few and would have been sanctioned for sound reasons in accordance with appropriate regulations.

Call Centres

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department plans to outsource call centre work to premises outside the United Kingdom. [132110]

Mr. Caplin: The Defence Communication Services Agency manages the provision of a substantial portion of call-centre type services across the Ministry of Defence and has no plans to outsource call centre premises outside the United Kingdom.

There are some small helpdesk facilities operated within Ministry of Defence establishments in Cyprus, Germany and the Falkland Islands; these are all managed from the UK.

Defence White Paper

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to publish the Defence White Paper. [134956]

Mr. Hoon: As I said in the Defence Policy Debate on 16 October 2003, Official Report, column 275, I intend to publish a Defence White Paper later this year.

Ministry of Defence Police

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his answer of 11 September 2003, Official Report, column 375W, on military police, when the last formal inspection by HM Inspectorate of Constabulary into the MOD police investigation branch and CID was carried out; and if he will give a copy of the report to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South. [132489]

Mr. Caplin: The last formal inspection of the Ministry of Defence Police (MDP) by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary (HMIC) took place in late 2001-early 2002. The inspection process included the work of the MDP Criminal Investigation Department. The report was published in April 2002.

I will send the hon. Member a copy of the HMIC Report and place a copy in the Library of the House.

Overseas Facilities

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list his Department's permanent facilities overseas, what the cost was in each of the last five years, of maintaining each of them, to what use each facility is put; what the estimated value of each facility is; and if he will make a statement. [134648]

Mr. Caplin: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Parliamentary Questions

Adam Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will answer the question tabled by the hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr, on 15 September 2003, reference 129531. [135217]

Mr. Hoon: I replied to the hon. Member on 27 October 2003, Official Report, column 6W.

Recruitment

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his answer of 10 September 2003, Official Report, column 754W, on recruitment, if he will list the monthly recruitment numbers from January 1997 to January 2003 for (a) each of the recruitment posts in Scotland, (b) England as a whole, (c) Wales as a whole and (d) Northern Ireland as a whole; and if he will make a statement. [133654]

Mr. Caplin: The numbers of other rank enlistments for all three Services in each month from April 1997 to December 2002 are detailed in the following tables. Figures prior to April 1997 are not held centrally. Statistics for officer recruitment are not broken down by region.

Service Accommodation

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many properties were contained in his Department's married quarters estate on 1 October; and how many are held by his Department in (a) England, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales, (d) Northern Ireland and (e) overseas. [133370]

Mr. Caplin: Figures for Service Family Accommodation (SFA) in mainland United Kingdom are currently only available as at 30 September 2003 and are shown as follows.

	Number
England	45,207
Scotland	4,238
Wales	1,118
Total	50,563

Figures for SFA elsewhere are currently only available as at 1 April 2003, as shown in the following table.

	Number
HQNI	3,180
Germany	14,479
Cyprus	2,330
Falkland Islands	55
Gibraltar	576
PTC[1]	1,040
Total	21,660

[1] PTC (Personnel Training Command): includes Ramstein, Brunssum, Izmir, Naples, Lisbon and Stavanger.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many units within the married quarters estate are in (a) Standard 1 condition, (b) Standard 2 condition, (c) Standard 3 condition and (d) Standard 4 condition; [133371]

(2) how many service personnel are housed in (a) Standard 3 and (b) Standard 4 properties within his Department's married quarters estate; and what plans he has to reduce this number. [133375]

Mr. Caplin: The total number of houses in mainland United Kingdom that have been assessed for condition (more than 98 per cent. of stock) at the four standards for condition were categorised as below as at 17 October 2003.

Standard	Total number
1	23,413
2	22,692
3	3,502
4	179

Properties currently at the lower two standards will be the first to be targeted for disposals as demand falls over the next few years.

Figures for the number of houses from within the Standards 3 and 4 that are currently occupied are not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many units within his Department's married quarters estate have been upgraded in each of the last five years; and what proportion of these were upgrades to the entire estate. [133373]

Mr. Caplin: The number of houses brought up to Standard 1 for Condition in mainland United Kingdom in each of the past five financial years was:

	Number
1998–99	[1]
1999–2000	1,308
2000–01	2,733
2001–02	3,340
2002–03	1,440

[1] Figures not collected at that time

None of these years includes an instance where the entirety of any one estate was brought up to Standard 1. A number of estates are now fully at Standard 1 but these have been addressed in phases, over a number of years, to minimise disruption to both occupants and Service operational requirements. Currently, just over 50 per cent. of the core stock is at Standard 1 and over 90 per cent. of families are in properties at either Standard 1 or 2.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to publish the conclusions of his Department's Business Process Review of the Management and Delivery of Defence Housing; and if he will list those consulted in this review. [133374]

Mr. Caplin: I expect the Business Process Review of the Management and Delivery of Defence Housing to be published in the spring of 2004. A copy of the report will be placed in the Library of the House. To date, a wide range of stakeholders have been consulted including those involved in the delivery of Defence housing, their customers, other Government Departments, the trade unions and relevant bodies in the private sector. The final report will contain a full list of those consulted.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of his Department's married quarters were empty as at 30 September; and what proportion of this represents his Department's management margin required for managing change. [133378]

Mr. Caplin: At the end of September there were some 8,500 empty married properties in mainland UK. Of these:

Over 1,500 are held for future deployments

Some 900 are in the course of disposal during 2003–04 with additional properties identified as non-core and for disposal in 2004–05

Some 550 are empty undergoing or awaiting modernisation

The remainder are available to let or are already allocated or under offer to incoming families.

The Defence Housing Executive's management margin for managing change requires an on-going continuous review to ensure delivery of homes to Service families. As at 31 March 2003, the management margin (i.e. the proportion of working stock vacant) was 13.6 per cent. The DHE's long term target is to reduce this to no more than 10 per cent. by financial year 2005–06.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what his Department's disposal targets are for married quarters estate stock in each of the next five years; [133382]

(2) what his Department's targets are for reducing the void rate levels in the married quarters estate; and if he will make a statement. [133380]

Mr. Caplin: Targets set for the Defence Housing Executive (DHE) are not expressed in terms of numbers of houses for disposal but as the progressive reduction of void rates in order to achieve, by 2005–06, a management margin of 10 per cent. (the management margin is the proportion of vacant working stock required to manage change).

Some 12,000 properties have been released by DHE for disposal since January 2000. In addition, over 900 properties are expected to be released during 2003–04. To maintain progress towards the long term target of 10 per cent., a greater number of disposals is likely to be needed during 2004–05, and in subsequent years, depending on demand.

Reserve Forces

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will bring forward revisions to the Reserve Forces Call-out and Recall (Financial Assistance) Regulations 1997, S.I., 1997, No. 309. [133080]

Mr. Caplin: Work on revising SI 1997/309 (The Reserve Forces (Call-out and Recall) (Financial Assistance) Regulations is ongoing, and when it is concluded, I will make an announcement in the House. A consultation paper with proposals for revising the financial assistance available to reservists under SI 309/97 when called out into permanent service will be available at the earliest opportunity.

Vaccines

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what advice the Deputy Chief Medical Officer gave on administering pertussis vaccine together with anthrax vaccine to service personnel prior to the 1991 Gulf War. [134574]

Mr. Caplin: I refer the hon. Member to the Ministry of Defence paper: "Background to the use of Medical Countermeasures to Protect British Forces During the Gulf War (Operation GRANBY)" dated October 1997, a copy of which is in the Library of the House and available on the Internet at: http://www.mod.uk/issues/gulfwar/info/medical/mcm.htm, and to my noble Friend the Minister for Defence Procurement's written answer of 9 October 2003, Official Report, House of Lords, c. WA70.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which vaccines administered to Service personnel prior to the 1991 Gulf War were not licensed for use in the United Kingdom; and what reports he has received that vaccines were not given in accordance with the manufacturer's instructions. [134575]

Mr. Caplin: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to have a public inquiry into the use of vaccines by the Department prior to the 1991 Gulf war; and if he will make a statement. [134621]

Mr. Caplin: The Government are not convinced that such a public inquiry would help answer the basic question of why some Gulf veterans are ill. We have not ruled out the possibility that we may look at this again if circumstances were to change, but in the present circumstances, it is only through the programme of independent scientific and medical research initiated by the Government that we are ever likely to be able to establish the causes of Gulf veterans' illnesses.

HEALTH

Local Government Finance

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the transfers into and out of formula spending share for 2004–05, and grants which are due to cease at the end of 2003–04; and whether his Department plans consequently to adjust the baseline calculation for floors and ceilings. [127165]

Mr. Raynsford: I have been asked to reply.

The Secretary of State for Health intends to end three special grants in 2003–04: Deferred Payments (£40 million), Performance Fund (£96 million) and Care Direct (£2.2 million). No other transfers are planned at this stage, although the situation will not be finalised until the provisional local government financial settlement. In each case, the Government are considering whether to adjust authorities' baselines for Formula Grant and for Formula Spending Shares.

Social Care

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the budget for social services in Lancashire was in each year since 1992. [134902]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The table shows the personal social services (PSS) budget figures for Lancashire county council, for each year since 1992–93. The figures include children's services.

Social services budgets—Lancashire county council—1992–93 to 2003–04

£ million

	PSS budget
1992–93	132,406
1993–94	156,288
1994–95	182,308
1995–96	200,193
1996–97	216,873
1997–98	231,046
1998–99	191,062
1999–2000	199,798
2000–01	216,811
2001–02	231,741
2002–03	262,069
2003–04	289,932

Acetylcysteine

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the availability of Acetylcysteine on the NHS. [133094]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Acetylcysteine is available on the national health service as a prescription only medicine.

Cancer Services

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps are being taken to improve waiting times from referral by a GP to treatment for cancer services. [133892]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The NHS Cancer Plan sets out our strategy to reduce waiting times for cancer patients. A two-week outpatient waiting time standard was introduced in 2000 for all urgent general practitioner referrals of suspected cancer. In the last quarter—April to June 2003—98.5 per cent. of urgent GP referrals for suspected cancer were seen by a specialist within two weeks. By 2005, there will be targets of a maximum one month wait from diagnosis to treatment and a maximum two month wait from urgent GP referral to treatment for all cancers. Progress towards these targets is being achieved through increased investment, additional staffing levels, installing new radiotherapy and diagnostic facilities and streamlining care processes through the cancer services collaborative.

Cannabis

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the relationship between the incidence of psychosis and cannabis use. [134347]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Department monitors research into the effects cannabis has on mental health on a continuous basis. The Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs (ACMD) published a report in March 2002—"The classification of cannabis under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971"—in which it described the range of harms caused by cannabis, including its known effects on mental health. There has been a lot of debate about the use of cannabis and whether it can lead to mental illness, especially schizophrenia. No clear causal link has been proven for the latter, although recent epidemiological research has shown a stronger association than previously evident. Cannabis use can unquestionably worsen existing schizophrenia (and other mental illnesses) and lead to relapse in some patients.

In addition, on 29 September 2003, the Department published "Dangerousness of Drugs—a Guide to the Risks and Harms associated with Substance Misuse", which outlines the chronic and acute problems associated with a range of licit and illicit substances commonly used in the United Kingdom, including cannabis.

Chronic Diseases

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has commissioned into the proportion of health spending which will be needed for chronic diseases over the next 50 years. [133724]

Dr. Ladyman: The Department has not commissioned its own research into this. There is a growing body of research and evidence that highlights the increasing significance of chronic illness. The Department has work in progress looking at the future burden of diseases, including chronic illness, and exploring the implications for services and patients.

Community Health Councils

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his most recent estimate is of the number of staff employed in community health councils in England at risk of redundancy; and what the potential liability for redundancy costs is. [134582]

Ms Rosie Winterton: We estimate that 380 staff of community health councils will be made redundant. The cost of redundancy is estimated at £12 million.

Dentistry

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many dentists were accepting national health service patients in (a) Stroud, (b) Gloucestershire and (c) England in (i) 1990, (ii) 1997 and (iii) the last year for which figures are available; [131495]

(2) how many dentists in (a) Stroud and (b) Gloucestershire accept (i) national health service patients and (ii) only children as NHS patients; and how many are registered as private practices. [131496]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The table shows the number of practices providing general dental services (GDS) in England, Gloucestershire and Cotswold and Vale Primary Care Trust, which covers Stroud, at August 1990, August 1997 and August 2003.

These figures exclude salaried dentists working in the general dental service, dentists working in community dental services, personal dental services and hospital dental services and dentists who do no national health service work. Information is not collected centrally on the number of dentists who practice solely privately but it is thought that the number of such dentists is around 2 per cent.

The number of practices accepting new NHS patients for registration at October 2003 is shown in the following table. The information is obtained from the www.nhs.uk website. This information is not available for earlier years.

Some people choose not to register with a GDS dentist and only visit the dentist when they require treatment on an occasional basis. Patients may also obtain treatment from other NHS dental services, including dental access centres.

Diabetes

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure the continuity of supply of animal insulin for those diabetes sufferers who do not wish to use human insulin. [134245]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Department is in regular contact with the companies supplying animal insulin in the United Kingdom. Both companies have confirmed that they will continue to supply animal insulin for the foreseeable future.

Long-term Care

Mr. Horam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about financing for care places in London in the next financial year. [134071]

Dr. Ladyman: There have been substantial increases in the level of funding provided for social services in London and across England in recent years which local councils can use to increase local provision or to rebalance the care home market and increase fee levels if that is what is needed. Independent researchers, Laing & Buisson recently published research on fees paid to independent sector providers, which shows that fees in the care home sector have increased nationally by an estimated 8 per cent. in 2002–03—well ahead of wages. This is clear independent evidence that care home fees are being increased.

The revenue support grant for London boroughs reflects the higher costs of care in the capital, and this allows these boroughs to pay higher care home fees than local authorities in popular locations in the rest of the South East, especially on the border with London.

Care homes face special challenges, such as high capital overheads, in London and this impacts on cost and availability. In order to meet these challenges London boroughs have developed a range of services to enable greater choice for older people. This is demonstrated by the fact that in London more people are receiving intensive home care packages than in any other region of the country.

Lung Disease

Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has for the introduction of a national service framework on lung disease. [135180]

Miss Melanie Johnson: There are no plans for a national service framework (NSF) on lung disease. We are, however, taking steps to improve services for people with lung disease. The children's NSF will include childhood asthma as an exemplar condition. The NSF for chronic heart disease already has a reduction in cigarette smoking as one of its major targets. We have also banned tobacco advertising and made smoking reduction aids available on national health service prescription.

Additionally we have asked the National Institute for Clinical Excellence to prepare guidelines for the management and diagnosis of chronic obstructive pulmonary disease. We expect this guidance to be produced in 2004.

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many times since 2001 he has taken flights on departmental duties in the UK; how many of these were (a) charter flights, (b) first or club class and (c) by helicopter; and who accompanied him on each trip. [95389]

Mr. Hutton [pursuant to the answer, 12 February 2003, Official Report, c. 820W]: I regret that the previous response the hon. Member received was incorrect. The response should have read as follows:

"According to available information Ministers in the Department of Health made the following flights within the UK between 2001 and February 2003.

My right hon. Friend, the then Secretary of State (Mr Milburn) made one business class return flight, three single business class flights and one single premium economy flight. He was accompanied by one private secretary and one special adviser on four occasions.

I made four business class return flights and two single business class flights. I was accompanied by one private secretary on three occasions.

My noble Friend, the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State (Lord Hunt of Kings Heath) made two return business class flights.

In her capacity as Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend, the Member for Salford (Ms Blears) made one business class return flight and six single business class flights. She was accompanied by one private secretary on three occasions.

In her capacity as Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Public Health, my hon. Friend, the Member for Salford (Ms Blears) made three business class return flights and six single business class flights. She was accompanied by one private secretary on two occasions.

In his capacity as Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr Lammy) made three business class return flights and two single business class flights. On four occasions he was accompanied by one private secretary and by two private secretaries on one occasion.

In her capacity as Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Public Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper) made one business class return flight and was accompanied by one private secretary.

In his capacity as Minister of State for Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton Itchen (Mr Denham) made one business class return flight and was accompanied by one private secretary.

In her capacity as Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham Edgbaston (Ms Stuart) made one single business class flight.

All travel was undertaken fully in accordance with the rules set out in the Ministerial Code and Travel by Ministers, copies of which are available in the Library."

MMR Vaccine

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the Government have given to any manufacturer or supplier of (a) MMR and (b) MR vaccine (i) an indemnity, (ii) an undertaking and (iii) a letter of comfort in respect of claims or potential claims arising out of the use of such vaccines. [134581]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 27 October 2003]: No.

Pacemakers

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients received heart pacemakers in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement on the reliability of pacemakers. [134242]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Figures published in the National Pacemaker Database Annual Report for 2002 are shown in the table.

For the United Kingdom

	Total	New	Replacement
1998	23,366	18,674	4,692
1999	23,705	18,912	4,793
2000	24,916	19,439	5,477
2001	27,028	20,643	6,385
2002	25,397	19,154	6,243

The Medicines and Healthcare Products Regulatory Agency considers the overall current reliability of pacemakers to be appropriate.

Pseudoxanthoma Elasticum

Mr. Goodman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to combat PXE; and if he will make a statement. [134999]

Dr. Ladyman [holding answer 28 October 2003]: Specialised genetics services may play a role in the diagnosis of Pseudoxanthoma elasticum (PXE), and in giving advice to families about inheritance of the disease. As a result of the genetics White Paper and earlier commitments, the Government are investing substantially in genetics services.

Smog

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what his latest estimate is of the (a) mortality and (b) morbidity caused by smog in the UK; [133281]

(2) what research he has commissioned on the effects on human health caused by the emission of oxides of nitrogen from conventionally powered vehicles. [133282]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Department of Health has commissioned several research projects on the health effects of nitrogen dioxide. These include research on the interaction between nitrogen dioxide and allergens in asthmatic volunteers; research on nitrogen dioxide and exacerbations of chronic obstructive pulmonary disease; research on the impact of the 1991 nitrogen dioxide episode; research on the health effects of exposure to traffic; general air pollution projects which include nitrogen dioxide and some literature review projects. A full list of the air pollution research projects funded by the Department of Health is given on the air pollution website www.doh.gov.uk/airpollution/index.htm. The Executive Summary of a review of results of the air pollution research programme is available at www.le.ac.uk/ieh/pdf/sr4execsum.pdf.

The Department of Health's Committee on the Medical Effects of Air Pollutants (COMEAP) has reported that, in 1995–96, air pollution in Great Britain was associated with deaths brought forward in those already ill and respiratory hospital admissions as shown in the following tables.

Numbers of deaths and hospital admissions for respiratory diseases affected per year by PM_{10} (particulate matter generally less than 10 (m in diameter) and sulphur dioxide in urban areas of Great Britain

Pollutant	Health outcomes	GB urban
PM_{10}	Deaths brought forward (all cause)	8,100
	Hospital admissions (respiratory) brought forward and additional	10,500
SO_2	Deaths brought forward (all cause)	3,500
	Hospital admissions (respiratory) brought forward and additional	3,500

Numbers of deaths and hospital admissions for respiratory diseases affected per year by ozone in both urban and rural areas of Great Britain during summer only

Pollutant	Health outcomes	GB, threshold = 50 ppb	GB, threshold = 0 ppb
Ozone	Deaths brought forward: all causes	700	12,500
	Hospital admissions (respiratory) brought forward or additional	500	9,900

Source:
COMEAP(1998)

Since that time, pollution levels have reduced but COMEAP has concluded that a wider range of outcomes (such as cardiovascular admissions and loss of life expectancy due to long-term exposure) can be quantified. COMEAP will be producing a report updating the above estimates starting in 2004.

ENVIRONMENT

US Reserve Fleet (Decommissioning)

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions, between which individuals, have taken place between the Government and the US Administration in respect of the ships from the US Reserve Fleet intended for dismantling in the UK. [133364]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 21 October 2003]: There have been discussions between officials in the Department, the Department for Transport, the Maritime and Coastguard Agency, the Health and Safety Executive, and the Environment Agency, and their counterparts in the US State Department, the US Marine Administration and the US Environmental Protection Agency. These discussions covered a range of issues including the safe transportation of the vessels across the Atlantic, the environmentally sound management of wastes arising from the dismantling of the vessels, and the authorisations and notifications necessary to undertake these operations.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent assessment she has made of the potential impact on the marine environment of the Tees estuary of the planned dismantling of ships from the US Reserve Fleet. [133365]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 21 October 2003]: An assessment was made, by the Environment Agency in combination with other regulatory bodies, regarding modification of the waste management licence for the facility where the dismantling will take place. The assessment satisfied the Agency that the planned operations at the site would be unlikely to have a significant effect on the Tees estuary or the Teesmouth and Cleveland Special Protection Area. Other applications for permissions and consents relating to this case are subject to appropriate scrutiny by the relevant authorities.

Abandoned Cars

Phil Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps she is taking to deal with the problem of abandoned cars. [134348]

Mr. Morley: Defra is working closely with other Government Departments on a range of initiatives to tackle the problem of abandoned vehicles.

Our role in this has included introducing, on 9 April 2002, regulations reducing the statutory notice period after which local authorities can remove abandoned vehicles from the highway. Local authorities can now remove from the highway those vehicles that they consider merit destruction after the expiry of a 24 hour notice placed on them.

We have now consulted on a proposal to reduce the statutory notice period whereby a landowner can object to the removal of a vehicle(s) abandoned on their land. The consultation closed on 24 October. Depending on the outcome of the consultation, we may introduce a regulation in the new year to amend the Removal and Disposal of Vehicles Regulations 1986.

Climate Change

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what estimate she has made of the impact of climate change on low lying coastal areas; and if she will make a statement. [134248]

Mr. Morley: The UK Climate Impacts Programme (UKCIP) was set up in April 1997 and is funded by Defra. In April 2002, a set of scenarios, referred to as the UKCIP02 scenarios, were published. These scenarios cover four potential future UK climates based on a range of emission scenarios: low, medium-low, medium-high and high.

Overall, the report concludes that is is likely that relative sea level will continue to rise around most of the UK's shoreline. The rate of increase will depend on the natural vertical land movements in each region and on the emissions scenario. By the 2080s, the sea level may be between 26 cm and 86 cm above the current level in south-east England.

The report also concludes that extreme sea levels will be experienced more frequently. For some east coast locations, extreme sea levels could occur between 10 and 20 times more frequently by the 2080s than they do now, under the medium-high emissions scenario.

The Defra publication, "Flood and Coastal Defence Project Appraisal Guidance 3: Economic Appraisal", advises operating authorities to assume an increase in sea level of between 4 mm and 6 mm per year, where the higher level applies to the south and east of England. These allowances have been built into FM measures since the mid 1980s.

EU Shellfish Directive

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what regulatory impact assessment has been carried out to establish the likely costs to (a) water companies, (b) other companies, (c) local authorities and (d) the Environment Agency arising from the implementation of the EU Shellfish Directive. [133110]

Mr. Morley: A Regulatory Impact Assessment was prepared for the major review of designated waters under the Shellfish Waters Directive (79/923/EEC) announced in 1999. It showed (a) costs to water companies in England estimated at £81 million, (b) no costs identified at the time to other companies and (c) no costs to local authorities. Costs to the Environment Agency are taken into account in their grant received from Defra and are in the region of £320,000 for 2003–04. Costs to water companies of possible further measures are being assessed as part of the current periodic review of water prices.

Fly-tipping

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what her policy is on the use of fixed penalty notices to deter fly-tipping. [133103]

Mr. Morley: Because fly-tipping is a serious offence, it attracts penalties of up to £20,000 or six months imprisonment if convicted in a Magistrates' Court, or an unlimited fine and up to two years imprisonment if convicted in a Crown Court. Fixed penalty notices for fly-tipping are not being considered as it could give a confusing message as to the seriousness of the offence.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent research she has commissioned into fly-tipping; and if she will make a statement. [133104]

Mr. Morley: Environmental Campaigns (ENCAMS), a Defra sponsored organisation, recently carried out a study to provide information on fly-tipping. The report is available from the ENCAMS website (http://www.encams.org).

The Environment Agency have also conducted some research which has considered the types and volumes of waste illegally deposited on agricultural land. Details of this report will be published soon.

Defra are currently developing an comprehensive research project to collect data on the causes of fly-tipping, an analysis of types and locations of fly-tipped waste, consideration of how fly-tipping might best be prevented and the effect that various waste management policies, both national and local, are having and will have on fly-tipping levels. Results should be available late next year.

GM Organisms

Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will list National Grid references of trial sites where genetically modified organisms are being released into the environment under directive 2001/18/EC. [134707]

Mr. Morley: There are currently five active consents allowing companies to undertake clinical trials of GM bacteria for the development of vaccines in England. The sites of each release are set out in the following table. There are currently no field trials of genetically modified crops taking place in the UK.

Company	Type of GMO	Site of release	Ordnance Survey grid reference	Consent reference

Hazardous Waste

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will list the circumstances under which the Environment Agency treats the movement of waste as an unacceptable risk to public health. [134451]

Mr. Morley: Establishments or undertakings which transport waste on a professional basis in England and Wales, are required to be registered with the Environment Agency. Carriers of waste are also subject to the duty of care under section 34 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. Both these sets of controls are designed to minimise the risk to the environment and human health.

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the Landfill Directive which will come into force in July 2004, with reference to existing potentially toxic landfills awaiting remediation. [134452]

Mr. Morley: Under the Landfill (England and Wales) Regulations 2002, which implement the technical and regulatory components of the Landfill Directive, all hazardous waste as defined in the regulations will require treatment prior to landfill from 16 July 2004. From that date, co-disposal of hazardous and non-hazardous waste will be banned, except in certain specific circumstances. The Environment Agency is undertaking a permitting exercise that will bring all currently operating landfill sites, including hazardous waste sites, within the Pollution Protection and Control permit system. This will make the more stringent controls contained in the Landfill Directive a requirement for operating a landfill site in England and Wales.

Kirby Report

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the Government's response to the Kirby Report on remediation permits. [132664]

Margaret Beckett: The recommendations of the report "Remediation Permit—Towards a single regeneration licence" are being considered, and where appropriate, being taken forward in my Department's review of Waste Permitting. Informal consultation is currently taking place. A formal consultation on draft regulations is expected early next year. A formal response to the report will be prepared following that consultation exercise.

Livestock Support Payments

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the impact on British agriculture of decoupling carried out (a) on an historic basis and (b) on the basis of regional averages. [132661]

Margaret Beckett: We are currently consulting stakeholders on whether the historic or area model of the new Single Payments Scheme should be operated in England. Responses to that exercise will help develop our understanding of the range of environmental, social and economic impacts of each of the models including the impact on the agriculture industry and its constituent parts. An assessment has been made of the impact of each model on the distribution of CAP direct aid payments. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

TREASURY

Company Finance Market

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent discussions he has had with representatives of the Institute of Chartered Accountants of England and Wales regarding the effectiveness of the company finance market. [135071]

John Healey: The Government issued a consultation document alongside Budget 2003 called "Bridging the Finance Gap: a Consultation on Improving Access to Growth Capital for Small Businesses". The consultation explored a wide range of issues concerning the ability of firms, and in particular, small and high-growth firms, to raise the finance that they need in the market. The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales (ICAEW) were one of many interested parties who responded to the consultation. The Government are currently considering the responses that it has received from the consultation and will respond in due course.

Additionally, ICAEW is represented on an advisory group, established in Budget 2003, which is examining the role of accountants and other financial intermediaries in providing advice to firms about the financing options available to them. The group is expected to report to the Government next month.

Company Tax (EU Harmonisation)

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans the EU has for the harmonisation of company tax within the EU. [134319]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government's view is that fair tax competition is the way forward for Europe, not proposals for tax harmonisation. The Government will not support any action at European level that will threaten jobs or the competitive position of British business.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans the EU has to combat (a) fraud and (b) evasion in company taxes. [134318]

Dawn Primarolo: The ED is considering a draft proposal to amend and update the Directive on Mutual Assistance (77/799/EEC), the objective of which is to improve the functioning of procedures so as to enable Member States to deal more effectively with cross-border tax evasion and avoidance. I submitted an Explanatory Memorandum to the European Scrutiny Committee on 10 September 2003.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, (1) how he defines administrative co-operation in the draft EU constitution Article III-63 on company taxation; [134308]

(2) how he defines combating tax fraud and tax evasion in Article III—63 of the draft EU Constitution. [134320]

Dawn Primarolo: The draft EU Constitutional Treaty proposed by the Convention on the Future of Europe does not contain definitions of these terms. Any changes to the provisions of the existing EU Treaties, including those in Article HI-63 of the draft Treaty, require the unanimous agreement of all Member States. The Government has made it clear in its White Paper "The British Approach to the European Union Intergovernmental Conference 2003" that it will insist that tax matters continue to be decided by unanimity.

Departmental Employees

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many employees of the Treasury there were in each year since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [135303]

Ruth Kelly: I refer the hon. Member to the staffing figures published in the annual publication 'Civil Service Statistics' which covers permanent staff numbers (FTE basis). Copies of the publication are laid in the Libraries of both Houses. The last edition, with updates based on April 2001 data was published in June 2002.

Alternatively, this information is available at the following address on the Cabinet Office website: http://www.civil-service.gov.uk/statistics/css.htm.

EDS

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list payments made by (a) HM Treasury, (b) Customs and Excise and (c) the Inland Revenue to EDS in each of the last five financial years; and if he will make a statement. [134225]

Dawn Primarolo: The payments made to EDS in each of the last five financial years were as follows:

(a) HM Treasury

No payments made because HM Treasury has no commercial relationship with EDS.

(b) Customs and Excise

Customs and Excise Customs and Excise only have one contract with EDS through a framework contract signed on 5 July 2002.

The payments made to EDS were:

	£ million
2002–2003	1.00
2003[1]	1.21

[1] To date

Both figures were exclusive of VAT.

(c) Inland Revenue

The Inland Revenue has a contract with EDS to supply IT services to the Department. The payments made during the last five financial years were:

	£ million
1998–1999	208.4
1999–2000	252.3
2000–2001	247.0
2001–2002	299.1
2002–2003	331.9

These figures exclude VAT and payments in respect of capital purchases.

Eileen Tully Ruling

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with representatives of the Valuation Office Agency regarding the implications of the ruling in favour of Mrs. Eileen Tully against the Inland Revenue. [134501]

Dawn Primarolo: No discussions have taken place because of the very limited circumstances in which the Tully decision will have an effect elsewhere. The case was determined on the specific facts of the particular case.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the loss in potential revenue resulting from the ruling in favour of Mrs.Eileen Tully against the Inland Revenue. [134502]

Dawn Primarolo: No estimate of any potential loss of revenue has been made as a result of Mrs Tully's Lands Tribunal decision.

Energy Useage

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much (a) electricity and (b) other energy his Department has used in each year since 1997 (i) in total and (ii) per square metre; what the projected use is for each of the following years for which forecasts are made; what plans he has to reduce usage; and if he will make a statement. [135061]

Ruth Kelly: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the right hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) on 30 April 2003, Official Report, column 373W. The Chancellor's Departments will continue to ensure that they minimise energy spend/consumption while still meeting business needs. The Departments remain fully committed to meeting the challenging demands of the Government's Framework Targets.

Income Tax

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the cost would be of reducing the starting rate of tax to (a) five per cent.and (b) nought per cent.for those earning less per annum that (i) £5,000, (ii) £10,000, (iii) £15,000, (iv) £20,000, (v) £25,000 and (vi) £30,500 assuming that the starting rate continues to apply to the first £1,960 of taxable income. [133177]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 29 November 2003]: Estimates are given in the table.

Cost of reducing the starting rate of tax[1] (in £ billion)	Starting rate in 2003–04
	(a) Five per cent.	(b) nought per cent.
Total income per annum less than:
(i) £5,000	Negligible	Negligible
(ii) £10,000	0.6	1.1
(iii) £15,000	1.2	2.4
(iv) £20,000	1.7	3.3
(v) £23,000	2.0	4.1
(vi) £30,500	2.3	4.6

[1] Excludes dividends income at the starting rate

The estimates are based on the Survey of Personal Incomes 2000–01 and are consistent with the April 2003 Budget.

The figures exclude any estimates of behavioural response to the change.

Pay Statistics

Mr. Moore: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the average weekly gross pay (a) including and (b) excluding overtime for full-time workers in (i) Scotland, (ii) each of the unitary local authority areas in Scotland and (iii) Great Britain for (A) all manual, (B) all non-manual and (C) all workers in the last year for which figures are available. [134578]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Michael Moore, dated 29 October 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent question on the average weekly gross pay (a) including and (b) excluding overtime for full-time workers in (i) Scotland (ii) each of the unitary local authority areas in Scotland and (iii) Great Britain for all workers. (134578)

The attached tables show the average gross weekly gross pay (a) including and (b) excluding overtime for full-time workers in (i) Scotland (ii) each of the unitary local authority areas in Scotland and (iii) Great Britain for all workers.

The tables do not include estimates for manual and non-manual employees separately. This is because the data have been coded on the Standard Occupational Classification 2000 which does not differentiate between manual and non-manual employees. An alternative to the manual and non-manual separation can be derived from the New Earnings Survey (NES), based on the National Statistics Socio-Economic Classification (NS-SEC). However, the two classification methods do produce different results and, to avoid misunderstanding, tables based on the NS-SEC will not be used to substitute for manual and non-manual employees in publications. Hence there is no data based on the manual and non-manual separation.

The NES publication criteria state that all estimates with a sample number less than 30 or a relative standard error greater than 5 per cent. must be suppressed. A large number of estimates have been removed from the lists due to the suppression criteria. The information is based on the 2003 NES, the latest survey for which data are available, providing earnings data for April 2003.

Mr. Moore: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of full-time workers in (a) Scotland, (b) each of the unitary local authority areas in Scotland and (c) Great Britain earned gross pay less than (i) £287.93 per week, (ii) £215.95 per week and (iii) £159.60 per week for the categories (A) male manual, (B) male non-manual, (C) all male, (D) female manual, (E) female non-manual, (F) all female, (G) all manual, (H) all non-manual and (I) all workers, (1) including and (2) excluding overtime in the last period for which figures are available. [134579]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Michael Moore, dated 29 October 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent question on the percentage of full-time workers who earned gross pay beneath various thresholds in Great Britain, Scotland, and the unitary authorities in Scotland. (134579)

I am placing in the House of Commons Library, six tables showing the percentage of full-time workers in (a) Scotland (b) each of the unitary local authority areas in Scotland and (c) Great Britain who earned gross pay less than (i) £287.93 (ii) £215.95 and (iii) £159.60 per week for (A) male workers (B) female workers and (C) all workers, (1) including and (2) excluding overtime.

The tables do not include estimates for manual and non-manual employees separately. This is because the data have been coded on the Standard Occupational Classification 2000 which does not differentiate between manual and non-manual employees. An alternative to the manual and non-manual separation can be derived from the New Earnings Survey (NES), based on the National Statistics Socio-Economic Classification (NS-SEC). However, the two classification methods do produce different results and, to avoid misunderstanding, tables based on the NS-SEC will not be used to substitute for manual and non-manual employees in publications. Hence there is no data based on the manual and non-manual separation.

There are no data available for each of the unitary local authority areas in Scotland for full-time workers who earned gross pay less than £159.60 per week including and excluding overtime due to our publication criteria.

This is a result of the New Earnings Survey publication criteria, which state that all estimates with a sample number less than 30 or a relative standard error greater than 5 per cent. must be suppressed. A large number of estimates have been removed from the lists due to the suppression criteria. The information is based on the 2003 NES, the latest survey for which data are available, providing earnings data for April 2003.

Performance and Innovation Fund

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the budget of the Performance and Innovation Fund was in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [134226]

John Healey: There is no Performance and Innovation fund. However, the Policy Innovation Fund was established in the 2000 Spending Review and the first year in which allocations were made was 2001–02. The budget for the years 2001–02, 2002–03 and 2003–04 was £50 million per annum.

Stamp Duty

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he plans to increase stamp duty on homes. [134416]

Ruth Kelly: Stamp duty on house purchases will be replaced by stamp duty land tax from 1 December, but the rates for residential property purchases will be the same. Changes to the tax system are announced by the Chancellor as part of the Budget process.

Tax Credits

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer under what statutory authority he is seeking to recover overpayments of tax credits within the current financial year (a) in cases of official error and (b) in other cases. [134995]

Dawn Primarolo: Section 28(5) Tax Credits Act 2002 deals with cases where it appears likely that an overpayment of tax credits under an award will arise for a tax year. It enables the Inland Revenue to amend that award, or any other award of tax credit to the claimant(s), with a view to reducing or eliminating the likely overpayment.

Section 28(6) covers cases where a tax credits award is terminated on the grounds that those who had claimed had never, during the period of the award, been entitled to tax credits. In these cases, the amount paid under the award may be recovered as though it were an overpayment of tax credits identified at the year end.

UK Debt

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the total amount of debt owed to the UK by other countries was in the last year for which figures are available, broken down by country. [134726]

Ruth Kelly: Most of the debt owed by sovereign Governments to the UK Government arises from defaults on export contracts guaranteed by the Export Credit Guarantee Department (ECGD). Such debts usually become the subject of Bilateral Debt Agreements entered into under the auspices of the Paris Club of official creditors. Table 1 shows the debt owed to the UK Government as at 30 September 2003 under Paris Club Arrangements.

In addition to debt rescheduled in the Paris Club, ECGD holds unrecovered claims on a number of countries, by far the largest of which is Iraq, where ECGD has unrecovered claims of approximately £620 million.

The UK Government has already announced its commitment to providing 100 per cent. irrevocable debt relief for all countries eligible for the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Initiative (HIPC) upon their reaching Completion Point. In addition, for eligible HIPC countries yet to reach Decision Point, the UK does not ask for, or expect to receive, payments. Any debt payments that are made are held in trust until they can be returned to fund poverty reduction.

The debts of Benin, Bolivia, Burkina Faso, Mali, Mauritania, Mozambique, Tanzania and Uganda were all cancelled when they reached the HIPC Completion Point.

The Department for International Development (DfID) no longer provides aid loans to low income countries. However, Table 2 shows the outstanding debt owed to DFID as of 31 March 2003 from loans made in previous years. In 1978, the Government cancelled nearly all of its aid debts to low-income countries, which were worth £1.2 billion. In September 1997, the Government launched the Commonwealth Debt Initiative (CDI). Under the CDI, the Government announced that it was willing to cancel the remaining aid debts, worth £132 million, of those poorer (lower-middle income) Commonwealth countries who were committed to the Millennium Development Goals, who were following sound economic policies, who promoted accountable and transparent governance and who were bearing down on corruption. To date, 12 countries have benefited from this initiative.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Inward Investment (North-West)

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many jobs were created in each year since 1992 in the north-west as a result of inward investment. [134896]

Ms Hewitt: The figures in the table are based on information provided by inward investment companies at the time of the announcement of the decision to invest in the UK. They are based on the companies' best estimate, at that time, of the number of new jobs associated with each investment.

There is no requirement on companies to notify inward investment decisions to Invest UK and so the figures include only those projects where Invest UK and/or North West Development Agency were involved or which have come to their notice.

	Number of new jobs
1992–93	1,012
1993–94	1,927
1994–95	1,986
1995–96	3,622
1996–97	1,556
1997–98	4,944
1998–99	3,224
1999–2000	4,768
2000–01	3,187
2001–02	1,987
2002–03	7,486

Arms Exports

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to her answer of 6 October 2003, Official Report, column 1068W, whether the Government's proposals on transportation of small arms comply with Clause II.14 of the Programme. [135101]

Nigel Griffiths: The new controls that the Government will be introducing on trafficking and brokering are fully consistent with the United Nations Programme on Action to Prevent, Combat and Eradicate the Illicit Trade in Small Arms and Light Weapons in All Its Aspects.

BAE Systems

Sir Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations she has received on BAE Systems relocation of its regional aircraft business to Ayrshire; what funding her Department has provided to BAE Systems plant at Prestwick for employment relocation and creation; and if she will make a statement. [134011]

Jacqui Smith: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, has received one representation on BAE Systems' relocation of its new regional aircraft business to Prestwick in Ayrshire.

The Department of Trade and Industry has provided no funding to BAE Systems' plant in Prestwick. However, following the company's decision to cease regional aircraft production, the Scottish Executive, having consulted with DTI, offered BAE Systems £2.4 million in Regional Selective Assistance (RSA) to support the consolidation of their Regional Aircraft Support Centre at Prestwick.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of (a) the impact of BAE Systems' decision to relocate regional aircraft production from its Woodford Aerodrome in the North West to Prestwick on employment opportunities in the North West of England and (b) the future viability of the aerospace industry in the North West. [134012]

Jacqui Smith: The Department's understanding is that BAE Systems Regional Aircraft has not relocated regional aircraft production from Woodford in the North West to Prestwick in Ayrshire as, with the cancellation of the Avro RJX, the company took the decision in November 2001 to cease all further regional aircraft production activities. A number of different locations were considered before BAE Systems Regional Aircraft decided to place its new Regional Aircraft business, focusing on customer support, engineering and management support, in Prestwick.

As regards the future viability of the aerospace industry in the North West, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, established the Aerospace Innovation and Growth Team (AeIGT) in May 2002 to produce a 20-year vision for the future of the aerospace industry across the whole of the UK, including the North West of England, and to make recommendations as to how to make that vision a reality. Over 140 senior representatives of aerospace companies, Government Departments and trade unions, as well as universities and research bodies, have been involved. Work is now proceeding on the implementation of the AeIGT's recommendations and a wide range of stakeholders are involved in producing plans to achieve this, both nationally and at local level. The Chairman of the North West Regional Development Agency is a member of the AeIGT and has been, and continues to be, closely involved in its work.

Chemicals

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the European Commission's draft proposals for the registration, evaluation and authorisation of chemicals; and what assessment her Department has made of the likely impact of the proposals on the chemicals industry. [132860]

Jacqui Smith: The UK Government fully support the objectives set out in the Commission's White Paper on the new EU Chemicals Strategy. Following the Commission's consultations on draft legislative proposals in May to July this year, the Commission has indicated its intention of making a number of changes to the proposals. The Government welcome any changes intended to make the proposals more effective and workable, and will be considering the revised proposals in consultation with stakeholders. Once adopted, the Government will carry out a separate UK consultation, and that will be accompanied by a regulatory impact assessment.

Defence Export Licences

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in how many cases where a defence export licence was revoked in (a) 2000, (b) 2001 and (c) 2002 a defence export licence was subsequently granted to allow the export of the same items to an alternate destination. [134600]

Nigel Griffiths: This information is not readily available and would require both a computer and manual search of all records for the three years in question to determine whether there are identical matches and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Electricity Supply

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions she has had with National Grid Transco about the maintenance of the network, following the power cuts in August; and if she will make a statement. [134044]

Nigel Griffiths [holding answer 23 October 2003]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has not personally spoken with National Grid Transco on this issue—however she is being kept fully appraised of developments. I have spoken on a number of occasions with the CEO of NGT concerning the August power cuts.

To ensure that all the facts have been assembled about these incidents, and that the appropriate lessons learnt for the future, the Government in conjunction with the Regulator—Ofgem, commissioned a report employing independent consultants. DTI's Engineering Inspectorate is also investigating the circumstances around the power interruptions.

Employment Tribunals

Mr. Hepburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many employment tribunal cases there were in (a) south Tyneside, (b) Tyne and Wear, (c) the north-east and (d) the UK in each year since 1997. [134858]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The following table shows the number of tribunal applications registered by the Employment Tribunals Service in the UK since 1997. Statistical information for the geographical areas of south Tyneside, Tyne and Wear and the north-east is not readily accessible and could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

	Registered tribunal applications
2002–03	98,617
2001–02	112,227
2000–01	130,408
1999–2000	103,935
1998–99	91,913
1997–98	80,435
1996–97	88,910

Mr. Hepburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the average amount of an employment tribunal cost award was in (a) south Tyneside, (b) Tyne and Wear, (c) the north-east and (d) the UK in each year since 1997. [134859]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The following table shows the average amount of an employment tribunal cost award in the UK since 1997. We are unable to supply the average amount of an employment tribunal cost award for south Tyneside, Tyne and Wear and the north-east.

	Average cost award
2002–03	1,524
2001–02	983
2000–01	295
1999–2000	1,155
1998–99	743
1997–98	546

Mr. Hepburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the average award for compensation in employment tribunal cases has been in (a) south Tyneside, (b) Tyne and Wear, (c) the north-east and (d) the UK in each year since 1997. [134860]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The Employment Tribunals Service only collects compensation statistics for tribunal cases covering the jurisdictions of unfair dismissal, race discrimination, sex discrimination and disability discrimination. Therefore, the figures quoted in the following table illustrate the average award for compensation in employment tribunal cases for the UK since 1997 in relation to the aforementioned complaints. We are unable to supply separate information for south Tyneside, Tyne and Wear and the north-east.

	Average compensation award
2002–03	7,598
2001–02	7,306
2000–01	5,764
1999–2000	5,734
1998–99	4,449
1997–98	4,894

Mr. Hepburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many employment tribunal cost awards have been made against (a) respondents and (b) applicants in (i) south Tyneside, (ii) Tyne and Wear, (iii) the north-east and (iv) the UK in each year since 1997. [134861]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The following table illustrates how many employment tribunal cost awards have been made against respondents and applicants in the UK in the last two financial years. The Employment Tribunals Service did not breakdown the statistics for applicants and respondents prior to 2001–02. We are unable to supply information for south Tyneside, Tyne and Wear and the north-east.

	Costs awards against respondent	Costs awards against applicant
2002–03	307	691
2001–02	169	467

Energy Production

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the average cost of producing electricity through (a) nuclear, (b) coal, (c) gas, (d) wind and (e) other renewable sources was; and what the average price paid by suppliers for electricity from each of the above generators was in the last year for which figures are available. [135001]

Nigel Griffiths [holding answer 28 October 2003]: This information is a commercial matter for the electricity generators and suppliers. Some indicative information on potential future prices for renewable sources, and for electricity produced from nuclear sources is given in "The Energy Review, a Performance and Innovation Unit Report, February 2002" available at www.number-10.gov.uk/su/energy/1.html, and in the "Long-Term Reductions in Greenhouse Gas Emissions in the UK" report prepared by an Inter-departmental Analysts Group, available at www.dti.gov.uk/energy/greenhousegas/index.shtml. Both reports are available in the Libraries of the House.

Export Controls

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to her answer of 6 October 2003, Official Report, column 1068W, on export controls, what her reasons are for concluding that it would be impractical to maintain a register of arms brokers. [135099]

Nigel Griffiths: The Government have already made clear that it proposes to register information on all those applying for licences, both for exports and for arms trafficking and brokering activities, thus creating a database available to be used for licensing and enforcement purposes, including as appropriate on an international basis. In addition, users of Open General Licences have to register to use the licence.

The Government believe that licence applications should be scrutinised on a case-by-case basis, with regard primarily to the nature of the transaction in question. Scrutiny and approval of individual transactions to areas of concern achieves a greater measure of control than simply a general assessment of companies' or individuals' reputation.

Industrial and Provident Societies

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what consideration was given in the company law review to bringing the audit requirements for industrial and provident societies in line with those of registered companies; [135114]

(2) what consideration was given in the company law review to amending the requirement that obliges industrial and provident societies wanting to publish interim accounts to undertake a full audit. [135131]

Jacqui Smith: The remit of the company law review did not extend to industrial and provident societies.

The Treasury will consider the modernisation of industrial and provident society legislation in the light of the proposed reform of company law.

Insurance Premiums

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on her assessment of the impact of insurance premium levels on the (a) construction, (b) manufacturing and (c) farming sectors of the economy. [134866]

Nigel Griffiths: Government have encouraged the Association of British Insurers (ABI) and British Insurance Brokers Association (BIBA) to work with business bodies and Trade Associations towards improving the availability of affordable cover. Since the publication of the Government interim report in June 2003, the ABI and BIBA have published a statement of good practice, making a commitment to provide at least 21 days' notice of their renewal terms for all policies, starting from 1 November 2003.

Mr. Ashley Jenkins

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when she expects to hold an investigation into the activity of Mr. Ashley Jenkins whose company assets were frozen on 2 October; what representations she has received about this case; and if she will make a statement. [134253]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 27 October 2003]: Inquiries under section 447 of the Companies Act 1985 into the affairs of Ashley Jenkins Ltd. and Ashley Jenkins SL, a company registered in Spain, were undertaken by officials of the Department's Companies Investigations Branch. The investigation's findings resulted in the presentation of a public interest winding-up petition, on 2 October, the High Court appointing the Official Receiver as Provisional Liquidator of both companies, pending the hearing of the petition on 14 January 2004.

The Official Receiver's duties as Provisional Liquidator include the preservation and protection of both companies' assets and financial records.

In view of the fact that this matter remains before the High Court it would be inappropriate for me to comment further about the affairs of the Ashley Jenkins companies.

Outsourcing

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures she is taking to persuade companies to maintain jobs in the UK rather than outsource abroad. [134438]

Ms Hewitt: As companies in the UK are operating in an increasingly competitive, global marketplace, they must have the freedom to choose where to locate in order to maximise their competitive advantage. If we chose to operate a protectionist approach, we would run the risk of forcing companies to locate completely out of the UK. This would not be to our long term economic benefit.

We will continue to create a stable, competitive environment in the UK. Our long term economic interest will be based on our ability to innovate to produce high value- added goods and services which need a highly skilled workforce, high calibre managers, forward looking unions and knowledgeable consumers.

Red Tape

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to reduce the regulatory burden on small and medium-sized firms. [134440]

Nigel Griffiths: Among the measures taken by the Government to cut red tape are:

cutting form-filling for 700,000 small businesses with our new flat rate VAT scheme; abolishing automatic penalties for late filing of VAT and giving UK businesses the best VAT threshold in Europe; cutting the number of regulations passed by Parliament in the past year by 793; cutting the time and bureaucracy it takes to set up a business from 28 separate licences, certificates and registrations in some cases ten years ago to less than a day now, costing under £10, while in the EU on average it takes four weeks to set up a new business and costs over £600.

These measures and others have established the UK in the top three countries for low levels of red tape, favourable tax regime, flexible labour markets, open financing systems and modern infrastructure, according to the latest Economist Intelligence Unit/Apax Partners survey of 60 countries.

British Gas's latest survey of business managers concludes that they are spending considerably less time dealing with red tape and non-core activities. 2.4 million SMEs have been created since 1997, including an estimated 1,690 in the hon. Member's constituency.

We are seeking further improvements through Regulatory Impact Assessments, 'Think Small First' and Small Business Europe which promotes better regulation.

Small Businesses

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent research she has commissioned on the administrative burden on small businesses. [134949]

Nigel Griffiths: The Small Business Service, an executive agency of the DTI, commissioned the Small Business Survey 2003 in June 2003, to understand the concerns of small and medium-sized businesses. It has several questions on the administrative burden of small businesses, including how much time small and medium-sized enterprises spend each week on paperwork relating to complying with Government regulations and taxes.

State Aid

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on which occasions since 1997 the Government have made representations to the EC regarding state aid by another member state. [133885]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 23 October 2003]: No register of interventions is held. Representations can be made in response to notices published in the Official Journal in accordance with Article 88(2) of the EC Treaty; or in cases before the European Court of Justice where it appears appropriate and in UK interests; or on behalf of UK businesses who raise concerns.

World Trade Organisation (Cancun)

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals she will make to the World Trade Organisation on improving the logistics and organisation at WTO conferences after Cancun. [135127]

Ms Hewitt: We are currently discussing potential proposals in this area with other EU member states and with the commission. We are also in contact with the consultative group established by the Director General of the WTO, which we expect to produce recommendations in the course of next year.

TRANSPORT

Air Travel (Compensation)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to his Answer of 21 October 2003, Official Report, column 472W, on air travel (compensation), (1) if his Department will produce a partial regulatory impact assessment; and if he will place a copy in the Library; [135040]

(2) if it is the policy of his Department to comply with the Cabinet Office guidance on regulatory impact assessment; and if it is being complied with in this case. [135041]

Mr. McNulty: A partial regulatory impact assessment on the proposed Regulation was prepared at an early stage, and has been periodically updated to reflect changes made to the original text as work on the proposal has progressed. The latest version reflects the Council's common position of 11 March 2003. However, following the recent conciliation process between the Council and the European Parliament, a number of amendments to the common position have been agreed and the regulatory impact assessment will need to be modified accordingly. On receipt of the final text of the Regulation we will be in a position to complete our assessment and, in due course, place a copy in the Libraries of the House.

Airport Development

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what communities he has visited near airports which may feature in his White Paper on Airport Development. [134129]

Mr. McNulty: Ministers have met numerous delegations representing communities that may be affected by development options put forward in the consultation documents, "The Future of Air Transport in the United Kingdom". During the consultation, 18 public exhibitions were held across the UK at or near sites identified for potential airport development.

Airports (East and West Midlands)

Mr. John Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many responses he received during the extended consultation period regarding airports in the East and West Midlands. [134592]

Mr. McNulty: About 45,000 responses relating to airports in the East and West Midlands were received between 30 November 2002 and 30 June 2003.

Aviation Fuel Taxation

Mr. John Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps the Government are taking to press (a) member nations of the EU and (b) other international bodies to come to a common position on the taxation of aviation fuel. [134591]

Mr. McNulty: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 28 October 2003 to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), Official Report, column 134W.

Blue Badge Scheme

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will include (a) colitis and (b) Crohn's disease in future research on the eligibility criteria for the blue badge scheme. [134339]

Mr. McNulty: Following a recent review of the Blue Badge Scheme, we will be undertaking research into the independent mobility needs of certain groups of people, including people with colitis and Crohn's disease, to determine whether eligibility should be extended. We propose to take forward that research in 2004.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what (1) representations he has received from disabled motorcycle owners about problems with attaching disabled badges designed for car windscreens to motorcycles; [134799]

(2) what advice he has issued to disabled motorcycle owners about attaching disabled badges to their vehicles. [134800]

Mr. McNulty: Under the current regulations the blue badge must be displayed on the dashboard or fascia panel of the vehicle, with the front facing forward, so that the relevant details are clearly legible from outside of the vehicle.

For motorcycles we advise that the badge should be exhibited in a conspicuous position on the vehicle so that the relevant details on the front are visible. The precise method of attaching the badge is a matter for the badge holder to determine.

We have received representations from individual disabled motorcyclists and from the National Association for Bikers with a Disability (NABD) about the problems of displaying the badge so that it complies with the requirements of the regulations. Following discussions with NABD we have agreed to support the Association in designing a suitable secure holder for the badge and the associated time clock. We are, therefore, funding a design competition for 2nd year students at Salford University's School of Art & Design. We hope to have the winning design by summer next year.

Departmental Advertising

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much his Department spent on advertising in (a) 1995, (b) 1997 and (c) 2003. [133729]

Mr. McNulty: Expenditure is recorded on a financial year basis and is shown in the following table.

	£ million
1995–96	6.4
1996–97	5.7
1997–98	4.5
1998–99	4.6
1999–2000	5.2
2000–01	7.8
2001–02	9.8
2002–03	10.2
2003–04	9.5

[1] estimated advertising outturn

The increase in expenditure since 2000–01 reflects additional road safety advertising in support of the Government's road safety strategy "Tomorrow's Roads—Safer For Everyone" published in March 2000.

Driving Licence Applications

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what his target is for the time taken to process a provisional driving licence application from the date of receipt of the application to the applicant receiving their licence; and what proportion of applications were dealt with within the target in each of the last three years. [134662]

Mr. Jamieson: The Secretary of State's targets for the last three years have been as follows:

Year	Target	Result
2000–01	95% in 9 working days	Achieved
2001–02	95% in 8 working days	Achieved
2002–03	95% in 8 Working days	Achieved

These performances have been reflected in the Agency's Annual Reports.

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which medical conditions require further enquiries to be made in applications for provisional driving licences; and what representations he has received from disability organisations in relation to driving licence applications from people with medical conditions or disabilities. [134664]

Mr. Jamieson: The medical conditions which need to be declared and where further medical enquiries would normally be undertaken are listed on all the main drivers application forms. For example, the DI application form (available from post offices) is used to apply for first provisional licences and the D42 and D46 forms which are automatically issued by DVLA to prompt the renewal of medically restricted licences and renewal at age 70 and thereafter.

We regularly receive representations from disability organisations and interested parties representing individuals suffering from medical conditions that may affect their ability to drive. This representation is welcomed and the information received is often referred to the Secretary of State's Honorary Medical Advisory Panels to help inform their decisions on medical fitness to drive and future policies.

Trains (Smoking)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what steps he is taking to persuade GNER to follow the example of Virgin Rail in banning smoking on all trains; [134969]

(2) what plans he has to bring together the Health and Safety Executive, train operators and Network Rail to discuss the impact on public health of smoking at railway stations and on trains. [134970]

Mr. McNulty: There are no such plans. Under the Railways Act 1993 (as amended by the Transport Act 2000) train operating companies may regulate smoking in railway carriages and at their stations. It is a matter for the train operators to decide whether, and where, to permit smoking.

Road Safety

John Thurso: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which proposals contained in his Department's road safety strategy require primary legislation; and in which legislation (a) they have been enacted and (b) he plans to enact them in each case. [133880]

Mr. Jamieson: The following primary legislation foreseen in the Government's road safety strategy "Tomorrow's Roads—Safer for Everyone" has been enacted as follows:

Figures in square brackets [3] refer to the relevant chapter of the road safety strategy

[2] Change legislation on school crossing patrols, Transport Act 2000

[3] Introducing mandatory logbooks for learner car drivers (to include night-time driving), Transport Act 2000

[4] Strengthen police powers for roadside testing, accommodating drug screening devices and providing for drug recognition and impairment testing, Railways and Transport Safety Act 2003

[7] Tighten the seat belt exemption for people on "local rounds of deliveries", Railways and Transport Safety Act 2003

[10] Develop new technology which could help enforce the law more effectively e.g. digital breath-testing and drug-testing devices, Railways and Transport Safety Act 2003

The following proposals await a suitable legislative opportunity:

[3 & 8] Improvement of driver training and testing

[4] Introduce evidential roadside breath-testing

[4] Repeal UK drivers1 hours rules in favour of EU rules (pending outcome of European negotiations)

[10] Provide for driver improvement schemes as a court disposal

[10] Amend road traffic penalties in the light of Home Office Review of Road Traffic Penalties

After research and consultation with local authorities the following are deemed no longer to require primary legislation and the Government has no current plans to implement them.

[6] Creation of a hierarchy of roads by road usage

[6] Development of a simpler method of making speed limits by reference to a speed management strategy

The Government also considers that primary legislation may not be necessary for the following and has no plan to pursue it:

[4] Giving police additional powers to undertake targeted breath testing

Transport for London (Budget)

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans his Department has to increase the Transport for London budget for each financial year from 2005–06. [135175]

Mr. McNulty: The Progress Report on the 10-Year Plan for Transport, "Delivering Better Transport", published last December, set out indicative levels of spending in London through to 2010–11. Allocations for the period 2005–06 to 2007–08 will be considered in the forthcoming cross-Government spending review, the results of which will be announced next year.

Unsupervised Railway Stations

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to meet local authorities, train operators and Network Rail to discuss the elimination of graffiti at train stations and adjacent railway lines. [134958]

Mr. McNulty: None.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many prosecutions there have been by British Transport Police of individuals who commit acts of vandalism on (a) trains, (b) railway stations and (c) railway lines in each of the last 10 years. [134959]

Mr. McNulty: The British Transport Police (BTP) does not record crime statistics split by stations, lines and trains. Also vandalism is not classified as a crime group but the offence of criminal damage is the closest equivalent. Prosecutions are a matter for the Crown Prosecution Service. However, the BTP have provided the information in Table 1 regarding the number of people arrested, summonsed or charged with criminal damage in the past six years which is the maximum period for which reliable data is available. Table 2 shows the total number of criminal damage offences reported and cleared for the last ten years.

Table 1

Time Period	Number of Persons Arrested/ Charged/Summonsed for criminal damage offences
1 October 1997—30 September 1998	607
1 October 1998—30 September 1999	669
1 October 1999—30 September 2000	644
1 October 2000—30 September 2001	537
1 October 2001—30 September 2002	549
1 October 2002—30 September 2003	554

Table 2

Annual criminal damage offences (1 April–31 March)	Reported	Cleared
2002–2003	6,502	717
2001–2002	6,030	846
2000–2001	6,536	988
1999–2000	6,826	963
1998–1999	6,573	1,013
1997–1998	6,296	1,105
1996–1997	7,984	994
1995–1996	10,502	971
1994–1995	13,156	1,348
1993–1994	13,023	1,280

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many unsupervised train stations there are in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Yorkshire. [134967]

Mr. McNulty: Figures for the number of unsupervised stations are not held centrally. There are no obligations on train operators about staffing stations per se. There are requirements to open ticket offices at the times specified in the 'Ticketing and Settlement Agreement' (TSA). The TSA includes over 1300 stations—more than half the stations on the network—including over 50 in Yorkshire. Train operators may staff stations and ticket offices over and above the requirements of the TSA.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent studies have been carried out by his Department into the impact on passenger numbers of fear of violence and antisocial behaviour at unsupervised railway stations. [134968]

Mr. McNulty: Departmental research was carried out last year on perceptions of personal security and concerns about crime on public transport. This included discussions on staffing at railway stations, what makes people feel insecure at stations, what measures could be taken to improve people's perceptions, and the impact that all these have on people's willingness to travel.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what steps he is taking with Network Rail to tackle vandalism and graffiti at unsupervised railway stations; [134972]

(2) what steps he is taking to protect the rail infrastructure from criminal damage. [134974]

Mr. McNulty: This is primarily a matter for Network Rail as owner of the national network infrastructure, and the train operators to which stations are leased. Our Directions and Guidance to the Strategic Rail Authority require it to encourage train operators to participate in both the Secure Stations and Secure Car Parks schemes, which award accreditation when specified standards of design and management are reached. The Strategic Rail Authority has funded the provision of CCTV at stations through its Rail Passenger Partnership fund, and CCTV will be provided at some stations under the Modern Facilities at Stations programme. We also support the initiative by the British Transport Police and train operators to recruit special constables from within their own staff.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent discussions he has had with train operators on unsupervised stations. [134973]

Mr. McNulty: None.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Anti-social Behaviour

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what resources he has provided to (a) Sefton council and (b) the Merseyside Police Authority for monitoring anti-social behaviour. [132995]

Ms Blears: For this financial year 2003–04, the Anti-Social Behaviour Unit (ASBU) provided £700,000 to the Government offices of the north-west to spend on anti-social behaviour matters. The ASBU did not specify on what specific activities they should spend this money.

Sefton have not been allocated any Home Office funds directly for anti-social behaviour initiatives, but a number of schemes should have an effect on anti-social behaviour. The Building Safer Communities Fund (BSCF) have allocated £30,000 to develop neighbourhood CCTV systems and a further £19,500 is being used to tackle alcohol-related disorder and improve education and awareness, both of which should have a "knock on" effect on anti-social behaviour.

Under the Small Retailers scheme, £28,971 was awarded to Sefton and is being used to fund CCTV systems for a number of retailers in the Derby and Linacre and Netherton and Owell wards, and it is hoped that this will deter theft, vandalism and anti-social behaviour.

For 2003–04, we also provided £200,000 to Liverpool City council for partnership working on anti-social behaviour initiatives. While Merseyside Police were not the direct recipient of this funding, they will obviously benefit from this injection of money, and via the Liverpool Crime and Reduction Partnership will have influence on how this money is best spent.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of the anti-social behaviour units within police authorities. [132996]

Ms Blears: All local agencies need to work together if anti-social behaviour is to be tackled effectively and the Police Service has a key role to play. This is reflected in the National Policing Plan, which makes clear that dealing with anti-social behaviour is an overarching policing priority. While we have not carried out any formal assessment of the way in which police forces are tackling anti-social behaviour, it is one aspect being examined in the baseline assessments of police forces currently being carried out by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary (HMIC). The results will be available in the spring. Anti-social behaviour is also being addressed during HMIC's inspections of Police Basic Command Units.

Huw Irranca-Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the efforts of (a) police forces in Wales, (b) the South Wales police force and (c) other forces in the United Kingdom to engage with the programme to tackle anti-social behaviour. [133500]

Ms Blears: All local agencies need to work together if anti-social-behaviour is to be tackled effectively and the Police Service has a key role to play. This is reflected in the National Policing Plan, which makes clear that dealing with anti-social behaviour is an overarching policing priority. While we have not carried out any formal assessment of the way in which police forces are tackling anti-social behaviour either in Wales or more generally, it is one aspect being examined in the baseline assessments of police forces in England and Wales currently being carried out by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary (HMIC). The results will be available in the spring. Anti-social behaviour is also being addressed during HMIC's inspections of Police Basic Command Units.

Huw Irranca-Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with colleagues in the Welsh Assembly Government in respect of anti-social behaviour initiatives with particular reference to (a) pilot residential parenting schemes, (b) nuisance neighbours panels, (c) criminal justice interventions programme areas, (d) Operation Scrap-it, (e) Operation Gate-it and (f) Operation Scrub-it. [133501]

Ms Blears: The work in this area is being taken forward by the Anti-Social Behaviour Unit at the Home Office. The unit was set up in January 2003. Staff within the unit have undertaken visits to different parts of England and Wales gathering information from communities and practitioners about their anti-social behaviour priorities.

This resulted in the introduction of the Anti-Social Behaviour Bill and the publication of the White Paper, 'Respect and Responsibilities' (March 2003). This was followed up by the launch of the Action Plan (10 October 2003) which outlines the initiatives mentioned above. The powers in the Bill relating to local authority powers to get graffiti off street furniture are a devolved issue (the powers will be given to 12 authorities in England in the first instance). It is for the Welsh Assembly to decide whether authorities in Wales will adopt these powers.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his policy on anti-social behaviour. [133999]

Ms Blears: Tackling anti-social behaviour is a priority for Government. The Home Office published an Action Plan "Tackling Anti-Social Behaviour Together" on 14 October 2003. The action plan sets out existing and new work across the Home Office and other Government Departments which contributes to the drive to tackle anti-social behaviour across England and Wales.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he recommends police forces use to deter anti-social behaviour. [134000]

Ms Blears: As the Anti-Social Behaviour Action Plan launched on 14 October makes clear, effective action to tackle anti-social behaviour requires effective partnership working between all local agencies including the police. The police have a very important role to play, and tackling anti-social behaviour is a key national policing priority under the National Policing Plan (NPP). Forces need to set out as part of their annual local plan and strategic plans under the NPP how they are going to address anti-social behaviour.

The response of the police, working with its partners, will depend on the nature of the local problems. In responding to those problems, the police need to ensure that they are using the National Intelligence Model to identify and target action against anti-social behaviour; have in place agreed information sharing protocols with other agencies; ensure they are using their resources effectively, including the Special Constabulary and Community Support Officers; be clear about how the various interventions available, for example, acceptable behaviour contracts, anti-social behaviour orders, fixed penalty notices, can best be used as part of a local strategy. Police forces should also, with partner agencies, be considering how they will use the new powers which will become available under the Anti-Social Behaviour Bill.

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the aims are of the pilot scheme in Manchester in which people guilty of anti-social behaviour remain on housing benefit and accept training; and what plans there are for similar pilots in the North East of England. [134199]

Ms Blears: The Foundations pilot developed by Manchester city council, Irwell Valley Housing Association and the children's charity NCH is based on a NCH project that has been running in Dundee for the last five years.

The pilot aims to provide intensive support to families who have a history of committing anti-social behaviour. It aims to tackle the causes of this behaviour and establish some stability for children living within the families. There are strict rules and high expectations of each family involved in this pilot. Each family will understand that certain behaviour will not be tolerated and would result in eviction from the scheme.

At present there are no projects similar to the Dundee project in the North East of England. However a number of local authorities and their partners provide tenancy support and at least one is developing plans for a 'Dundee type' project.

Call Centres

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his Department plans to outsource call centre work to premises outside the United Kingdom. [132105]

Fiona Mactaggart: The available information held by the Home Office on call centres shows that the Home Office does not have any outsourced call centre contracts and has no plans to outsource such work outside the United Kingdom.

Correspondence

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for West Worcestershire will receive a response to his letter of 7 July, reference M3286/3. [134330]

Ms Blears [holding answer 27 October 2003]: I wrote to the hon. Member on 24 October 2003.

Drug-related Offences

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many hours he estimates have been spent by the police service in each of the last 15 years in dealing with drug related offences; how many hours per year on average this represented for each serving police officer; and if he will make a statement. [133903]

Ms Blears: The information requested is not collected. Police officers in particular exercise considerable discretion and judgement in the way they carry out their duties in this area as in others. Their deployment however is for the Chief Officer of Police who utilise a number of strategies to combat drug crime.

The Government are strengthening enforcement at a local level, supporting the police to better tackle drug misuse. Through the updated Drug Strategy annual proactive expenditure on reducing drug supply is expected to be £380 million for 2003–04 for all enforcement agencies.

We are taking high profile action against suppliers in communities with particular problems. Every opportunity from arrest, to court, to sentence, will be used to get offenders into treatment to break the link between drugs and crime.

Essex Police (Special Branch)

Mr. Francois: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Special Branch constables were employed by Essex police on 1 September. [132636]

Ms Blears: It is not our policy to disclose details of Special Branch deployments at force level in the interests of national security, as to do so could compromise operations.

Juvenile Offenders

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many crimes were committed by juvenile offenders in (a) Haltemprice and Howden, (b) the East Riding of Yorkshire and (c) the Humberside Police Authority area in each of the last two quarters for which figures are available; and how many cautions were issued. [132525]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 16 October 2003]: The information contained in the table gives the number of children convicted of all offences and those given reprimands and final warnings in Humberside, during the last two quarters of 2001.

The information collected centrally does not enable cases in the Haltemprice and Howden constituency to be identified nor cautions in the East Riding of Yorkshire. Neither is it possible to give the number of crimes committed by juveniles, only the number of juveniles who are found guilty of all offences.

Statistics for 2002 will be published in December.

Metropolitan Police (Rental Vehicles)

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much has been spent by the Metropolitan police on rental vehicles in each month since March. [133971]

Ms Blears: The information requested is in the table. It has been provided by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Breakdown for each month: April 2003—September 2003

Month	Total (£000)
April 2003	[1]204
May 2003	497
June 2003	961

September 2003	668
Totals:	4,397

[1] This figure takes account of retrospective year end adjustments (credits for accruals) for 2002/03.

Open Circuit Television (Monmouth)

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set up an investigation into the contract to install open circuit television in Monmouth and the role of the then Acting Chief Constable of Gwent Police, Mr. Richard Thomas; and if he will make a statement. [130871]

Ms Blears: There are no plans for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to set up an investigation.

I am advised by Gwent Police that Gwent Police Authority requested an investigation by the District Auditor relating to issues surrounding CCTV in spring 2000. The preliminary results of this inquiry led the Chief Constable of Gwent to refer the matter to the Chief Constable of West Mercia for a full criminal investigation relating to the then retired Acting Chief Constable, Richard Thomas, and others. Work on this started in July 2000. At the conclusion of the investigation a report was submitted to the Crown Prosecution Service, who having considered the evidence, concluded on 31 January 2002 that there would be no criminal proceedings. The recommendations within the District Auditors report are being pursued by Gwent Police Authority.

Police

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his powers to recommend the capping of police authorities. [133611]

Ms Blears: The Home Secretary has no power to recommend the capping of police authorities.

Powers to cap local authority budgets rest with my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Prescott).

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the daily average proportion of police officers' time spent out on patrol following the introduction of community support officers and other civilian support staff. [134251]

Ms Blears [holding answer 27 October 2003]: An analysis of diaries kept by 378 officers in seven forces prior to the introduction of Community Support Officers (CSOs) found that 17 per cent. of regular officers' time was spent on patrol. The Police Reform Act 2002 powers, which allowed the designation of CSOs and other support staff, were commenced on 2 December 2003. We have not yet repeated the exercise.

However, a programme of research into the nature, frequency and effectiveness of beat patrolling by police officers and Police Community Support Officers (PCSOs) is under way. Results will be reported as soon as available.

We know that there is significant variation between forces in the amount of time officers spend on front line duties, including patrol. We are, as part of the Police Performance Assessment Framework, collecting data from forces so that we can publish a baseline estimate of front line policing for all forces next year. We will then use this data to drive time spent on front line policing up, concentrating on those areas where time spent is lowest.

Most forces currently spend around 60 per cent. of their time on front line policing and I would like to increase that figure.

Police Authorities

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police authorities employ chief executives. [134249]

Ms Blears [holding answer 27 October 2003]: Section 16 of the Police Act 1996 allows each police authority to appoint a clerk to the authority. It is a matter for each police authority to decide if the postholder is termed a chief executive. We do not hold information on this centrally.

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which police authorities have (a) a portfolio structure around themes of community leadership, performance appraisal and strategy development and similar areas of activity and (b) a panel structure. [134250]

Ms Blears [holding answer 27 October 2003]: Section 6(1) of the Police Act 1996 lays upon police authorities the responsibility for securing and maintaining an efficient and effective police force for its area. How the authority organises internally to achieve this, is a local matter for the authorities themselves and not for central Government. Accordingly, there is no information held centrally by the Home Office on the internal structure of each authority.

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his model internal structure for a local police authority. [134252]

Ms Blears [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The 43 local police authorities have the overarching responsibility to secure and maintain an efficient and effective police force for their area.

How police authorities decide to structure the organisation is a matter for the authorities themselves in accordance with local circumstances. It would not be appropriate for central Government to provide a model structure for police authorities.

Police Officers (Protection from Violence)

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he is taking to protect police officers against violence while on duty. [133994]

Ms Blears: All police forces within England and Wales operate within the Health and Safety (Police) Act 1997 and must, therefore, conduct and maintain appropriate risk assessments into the roles of their staff. Where a risk is identified, control measures must be introduced to avert the risk or lessen its impact to an acceptable level.

In terms of officer safety, the most significant control measures include regular, mandatory self-defence training and the provision of equipment, such as batons, handcuffs and incapacitant spray. All police forces in England and Wales have access to dual-purpose body armour (knives and ballistic) either as a general or pool issue. Specialist officers also receive additional Personal Protective Equipment.

Snares

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been carried out in each police authority area for the illegal use of snares in the last five years. [133977]

Paul Goggins: Prosecutions for the illegal use of snares are brought under section 11(1) of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. However, the information collected centrally on court proceedings does not distinguish offences connected with snares from similar offences under section 11 relating to other methods of killing or taking wild animals.

Two prosecutions under section 11 in England and Wales were notified to the Home Office in 2001, one of which was in the North Wales police force area and the other in Greater Manchester.

Statistics for 2002 will be published in December.

Special Constables (West Mercia)

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many special constables there were in West Mercia for each year since 1997. [134389]

Ms Blears: The number of Special Constables in West Mercia Constabulary since 1997 are set out in the table:

At 31 March	Number
1997	582
1998	512
1999	515
2000	476
2001	399
2002	339
2003	309

We have made clear in the National Policing Plan 2003–06 our commitment to increase the numbers and effectiveness of the Special Constabulary.

Terrorism

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he has given to the police on publicising the fact that powers under section 44 of the Terrorism Act 2000 are in operation in the local area. [133967]

Ms Blears: The publicising of the use of section 44 powers under the Terrorism Act 2000 in any particular area is an operational decision for the force concerned. Any decision to publicise the fact that the powers are being used would be made in light of the operational objective, and mindful of the need to ensure that the information released can not be exploited by those intent on committing acts of terrorism.

That said there is a legal requirement under section 45 of the Terrorism Act to inform any individual who is stopped and searched under section 44 that he or she has been stopped and searched under that section of the Act.

TETRA Communications System

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on (a) the refusal of the North Wales police to accept the TETRA communications system and (b) the concerns expressed about the system by the Lancashire force. [133733]

Ms Blears: All police forces in England, Wales and Scotland are committed to Airwave, the new radio communications system based on TETRA technology. The Airwave service will become available in North Wales in December 2004. Airwave is already available to 26 forces and has over 29,000 police users. The rollout is due to complete by mid-2005.

Lancashire Constabulary, the pilot force for Airwave, is satisfied with the service, which has been fully operational since September 2001.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the annual (a) capital and (b) revenue costs are in 2003–04 of the police TETRA communications system. [133734]

Ms Blears: Airwave is the new radio communications system for the police service in England, Wales and Scotland.

The estimated total capital cost to the Home Office for Airwave in 2003–04 is £78 million. The estimated total revenue cost in 2003–04 is £98 million.

Trafficking for Labour Exploitation

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to introduce an offence of trafficking for labour exploitation. [134614]

Beverley Hughes: In the White Paper, "Secure Border, Safe Haven", the Government promised to introduce legislation on trafficking for both labour and sexual exploitation. Offences of trafficking for sexual exploitation are contained in the Sexual Offences Bill currently before Parliament. Legislation covering trafficking for the purpose of labour exploitation is currently under development and will be introduced when parliamentary time permits. The United Kingdom played a key role in the negotiation of the 2002 EU Framework Decision on Trafficking, which commits all EU member states to the introduction of criminal offences covering trafficking for both sexual and labour exploitation.

Violent Crime

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what percentage of crimes committed in the last 12 months were violent; [133995]

(2) what the levels of violent crime were in the London borough of Havering in each year since 1997. [134001]

Ms Blears: In the 12 months to March 2003, violent crime accounted for 17 per cent. of the overall offences recorded in England and Wales. Violent crime is comprised of the following offence classifications, Violence against the person, Sexual offences, and Robbery.

I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 18W.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Broadcasting Licences

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what organisation is responsible for the issuing of radio broadcasting licences in Northern Ireland; what criteria are used in the issuing of licences; and if she will make a statement. [134823]

Estelle Morris: Responsibility for issuing radio broadcast licences in Northern Ireland lies with the Radio Authority. From 29 December 2003, responsibility will pass to Ofcom.

The criteria used for the award of Independent Local Radio licences are set out in Section 105 of the Broadcasting Act 1990. Independent National Radio licences are awarded on a highest cash-bid basis in accordance with the provisions of Sections 85 and 98–100 of the Broadcasting Act 1990. Section 51(2) of the Broadcasting Act 1996 sets out the criteria for the award of digital multiplex licences. All other licences (i.e. cable, satellite, restricted service licences, digital sound programme licences) are issued in accordance with either Part III of the 1990 Act or part II of the 1996 Act, and the Radio Authority's published guidelines, copies of which I have placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Communication Media

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will make a statement on the steps her Department is taking to educate older people in the use of communication media. [134733]

Estelle Morris: The Government recognise that, in a rapidly changing media environment, it is important that all citizens are media literate and able to make best use of communication media.

We have therefore, by way of the Communications Act 2003, placed a duty on the new communications regulator, Ofcom, to promote media literacy and to encourage the development of domestic electronic communications apparatus which can be used with ease by the widest possible range of individuals. The Act makes it explicit that, in carrying out these duties, Ofcom must have regard to the needs of older people. The Communications Act also requires Ofcom to set up a committee to provide them with advice on the interests of older and disabled people regarding communications matters.

In addition, the Department for Education and Skills, in partnership with industry, the voluntary sector and other groups, has set up 6000 'UK online' centres to provide information and communications technology (ICT) access for adults with low or no ICT skills. This Government initiative, announced by the Prime Minister in September 2000, aims to help people develop the skills needed to use the Internet to access information, to send e-mail using a variety of communications media and to explore the opportunities that new technologies offer such as further learning and updating skills. The centres are asked to target potential users from six socially excluded groups including people aged 65 and over.

Cultural Diversity

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will make a statement on progress towards international standards on cultural diversity at the recent UNESCO conference. [134541]

Estelle Morris: It was agreed at the recent UNESCO General Conference that an international standard-setting instrument on cultural diversity would be prepared. The Director General of UNESCO would like to adopt a new draft instrument at the next General Conference in the autumn of 2005. He has also undertaken to consult other UN agencies with interests in cultural diversity. The UK will await the result of this and any internal consultations before deciding whether to become a party to the convention.

Digital Terrestrial Television

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps she is taking to ensure that digital terrestrial television access is available in all areas of Northern Ireland before analogue services are switched off. [134157]

Estelle Morris: The Government are committed to ensuring that terrestrial analogue broadcasting signals are maintained until: everyone who can currently get the main public service broadcasting channels in analogue form (BBC1, BBC2, ITV, Channel 4/S4C and Five) can receive them on digital systems; switching to digital is an affordable option for the vast majority of people; and as a target indicator of affordability, 95 per cent. of consumers have access to digital equipment. A Digital Television Action Plan is already in place, designed to deliver these pre-conditions for switching off analogue terrestrial transmissions. A copy of the action plan is available at www.digitaltelevision.gov.uk.

Football Pitches

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what guidance is given to the National Lottery regarding the use of timber and sustainable sources in lottery-funded projects; and if she will make a statement. [135073]

Estelle Morris: While it remains a fundamental principle that lottery distributors make decisions independently of Government on considering applications for grants for lottery-funded projects, the Government have issued them with a number of Policy Directions. One of these encourages the distributors to take into account 'the need to further the objective of sustainable development'. This would include, although does not specifically relate to, the use of timber.

The Department is aware of the importance of procuring timber from responsibly managed and sustainable sources and actively encourages all of its non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) to take account of the principles of sustainable development in making grants.

National Lottery

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will list the Lottery awards granted in the north-west since 2000. [134897]

Estelle Morris: 8,881 lottery awards have made since 1 January 2000 in the north-west region.

Dates of lottery awards and the names of recipients will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Pleasure Piers

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) how much National Lottery funding has been provided for the preservation of pleasure piers in the last five years; [134559]

(2) how many pleasure piers have received public funding in each of the last five years; and from what sources of funds; [134560]

(3) which pleasure piers being redeveloped and refurbished are in receipt of lottery funding. [134561]

Estelle Morris: We have contacted the Heritage Lottery Fund, English Heritage and the National Piers Society to request the information required, and I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as it is available, placing copies of my letter in the Libraries of both Houses.

Public Entertainment Licences

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps she is taking to ensure that local authorities are able to set fees for public entertainment licences in order to reflect the proportionate risk of each establishment; and if she will make a statement. [134989]

Mr. Caborn: Under current law, an applicant for a public entertainment licence is required to pay a reasonable fee to be determined by the appropriate authority. The existing legislation does not provide a fee structure, however, case law has established that local authorities are entitled to recover the cost of administering the licensing scheme, provided that allowance is made for exemptions or reductions for charities. They are not empowered to raise revenue through a licensing scheme.

The fees charged by local authorities for public entertainment licences are at their discretion but must be no higher than is necessary to allow the full recovery of their costs. On 10 of April 2000, because of concerns about the levels of fees being charged by some local authorities, the Home Office issued a circular in conjunction with the Local Government Association asking local authorities to review their public entertainment licensing fee structures to ensure that they abide by the case law and are defensible and proportionate in light of the principles of fairness, transparency and consistency, and do no more than permit full recovery of costs.

Until the Licensing Act 2003 is fully implemented, we have no other mechanism for influencing fee levels.

Under The Licensing Act 2003, provides for the payment of licence fees in relation to applications, notifications, licences and certificates. The fees will be set centrally by the Secretary of State and are intended to be set on the basis of full cost recovery to allow local authorities to do no more than fairly recover their administration, inspection and enforcement costs associated with in respect of the new licensing regime.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Iraq

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will take steps to ensure that any proposal by the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq to allow Iraqi Government ministries to establish armed security forces will specify that (a) all forces are properly trained, (b) they have a clear command structure and (c) all weaponry is surrendered at the end of each shift. [132386]

Mr. Rammell: I have been asked to reply.

The Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) have already taken steps to ensure that armed security services are established correctly and with the permitted authority. CPA Order No. 27 establishes the authority for Iraqi Government ministries to establish a Facilities Protection Service (FPS). The FPS will be recruited directly by Government ministries, but will wear the same uniform and operate to the standards as set out in Order 27 regardless of where they work. CPA Order No. 3 governs the usage of firearms by all armed security services in Iraq, including the FPS. All the texts of CPA orders can be accessed on the internet at: http://www.cpa-iraq.org/regulations/index.html

NORTHERN IRELAND

Decommissioning

9. Angela Watkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many acts of decommissioning have taken place in Northern Ireland since April 1998. [134151]

Jane Kennedy: In 1998 the Loyalist Volunteer Force carried out an act of decommissioning in Northern Ireland. The IRA have carried out three acts of decommissioning (2001, 2002 and 2003) but I am not in a position to comment on where these events took place.

Belfast Agreement

12. Sir Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on implementation of the Belfast agreement. [134154]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) and my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber).

Organised Crime

13. Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the level of co-operation between British and Irish Governments in tackling organised crime in Northern Ireland. [134155]

Jane Kennedy: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier to my hon. Friend, the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Brown).

Unemployment

14. Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on unemployment levels in Northern Ireland. [134156]

Mr. Pearson: Labour Force Survey estimates indicate that unemployment in Northern Ireland for the period June-August 2003 was estimated to be 5.6 per cent. Northern Ireland unemployment rates remain at relatively low levels in historical terms and have fallen by 2.9 percentage points from December-February 1998 when the unemployment rate was 8.5 per cent.

Assembly Elections

Jeremy Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects elections to be held for the Northern Ireland Assembly. [134153]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink).

Peace Process

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of recent developments in the political situation in Northern Ireland. [134150]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer).

Water Charging

Mr. Luke: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the Government's proposal for water charging in Northern Ireland. [134152]

Mr. Spellar: £3 billion must be invested in Northern Ireland's water and sewerage services over the next 20 years, to comply with European Directives on water quality and protect public health and the environment. To sustain this scale of investment it is necessary that Northern Ireland's water and sewerage services should become self-financing and be delivered outside Central Government.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Working Holidaymakers

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in respect of each Commonwealth country (a) how many applications for entry clearance as a working holidaymaker have been received since 1 January, (b) how many of the applications were refused, (c) what percentage of the applications were successful and (d) what percentage of the applications were refused. [132981]

Mr. Mullin: Worldwide statistics for all working holidaymaker visas are collated by financial year (1 April–31 March) only and are not available on a monthly basis.

During the financial year 2002–03 the worldwide figures for the number of working holidaymaker visa applications that were received, issued and refused, and their percentages were as follows:

Worldwide working holidaymaker statistics for FY 2002–03

	Number	Percentage
Applications received	53,234	—
Applications issued	49,361	92.73
Applications refused	3,301	6.20
Applications outstanding[1]	572	1.07

[1] Applications outstanding include those where the application was brought forward into the next accounting period before being resolved. Applications can also be withdrawn during processing and still count as an application received. Numbers of successful applications and entry clearances issued may also not match up because of the way entry clearances are issued: a mother and three children on one passport may count as four applications, but one entry clearance may be issued.

Al-Qaeda

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received about links between Qatar and (a) Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and (b) other members of al-Qaeda. [134632]

Mr. Rammell: Qatar faces a terrorist threat from al-Qaeda and associated groups, like other countries in the region and elsewhere. It has played a constructive role in the international co-operative effort against terrorism and we have a regular dialogue with the Qatari government on the subject. Our policy is not to make public the details of such dialogue.

Arms Exports

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in which countries Ministers in his Department conducted arms promotion activities in (a) 2002 and (b) 2003 to date; and if he will make a statement. [112293]

Mr. Straw [pursuant to his answer, 14 July 2003, Official Report, c. 48W]: I regret that an administrative error led to an omission in my answer of 14 July 2003 to the right hon. Member. The correct answer should read as follows:

Foreign and Commonwealth Office Ministers regularly conduct overseas visits in the course of which they promote British exports, including those of defence equipment.

For 2002, our records indicate that Foreign and Commonwealth Office Ministers carried out such promotion activities in Chile, Hungary, India and Singapore; and in 2003 to date, Singapore. In 2002, Ministers also carried out promotion in relation to exports to the Czech Republic, but while in the UK. In 2003, ministerial promotion also took place in relation to exports to India, but while the Minister was in the UK. Negotiations for defence exports may extend over many years and may often be raised informally in the margins of other meetings.

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he intends to reply to the letter to him dated 18 September from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Shasta Parveen. [134216]

Mr. Mullin: I regret that as a result of a series of administrative errors, no reply was sent to my right hon. Friend to his letter of 18 September to my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary. The Foreign Secretary will write to him in the next few days on this case.

Human Trafficking

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Government of the United Arab Emirates on trafficking in human beings. [134355]

Mr. MacShane: The Government of the United Arab Emirates is taking action against trafficking. But we remain concerned about the use of young boys as camel jockeys. In July 2002 the UAE Minister of State for Foreign Affairs announced a ban on the use of camel jockeys under the age of 15. We welcomed this announcement, but there are reports that legislation is not always enforced. Visiting UK Ministers and our embassy staff at Abu Dhabi have raised our concerns with the UAE authorities and we will continue to press the UAE authorities to implement the ban fully.

Iceland

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Iceland about its decision to resume whaling. [135126]

Mr. MacShane: On 8 August, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State at the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Ben Bradshaw), issued a press statement expressing serious concern at the announcement by Iceland on 6 August that it intended to carry out lethal scientific whaling. On 10 September, the British Ambassador in Reykjavik, together with representatives from France, Germany, Sweden and the United States, handed the Icelandic Government a demarche, signed by the United Kingdom and 22 other countries, stating that the killing was unjustified and unnecessary. The UK will continue, along with other countries, to urge Iceland to reconsider its position.

Indonesia

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on recent progress with the investigation into the deaths of Brian Peters and Malcolm Rennie in Indonesia. [132999]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I am not aware of any recent progress in the investigation into the deaths of Brian Peters and Malcolm Rennie at Balibo in 1975, but I have recently written to the Special Representative of the Secretary General in East Timor, Kamalesh Sharma, to ask for an update. I am informed that the UN Serious Crimes Unit are unable to advance their investigation due to Indonesia's reluctance to co-operate with the investigation.

Iranian Refugees

Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received on the well-being of (a) Mr. Jamil Bassam and (b) Mr. Ebrahim Khodabandeh, the Iranians with refugee status in the United Kingdom arrested in Syria and handed over to the Iranian authorities; what representations he has made to the (i) Syrian and (ii) Iranian authorities on this matter; where the men are being held; and when they were last visited by (A) relatives, (B) Foreign Office officials and (C) the Red Cross. [134121]

Mr. Rammell: Jamil Bassam and Ebrahim Khodabandeh are not British nationals, so the UK has no legal right to offer consular assistance. After the two men were detained in Syria, our embassy in Damascus repeatedly asked the Syrian authorities for information, but the Syrian authorities did not respond to any of the embassy's four formal notes. Our embassy in Tehran has made it clear to the Iranian Government that we are taking a keen interest in the human rights of these two men. On 5 August Iranian authorities told our embassy that Mr. Bassam and Mr. Khodabandeh were well, that they continued to be held during investigations and that the Iranian judicial authorities had noted our call for due process. We are not aware of contact between the two men and their families. We have urged the Iranian Government on a number of occasions to allow a visit by the International Committee of the Red Cross. We are not aware that one has taken place.

Middle East

Richard Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been received by his Department about the proposed demolition by the Israeli authorities of the Shawamreh home in Anata in the West Bank; and what representations he has made to Israel on the issue. [133232]

Mr. Rammell: We have received representations about this specific case. We deplore the seizure of Palestinian land and the destruction of property in the Occupied Territories by Israel and have called upon the Government of Israel to stop these actions which undermine their commitment to the roadmap. The seizure of land and the destruction of property is provocative, increasing tension and mistrust, and making a comprehensive settlement more difficult to achieve.

Richard Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the implications for (a) the implementation of UN Resolutions on Israel and Palestine and (b) for Israel's obligations as an occupying power under the Geneva Conventions, of the military order issued by Israel on 2 October 2003 declaring land in the Occupied West Bank between the security fence and Israel's preoccupation 1967 border as a closed zone; and what action the UK Government intend to take. [133530]

Mr. Rammell: The implementation of this Israeli military order will have grave consequences for those Palestinians who live between the fence and the 1967 border and those who farm land in this area. It reinforces the concern that Israeli construction of the fence on occupied land amounts to de facto annexation of Palestinian land west of the fence, and prejudges the outcome of a final settlement based on UN Security Council Resolutions 242 (1967), 338 (1973) and 1397 (2002).

Under Article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention, the Occupying Power is only permitted to evacuate a given area of the occupied territory:

> "if the security of the population or imperative military reasons so demand".

We expect Israel to comply fully with this obligation.

My noble Friend the Baroness Symons of Vernham Dean has raised with the Israeli Ambassador our concerns about this and other Israeli activities affecting the humanitarian situation of Palestinians. We are in close touch with the US and other allies to ensure that Israel understands the opposition of the wider international community to the route of the fence.

Nepal

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress on human rights in Nepal. [135193]

Mr. MacShane: We remain seriously concerned about continued violations of human rights by both the Nepalese security forces and the Maoist insurgents.

There has been some encouraging progress this year, in particular during the ceasefire which held from January to August. We welcomed, for example, the formation of a Royal Nepalese Army (RNA) human rights cell to monitor and investigate reported human rights violations, and the first ever courts martial for human rights abuses. Reports of violations on both sides went down during the ceasefire.

Regrettably, however, credible reports of human rights violations have continued to be received, and have increased since the ceasefire broke down. These reports implicate the security forces in serious abuses such as illegal detentions, torture, disappearances, and summary executions (the Ramechhap incident as reported by the National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) is a particular example), and point to a residual culture of impunity in some elements in the security forces. We are pressing hard for these matters to be investigated thoroughly and for those responsible to be held to account. There is also clear evidence of Maoist abuses, including public torture and executions.

The UK is actively involved in encouraging greater respect for human rights, including through political pressure; human rights training for the security forces; and support for the National Human Rights Commission, the International Committee of the Red Cross, and civil society. A human rights Code of Conduct applicable to both sides would be a key element in any resumed peace process.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of whether Nepal is a safe country for the return of refugees. [135194]

Mr. MacShane: Asylum applications from Nepal—as with other countries—are considered on their individual merits in accordance with the United Kingdom's obligations under the 1951 UN Refugee Convention and the European Convention on Human Rights. In reaching decisions on individual cases, the Home Office—the Department responsible for considering these applications—takes full account of objective country information about the situation in Nepal. This would include information regularly provided by officials. An individual recognised as a genuine refugee from Nepal would not be made to return.

Passports

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much a passport cost in each year from 1997. [134005]

Mr. Mullin: The fee for a standard adult passport issued by a British diplomatic mission in each of the years from 1997 is as in the following table.

1997 to 25 March 1998	18.00
26 March 1998 to 11 April 1999	31.00
12 April 1999 to 15 December 1999	43.00
16 December 1999 to 20 November 2002	49.00
2 November 2002 to 1 October 2003	54.40
2 October 2003 to present	56.50

Sri Lanka

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer of 16 October 2003, Official Report, column 334W, on Sri Lanka, if he will list the non-governmental organisations whose representatives he met in Sri Lanka; and if he will make a statement. [134425]

Mr. MacShane: My hon. Friend the Minister of State at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Mike O'Brien) visited Colombo in January of this year. During his visit he met with representatives from international and national non-governmental organisations including the World Bank, UNICEF, UNHCR, United Nations Development Programme, the Centre for Policy Alternatives, Sri Lanka First and the Board of Investment of Sri Lanka.

West Bank/Gaza Strip

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer of 16 October 2003, Official Report, columns 336–37W, when he last had discussions with representatives of the Government of Israel concerning demolitions and destruction of infrastructure in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip; what (a) explanations and (b) assurances were offered by Israel; and if he will make a statement. [134430]

Mr. Rammell: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has urged Israel to improve the humanitarian situation throughout the Occupied Territories in his contacts with Israel's Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom. My Noble Friend the Baroness Symons of Vernham Dean expressed the Government's serious concerns about the demolition of Palestinian property in a meeting with Israel's ambassador, Zvi Shtauber, on 22 October. In previous discussions with representatives of the Government of Israel on this issue, security concerns have been cited for military operations conducted in the Occupied Territories which have resulted in the destruction of Palestinian infrastructure. Israel has in the past undertaken to ensure such operations have a minimal impact on the Palestinian population. We recognise the Israeli authorities have a legitimate right of self defence against terrorist attacks, but we continue to urge them to ensure their response to the threat is proportionate.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Adult Learning

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what research he has commissioned into communities which are under-represented in participation in adult learning. [134981]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The Department has not commissioned research on geographical communities but has a number of research studies underway or recently completed that examine groups which are under-represented in adult learning.

Adult learning participation has been regularly researched through the National Adult Learning Survey of over 6,000 adults in England and Wales. The results from the most recent survey in 2002 were published by the Department in April this year. They include analysis of the barriers to learning that people face as well as their learning patterns and attitudes. A longitudinal follow-up to a sub sample of the respondents to the 2001 survey, called Pathways in Adult Learning 2003, will be published in spring 2004.

A tracking survey of 2,000 learners who have participated in Adult and Community Learning is also underway. The research will analyse the characteristics and motivations of those who participate in such learning, and the longer term outcomes. The first sweep is underway, and results will be published in spring 2004.

The Department has commissioned evaluations of policies that help those under-represented in learning. The Adult and Community Learning Fund, set up in 1998 to support local community based adult learning, has regularly been evaluated. The most recent evaluation was published by the National Foundation for Educational Research in July 2002.

Adult Guidance Pilots, which ran until March 2003, provided advice and guidance on learning and work opportunities to people facing particularly difficult barriers, such as those with low or basic skills, ex-offenders and refugees. The results of the evaluation will be published early in 2004.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what arrangement he will make to monitor and develop the public strategy for widening adult educational participation. [134982]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: We will be monitoring and developing public strategy for widening adult educational participation through the implementation of the commitments set out in the White Paper 21st Century Skills, Realising Our Potential. In particular the new Skills Alliance of key Government Departments, economic partners and key delivery agencies is driving forward the Skills Strategy delivery plan. This includes work on the Learning and Skills Council's strategy, Successful Participation for All: Widening Adult Participation.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what action he is taking in conjunction with other Government departments and public bodies to support the Learning and Skills Council's strategy for widening adult participation. [134983]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The Government fully supports the Learning and Skills Council's recently published strategy, Successful Participation for All: Widening Adult Participation. It has an important role to play in implementing the Skills Strategy. My Department is represented on the LSC's Widening Adult Participation Implementation Group along with representatives from Further Education Colleges, Local Authorities and other providers. The LSC is maintaining and developing partnerships with a wide range of Government Departments and Public Bodies in order to realise its long term vision for widening adult participation.

Beacon Schools

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many schools have become beacon schools in each year since 1997, broken down by local education authority. [133686]

Mr. Miliband: The Beacon Programme was introduced in September 1998. The programme started with 75 schools, increasing to almost 1,150 schools in six subsequent expansion phases by September 2002. A detailed breakdown, including the 120 schools which are no longer in the Beacon Programme, has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many schools have lost beacon status in each year since 1997, broken down by local education authority. [133687]

Mr. Miliband: 120 schools have left the Beacon Programme since it started in September 1998. 57 of these transferred to the Leading Edge Partnership Programme. A detailed breakdown has been placed in the Library.

Foundation Degrees

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the cost is of the current advertising campaign for foundation degrees. [134976]

Alan Johnson: The current Foundation Degree advertising campaign commenced August 2003 and will run until end March 2004 at a total cost of £2,800,000. This figure includes extensive national press, targeted trade and business press and on-line advertising. Of the total figure, £850,000 is for a national press and local radio campaign planned for the new year.

GCSE

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what percentage of pupils in Lancashire passed five or more GCSEs at grades A-C in each year since 1992. [134903]

Mr. Miliband: The percentage of pupils who achieved 5 or more grades A*-C at GCSE/GNVQ in Lancashire Local Education Authority since 1992 is shown in the following table:

Academic year	Percentage of 15 year olds achieving five or more grades A-C GCSE/GNVQ*
1992	36.5
1993	39.4
1994	41.1
1995	41.7
1996	42.6
1997	43.8
1998	47.0
1999	48.0
2000	49.6
2001	50.1
2002	51.7
2003[1]	52.9

[1] Provisional

The figures prior to 1998 are not directly comparable with the later years because of the local government reorganisation that took place in 1998.

Higher Education Teachers' Pay

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what plans he has, in conjunction with the Higher Education Funding Council for England, to change the formula for payments for teaching by higher education institutions; and what representations he has received about the transition to any new formula and therefrom to a future regime permitting top-up fees. [134124]

Alan Johnson: The Higher Education Funding Council for England is consulting the higher education sector on proposed changes to its funding method for teaching for 2004–05. The deadline for responses is 14 November. The consultation document "Developing the funding method for teaching from 2003–05" is available on the HEFCE website at http://www.hefce.ac.uk/Pubs/hefce/2003/03 427.

Learning Communities

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on progress in developing a strategy for learning communities. [134978]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Good progress has been made on developing the Learning Communities strategy. A community workshop has been held with front line practitioners. A project board is being established and the scoping document has been sent out to all relevant parties. Over the next few months officials will be working with Government Offices and key stakeholders to work up proposals for their regions. Testbeds will commence in April 2004

Modern Apprenticeships

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the level of participation of young school leavers in modern apprenticeships was in the last five years; and what percentage of the cohorts it represented. [134986]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Participation data are collected in line with the Public Service Agreement (PSA) for modern apprenticeships which states that "By 2004, at least 28 per cent. of young people to start a Modern Apprenticeship by age 22". The technical note for this target clarifies this to mean first-time entrants to Foundation or Advanced Modern Apprenticeships by those aged 16 to 21. The outturn will be starts, defined above, during the Learning and Skills Council (LSC) academic year 2004/5 expressed as a proportion of the most recent population estimate for that cohort from the Office for National Statistics (ONS). Data disaggregated into age cohorts are not routinely available.

While Modern Apprenticeships have a longer history, fit for purpose data for the PSA target have been compiled only since 2001/2:

	2001–2	2002–3
Modern Apprenticeship starts	137,000	[2]144,900
(percentage)	[1](22.8 percent.)	[1](23.9 per cent.)

[1] Proportion calculated using ONS population estimates DME50 Table 4

[2] Data for 2002/3 outturn is provisional; due to be finalised by the LSC in January 2004

Modern Language Teaching

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many teachers were in training specialising in a modern language, in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [135011]

Mr. Miliband: The following table shows the number of entrants to initial teacher training courses in secondary modern foreign languages since 1998/99.

	Postgraduate	Undergraduate	Total
1998/99	1,606	51	1,657
1999/2000	1,431	38	1,469
2000/01	1,610	23	1,633
2001/02	1,689	16	1,705
2002/03	1,725	7	1,732
2003/04[2]	n/a	n/a	n/a

Nuclear and Chemical Engineering Graduates

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many graduations in (a) nuclear and (b) chemical engineering there were in each year since 1990. [130194]

Alan Johnson: Figures for nuclear engineering are not held centrally.

The available information covering chemical engineering is in the table. Figures for 1993/94 and earlier years are not held centrally on a comparable basis.

First degree chemical engineering graduates from UK institutions

Academic year	Number of graduations

Phonics Teaching Methods

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will carry out a meta-analysis of the relative effectiveness of (a) analytic and (b) synthetic phonics teaching methods. [135021]

Mr. Miliband: The phonics seminar which the Department held in March 2003 and Professor Greg Brooks' report, published in August, have made a very significant contribution towards ensuring a clearer understanding of the research on phonics and its implications for the National Literacy Strategy. The Department is considering Professor Brooks' recommendations for additional research, which will be assessed against other research priorities.

School Bus Services

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many education authorities operate school bus services for pupils other than those with special needs. [134797]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We do not collect information about local education authority bus operations.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what percentage of pupils in each education authority are provided with a special school bus service; and at what cost. [134798]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We do not collect information on the percentage of pupils receiving transport to special schools. In 2001/02 total LEA expenditure on home to school transport was £561 million. Of that figure, £254 million (45 per cent.) was spent on transporting children to special schools.

School Performance

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills whether it is his policy to reduce the size of schools that perform to an above-average standard. [134838]

Mr. Miliband: The Secretary of State does not decide the size of schools. To reduce the number of places at a school, the admission authority (the local education authority for community and voluntary controlled schools, the governing body for foundation and voluntary aided schools) would have to change the school's admission arrangements, after the required consultation, so as to include a lower admission number. Other local schools or neighbouring local education authorities could object to the Schools Adjudicator if they disagreed with the new lower number. So could 10 or more local parents, if the new number is below the school's measured capacity.

Our guidance to local decision-makers on changes to school organisation makes it clear that blanket assumptions should not be made about the optimum size of a school; and that the priority must be to secure the highest standards.

School Trips (Funding)

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) what weight is given to the costs of funding school trips for schools in deprived areas when the Department calculates school budgets; [135133]

(2) whether there are (a) national and (b) local distributors of funds for schools in deprived areas seeking funding for school trips; [135134]

(3) what resources are allocated to schools in areas of high deprivation to ensure that they are able to comply with his Department's guidelines on allowing children in receipt of free school meals to attend school trips. [135135]

Mr. Miliband: The Education Funding Formula does not include a factor to specifically take account of the cost of funding school trips for schools in deprived areas. It does include a factor to take account of the extra costs of educating deprived pupils. The factor uses data on families in receipt of Income Support and the Working Families Tax Credit.

I am not aware of any national or local distributors of funds for schools in deprived areas seeking funding for school trips.

It is for a school's governing body to decide on the allocation of resources for school trips from the school's budget share. Regulations require that all local education authorities distribute some funding on the basis of social deprivation.

Skills Strategies

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on progress on the alignment of national, local and sectored skills strategies. [134977]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The Skills Strategy "21st Century Skills—Realising our Potential", published on 9 July 2003, set a long-term agenda through to 2010. Central to the success of the strategy is ensuring that implementation is achieved in a sustained and coherent way. We have formed a national Skills Alliance, bringing together the key Government Departments with employer and union representatives and the key delivery agencies to drive forward the Skills Strategy delivery plan. At the first meeting on 14 October, the Skills Alliance agreed its terms of reference and began to identify its priorities and a forward agenda to end 2004. The members decided that its focus would be on strategic issues; monitoring progress; delivery on the ground; and ensuring collaboration between the key agencies. The Alliance intends to report on progress annually.

Specific approaches include Sector Skills Agreements, which will be designed and delivered in collaboration with the national and local Learning and Skills Councils and Regional Development Agencies to ensure that there is a coherent response to sector needs nationally, regionally and locally. We have also asked Regional Development Agencies to work with key partners, including LSCs, Jobcentre Plus and Small Business Service taking account of the needs of sectors. Together, in consultation with a wide range of other partners, they will develop proposals to establish partnerships which will ensure that employment, skills and business support priorities are addressed in an integrated way. We expect the first regional skills partnerships to be in place from April 2004.

Soft Key Skills

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what progress has been made in formulating viable measures for the attainment by pupils of soft key skills. [134980]

Mr. Miliband: The current national specifications for the key skills of Working with Others, Problem Solving and Improving Own Learning and Performance have been in use since September 2000.

Specialist Schools

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many specialist schools have failed to have their status renewed. [134935]

Mr. Miliband: Since the Specialist Schools Programme began in 1997 some 39 specialist schools have failed to have their status renewed.

Student Complaints Adjudicator

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the appointment of an independent Student Complaints Adjudicator and the establishment of an office to service this function. [134122]

Alan Johnson: The higher education sector has established the Office of the Independent Adjudicator for Higher Education (OIA) to consider cases which students have been unable to resolve within their higher education institutions. The OIA was incorporated as a company on 7 July 2003. The Board of Directors have appointed Dame Ruth Deech as the Independent Adjudicator and Michael Reddy as Deputy Adjudicator and are currently in the process of recruiting other staff, establishing the office and setting up systems. The OIA expects to be able to receive cases early in 2004. The Government fully supports the higher education sector in providing students with a fair, open and transparent means of redress when things go wrong.

Thameside College

Andrew Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when he expects the Learning and Skills Council inquiry into Thameside College to be completed; if he will make a statement on the outcome when it is completed; and what financial provision he has made to deal with its outcome. [133900]

Alan Johnson: The Secretary of State for Education and Skills has received a formal complaint alleging breaches of corporate governance and management and financial irregularities at Thameside College. An investigation into these allegations has been completed. The report of the investigation is now being written and will be considered and decisions based on its findings made when it is received. The findings of the investigation and decisions taken will determine whether a statement is made. Any financial implications resulting from the investigation and decisions will be dealt with by the Learning and Skills Council.

Tuition Fees

Mr. Keith Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills whether 100 per cent. of the tuition fee will be paid to higher education institutions in the academic year for which it is charged. [134060]

Alan Johnson: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer of 20 October 2003, Official Report, column 438W, where I stated that the Government will pay the tuition fee to the higher education institution during the academic year for which it is charged.

University Funding

Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportions of income from university top-up fees are expected to fund (a) postgraduate research and (b) undergraduate teaching. [134322]

Alan Johnson: These will be matters for Higher Education Institutions to decide for themselves.

University Medical Schools

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to the Answer of 21 October 2003, Official Report, column 502W, on university medical schools, to the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison), if he will identify the sum for additional funding by each university. [135027]

Alan Johnson: No. The sum referred to was allocated by the Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE) which does not, as a matter of policy, publish sensitive student data at course level for individual institutions.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Liability Insurance (Companies)

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what action he is taking to prevent companies from trading without appropriate liability insurance; and if he will make a statement. [134233]

Mr. Browne: Although compliance levels remain high, all non-compliance is serious. Uninsured companies reduce the compensation available to their employees: transfer the cost of accidents to the taxpayer; and have an unlawful competitive advantage over their legitimate competitors.

The Department is taking a number of actions to re-inforce compliance in the second stage of its review of Employers' Liability Compulsory Insurance (ELCI). These include developing an enforcement database and issuing supplementary guidance on procurement in the public sector to make the confirmation of contractor and subcontractor compliance a more explicit part of the tendering process.

We will report in Autumn on the progress that has been made and any further steps we intend to take.

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many (a) companies and (b) individuals have been prosecuted for trading without appropriate liability insurance in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [134234]

Mr. Browne: The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) is responsible for enforcing Employers' Liability Compulsory Insurance (ELCI).

Over the past five years HSE has prosecuted 18 individuals, 14 companies and 2 partnerships for trading without liability insurance. The breakdown for each operational year is as follows:

	Individuals	Companies	Partnerships
1999–2000	4	0	0
2000–01	3	0	0
2001–02	4	6	2
2002–03	5	4	0
Total	17	11	02	Grand Total = 30

For the period 1 April to 30 September 2003 the breakdown is as follows:

Individuals	Companies	Partnerships

Asbestos Surveyors

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many asbestos surveyors are registered in the United Kingdom. [134186]

Mr. Browne: The United Kingdom Accreditation Service has accredited 50 organisations that carry out inspections for asbestos in buildings. A further 40 organisations have applied for accreditation. Only the number of organisations accredited is known not the number of asbestos inspectors they employ.

Council Tax Benefit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will estimate the tenure status of pensioners who are entitled to council tax benefit but do not receive it. [135222]

Mr. Pond: Council Tax Benefit is administered by over 400 local authorities, each of which is required by legislation to take appropriate steps to ensure that people with a potential entitlement to Council Tax Benefit are made aware of the help available.

Information is also contained in leaflet GL17 "Help with your Council Tax Benefit" as well as various other information leaflets and posters produced by the Department.

The information is in the table.

Estimated tenure status of pensioners entitled to but not in receipt of Council Tax Benefit in 2000–01

Benefits Estimates of Take-Up

Tenure type	Proportion (per cent.)
Local Authority tenants	11
Private renters	14
Owner-occupiers	75
Total	100

Notes:

1. "Private renters" includes pensioners renting accommodation from Registered Social Landlords.
2. Estimates cover the pensioners in the private household population of Great Britain. The data source is the Family Resources Survey.
3. A pensioner is defined as either a single person aged at least 60 years old or, if a couple, both will be termed pensioners if one is aged at least 60 years old.
4. This analysis should be treated with caution as there are possible sources of error, such as misidentification in modelling entitlement to Council Tax Benefit, misreporting of benefit receipt, and inaccuracies in grossing-up estimates from sample data which have not been corrected for.

Health and Safety Executive

Andrew Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the cost was to the Health and Safety Executive in 2002–03 of employing casual staff, broken down by region; and when this practice will be terminated and only permanent staff employed. [132538]

Mr. Browne: During 2002–03, the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) employed both casual and agency staff. We do not have details of the costs broken down by specific regions. The costs shown are the only breakdown available. A further breakdown could be made available only at disproportionate costs.

	Annual costs by region (£)
Agency staff
Bootle	660,844
London	418,180
Nationally	817,514
Sub total	1,896,538
Casual staff
Bootle	35,784
London	37,059
Nationally	18,288
Sub total	91,131
Agency and casual staff total	1,987,669

HSE has no plans to end the practice of using temporary staff. These contracts provide essential short-term cover for such events as maternity/sick cover, projects or gaps prior to recruitment. The use of temporary staff is carefully monitored to ensure that these are used only in appropriate circumstances.

Andrew Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the basis is of his policy that the Field Operations Division of the Health and Safety Executive no longer visit companies where an adverse insurance report indicating defects in plant and equipment has been received. [132541]

Mr. Browne: The Field Operations Directorate of the Health and Safety Executive has never had a policy to visit companies where an adverse inspection report has been received. Until recently they had an administrative procedure to write to companies asking them to confirm that action had been taken. This procedure, which involved 10 full time staff equivalents, added little or no value as companies had almost invariably acted on the report. The procedure was stopped in April 2003 and the administrative staff time applied to work more directly supporting inspectors.

Insurance Premiums

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to require, as part of Employers Liability Compulsory Insurance, main contractors to bear responsibility for any subcontractors that they employ. [132842]

Mr. Browne: For the overwhelming majority of employers it is a legal requirement to have Employers' Liability Compulsory Insurance (ELCI).

In support of this, model conditions of contract in guidance on procurement in the public sector expect contractors to comply with the requirement to have (ELCI) and provide that contractors shall be responsible for the acts and omissions of their sub-contractors as though they were their own.

However the Government intends to issue supplementary guidance with reference to ELCI, to make the confirmation of contractor and subcontractor compliance a more explicit part of the tendering process.

We would encourage a similar standard in the private sector.

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to issue guidance to the insurance industry advising that companies with proven good records in health and safety should have that reflected in lower insurance premiums. [132845]

Mr. Browne: The Association of British Insurers (ABI) recently announced an initiative "Making the Market Work" under which an ABI/Insurer assessment committee will advise trade associations on their health and safety schemes taking into account best practice features that employers' liability compulsory insurance (ELCI) insurers expect to see in place.

Government are also working with the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) to link its 'risk profiling' tools to insurers underwriting decisions.

These initiatives are a first step towards ensuring that insurance premiums better reflect the health and safety records of companies.

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will include in his Department's second report into employers liability compulsory insurance a study of (a) the administrative and legal costs incurred in settling claims and (b) their impact on premiums. [132849]

Mr. Browne: The Department included a study of the administrative and legal costs incurred in settling claims and their impact on premiums in the First Stage Report of the Review of Employers' Liability Compulsory Insurance published on 3 June 2003. A copy of this is available in the Library. The Department's second stage report to be published in the autumn will not repeat this analysis but will set out the further actions that we propose to take. A copy of this will also be placed in the Library of the House on publication.

Pensioners' Benefits

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what estimate he has made of public expenditure on the (a) winter fuel allowance, (b) free television licence and (c) Christmas bonus for pensioners in (i) 1997–98, (ii) 2002 03, (iii) 2010, (iv) 2020, (v) 2030, (vi) 2040, (vii) 2050 and (viii) for other years for which estimates have been made. [134472]

Mr. Browne: The information requested is in the table.

Projected expenditure on winter fuel payments, free television licences for the over 75s, and Christmas bonus for pensioners

£ million, 2003–04 prices

	1997–98	2002–03	2010–11	2020–21	2030–31	2040–41	2050–51
Winter fuel payments	227	1,758	1,808	1,608	1,476	1,194	962
Free TV licences	0	384	469	636	903	1,231	1,477
Christmas bonus for pensioners	131	113	102	81	74	62	48

Notes:
1. All figures expressed in £ million, 2003–04 prices and rounded to the nearest million.
2. Projections are those underlying the Budget 2003 Economic and Fiscal Strategy Report, Annex A.
3. Expenditure is for Great Britain, except free TV licences for the over 75s which is for the United Kingdom.
4. The winter fuel payments expenditure includes expenditure on the 80+ annual payment announced in Budget 2003.
5. Current government policy on uprating of benefits is assumed throughout.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what estimate he has made of public expenditure on public sector pensions as a percentage of gross domestic product in (a) 1997–98, (b) 2002–03, (c) 2010, (d) 2020, (e) 2030, (f) 2040, (g) 2050 and (h) for other years for which estimates have been made. [134477]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

Public expenditure on public sector pensions is measured as contributions by Government employers to funded schemes plus pension payments and other outgoings, net of employee contributions and other receipts, in the case of unfunded schemes. The Treasury has no operational need to aggregate expenditure across all public sector pension schemes.

Public expenditure in the four major unfunded pension schemes (NHS, Teachers, Armed Forces and Principal Civil Service Pension Scheme) accounted for 1.00 per cent. of GDP in 1997–98 and provision was made in 2002–03 for net expenditure equivalent to 1.03 per cent. of GDP. Final figures for 2002–03 will only be available when resource accounts are published.

To help inform the illustrative long-term fiscal projections, estimates are being made of likely future expenditure on public service unfunded pensions under a variety of scenarios. We will consider how far it would be meaningful to disaggregate these projections into different components given the critical dependence of estimates on the assumptions made.

State Pension

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions pursuant to his Answer of 15 July 2003, Official Report, column 252W, on the state pension, if he will calculate the figures on the assumption that earnings growth exceeded price inflation by 1.5 per cent. in each of the six years in question. [132890]

Mr. Browne: The information requested is in the tables.

Table 1: The gross cost of uprating the basic State Pension by 1.5 per cent. above inflation from April 2004

£ billion

	2005–06	2006–07	2007–08	2008–09	2009–10	2010–11
All pensioners	0.9	1.3	1.9	2.6	3.3	4.0
Pensioners aged 65 and over	0.7	1.0	1.4	1.8	2.3	2.8
Pensioners aged 70 and above	0.6	0.9	1.2	1.7	2.1	2.5
Pensioners aged 75 and above	0.4	0.6	0.8	1.1	1.4	1.7
Pensioners aged 80 and over	0.2	0.4	0.5	0.7	0.8	1.0

Table 2: The net cost of uprating the basic State Pension by 1.5 per cent. above inflation from April 2004

£ billion

	2005–06	2006–07	2007–08	2008–09	2009–10	2010–11
All pensioners	0.7	1.0	1.4	1.8	2.3	2.8
Pensioners aged 65 and over	0.5	0.7	1.0	1.3	1.6	2.0
Pensioners aged 70 and over	0.4	0.6	0.8	1.1	1.4	1.7
Pensioners aged 75 and over	0.3	0.4	0.5	0.7	0.9	1.1
Pensioners aged 80 and over	0.2	0.2	0.3	0.4	0.5	0.6

Notes:
1. All costs are rounded to the nearest £100 million and are in 2003–04 price terms.
2. Gross costs are calculated by the Government Actuary's Department and are consistent with Budget 2003 assumptions.
3. The net costs are calculated using the DWP Policy Simulation Model for 2005–06. The net cost represents the cost after allowing for any offsetting savings in income-related benefits.
4. It is assumed that the start of the Savings Credit is increased to the value of the earnings linked basic State Pension.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions pursuant to his answer of 15 July 2003, Official Report, column 252W, on the state pension, what allowance was made for the non take-up of means-tested benefits in each of the six years in question. [132891]

Mr. Browne: The net costs of earnings uprating are calculated using the Department's Policy Simulation Model. The model takes account of the take-up of benefits and its results are consistent with the Department's forecasts for benefit expenditure and case loads for 2004–05 and 2005–06. In calculating costs for years after 2005–06 no change to levels of take-up is modelled.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions pursuant to his answer of 15 July, Official Report, column 252W, on the state pension, what assumption has been made in each of the six years in question for the amount by which earnings growth exceeds price inflation. [132893]

Mr. Browne: The previous answer was consistent with economic assumptions underpinning the 2003 budget. Medium and Long-term projections as published in the 2003 budget, forecast real earnings growth at 2 per cent.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Judges (Appeals)

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what action the Secretary of State takes against judges who are successfully appealed against in relation to (a) sentence and (b) conviction significantly more often than the norm. [134113]

Mr. Leslie: Judges are accountable for their judicial decisions via the appeal system. A successful appeal to a higher court does not of itself provide a basis for criticism of a trial judge. Where the Court of Appeal does record criticism of the trial judge, the judgment is always sent to the judge concerned, and where there is any reason for concern about the conduct of the judge, it is sent to the presiding judges. From time to time where judges are not performing adequately, they may be given advice and guidance, or training, or different workloads or types of workload by the responsible senior judiciary.

In cases where the judge's conduct is seriously impugned, the presiding judges will refer the matter to the Lord Chancellor and Secretary of State, and the Lord Chief Justice to consider complaints about conduct.

Legal Aid

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what assistance has been offered by the Legal Aid Board to Mr. Liam Campbell and Mr. Michael McKevitt. [133237]

Mr. Lammy: The Legal Aid Committee of the Law Society of Northern Ireland, which has statutory responsibility for the administration of civil legal aid in Northern Ireland, has indicated that under Article 24 of the Legal Aid, Advice and Assistance (Northern Ireland) Order 1981, it is prohibited from giving information about individual cases.

Matrimonial/Family Court Orders

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs if he will ask the Law Commission to review the law on variation of matrimonial and family court orders. [134494]

Mr. Lammy: Under the current law, the courts are empowered to vary orders made in family proceedings in appropriate circumstances. I do not propose to ask the Law Commission to undertake such a review at the present time.

Small Claims Courts

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs how long the average waiting time has been for hearing small claims in the small claims court which serves the Teesside area in the last six months. [134296]

Mr. Leslie: Under the Department's Public Service Agreement with HM Treasury, the average waiting time for a small claim is measured from allocation to the small claim track to the disposal hearing and should be no more than 15 weeks. There are 12 county courts within the Tyne-Tees group that conduct small claims hearings, and in the period April to September 2003, the group's average was 9.7 weeks.

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what proportion of (a) claimants and (b) defendants was legally represented at any stage of actions in the small claims court in the last three years. [134299]

Mr. Leslie: Figures relating to the representation status of each party in a small claims case are only available for the final hearing stage. The percentage of parties represented by a solicitor at this stage are provided in the table.

	Percentage
	For claimant	For defendant	Total small claims hearings
2002	42.7	33.2	55,719
2001	50.9	39.1	58,333
2000	48.7	35.1	55,836

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs how many claims the small claims court for the Teesside sub-region determined in each of the last three years. [134302]

Mr. Leslie: There are 12 county courts within the Tyne-Tees group that conduct small claims hearings. During 2002, the number of small claims disposed of by way of a hearing throughout the group was 1,146. In 2001, this figure was 1,572, and in 2000, it was 1,208.

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what the average cost per claim to claimants has been of pursuing a claim in the small claims court in the last five years. [134305]

Mr. Leslie: Claimants pay a fee on issue of proceedings. A small proportion will pay a fee on allocation to track (principally defended claims). Taking both fees into account, the average paid in fees on small claims (up to £5,000) issued in county courts was, over the last five years:

1999	57.50
2000	63.33
2001	63.33
2002	63.33
2003	61.83

Some claimants (on small and large claims) will additionally seek specific orders during the course of proceedings and some of those who have obtained judgment will issue enforcement proceedings. In both cases, further fees will be payable. It is not possible to attribute these extra fees to the average payable on small claims, specifically.

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs how many claims were dealt with by the small claims court in England and Wales in (a) 2000–01, (b) 2001–02 and (c) 2002–03. [134306]

Mr. Leslie: During 2000–01, the number of small claims disposed of by way of a hearing was 58,730. In 2001–02, this figure was 54,742, and in 2002–03, it was 56,988.

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what the average time has been from filing a claim to a hearing date in the small claims court in each of the last five years. [134307]

Mr. Leslie: The figures asked for are provided in the table.

	Average waiting time (weeks)
2002	31
2001	28
2000	29
1999	26
1998	24

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Small Businesses

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister what estimate he has made of the effect of section 8 of the Local Government Act 2003 on the competitiveness of small businesses. [135070]

Mr. Raynsford: Section 8 of the Local Government Act 2003 will have no effect on the competitiveness of small business. It forms part of the new local government capital finance system allowing local authorities to use borrowing and credit without Government consent, where they can afford to do so without extra Government support.

Community Regeneration

Stephen Hesford: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what measures the Government has introduced to help disadvantaged communities regenerate themselves. [134118]

Yvette Cooper: The Government helps communities regenerate themselves through strategies such as the Communities Plan and the Neighbourhood Renewal strategy; which include additional support for programmes such as the Market Renewal pathfinders (new funding of £500 million) and the Neighbourhood Renewal Fund (£975 million over the next two years). For the longer term the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is supporting community participation and effective public service improvement in the most disadvantaged communities.

East Midlands Regional Assembly

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister (1) how much the East Midlands Regional Assembly has spent on legal advice since it was established (a) in total and (b) on its incorporation; [134736]

(2) if he will list (a) public relations and communications companies, (b) advertising and marketing companies, (c) management consultancies, (d) accountancy companies, (e) banking firms, (f) individual consultants and (g) other specialist consultancies used by the East Midlands Regional Assembly since June 2001; what services were provided in each case; and what the cost was in each case; [134752]

(3) how many equivalent full-time employees were employed in the East Midlands Regional Assembly (a) when it was established and (b) on 1 May; [134757]

(4) how many publications have been issued by the East Midlands Regional Assembly in each year since its establishment; and what the cost was in each case; [134758]

(5) how many conferences have been organised by the East Midlands Regional Assembly in each year since it was established; and what the cost was in each case; [134759]

(6) many research projects the East Midlands Regional Assembly (a) planned to commission and (b) commissioned in 2002–03; and what the rationale of each project was; [134760]

(7) how many conferences staff of the East Midlands Regional Assembly have attended since the Assembly was established; what the (a) cost and (b) purpose was in each case; and how many were overseas conferences. [134789]

Mr. Raynsford: The information requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The East Midlands Regional Assembly is a voluntary body which receives Government grant. The details of its expenditure is a matter for the Assembly.

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what guidance his Department has given to the East Midlands Regional Assembly on its incorporation. [134750]

Mr. Raynsford: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has not given the East Midlands Regional Assembly any guidance on incorporation.

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what powers his Department has in relation to the operations of the East Midlands Regional Assembly. [134751]

Mr. Raynsford: The East Midlands Regional Assembly is a voluntary body. The only locus the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has is in terms of checking that the assembly's membership is representative of the region, for the purposes of designation and in terms of the funding agreement about its use of Government grant.

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list the statutes which govern the operation of the East Midlands Regional Assembly. [134753]

Mr. Raynsford: The East Midlands Regional Assembly is a voluntary body and is not governed by statute.

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what position Mr. Simon Brian holds within the East Midlands Regional Assembly. [134765]

Mr. Raynsford: Mr. Simon Brian is East Midlands Regional Assembly's Communications Manager.

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister which organisation audits the accounts of the East Midlands Regional Assembly. [134766]

Mr. Raynsford: Newby Castleman of 22 Park Road, Melton Mowbray, LE13 1TT.

Hazardous Waste

Mrs. May: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what responsibilities local authorities have in relation to the (a) movement of hazardous waste and (b) identification of material contained in landfill sites. [134453]

Mr. Morley: I have been asked to reply.

Local authorities have no regulatory responsibilities regarding the movements of hazardous waste unless they are directly involved in the production, collection or processing of the waste in question. Movements of hazardous waste in Great Britain are controlled by the Special Waste Regulations 1996 and enforced by the Environment Agency. The Regulations require that hazardous waste be monitored from the moment it is discarded until it reaches its final point of treatment, disposal or recovery. The Environment Agency is the regulatory authority for controlling landfill sites and local authorities have no role in regulating licensed or permitted sites. However, under contaminated land legislation, local authorities do become responsible for closed landfill sites in certain circumstances.

London Boroughs (Council Tax)

Simon Hughes: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how much council tax was collected in each year in the London boroughs since 1996. [135157]

Mr. Raynsford: The table shows the amounts of council tax collected in each London borough and the City of London, irrespective of the financial year to which they relate, in each year from 1995–96 to 2002–03.

Simon Hughes: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what proportion of council tax due was collected in the London boroughs in each year since 1996. [135158]

Mr. Raynsford: The following table gives the in-year council tax collection rates for each London borough and the City of London for each year from 1995–96 to 2002–03. The collection of council tax continues after the end of the financial year to which it relates. This means that the percentage of council tax ultimately collected for any financial year is greater than that shown in the table.

Mining Communities (Regeneration)

Ms Atherton: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how much (a) funding and (b) other resources have been made available to support the regeneration of the former (i) tin mining and (ii) coal mining communities of West Cornwall in each of the last five years; and if he will list the (A) funding streams and (B) other resources available to support the regeneration of former mining communities in the UK. [134077]

Yvette Cooper: A detailed breakdown of funding and resources made available to support the regeneration of tin mining and coal mining communities in West Cornwall is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

However, in the past five years indicative funding for projects to assist communities generally within the Camborne, Pool, Redruth areas, which lie at the heart of the former tin mining areas of West Cornwall, by the South West Regional Development Agency is as follows:

	Indicative spend
1998–99	1,816,529.00
1999–2000	713,496.00
2000–01	398,021.00
2001–02	2,313,686.00
2002–03	516,300.00
2003–04 (to date)	552,767.00

Furthermore, the Camborne, Pool, Redruth Urban Regeneration Company was approved in September 2002 to help address deprivation, attract private sector interest and investment and secure improvements to the local environment and public realm in Camborne, Pool and Redruth. The Company—CPR Regeneration—is funded jointly by the local authority, English Partnerships and the South West Regional Development Agency.

Two national programmes support the regeneration of the former coal mining communities. These are: (i) the National Coalfields Programme and (ii) The Coalfields Regeneration Trust. In addition, a range of national regeneration programmes provides support to all areas including former mining areas such as those controlled by the Regional Development Agencies, the Neighbourhood Renewal Fund and the Housing Investment Programme.

Para-professional Staff

Ms Walley: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what discussions he has had with (a) local authority associations and (b) trade union representatives on national conditions of service for para-professional staff and those on term-time only contracts; and if he will make a statement. [132499]

Yvette Cooper: Ministers of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister have no discussions with local authority associations or trade union representatives on these issues. Pay and contractual arrangements for support staff are determined at local level.

Pensioners (Council Tax)

Tim Loughton: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many pensioners pay council tax in the UK; and what estimate he has made of the total tax they pay in England. [134794]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Tim Loughton, dated 29 October 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent question asking how many pensioners pay council tax in the UK and for an estimate of the total tax they pay in England. (134794)

Estimates for council taxes are based on the analysis "The effects of taxes and benefits on household income 2001–02" produced by the ONS and published on the National Statistics website on October 21st 2003. The analysis can be obtained from the House of Commons library or from the National Statistics website at: http://www.statistics.gov.uk/taxesbenefits. It includes measures of income inequality for the United Kingdom as a whole based on data from the Expenditure and Food Survey. This is a sample survey covering about 7,500 households in the UK and sample sizes for pensioner households are only sufficient to give very approximate estimates.

Pensioner households have been defined as those where the Household Reference Person is retired or unoccupied and aged 65 or more and male, or 60 years of age or more and female, and economically inactive.

Detailed information on the definition of the Household Reference Person can be found in Appendix D of the document at the following address:

http://www.statistics.gov.uk/downloads/theme_social/Family_Spending_2001-02_revised/Family_Spending_revised.pdf

Estimates for 2001–02 suggest that there were about 6 million pensioner households (single and couples) in Great Britain and that about 5 million of those paid council tax (i.e. their net council tax was greater than zero). Council tax is not paid in Northern Ireland. Net council tax is defined as gross council tax less benefits and discounts, where a household reports taking up a council tax benefit entitlement.

The data suggests that single and couple pensioner households in England paid about 3 billion in council tax net of benefits and discounts. However, these estimates of numbers and payments will not match population data or administrative payments data because of sample size and weighting issues as well as possible inaccurate reporting by respondents.

Street Warden Scheme

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to provide funding to extend the street warden scheme to Romford. [133998]

Yvette Cooper: There are no Office of the Deputy Prime Minister funded warden schemes operating in Romford. No application was made to set up a scheme in Romford during the initial bidding round in 2001.

At present, there are no plans for a further round of Office of the Deputy Prime Minister funding for new warden schemes beyond March 2005, however, if the constituents of Romford wish to start up a warden scheme in their area, we would suggest that funding would need to be secured from sources such as the local authority, Registered Social Landlords or from the private sector, as many other neighbourhood warden programmes have done.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans the Government has to fund further street warden schemes in Suffolk. [134407]

Yvette Cooper: In the County of Suffolk, Street Warden Schemes funded by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister are operating in Lowestoft, Bury St. Edmunds and Ipswich. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's funding for Street Warden Schemes is a four year programme which concludes in March 2005 and there are no plans to extend funding past this date.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is actively working with existing schemes to help them secure mainstream funding from sources such as local authorities and the private sector. Support and guidance is also being provided to areas wishing to set up schemes with their own resources.

TREASURY

Administration Costs

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the administration costs budget of the Treasury in each year since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [135302]

Ruth Kelly: The Treasury's administration costs expenditure is set out in successive Departmental Reports (most recently for 2003, Cm 2922) and Resource Accounts (most recently for 2002–03, HC 999).

Arms Embargo (Rwanda)

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether HM Customs and Excise has responded to the requests by the United Nations Security Council for information on violations of arms embargoes in Rwanda by UK companies discussed in the United Nations Security Council document, "Third Report of the International Commission of Inquiry (Rwanda)", (S/1997/1010). [135132]

John Healey: I am advised that Customs investigators had met with officials from the International Commission of Inquiry (Rwanda) on 10 January 1996 to discuss Customs investigations and had also responded to a request from the UN International Tribunal on 21 March 1996. The Third Report of the Commission was published on 1 November 1996.

There had been some earlier confusion over letters from the Commission which were never received by Customs, but the Commission accepted that the requests in those two letters had been answered in the course of the above meeting.

HM Customs and Excise responded on 14 November 1996 to the Commission's requests for information about Customs investigations into arms supplies to Rwanda and exiled Rwandans.

I understand that Commission officials expressed complete satisfaction with the co-operation received from the UK Government of the day.

Business Taxation

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the aggregate charge in taxation paid by UK business was from 1997 to 2002. [134867]

Ruth Kelly: Figures on receipts from individual taxes are available in tables 2.1A to 2.1E in Financial Statistics published by the Office for National Statistics, which is available in the Library of the House.

It is not possible to apportion receipts between business taxpayers and others. This is due to a number of taxes (for example fuel duty) being paid by both business and individuals, and because markets adjust to shift the incidence of taxation throughout the economy.

Council Tax

Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much council tax was paid as a proportion of gross incomes for households in each income quintile group in London for the latest year for which data is available. [135162]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Simon Hughes, dated 30 October 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent question asking how much council tax was paid as a proportion of gross incomes for households in each income quintile group in London for the latest year for which data is available. (135162)

Estimates in the following table are produced from the Office for National Statistics' analysis "The effects of taxes and benefits on household income" produced by the ONS and published on the National Statistics website on October 21st 2003. The analysis can be obtained from the House of Commons library or from the National Statistics website at http://www.statistics.gov.uk/taxesbenefits. It includes measures of income inequality for the United Kingdom as a whole based on data from the Expenditure and Food Survey.

The table shows, for 2001–02, the average net council tax paid for all households in London and for each income quintile group where households are ranked by equivalised disposable income. Equivalisation is a standard methodology that takes into account the size and composition of households and adjusts their incomes to recognise differing demands on resources. The net council tax figures are gross council tax less reported council tax benefits and discounts. The table also shows the boundaries between equivalised disposable income quintiles, which have been calculated separately for London households. For example, the 1st quintile boundary is the income level below which one fifth of those households are estimated to lie. The results are subject to a degree of uncertainty due to increased sampling variability arising from small sample sizes.

Correspondence

Mr. Flook: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will answer the letter to him of 20 June from the hon. Member for Taunton concerning Mr. Ken Coles of Chelston about national insurance contributions. [135878]

Dawn Primarolo: There is no record of the hon. Member's letter having been received in the Treasury. However, a copy has been requested and a reply will be sent as soon as possible.

Debt Cancellation (Second World War)

Bob Spink: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the cancellation of continuing debt incurred by the UK (a) during and (b) in the aftermath of the Second World War. [135255]

Ruth Kelly: No specific representations concerning the cancellation of the debt incurred by the UK as a result of the Second World War have been received in recent years. However successive Governments have undertaken to meet the obligations under the terms of the debt incurred by repaying the United States and Canadian Governments in full the amounts lent in 1945.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much has been paid to the United States in settlement of military equipment provision during World War II in each year since 1973. [134946]

Ruth Kelly: From 1973 to 2000, the UK made annual repayments of principal and interest of around US$153 million, made up of a US$138 million scheduled repayment of principal and interest plus US$15 million of interest on the six deferred payments, to the United States in respect of its Second World War Loans. In 2001 and 2002, the repayments were US$152 million and US$150 million respectively.

Employment Disincentives

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 6 October, Official Report, column 1087W, on employment disincentives, if he will make such an assessment. [135110]

Dawn Primarolo: Existing survey data would not provide sufficient information to make an assessment of the disincentive for those on low incomes to change jobs because of short-term cash flow problems. The creation of a new survey, or extension of an existing one, to generate this information would entail disproportionate cost and therefore the Government have no plans to make this assessment.

Euro

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to the answer of 20 June, Official Report, column 458W, on the euro, if he will list the events attended by ministers to campaign for a pro-European consensus; which Government ministers were in attendance at these events; when each event took place; if he will list the events planned for ministers to campaign for a pro-European consensus; which Government ministers will be in attendance; and what were the dates of these events. [135349]

Ruth Kelly: The Chancellor and other Ministers have held a variety of meetings to discuss the euro in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. In addition, Treasury officials have held more than 150 meetings with opinion formers in Britain and Europe since the Chancellor's statement on 9 June.

Growth Rates

Mr. Evans: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list (a) the growth figures for (i) England and (ii) the north-west in each year since 1992, and (b) projected figures for future years. [134895]

Ruth Kelly: UK growth forecasts will be updated in the forthcoming Pre-Budget Report. The Government do not publish forecasts for England and the English regions. The Office for National Statistics (ONS) does not produce estimates of real Gross Domestic Product (GDP) for England and the nine English regions. However, the ONS does produce estimates of nominal Gross Value Added (GVA) for these regions, which can be found on its website (www.statistics.gov.uk).

Income Tax Evasion

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent estimate his Department has made of the level of income tax contributions lost to evasion. [135382]

Dawn Primarolo: There is no reliable measure of the total tax and other duties lost to evasion. In his report, published in March 2000, Lord Grabiner QC commented on the scale of the hidden economy and said:

> "By its nature, the size of the informal economy is hard to measure. Most estimates are based on analysing high-level economic aggregates, such as labour market statistics or income and expenditure surveys, and calculate the result as a percentage of GDP. However there is research which suggests that these estimates tend to be exaggerated."

It would be impractical to arrive at a precise and meaningful figure as to the scale of the problem without a considerable investment of time and resources.

Influenza

David Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people aged 65 years or over died of influenza in (a) the East Riding of Yorkshire, (b) Hull and (c) the UK in each year since 1997. [135280]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. David Davis, dated 3 October 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent question asking how many people aged 65 years or over have died of influenza in (a) East Riding of Yorkshire, (b) Hull, (c) the UK in each year since 1997. (135280)

Figures for East Riding of Yorkshire and Kingston-upon-Hull, (City of) unitary authorities and the United Kingdom are provided in the table. The most recent year for which data are available is 2001.

Numbers of deaths from influenza[1], 1997 to 2001[2] for East Riding of Yorkshire and Kingston-upon-Hull, (City of) unitary authorities and the United Kingdom[3]

	Number of deaths
	East Riding of Yorkshire	Kingston-upon-Hull, City of	United Kingdom
1997	*	*	413
1998	*	—	129
1999	6	—	598
2000	*	*	630
2001	—	—	27

— = zero deaths.
* = Fewer than five deaths.
[1] Deaths with an underlying cause of influenza defined using the International Classification of Diseases, Ninth Revision (ICD-9) code 487 for the years 1997 to 2000 and, for the year 2001, the International Classification of Diseases, Tenth Revision (ICD-10) codes J10 and J11.
[2] Figures are for deaths occurring in each calendar year, except for data for Scotland and Northern Ireland included in the United Kingdom totals. These are deaths registered in each calendar year.
[3] Deaths of usual residents of these areas.

Iraq

Alan Simpson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what costs the Government has (a) incurred since and (b) made provision for in relation to Iraq, broken down by Government department. [135767]

Mr. Boateng: In his 2003 Budget statement, the Chancellor confirmed that £3 billion has been set aside in a special reserve available to the Ministry of Defence, for the costs of the military campaign in Iraq,

> "so that our troops continue to be properly equipped and given the resources that they deserve and have a right to expect." [9 April 2003, Official Report, column 271.]

It is too early to provide total costs of the military campaign in Iraq. However, up to the point military operations began, Ministry of Defence estimate costs at around £700 million.

At the Donors' Conference on Iraq, in Madrid on 24 October, the UK made a total financial commitment towards Iraq's reconstruction of £544 million for the three years from April 2003, including funding we have provided so far and our share of proposed European Community spending in Iraq.

£248 million is for humanitarian and reconstruction assistance already committed by DFID and other Government Departments, £9 million of which is our share of the EC commitment, and £296 million will be for the period up to March 2006, £29 million of which is our share of currently proposed EC spending.

Note of Dissent (Directions)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the directions overriding a note of dissent by an accounting officer that his Department has been notified of since January 2003; if he will place details of such directions in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [134224]

Ruth Kelly: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by the Economic Secretary on 23 June 2003, Official Report, column 617W.

The Treasury was informed of a direction by the Ministry of Defence on 30 July 2003 in respect of Hawk trainers.

The procedures relating to ministerial directions are set out in the "Accounting Officer Memorandum" and require Departments to convey relevant papers to the C&AG, copied to the Treasury, once an Accounting Office has received a direction from a Minister. It is for the C&AG to decide what action should be taken and whether he wishes to investigate further. Such documents may contain sensitive or classified material and it is for the Minister of the Department concerned to decide whether to make such directions more widely available.

Pay Statistics

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the current average pay in the (a) private and (b) public sector is, (i) exclusive and (ii) inclusive of work benefits. [134873]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Jonathan Djanogly, dated 30 October 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent question on average pay in the public and private sector, both excluding and including work benefits. (134873)

In April 2003, the average gross weekly earnings of full-time employees whose pay was not affected by absence, was £465.90 per week for those employed in the private sector and £480.80 per week for those in the public sector. The figures include overtime and bonuses, but do not include any non-monetary payments or benefits. This information is taken from the New Earnings Survey.

None of the surveys of employers, households or individuals carried out by the Office for National Statistics collects details of non-monetary work benefits, such as company cars, private health insurance, employers' pension contributions, share schemes, etc. The Inland Revenue publish details of the value of a number of these benefits on their website at: www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk/stats/taxable_benefits/menu.htm.

However, this data is not produced for the public and private sectors separately.

Scottish Housing Stock (Debt)

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for (a) Scottish Borders, (b) Dumfries and Galloway and (c) Glasgow local authorities (i) the amount of housing debt remaining after transfer of local authority housing stock, (ii) the portion of that residual debt which (A) has subsequently been redeemed and (B) continues to be serviced, (iii) the breakage costs associated with any redemption of residual debt and (iv) the estimated servicing costs of any residual debt in (X) 2003–04, (Y) 2004–05 and (Z) 2005–06 indicating in each case which costs are being met by (1) the Treasury and (2) the Scottish Executive. [135075]

Ruth Kelly: Housing stock transfers in Scotland are a devolved responsibility of the Scottish Executive, and therefore most of the information requested is a matter for the Executive. With regard to Treasury costs, the amount of grant provided by the Exchequer to the Scottish Executive in respect of repayment of debt was £59 million for Scottish Borders, £76 million for Dumfries and Galloway and £920 million for Glasgow.

Tourism/Agriculture Spending

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what total government spending on the (a) tourist and (b) agricultural industry was in 2002–03. [135839]

Ruth Kelly: I refer the hon. Gentleman to Table 3.5 in Public Expenditure Statistical Analyses 2003 (Cm 5901) a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

VAT

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his policy on the relative VAT rates applied to (a) energy saving equipment and (b) energy used in (i) new build and (ii) the repair and conversions of existing buildings. [135402]

John Healey: The installation of energy-saving materials in residential accommodation and certain charity buildings is liable to VAT at the reduced rate of 5 per cent. This helps to keep homes warm and contributes to achieving the energy saving targets we are committed to as a result of the Kyoto summit. The Government is currently negotiating hard for an amendment to the European Sixth VAT Directive which would permit the reduced VAT rating of the purchase of energy-saving materials for do-it-yourself installation.

Fuel and power used in the construction, repair and conversion of buildings is standard-rated for VAT purposes. However, since 1997 domestic fuel and power subsequently used in those buildings has only been liable to VAT at 5 per cent.

CABINET OFFICE

Civil Service

Dr. Cable: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what estimate the Cabinet Office has made of the proportion of civil servants which the senior Civil Service represents; and if he will make a statement. [134135]

Mr. Alexander: The most recent figures relating to the number of staff as at 1 April 2003 were published on 16 October 2003. These figures show that there were 542,770 permanent civil servants (Headcount basis), and of these 4,260 or 0.8 per cent. were at Senior Civil Service Level.

Non-departmental Public Bodies

Dr. Cable: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many non-departmental public bodies there were in England in each year since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [134549]

Mr. Alexander: Information on non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) is provided annually in the Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies". The latest available data are contained in "Public Bodies 2003", giving information as at 31 March 2003. Copies of these publications are held in the House Libraries.

The number of NDPBs sponsored by UK Government Departments with responsibilities for England in each year was as follows:

Year	Number
1997	846
1998	837
1999	828
2000	822
2001	853
2002	773
2003	786

Some of these NDPBs will have a remit which extends beyond England.

Official Buildings

Norman Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list the official buildings within a mile of Parliament for which the Cabinet Office has responsibility, giving in each case the date of acquisition; whether the acquisition in each case was (a) as a result of a departmental transfer and (b) a new acquisition by the Government; and what the buildings are used for. [134419]

Mr. Alexander: The buildings are as follows:

Building	Acquisition date	Means of acquisition	Use
70 Whitehall[1]	1996[2]	Departmental transfer	Office space and operational facilities
36 Whitehall	1996[2]	Departmental transfer	Office space
53 Parliament Street	1996[2]	Departmental transfer	Office space
Hepburn House, Marsham Street	1996[2]	Departmental transfer	Vacant space and transfer to another Department pending
10 Downing Street[1]	1996[2]	Departmental transfer	Office space, residential accommodation, state rooms
11 Downing Street[1]	1996[2]	Departmental transfer	Office space, residential accommodation, state rooms
12 Downing Street	1996[2]	Departmental transfer	Office space
Admiralty House[1]	1996[2]	Departmental transfer	Residential accommodation, state rooms
11 Belgrave Road[1]	1996[2]	Departmental transfer	Office space, training and operational facilities
Admiralty Arch	1998	Departmental transfer	Office space
22/26 Whitehall[1]	1999	Departmental transfer	Office space
35 Great Smith Street[1]	2000	New acquisition	Office space
Stockley House, 130 Wilton Road[1]	2000	Departmental transfer	Office space
9 Whitehall	2001	New acquisition	Office space
7 St. James's Square[3]	2001	Departmental transfer	Office space
10 Great George Street[1]	2001	New acquisition	Office space and operational facilities
2 Little Smith Street	2001	New acquisition	Office space
67 Tufton Street	2001	New acquisition	Office space and operational facilities

[1] The Cabinet Office does not occupy the whole of these buildings.
[2] All of the properties acquired by the Cabinet Office in 1996 were transferred when responsibility for buildings was delegated to Departments from the then Property Services Agency.

Public Appointments

Sandra Gidley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what proportion of ministerial appointments to public bodies in each year since 1997 were of (a) men and (b) women; and what proportion of public appointments were held by women in each year since 1997. [134682]

Mr. Alexander: Information is provided annually in the Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies". The latest available data is contained in "Public Bodies 2003", giving information as at 31 March 2003. Copies of these publications are held in the House Libraries.

These show that the number and proportion of men and women holding ministerial appointments in public bodies were as follows:

	Men		Women
Year	Number	Per cent.	Number	Per cent.
1997	22,068	67	10,728	33
1998	20,676	66	10,487	34
1999	19,693	65	10,526	35
2000	17,303	66	9,106	34
2001	16,743	66	9,106	34
2001	16,743	65	9,106	35
2002	14,510	66	7,391	34
2003	14,436	64	8,028	36

Data on non-ministerial appointments have not been collected since 2001.

PRIME MINISTER

Correspondence

Sir Robert Smith: To ask the Prime Minister when he will reply to the letter from Sir Ian Wood and Mr. Paul Blakeley of 22 October regarding the impact of the draft EU constitution on investment in the exploitation of North Sea oil and gas reserves; and if he will place a copy of the reply in the Library. [R] [135324]

The Prime Minister: The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has replied today on my behalf. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

CULTURE MEDIA AND SPORT

Drug Testing

John Mann: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what recent guidance she has given to (a) the Football Premier League and (b) UK Sport on the deterrent use of maximum bans for breaches of drug testing regulations. [135312]

Mr. Caborn: The Government have given no advice to the Football Premier League and UK Sport on doping sanctions.

This is a matter for UK Sport and sport's governing bodies. The UK's national anti-doping policy is in line with the International Standard for Doping Control which requires the governing bodies to carry out a robust in-and-out of competition dope testing programme. Governing bodies are responsible for imposing sanctions where an athlete has been found to have committed a doping offence. Sanctions should be in line with the regulations set out by the governing body or international federation which will comply with the rules of the British Olympic Association or Commonwealth Games Associations.

Olympic Games

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations the Government have made to the International Olympic Committee on an Olympic team from Burma taking part in the Athens games in 2004; and if she will make a statement. [134719]

Tessa Jowell: The Government have not made any representations to the International Olympic Committee regarding the participation of Myanmar in the 2004 Olympic Games in Athens. It remains the Government's view that the Olympic Games is a non-political event.

The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South may be interested to note that the EU Common Position on Myanmar includes a visa ban on regime members. This would mean that senior regime members would not be able to attend the Games in Athens.

Tote

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when she intends to introduce legislation to change the status of the Tote; and if she will make a statement. [134990]

Mr. Caborn: We intend to bring the necessary legislation forward when parliamentary time allows.

DEFENCE

Armed Forces Pay and Conditions

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how the pay and conditions offered to members of the reserve forces differs from those offered to members of the regular forces; and if he will make a statement. [134917]

Mr. Caplin: When called out for full-time service, reservists receive the same rates of pay and are generally entitled to the same allowances as their regular counterparts. However, unlike regular soldiers, reservists may also claim financial assistance if their civilian earnings are greater than their military pay. They are also entitled to a tax-free call-out gratuity of £420.

When called-out, reservists are paid the full 13 per cent. X-factor (training pay only includes 5 per cent. X-factor). The X-factor takes account of the relative disadvantages of conditions of service experienced by members of the armed forces compared with those in civilian life.

Armed Forces Pensions

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of the armed forces' daily pay rate is deducted for the purpose of contributing to the Armed Forces Pension Scheme. [134493]

Mr. Caplin: No deduction is made from the pay of Volunteer Reservists for the purpose of contributing to the Armed Forces Pension Scheme.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what mechanisms (a) have existed since 1973 and (b) exist to ensure that all members of the armed forces are fully informed of their pension entitlements on leaving the services; and if he will make a statement; [134918]

(2) what incidences there are of members of the armed forces not being informed of their pension entitlements on leaving the services; and if he will make a statement. [134919]

Mr. Caplin: Mechanisms have been in existence since 1973, to inform, by letter, all members of the armed forces of their pension entitlements on leaving the Services. Computer generated printouts for each Service advise the pension divisions of the requirement to produce this letter.

A problem has been identified affecting some former service personnel with less than two years service, who may not have received their entitlements to an Armed Forces Pension Scheme attributable gratuity, or pension. We expect the great majority of omissions to have been rectified by January 2004. Procedures have been tightened to prevent a reoccurrence.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what rights members of the armed forces (a) have and (b) have had to backdate their pensions if they were not informed of their pension entitlements on leaving the services; and if he will make a statement; [134920]

(2) under what circumstances a former member of the armed forces who has not collected their pension from the first date at which there were entitled to it can receive backdated payments; and if he will make a statement. [134921]

Mr. Caplin: Members who have not claimed their pension entitlement on leaving the armed forces, or have not claimed when their entitlement becomes due, have a right to receive payments backdated to six years, in line with the Statute of Limitations Act 1980. However, Ministry of Defence and HM Treasury may authorise that payments be backdated further, depending on the merits of each case. Payments are usually backdated in full and are always so where non-payment was due to a mistake on the part of MOD.

Cadet Forces

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what (a) pay and (b) conditions are offered to those that assist in running cadet forces. [133751]

Mr. Caplin: Certain categories of helpers (of which there are many) with the Cadet forces can be paid for a certain number of days per year for training and to cover expenses such as travelling and subsistence.

Conditions for the cadet services vary according to type of volunteer. Military status volunteers are subject to military Service Regulations while civilians are subject to the appropriate Civil Service regulations.

Depleted Uranium

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his answer of 8 July 2003, Official Report, column 701W, on depleted uranium, what conclusions and agreements have been reached with the United States following these discussions. [135038]

Mr. Caplin: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 6 October 2003, Official Report, column 1159W.

Iraq

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made in (a) securing and (b) protecting evidence of human rights abuses in Iraq during Saddam Hussein's regime; what evidence has been handed to the relevant prosecuting authorities; and what the relevant prosecuting authorities are. [133831]

Mr. MacShane: I have been asked to reply.

The Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) has been working with the Governing Council, the Iraqi Human Rights Ministry, and local and international organisations to put in place the necessary procedures for collecting and securing evidence. The CPA has so far investigated 128 of the 250 reported mass grave sites and seized thousands of potentially relevant documents. CPA efforts are also focused on building the capacity of Iraqis to investigate the crimes committed by the former regime for both historical and prosecution purposes.

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to send (a) additional and (b) replacement troops to Iraq; which units are to be sent and when; and if he will make a statement. [135450]

Mr. Hoon: I refer the hon. Member to my Written Statement of 28 October 2003, Official Report, columns 7–8WS.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the reason no action was taken to take into account (a) factual errors and (b) suggested errors of interpretation brought to the attention of their seniors by concerned defence intelligence officers in respect of the draft dossier on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction of September 2002, prior to its final publication; and when he was first informed of the misgivings of the defence intelligence staff officers relating to the draft. [131108]

Mr. Hoon: As indicated in my evidence to Lord Hutton's Inquiry on 27 August 2003, I was first informed in a minute dated 18 July 2003 that two officials in the Defence Intelligence Staff had expressed some concerns about certain language used in the dossier. I set out the action taken as a result of those concerns in my remarks in the House on 11 September 2003, Official Report, columns 491–95.

Service Accommodation

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many new build units in the married quarters estate are planned by his Department in each of the next three years; and how many houses this will replace from the existing married quarters estate. [133381]

Mr. Caplin: The numbers of new build Service family houses planned in mainland UK for the next three years, through both capital projects and PFI are as follows:

Year
2003	391
2004–05	500
2005–06	315
Total	1,206

Further to the answer given by the then Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend for Kirkcadly (Dr. Moonie) on 13 May Official Report, column 152–153W, the expected completion date for 24 properties has changed from 2003–04 to 2004–05.

It is difficult to specify how many existing family houses these new builds will replace. New build is often at locations where the requirements for Service housing are new or increasing, and therefore the new houses are not intended as replacements, but they may indirectly replace housing at other locations where requirements are declining.

Territorial Army (Northern Ireland)

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people have been recruited to the Territorial Army in Northern Ireland in each of the past five years; what steps he is taking to increase these figures; and if he will make a statement. [134827]

Mr. Caplin: The number of people recruited into the Territorial Army (TA) in Northern Ireland in each of the past five years are shown in the following table.

1 April to 31 March	Officers	Soldiers
1998–99	30	297
1999–2000	45	272
2000–01	33	279
2001–02	42	235
2002–03	39	218
2003–04 to date	24	153

TA recruiting is a continual process throughout the year and is generally conducted geographically by local TA centres. A local TA recruiting campaign has recently been run, supplementing the national radio, television and interne[illegible]ruiting campaigns. This involved open days in the TA C[illegible] following advertisements placed in the local press and on the radio. Considerable interest was generated from potential recruits, which included approximately 100 inquiries emanating from the North Down Constituency.

Weapons of Mass Destruction

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his Department's latest estimate is of those states that are (a) known and (b) suspected of pursuing (i) nuclear, (ii) chemical and (iii) biological weapons programmes; and if he will list them. [133721]

Mr. Hoon: Under the terms of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, the United Kingdom, the United States, France, China and Russia are legally entitled to possess nuclear weapons. Additionally, India and Pakistan have tested nuclear devices. We continue to encourage Israel to resolve international concerns about its nuclear status by acceding to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty as a non-nuclear weapons state.

There are five states parties to the Chemical Weapons Convention that have declared possession of chemical weapons. They are currently in the process of destroying them in accordance with their obligations under the Convention.

The Government have made clear in recent months that we continue to believe that Iraq had produced and had active programmes for production of WMD. We are also aware of, and very concerned by, persistent reports that Iran, The Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Libya and Syria are pursuing programmes to develop WMD and the means for their delivery.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Asylum Seekers

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much asylum seekers cost public funds in the last 12 months per head of tax paying population. [132337]

Beverley Hughes: The cost of supporting asylum seekers in the last financial year for which final data are available (2001–02) was £1,046 million.

Drugs

John Mann: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions he has had about reclassifying amphetamines from a class B to class A drug. [135315]

Caroline Flint: Under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, amphetamines are classified as a Class B drug.

The Government keep the control of drugs under review but have had no recent discussions with the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs nor any other party about moving amphetamines to class A.

Gun Crime

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the level of gun crime. [134091]

Caroline Flint [holding answer 27 October 2003]: Although the incidence of firearms offences is low compared to recorded crime as a whole, too many people are still being killed and injured by firearms. This is unacceptable.

We are taking forward a programme to tackle gun crime on a number of fronts. This includes:

tackling the links to drug supply and crime;

reducing the supply and availability of firearms;

effective police operations to drive down firearm offences;

tough laws and effective enforcement and engaging the worst affected communities to address the underlying gun culture.

Passports

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average administrative cost was of issuing a passport in each of the last five years. [134364]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The administration costs of producing a passport over the past five years was as follows:

Financial year	Administrative expenditure (£)	Passports issued	Administrative cost per passport (£)
1998–99	15,783,000	4,737,057	3.33
1999–2000	20,596,000	5,316,490	4.03
2000–01	25,433,000	5,543,994	4.59
2001–02	35,866,000	5,583,266	6.42
2002–03	36,081,000	5,354,348	6.74

Administration costs are classified in the Agency's accounts as all non-production costs including costs of the change programme, support staff and accommodation.

The main reason for the increase over time has been to deliver a growing change programme.

Unaccompanied Asylum Seekers

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department is taking to ensure that councils are not financially disadvantaged by continuing the care of unaccompanied asylum seekers beyond the age of 16. [131494]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 14 October 2003]: The Home Office is responsible for paying grant to local authorities supporting Unaccompanied Asylum Seeking Children (UASCs) until the age of 18. The grant allows for local authorities to claim the same level of grant for UASCs aged 16–18 as for under 16s—provided that they applied for asylum before reaching the age of 16.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Small Claims Court

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what plans he has to compile annual reports on the work of the small claims court separately from the report on the Courts Service. [134938]

Mr. Leslie: The Court Service will shortly be publishing the first edition of the County Court Annual Report. It will cover the period 2002–03.

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs whether those who adjudicate in the small claims court are given training to help them assist unrepresented parties to actions in the small claims court. [134294]

Mr. Leslie: Judicial training is the responsibility of the Judicial Studies Board (JSB), an independent body chaired by Lord Justice Keene. The JSB provides written guidance to judges on the conduct of small claims cases in its Civil Bench Book and on the particular needs of litigants in person in its Equal Treatment Bench Book. Both publications are publicly available via the JSB's website (www.jsboard.co.uk). Judges who sit in the county court attend an Induction Course on first appointment and further training is provided at three-yearly intervals for all who exercise the civil jurisdiction. All such training includes sessions on the needs of litigants in person.

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what mediation resources are made available to (a) claimants and (b) defendants involved in actions in the small claims court. [134297]

Mr. Lammy: There is no national provision of mediation services within the court system. A pilot scheme for mediating small claims cases is provided by the Devon and Exeter Law Society at Exeter, Barnstaple and Torquay County Courts. If it proves successful we will consider extending a similar service to other courts.

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what the average cost has been to public funds of each action brought in the small claims court in the last three years. [134298]

Mr. Lammy: The only cost to public funds in pursuing a small claim through the county court is in relation to the exemption and remission of fees. Separate figures on exemption and remission are not collected on claims which fall in the monetary bands of the small claims track.

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what legal advice and support is available to (a) claimants and (b) defendants involved in actions in the small claims court. [134300]

Mr. Lammy: Although there is no specific provision of legal advice at small claims courts themselves, Court Service staff do provide assistance to claimants and defendants on procedural matters regarding the hearings. Money Claims Online, launched in December 2001, also allows claimants and defendants in small claims proceedings to submit their claims and responses online, thereby reducing pressure on the courts themselves. In addition, all courts in England and Wales are Quality Marked Information Points for The Community Legal Service (CLS) and hold the CLS directory which contains information on service providers such as Citizens Advice Bureaux, Law Centres, independent advice agencies and solicitors. Through the CLS information and advice is available in a wide range of categories such as consumer claims, disputes between landlords and tenants about repairs, deposits and rent arrears.

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs how the effectiveness of the small claims court as a means for the public to recover small claims economically is monitored and assessed by the Department. [134303]

Mr. Leslie: There is no measure in place to monitor or assess the effectiveness of the county court as a means for the public to recover small claims economically. However, under the department's Public Service Agreements we have a number of business targets which have been identified to measure our performance in reducing unnecessary delay, reducing unnecessary cost and improving enforcement.

Sutton Coldfield Courthouse

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs if he will make a statement on the future of the courthouse in Sutton Coldfield. [135806]

Mr. Leslie: I have decided that the appeal of Birmingham city council, against closure, should be allowed. Therefore the magistrates courthouse at Sutton Coldfield will remain open.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Benefits/MOT Testing

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to bring Northern Ireland into line with the rest of the United Kingdom in relation to (a) the overlapping of social security benefits and (b) MOT testing; and if he will make a statement. [134829]

Angela Smith: The information is as follows:

(a) There is a long-standing policy of parity in social security matters between Great Britain and Northern Ireland. NI social security legislation relating to overlapping benefits is therefore already in line with that in GB.

(b) MOT testing in Northern Ireland is conducted to the same standards and within the same framework of EU requirements as elsewhere in the UK. However, an earlier proposal to lower the age at which private cars in Northern Ireland must undergo an MOT test from four years to three years, in line with practice in the rest of the United Kingdom, was deferred pending the outcome of a review of three year testing in Great Britain.

MOT tests, along with all other statutory vehicle tests, are carried out exclusively in Northern Ireland by the Driver and Vehicle Testing Agency (DVTA) of the Department of the Environment. There are no arrangements to allow private garages in Northern Ireland to carry out MOT tests on private cars, as is the practice in Great Britain. In light of the on-going difficulties with MOT test waiting times, there have been some calls for the GB arrangements to be introduced in Northern Ireland. However, following the recent programme to refurbish and re-equip DVTA's 15 test centres, under a £57 million private finance initiative contract, and on completion of the current project to introduce telephone, and subsequently internet, test booking, I expect the Agency to return to its previously high levels of performance and customer service. I believe these arrangements best suit the circumstances in Northern Ireland and I have no plans at present to review them.

Human Organs

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the National CJD Unit in Edinburgh monitored all imports and exports of brains and brain material between Belfast and Dublin. [132411]

Angela Smith: Brain and brain tissue samples which have been sent between Belfast and Dublin relate only to Multiple Sclerosis and related demyelinating disorders of the brain and not to suspected cases of CJD. The National CJD Unit in Edinburgh therefore does not monitor the movement of these samples.

Cancer Services

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many additional (a) specialist medical, (b) nursing and (c) other staff have been employed since March 2001 to improve cancer services in Northern Ireland. [133870]

Angela Smith: A table showing the number of additional specialist medical, nursing and other staff employed by Health and Social Services Trusts between 31 March 2001 and 30 September 2003 to improve cancer services in Northern Ireland is shown in the following table.

Illegal Arms/Explosives

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what estimate he has made of the amounts of illegal arms and explosives held by the (a) Provisional IRA, (b) Real IRA, (c) Continuity IRA, (d) UVF, (e) UDA, (f) LVF and (g) INLA. [135443]

Jane Kennedy: This information is only available from intelligence sources and it would be inappropriate for the Government to comment. The Government and the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning will resolutely continue to pursue complete decommissioning by all paramilitary organisations to ensure that there is a permanent end to paramilitary activity in all its forms.

Northern Ireland Fire Authority

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of whether the Northern Ireland Fire Authority is complying with section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 in relation to equality of opportunity. [134247]

Angela Smith: We are satisfied with the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland's commitment to the requirements of section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998. The Authority submits annual reports to the Equality Commission setting out its compliance with section 75.

PSNI (Facilities)

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the accessibility of Police Service of Northern Ireland sporting and social facilities and premises to former members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. [135444]

Jane Kennedy: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) on 16 September 2003, Official Report, column 727W, in respect of access to PSNI sporting facilities. This is a matter for the Chief Constable.

With regard to access to PSNI social facilities, this is a matter for the Council of the RUC Athletic Association, however I am advised that under rule 5 of the Association, retired RUC officers are full members along with serving officers of the PSNI.

Regeneration Funding (Belfast)

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has in relation to allocation of Belfast Regeneration Office Action Plan resources for Belfast. [134615]

Mr. Spellar: The Belfast Regeneration Office Action Plan is currently under consideration by Government.

Salmon

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many salmon fish farms have been operating, and how many fish were produced, in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years. [135446]

Mr. Pearson: The information is as follows:

	Number of licensed salmon fish farms
1998	1
1999	1
2000	1
2001	1
2002	1

Due to the fact that there has been only one salmon fish farm operating in Northern Ireland for the past five years, the production figures for each of the last five years is not in the public domain as it would be too easy to identify the company involved.

Waiting Times

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people in Northern Ireland are waiting for (a) hip and (b) knee replacement operations; how many of these have been waiting (i) less than 12 months, (ii) between 12 and 18 months, (iii) between 18 and 24 months and (iv) longer than 24 months; what steps he is taking to reduce these figures; and if he will make a statement. [134830]

Angela Smith: Information on people waiting for treatment is collected on the basis of specialty rather than the type of operation. The number of patients in Northern Ireland awaiting admission to hospital, as either an inpatient or day case, in the trauma and orthopaedic specialty is detailed in the following table. Figures are representative of the position at the end of June 2003 (the latest information available).

Specialty—trauma and orthopaedics

Time waiting (months)	Number
0–11	4,132
12–17	721
18–23	325
24+	611
Total waiters	5,789

Source:
CH1

I am aware that there are significant waiting lists for orthopaedic surgery at present. This reflects a general increase in demand over recent years for orthopaedic services and waiting lists have grown as a result.

A number of measures are being taken to deal with this increase in demand including increasing the number of orthopaedic surgeons in training and the recent building of two modular theatres, costing £3.8 million, on the Musgrave Park Hospital site. The provision of these new theatres will increase theatre capacity, increase capacity for fracture services, stabilise and reduce waiting lists, and facilitate the mix of elective, trauma and out-patient work of consultant orthopaedic surgeons.

TRANSPORT

A14

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much was spent on (a) consulting on, (b) designing and (c) advertising the Highways Agency's proposal for grade-separated junctions along the A14 between Brampton and Thrapston; who decided to stop the proposal; what evaluation of project was originally undertaken; how that changed before the decision was taken to stop the proposals; what the alternative schemes are; how the value for money of the alternative schemes has been evaluated; for what reason the alternative schemes were not produced when the original proposal was withdrawn; what low cost safety improvements are planned; and when they will be made. [134862]

Mr. Jamieson: I have asked the acting Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Stephen Hickey, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Stephen Hickey to Mr. Jonathan Djanogly, dated 30 October 2003:

I have been asked by the Transport Minister, David Jamieson, to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the A14 Thrapston to Brampton Grade Separation Scheme and the decision to suspend further work on the project following a recent re-evaluation of scheme benefits under the continuous value management process.

I know that you have been in correspondence with the Agency's Bedford office on this matter and that a meeting with officials has been arranged for Friday 31 October 2003 The information you seek will be made available at that meeting.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to his answer of 21 October, Official Report, column 472W, on air travel (compensation) when his Department will produce an updated Regulatory Impact Assessment reflecting changes made during negotiation; and if he will place it in the Library. [135368]

Mr. McNulty: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 29 October 2003, Official Report, columns 257–58W.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received sufficient information on possible new runway sites at (a) Birmingham (alternative runway proposal), (b) Gatwick (alternative runway proposals by BAA), (c) Redhill, (d) the Marinair site, (e) Severnside, (f) Sheppey and (g) Thames Reach, to enable consideration to be given to them in the forthcoming White Paper on Air Transport. [135191]

Dr. Howells: As my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Transport, has made clear on many occasions, we will consider carefully all serious, worked-up proposals submitted as responses to the consultation.

The Department held discussions with several promoters of proposals for new airport capacity that are alternatives to, or variants of, options set out in the Government's consultation document. The aim has been to provide guidance on the methodology used to appraise options in the SERAS study and on the information that will be needed by the Department in order to appraise alternative ideas submitted as part of the consultation.

Aviation Industry (Tax Subsidy)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what subsidy from public funds he estimates the aviation industry receives in terms of favourable taxation policy; and if he will make a statement. [135024]

John Healey: I have been asked to reply.

The aviation industry receives no direct subsidy from public funds.

The Government recently completed a consultation process on the use of economic instruments in the aviation sector, which included examining incentives to encourage better environmental performance.

The Government's views will be set out in the Air Transport White Paper due to be published later this year.

Dealing with Disadvantage Project

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action local highway authorities can take to apply for the Dealing with Disadvantage funding which has not yet been allocated. [134740]

Mr. Jamieson: £16 million of the money identified for Dealing with Disadvantage is available for grants to local authorities. £11.7 million has been allocated to Greater Manchester and Lancashire. Four further authorities have been invited to submit bids for grant funding. These are Bradford, Liverpool, Nottingham and Sandwell, which are the next four non-Greater Manchester and Lancashire authorities on the ranked list of places for road safety problems associated with disadvantage. Invitations to bid have been made on the basis of need.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people are funded out of the Dealing with Disadvantage grant; and what cost benefit analysis has been carried out in relation to the expenditure. [134741]

Mr. Jamieson: No specific numbers of staff have been identified for the Grants that are the subject of the Special Grant Report. The Neighbourhood Road Safety Team, which is being hosted by Greater Manchester Police, will have eight members of staff.

All grant allocations have been scrutinised for relevance to the identified problems and the likelihood of success. Because some of the work is generic, such as road safety education, it is not possible to attribute directly what savings may arise, so cost-benefit analysis is not appropriate in this case.

The Government wish to learn from the experience of this initiative and so a monitoring and evaluation contract is presently out to tender and this will provide lessons for future policy development and delivery.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which highway authorities have received a share of the funds allocated for highway improvements under the Dealing with Disadvantage programme; and how much was paid to each one. [134742]

Mr. Jamieson: The 10 authorities that received allocations for improvements to the highway are:

Blackburn with Darwen	120,000
Blackpool	1,256,000
Bolton	425,000
Bury	250,000
Manchester	838,000
Oldham	195,000
Rochdale	230,000
Salford	300,000
Tameside	780,000
Wigan	563,000

In addition, £500,000 was allocated to Tameside to develop and deploy their "Watchman" anti-speeding initiative across all 10 authorities.

£1,000,000 remains unallocated for further developments.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the most recent road safety record in respect of each of the local highway authorities to be allocated a Dealing with Disadvantage grant; and what specific improvements he expects to result from the award of such grants. [134743]

Mr. Jamieson: The 2002 casualty figures in the 10 authorities are as follows.

Local authority (District)	Fatal	Serious	KSI	Slight	Total
All casualties 2002
Blackburn with Darwen	3	80	83	701	784
Blackpool	10	94	104	762	866
Bolton	12	85	97	1,461	1,558
Bury	8	53	61	968	1,029
Manchester	15	252	267	3,493	3,760
Oldham	4	57	61	959	1,020
Rochdale	11	84	95	1,180	1,275
Salford	7	80	87	1,169	1,256
Tameside	4	85	89	864	953
Wigan	9	123	132	1,595	1,727
Child pedestrian casualties— 2002
Blackburn with Darwen	0	11	11	74	85
Blackpool	0	19	19	64	83
Bolton	1	9	10	133	143
Bury	0	13	13	70	83
Manchester	1	39	40	170	210
Oldham	0	16	16	104	120
Rochdale	0	15	15	89	104
Salford	1	13	14	60	74
Tameside	0	17	17	88	105
Wigan	0	25	25	127	152

Our objective is to narrow the gap between disadvantaged areas and the rest of the country by reducing casualties in deprived areas at a faster rate than for the country as a whole.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate of the unit cost of staff he has used in determining grants for support staff to individual local authorities for delivering Dealing with Disadvantage projects. [134744]

Mr. Jamieson: The allocation for staff is a nominal sum in recognition of the additional administrative burden being placed on the authorities. In partnering agreements, the authorities will have to demonstrate how the staff costs have been incurred in furtherance of the Dealing with Disadvantage work.

Gatwick Airport

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of non-transfer air passengers at Gatwick use public transport to or from the airport. [135189]

Dr. Howells: In 2002 the mode of travel to Gatwick broke down as follows (numbers rounded):

	Percentage
Private car	53
Hire car	2
Taxi/minicab	15
Bus/coach	8
Rail	22
Other	less than 1

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people around Gatwick airport fell within the 54 leq and 57 leq contours for aircraft noise in 2002; and how many he estimates would fall within these contours in 2030 if a new wide spaced runway were built, assuming no change to aircraft noise standards other than those recently agreed in the International Civil Aviation Organisation. [135190]

Dr. Howells: The populations within the 54 and 57 dBA daytime leq contours in 2002 were around 8,400 and 3,500 respectively. The Stage Three SERAS report gave figures for Gatwick with an additional wide spaced runway. In 2030, the populations in the 54 and 57 dBA contours were projected to be 39,800 and 20,900 respectively. The noise projections assume no changes to ICAO noise standards beyond those recently agreed, but do not rely solely on the minimum standards required by ICAO. They incorporate realistic assumptions about replacement of older, noisier aircraft by more modern and less noisy types.

Air Travel

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the number of cars used by air passengers which would travel to Gatwick airport on average each day if a new wide spaced runway were built and used to full capacity, assuming that flights operated for 16 hours each day, the proportion of passengers using public transport was the same as currently and that of the remaining passengers half parked at the airport, and half were delivered and collected. [135188]

Dr. Howells: The information is not available in the form requested. The SERAS Stage 3 report included an assessment of the demands for surface access to the airport in 2030 with the addition of a wide-spaced runway in 2024 (i.e. after expiry of the planning agreement between BAA plc and West Sussex county council). Table 2.10 of the report shows that with passenger demand of 76 million passengers per annum in 2030 (and assuming enhanced rail infrastructure and services), the share of air passenger trips by car would be about 51 per cent. (about 30 million road trips per annum).

M1 (Widening)

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects work will start on the widening of the M1 motorway; and if he will make a statement. [135334]

Dr. Howells: Various Multi-Modal and Road Based Studies have recommended widening the majority of the heavily congested sections of the M1 motorway between M25 (Junction 6A) and M62 (Junction 42).

Widening of sections of the motorway in Hertfordshire and Bedfordshire (Junctions 6A-13), and improvements to the M6/M1 junction, have been accepted into the Targeted Programme of Improvements (TPI). The Highways Agency is currently reviewing procurement and programme options for these schemes, but construction work is planned to commence within the timescale of the Ten Year Transport Plan announced in 2000, subject to completion of statutory procedures.

The Secretary of State has announced previously that he is minded to add further schemes for widening other sections of the M1 motorway between Junction 21 (M69) and Junction 42 (M62) to the TPI. Preparation work continues on these sections of the motorway to identify widening options/costs. The Secretary of State intends to make further announcements in due course.

Road Widths

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he collates on mean average road widths in cities in England; and what guidance he gives to the relevant authorities on minimum road widths. [134833]

Mr. Jamieson: The available information relates to urban major roads, i.e. those that are within urban areas with a population of 10 thousand or more. The latest estimate of mean road width for A roads in urban areas is 11.2 metres.

Information on minor roads is less comprehensive. In 2001, estimates were made for minor roads with speed limits of 40mph or below. The mean road widths for such B, C and unclassified roads were 7.5 metres, 6.9 metres and 6.2 metres respectively.

Government guidance on road widths for residential roads is provided in Design Bulletin 32 Residential Roads and Footpaths Layout considerations and its companion guide Places, Streets & Movement.

Definitive guidance and standards for motorways and other trunk roads is contained within the Design Manual for Roads and Bridges. Whilst this manual sets a standard of good practice principally for trunk roads, it may also be applicable in part to other roads with similar characteristics. Where it is used for local roads, it is for the highway authority to decide on the extent to which the documents in the manual are appropriate in any particular situation.

Transplant Vehicles

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to his answer of 1 July 2003, Official Report, column 194W, on transplant vehicles, whether he has reached conclusions on whether an amendment to legislation is necessary to allow transplant vehicles to be covered by the speed limit exemption for ambulances. [134267]

Mr. Jamieson: The current speed limit exemption legislation grants an exemption for vehicles used for ambulance purposes, but it does not provide a definition of ambulance purposes. It is therefore for the courts to decide whether, in any particular case, a vehicle used for carrying human tissue is being used for an ambulance purpose.

The Government acknowledge that there may be a requirement to amend speed limit exemption legislation in order to clarify the status of such vehicles. However any exemption to speed limits needs to be considered with the utmost care in order to safeguard the interests of all road users. We are currently considering the wider impacts of such an amendment before reaching a conclusion on whether any amendment would be both necessary and justified.

Primary legislation would be required in order to effect such a change, should we conclude an amendment is necessary.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Coastal Erosion

Norman Lamb: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the impact of offshore dredging on coastal erosion. [134761]

Keith Hill: There is no evidence that licensed marine minerals dredging has an impact on the rate of coastal erosion but, as a precaution, each environmental statement that accompanies an application to dredge must include a coastal impact assessment. This is subjected to close scrutiny to ensure that the results are satisfactory before a licence can be given. Most licences are subject to monitoring conditions and no licence has been terminated because of adverse impacts on the coast.

Norman Lamb: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what studies he has commissioned into the impact of offshore dredging on coastal erosion. [134762]

Keith Hill: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has not commissioned studies into the impact of offshore dredging on coastal erosion. Every marine minerals dredging proposal is subjected to environmental impact assessment. Every dredging licence application is therefore accompanied by an environmental statement that includes a specific coastal impact study. This is subject to wide consultation and publicity. It is carefully scrutinised by the Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Sciences on behalf of Defra to determine whether the proposal is environmentally acceptable. Only if the proposal is acceptable is a licence for dredging issued. The licence is normally subject to conditions requiring environmental monitoring and is time limited so that account could be taken of unforeseen environmental impacts if any were to occur.

Norman Lamb: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list the sites of dredging activity offshore; and if he will place a map of sites in the Library. [134763]

Keith Hill: Dredging activity offshore is statutorily controlled by a number of bodies including the Crown Estate, coast protection authorities, the Department of Transport, harbour and port authorities, local planning authorities and some private owners of seabed.

There is no central record of all types of offshore dredging. However, most marine minerals dredging is licensed by the Crown Estate and I have asked it to provide a schedule and maps of all currently licensed dredging areas. I will forward these to the hon. Member as soon as I receive them and will arrange for copies to be available in the Library of the House.

Information about offshore dredging licences issued by the Crown Estate is also available on the Crown Estate's website: www.crownestate.co.uk which is regularly updated.

Norman Lamb: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many licences have been granted in each of the last five years for dredging off the coast of Norfolk. [134764]

Keith Hill: Nearly all marine minerals dredging is licensed by the Crown Estate which informs that no new or extended licences were issued in 1998, 2000, 2001 or 2002 off the coast of Norfolk. In 1999, revised licences were issued for Areas 436 and 202 so that the tonnage to be dredged was not increased. In 2003 an existing licence for Area 254 was extended for a further 15 years.

Norman Lamb: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what income has been received by Crown Estates in each of the last five years for dredging licences in respect of sites off the Norfolk coast. [134822]

Keith Hill: The Crown Estate inform me that its Royalty Income from off the Norfolk Coast was:

	£ million
1998	4.44
1999	4.77
2000	6.16
2001	5.36
2002	5.29

Council Housing

Mr. Purchase: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what arrangements he has made for the transfer of housing revenue account surpluses and deficits between councils who manage their homes (a) directly and (b) through an arm's length management organisation. [135197]

Keith Hill: The arrangements are the same irrespective of whether authorities manage their own homes directly or through an arms length management organisation. Authorities' entitlement to housing revenue account subsidy for 2004–05 will be calculated in accordance with Determinations to be made after consultation. Each local authority will be required subsequently to submit subsidy claims, calculated in accordance with the Determinations and using a new internet-based system currently undergoing trials with a number of authorities. Where the claim shows that the authority is in deficit and an amount is due to it, subsidy will be paid on-account in 10 monthly instalments starting in May 2004. The amount claimed on account will be subject to audit and, if necessary, adjusted after the end of the year. Where the claim shows that an authority is in surplus, it will be required to make payments to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister at the same intervals.

Disability Discrimination Act

Brian Cotter: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what steps his Department is taking to ensure the compliance of local authorities with Part Three of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995; and if he will make a statement. [135401]

Phil Hope: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is not responsible for ensuring compliance of local authorities with the Disability Discrimination Act; responsibility for ensuring compliance rests with the Disability Rights Commission. However, we recognise we have a part to play in encouraging and sharing good practice—in partnership with the Local Government Association, the Audit Commission and others.

Best Value guidance to local authorities published in March this year stated that the way in which services impact on all sections of the community must be addressed explicitly in order to secure best value. This message is reinforced by Best Value Performance Indicators covering impact and needs assessments, equality action planning processes and accessibility of local authority public buildings.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister also has responsibility for Building Regulations. A revision to Part M of the Building Regulations was issued on 27 October 2002. The new Part M and Approved Document M aim not to make buildings accessible to, and usable by, "disabled people" narrowly defined, but aim to make buildings accessible to, and usable by, everyone—including people with disabilities.

Planning Inquiries

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many recommendations from planning inquiry inspectors he has (a) accepted and (b) rejected in each year since 1999. [134606]

Keith Hill: Detailed in the table is the requested information about the decisions taken by the my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister in relation to called in applications and recovered appeals since 1999. These cases were dealt with through inquiry, hearing and written representations.

	Inspector's recommendation accepted	Inspector's recommendation rejected
1999–2000	171	13
2000–01	167	22
2001–02	167	13
2002–03	221	34
2003–04[1]	149	21

[1] First six months.

South West Regional Assembly

Mr. Flook: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister (1) how many full-time equivalent employees were employed by the South West Regional Assembly (a) when it was first established and (b) on 1 October; [135425]

(2) how many research projects the South West Regional Assembly (a) planned to commission and (b) commissioned in 2002–03; and what the purpose of each project was; [135426]

(3) how many publications have been issued by the South West Regional Assembly in each year since its establishment; and what the cost was of (a) preparation and (b) publication in each case. [135427]

Mr. Raynsford: The information requested is not held centrally, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The South West Regional Assembly is a voluntary body. The details of its employees, activities and expenditure are a matter for the Assembly.

SSSIs

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list the sites of special scientific interest in the ownership of his Department or its agencies. [129344]

Yvette Cooper: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and its agencies own no sites of special scientific interest.

Starter Homes

Tim Loughton: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how much has been spent on the Starter Home Initiative, broken down by local authority area. [134814]

Keith Hill: As at 30 September 2003, £115,079,497 has been spent on the Starter Home Initiative. The breakdown by region is set out as follows. In addition a table with the breakdown of key workers helped by local authority area is available in the Library of the House. A complete breakdown of spend by individual local authority areas is not readily available.

Region	Total spend (£)
London	66,126,899
South East	37,930,397
South West	3,725,318
Eastern	7,160,383
West Midlands	136,500
Total	115,079,497

Thames Gateway Funds

Bob Spink: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what restrictions his Department has placed on the use of the Thames Gateway funds for Canvey Island. [135463]

Keith Hill: As part of the Thames Gateway and Growth Areas announcement of 30 July 2003, the East of England Development Agency (EEDA) was provisionally allocated £6 million to support the regeneration and development of South West Canvey Island.

The provisional allocation is based upon a project proposal presented to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister by The Canvey Island Steering Group, through the Thames Gateway South Essex Partnership. As with all Thames Gateway projects, formal grant approval is wholly contingent upon the preparation of a fully costed and appraised project package, which has clear and sustainable outputs that meet the Strategic Objectives of the Thames Gateway Growth Area.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Arms Exports

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the UK arms industry complies with Clause II.7 of the United Nations Programme of Action to Prevent, Combat and Eradicate the Illicit Trade in Small Arms and Light Weapons in All Its Aspects. [131153]

Nigel Griffiths: I am informed that the UK is complying with the UN Panel of Government Experts.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to her Answer of 6 October, Official Report, column 1068W, when the United Kingdom will ratify the UN Protocol Against the Illicit Manufacturing of and Trafficking in Arms. [135100]

Mr. MacShane: I have been asked to reply.

Following its signature of the Protocol against the Illicit Manufacturing of and Trafficking in Firearms, their Parts, Components and Ammunition on 6 May 2002, the UK is now considering with the European Commission and Member States possible amendments to the European Weapons Directive. This is a necessary first step to bring the Directive in line with the UN Firearms Protocol before ratification by Member States.

Broadband (South West)

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many telephone exchanges in the South West are broadband enabled; and what percentage of district council wards are broadband enabled in each county in the South West region. [134552]

Mr. Timms: I understand from BT that they have enabled 147 exchanges in the South West region to date and a further 64 exchanges are 'in build' and so should be enabled early in the new year.

Data at the district council ward level are not available.

Defence Export Licences

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many defence export licences were revoked in (a) 2000, (b) 2001 and (c) 2002. [134599]

Nigel Griffiths: Details of export licences that have been revoked are published in the Government's annual reports on Strategic Export Controls, copies of which are available from the Libraries of the House.

I have asked the Director of the Export Control Organisation to forward these figures to the hon. Member and place them separately in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what procedures are in place to ensure that where a defence export licence is revoked and a defence export licence subsequently granted to allow the export of the same items to an alternate destination, the items are not re-exported or re-directed to the original destination. [134601]

Nigel Griffiths: When a licence is revoked any subsequent application is required to comply with our national arms export licensing criteria and the consolidated EU criteria. The risk of diversion is a valid ground for refusing a licence and steps are taken to assess this risk.

Departmental Employees (Taunton)

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people are employed by her Department in (a) the Taunton constituency and (b) Somerset. [121978]

Ms Hewitt: DTI employs staff in more than 60 locations in Britain. The Government Office for the South West, based in Bristol, includes DTI staff and covers Somerset.

Electricity Supply

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what contingency plans are in place to deal with a sudden reduction in electricity supply; and whether priority areas to be supplied have been designated. [134818]

Mr. Timms: Sudden reductions in electricity are handled by National Grid and the Distribution Network Operators (DNOs) using the procedures set out in Operating Conditions 6 of the Grid Code (www.nationalgrid.com/ukindinfo_code/).

Generally, demand reductions of up to about 10 per cent. will be handled by voltage reductions. Most consumers would be unaffected—lights may flicker or dim for the period necessary. Some sensitive industrial equipment, such as alarms, may be affected.

If immediate demand reductions above that figure are needed, it is likely that customers would be cut off. The speed with which action has to be taken, and the loads involved, means that isolations are made in local areas at primary sub-station level. This action reduces the likelihood of incidents such as cascade tripping, which were seen recently in the US and Italy. However, discrimination between customers in those areas cannot be implemented.

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures are being taken to avoid electricity power cuts to (a) domestic and (b) commercial users. [134872]

Mr. Timms: I have nothing to add to the answer given to the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) on 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 118W.

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent assessment she has made of the benefits of generating electricity closer to the source of demand. [134128]

Mr. Timms: Through the New and Renewable Energy Programme, the DTI has funded a number of assessments of the benefits of distributed generation, i.e. smaller generation, which is connected to the distribution networks. Some of the most recent include a study of the impact of distributed generation on network security by UMIST and an investigation of the benefits of "islanded" generation operation by PB Power. Both these studies were undertaken in 2002. Currently, the DTI is funding work through the Distributed Generation Coordinating Group to produce guidance on the potential contribution of distributed generation to the security of the distribution networks, to be used in the design and operation of those networks.

Many of the projects relating to distributed generation initiated by the New and Renewable Energy Programme can be accessed via the DTI's website and a complete list of completed and on-going projects can be provided on request. Details of projects commissioned through the Distributed Generation Coordinating Group can be viewed on the Group's website at: distributed-generation.gov.uk

Energy Policy (Research and Development)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much public money was spent in each year since 1997 on (a) research into and (b) development of the (i) fuel cell principle and (ii) geo-thermal principle of producing energy; and if she will make a statement. [134326]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 27 October 2003]: Since 1997, the DTI Fuel Cells Programme has spent the following amounts on industrial development and research up to the end of Financial Year 2002–03, rounded to the nearest thousand:

1997–98	900,000
1998–99	1,197,000
1999–2000	1,168,000
2000–01	1,410,000
2001–02	1,249,000
2002–03	1,200,000
Total	7,124,000

Scientific research funding is also given through the Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council (EPSRC).

Fuel cell technologies are multi-disciplinary and receive funding through a number of EPSRC programmes and mechanisms. Much research effort is focused on the material and electrochemical aspects of the systems, but there is also a significant proportion of 'underpinning' research into fuels (including reformation and hydrogen) and integration issues.

EPSRC funding

	Fuel cell technologies	Hydrogen fuels	Geothermal
1998–99	1,016	136	0
1999–2000	703	59	0
2000–01	899	83	0
2001–02	1,145	319	7
2002–03	1,487	536	4

Notes:

1. Above figures are expenditure on grants in the financial years shown.

2. During 2004, EPSRC will be funding a major new consortium of fuel cell research, worth approximately £2 million over four years through the SUPERGEN initiative.

3. Hydrogen figures do not include SUPERGEN hydrogen consortium grant, worth £3.4 million from Q4 02/03.

There has been no funding for geo-thermal research and development since the decision in 1993 to cease the HDR programme (Hot Dry Rock). This followed a review in 1990 which concluded that the technical difficulties and economics of exploiting the resource made the prospects for this technology insufficient to continue research. However, through the Clear Skies initiative, the DTI is currently funding Ground Source Heat Pump installations in households and communities, with a total value of £308,462 to date.

Iraq

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of the reconstruction work being carried out in Iraq has been allocated to British businesses. [133407]

Ms Hewitt: We have no precise figures for the value of contracts awarded to British companies in Iraq. We are aware of a number of UK companies, which have been successful in winning business, but we have no means of calculating what proportion of the total work this represents.

Although there is no overall figure available, UK companies have won a number of contacts including:

De la Rue
Crown Agents
Standard Chartered
Halcrow
European Land Solutions
Olive Security

This list is not definitive, but shows that British firms are active in a variety of sectors in Iraq's reconstruction.

Motor Transport Fuel

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what system for the measurement of motor transport fuel delivered by oil suppliers to retailers she has approved; and if she will make a statement. [134562]

Mr. Timms: The Weights and Measures (Liquid Fuel carried by Road Tanker) Order 1985 regulates the delivery of motor fuel by oil suppliers to retailers. There are no systems specifically prescribed for these measurement purposes in the UK. The suppliers' fuel distribution terminal meters, often known as 'gantry meters', are controlled by HM Customs and Excise. These are not subject to type examination or individual verification. They do however, remain subject to the general provisions of the Weights and Measures Act 1985 which requires under Section 17 all instruments to be fair and just, and so in principle could be subject to inspection and enforcement by local authority trading standards departments.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recommendations of the International Organisation of Legal Metrology since 2001 relating to liquid motor fuels have (a) been and (b) not been implemented. [134564]

Mr. Timms: No OIML Recommendations relating to liquid motor fuels have been published since 2001.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how liquefied petroleum gas dispensers are controlled to ensure accurate measuring of the quantity of fuel delivered by suppliers to motor fuel retailers. [134565]

Mr. Timms: Liquefied petroleum gas (LPG) dispensers are not specifically prescribed for trade purposes in the UK. These instruments are therefore not currently subject to type examination or individual verification. They are however, subject to the general provisions of the Weights and Measures Act 1985 which requires under Section 17 all instruments to be fair and just, and as such could be subject to inspection and enforcement by local-authority trading standards departments.

A review of regulatory provisions covering measuring instruments under the Act takes place on a regular basis, normally every three years, and with the ever increasing commercial use of LPG dispensers these will be an important issue for discussion and debate in the next review.

The National Weights and Measures Laboratory has the regulatory responsibility on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and operates under a three year work programme. One of the proposed projects in the next programme (2005–08) will be the regulatory review.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what studies she has carried out since 2001 into the number of retail petrol sites required in the UK to ensure the maintenance of adequate supplies of fuels to (a) urban and (b) rural areas; and if she will make a statement. [134566]

Mr. Timms: Since 2001 my Department has not carried out any specific studies of the number of petrol sites required to maintain adequate supplies of transport fuels. However the Downstream Oil Industry Forum (DOIF), which consists of all sectors of the oil industry and relevant Government Department, is currently considering a related issue of the service to motorists in rural areas.

As part of this work the Countryside Agency is carrying out a mapping exercise of rural petrol sites using different thresholds for volumes of annual fuel throughput. This exercise will help inform the discussions of the Forum.

The Department also continues to work in close collaboration with the industry and other Government Departments to ensure that robust and effective emergency plans are in place in the event of any possible disruption to supplies of oil.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will list the national suppliers of motor transport fuels in the UK in (a) 1997 and (b) 2003. [134567]

Mr. Timms: The Department does not maintain records of national suppliers of bulk motor transport fuels. However, the Department is aware of the following suppliers both in 1997 and 2003.

1997

Refiners:

BP
Conoco
Elf
Esso
Fina
Murco
Phillips
Shell
Texaco
Total

Importers:

Futura
Mabanaft
Greenergy

2003

Refiners:

BP
Chevron Texaco
ConocoPhillips
Esso
Murco
Petroplus
Shell
Total

Importers:

Futura
Emir8
Mabanaft
Greenergy

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what road tanker meter measuring systems are required for the delivery of motor transport fuels to retailers. [134568]

Mr. Timms: There is no requirement in place for road tanker meters to measure fuel deliveries to retailers. The measurement takes place during the tanker filling operation. These instruments are not subject to type examination and verification but are under the control of HM Customs and Excise.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many complaints have been received since June 2002 of oil companies delivering fuel to retailers at high temperatures. [134569]

Mr. Timms: The Department has received no complaints since June 2002. However, we are aware of oil industry concerns on the issue, and my officials held a meeting in March with all sectors of the industry to discuss these.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what work has been carried out recently by the National Weights and Measures Laboratory and other government bodies into the delivery by oil supply companies of fuels to retailers at high temperatures. [134571]

Mr. Timms: NWML commissioned a report by NEL (National Engineering Laboratory) on 'Temperature Compensation of Liquid Fuels' in 1999. In response to the report NWML included five separate projects in its current work programme (2000–05). These projects comprise an investigation into possible legislative changes based on standard temperature accounting, the inclusion of sight gauges on road tankers, accuracy of service station stock records, sources and quantities of delivery losses including vapour recovery, and accuracy and legal tolerances of the meters in the supply chain.

Oil and Gas Industry

Sir Robert Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of the impact of the draft EU constitution on her Department's powers to regulate the exploitation of oil and gas reserves from the UK continental shelf. [R] [135323]

Mr. Timms: The Department has made an assessment of the potential impact of the draft Constitution on the Department's powers to regulate recovery of hydrocarbons from the UK continental shelf. This assessment notes that Article III-157 of the draft EU Constitutional Treaty would give the EU competence in energy matters related to the establishment of the internal market, including natural resources, with voting by qualified majority. Also, that Article III-130(2)(c) provides for unanimity on:

> "measures significantly affecting a Member State's choice between different energy sources and the general structure of its energy supply".

Post Office

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her definition is of urban for the purpose of the Post Office's network reinvention scheme. [135406]

Mr. Timms: The decision to classify a post office branch as urban or rural is an operational matter for Post Office Ltd. The company classifies as rural any post office within a community of less than 10,000 inhabitants. Above that the post office is classified as urban. I understand that the company has a geographical mapping model that enables it to adopt a consistent approach to classification across the country.

Printer Cartridge Recycling

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many sites there are in (a) the UK and (b) Wales where printer cartridges are recycled. [134714]

Mr. Timms: The Department does not hold this information, however, the UK Cartridge Remanufacturers Association report that there are over 100 remanufacturers in the UK. The Cartridge World refilling franchise has 174 branches in the UK, four of which are in Wales.

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of whether Article 4 of the Waste Electronic and Electrical Equipment Directive (a) applies to the manufacturing of anti-reuse devices such as printer cartridges with clever chip technology and (b) will encourage manufacturers to design reusable cartridges. [134715]

Mr. Timms: The WEEE Directive applies to whole electrical and electronic products, not to individual components, sub-assemblies or consumables. Printer cartridges fall into this latter category.

The Government are currently planning UK implementation of the WEEE Directive, with the aim of publishing detailed proposals later this autumn for consultation. This will include consideration of reuse issues.

Redundant Workers (Re-employment)

Mr. Wills: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many redundant workers over 41 years found employment within (a) one week, (b) one month, (c) three months and (d) six months after being made redundant in each of the last five years. [134934]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Michael Wills, dated 30 October 2003:

As National Statistician, I have been asked to reply to your recent question on people aged over 41 years who have been made redundant.

The attached table gives estimates, from the Labour Force Survey, of the number of people aged over 41 years who were made redundant in the twelve month period ending August of each year from 1999 to 2003. The LFS does not collect information about the length of time it takes for people to become re-employed after being made redundant. However, the table also shows the proportion of people, made redundant in the three months prior to their LFS interview, who were in employment again at the time of interview.

People aged over 41 who have been made redundant
United Kingdom, not seasonally adjusted

September to August	People made redundant (thousands)	Re-employment rate (percentage) [1]
1998–99	321	38.7
1999–2000	287	36.3
2000–01	275	41.8
2001–02	333	40.6
2002–03	286	40.3

[1] The proportion of people, made redundant in the three months prior to their Labour Force Survey interview, who were in employment again at the time of interview.

Solar Industry

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much income she estimates the delays in introducing new criteria to the clear skies grants has cost the UK solar industry; and if she will make a statement. [134542]

Mr. Timms: The Department needed to balance the early availability of grants against the need to adhere to European regulations. We endeavoured to keep stakeholders informed of any delays. It is not possible to put a financial estimate on this delay but preliminary evaluation of the scheme has shown that many people who were considering installation before they were aware of the grant availability still continued with their installation.

No such estimate has been made. Efforts were made to keep stakeholders informed of delays, which reflected the need to take account of European regulations.

Sub-post Offices

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many sub-post offices closed in England and Wales in (a) 1998, (b) 1999, (c) 2000, (d) 2001, (e) 2002 and (f) 2003 to date. [134203]

Mr. Timms: I am advised by Post Office Ltd. that details of net post office closures in the United Kingdom broken down by region/country are available only from March 2000 and were as follows:

	Number
England
2000–01	395
2001–02	204
2002–03[1]	295
Wales
2000–01	68
2001–02	26
2002–03[2]	18

[1] Including 85 closures under the urban reinvention programme.
[2] Including nine closures under the urban reinvention programme.

Before March 2000, Post Office Ltd. maintained records of net closures on a nationwide basis only and were as follows:

	Number
1997–98	243
1998–99	233
1999–2000	382

I understand that Post Office Ltd. produces information on post office closures on a quarterly basis. There were 248 net closures of post offices in England and 26 net closures in Wales to the end of June 2003, the latest quarter for which figures are currently available, of which 206 in England and 15 in Wales were under the urban reinvention programme.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps the Government are taking to maintain sub-postmasters' incomes at and above the rate of inflation; and if she will list the average increase in sub-postmasters' incomes in each of the last five years. [134852]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 28 October 2003]: The income of sub-postmasters is derived firstly from payments made to them by Post Office Ltd. for carrying out work on its behalf, and secondly, from the sales made by any private retail business, which they run alongside the post office.

Payments from Post Office Ltd. are typically split into two parts: a fixed payment irrespective of volumes of work handled, and product payments which are directly driven by volume of work in their branch.

The income a sub-postmaster receives therefore will be dependent not simply on rate increases, but also on volumes of Post Office Ltd. work handled and by the turnover of any private business.

The future ability of Post Office Ltd. to improve the payments it makes to sub-postmasters is dependent on the success of its current plan to turnaround the financial fortunes of the company. The steps the Government are taking to support this process include investment of some £480 million in banking technology to expand the capability of Post Office Ltd. and £450 million funding to support the rural network until 2006.

I understand from the company that over the last five years, Post Office Ltd. has made awards to increase the rates at which the fixed payments are made as follows:

	Percentage
1999–2000	[1]2.1
2000–01	2.2
2001–02	2.3
2002–03	2.3
2003–04	3.0

[1] Lump sum payment.

In addition to this, there have also been a series of increases to individual product payment rates as well as the payment of various unconsolidated lump sums.

HEALTH

Ambulance Services

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of deaths where the lateness of an ambulance was a factor in each year since 1997. [134665]

Ms Rosie Winterton [holding answer 27 October 2003]: This information requested is not collected centrally.

The latest information about ambulance performance is contained in the Department of Health Statistical Bulletin "Ambulance Services, England 2002–03".

Copies of the bulletin have been placed in the Library and are also available at www.doh.gov.uk/public/sb0313.htm

Ashford (Middlesex) Hospital

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 212W, on Ashford (Middlesex) Hospital, if he will estimate how many of the 8,555 patients would have been treated over the five year period covered by the contract with Mercury Health Ltd. if the private sector treatment centre did not exist. [134057]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 23 October 2003]: The treatment centre at Ashford plans to provide 8,555 procedures over the five years of the contract. Of this, it is estimated that 2,775 procedures are additional and 5,780 procedures will be transferred from the national health service to the new treatment centre. This transfer of patients to the new treatment centre will allow the trust to treat more patients and reduce waiting times in accident and emergency at St. Peter's Hospital (Surrey) by freeing up capacity in the hospital.

In addition, treatment centres are dedicated surgery units that are able to offer patients scheduled procedures at pre-booked times, protected from the pressures of emergency and seasonal demands.

Atkins Diet

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he is giving to hospital trusts regarding patients' requests to follow the Atkins diet while in hospital. [133933]

Mr. Hutton: Decisions relating to specific dietary needs for patients are made by hospital dieticians in consultation with the patient and, where appropriate, nursing and medical staff.

Government advice on nutrition is that people should eat a healthy, balanced diet. They have no plans to issue any guidance relating to the provision of the Atkin's diet in hospitals.

Clinical Trials Directive

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what items the EU Clinical Trials Directive will require trials to be carried out; and if he will make a statement. [135002]

Ms Rosie Winterton [holding answer 28 October 2003]: The European Directive on the conduct of clinical trials was adopted in February 2001. The main aim of the Directive is to simplify and harmonise procedures across the Community while ensuring the protection of trial subjects and providing a safe environment for the development of new medicines. Member states are required to implement fully the Directive by 1 May 2004.

The scope of the Directive is wide and the UK Regulations will apply to all clinical trials on medicinal products for human use conducted in the UK, including academic and healthy volunteer studies, with the exception of non-interventional trials.

The former Health Minister my noble Friend the Lord Hunt of Kings Heath invited the Medical Research Council (MRC) and the Academy of Medical Sciences to co-ordinate a report on the impact of the Directive on academic studies. The impact assessment, prepared by the MRC with the active support of others including Cancer Research UK, the National Co-ordinating Centre for Health Technology Assessment and a number of academic experts formed the basis for a response to the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency (MHRA) consultation on the draft regulations to implement the Directive into UK law earlier this year.

In responding to concerns, and to provide an environment in which patients are protected but high quality research is not inhibited, the Government have taken steps to attempt to influence the Commission in its consideration of a Commission Directive on Good Clinical Practice (GCP) and also in reviewing guidance that the Commission published earlier this year.

In another initiative, the Department and the MRC have announced a joint project to work with experts to find practical solutions to the issues identified in the impact assessment. Details of the project can be found on www.ncchta.org/eudirective/index.asp.

With our careful exploration of the impact on publicly funded research and organisations that support it and delays in the Commission finalising the GCP Directive and other guidance, the United Kingdom's implementing regulations are not expected to be made until early in 2004.

Further information on the scope of the Directive and the proposed UK implementing regulations is available on the MHRA's website www.mhra.gov.uk on the Clinical Trials Directive pages.

Epsom and St Helier Hospitals

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to the answer of 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 217W, on Epsom and St. Helier hospitals, which minister has responsibility for the South West London Strategic Health Authority. [135278]

Mr. Hutton: I have regional responsibility for London which includes, the South West London Strategic Health Authority.

Foundation Hospitals

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health from whom the Government received the original idea of foundation hospitals; and if he will make a statement. [134607]

Mr. Hutton: The development of national health service foundation trusts came out of the system of earned autonomy which was developed in conjunction with three-star NHS trusts who were asked to identify the barriers staff and management face and to list the freedoms that would allow staff to deliver improvements to patients more quickly.

General Practitioners

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many full-time equivalent practice-based general practitioners there have been in London in each of the past five years. [133723]

Mr. Hutton: The number of full-time equivalent practice-based general practitioners in London in the last five years is shown in the table.

General medical practitioners: in London Strategic Health Authorities; October 1997 to June 2003

	All GPs (excluding GP retainers) [1]
September 1997	4,225
September 1998	4,212
September 1999	4,198
September 2000	4,217
September 2001	4,212
September 2002	4,288
June 2003	4,399

Whole-time equivalents are estimated based on results from the 1992–93 GMP Workload Survey

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many registered general practitioners will be involved in out-of-hours services in London after the implementation of the GP contract; and how many were involved under the old arrangements. [133735]

Mr. Hutton: Under the current national general medical services (GMS) contract, all general practitioners are responsible for the care of their registered patients for 24 hours each day of the week. Regulations now allow GPs to transfer this responsibility during the out-of-hours period to accredited providers or to delegate it to other GPs. Under the new GMS contract, which is to be introduced from April 2004, GPs will be able to opt out completely from responsibility for care during the out-of-hours period. Primary care trusts are currently working with their local GPs to establish how many intend to exercise this option.

Integrated Care

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to publish the interoperability standards for the new integrated care record services. [133920]

Mr. Hutton: The interoperability standards for the integrated care records service (JCRS) are part of an evolutionary process that began publicly with the output based specification (OBS), available at www.doh.gov.uk/ipu/programme/index.htm.

The OBS requires conformance to various standards, for example, Health Language 7 (HL7) Version 3 for interoperability and SNOMED for clinical terminology. In addition, specific interchange standards, for example, those required to enable an out-patient appointment to be booked electronically, are being developed in conjunction with HL7 (www.hl7.org.uk) and the United Kingdom information technology trade representative body, Intellect (www.intellectuk.org).

JCRS is also taking account of the interoperability standards published in the electronic Government interoperability framework (www.egif.gov.uk) by the Office of the e-Envoy.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the results have been of the Gateway reviews of the NHS Integrated Care System. [134282]

Mr. Hutton: New and large-scale procurement projects in central Government are subject to gateway reviews. The process examines a project at critical stages to provide assurance that it can progress successfully to the next stage. The review provides project teams with advice and guidance from fellow practitioners and in order to maintain the integrity of the advice, this is held to be completely confidential by both parties. The gateway review process is not an audit.

Recommendations are made to the senior responsible officer on good practice in key areas such as programme management, risk management and involving key stakeholders. The national programme is implementing any recommendations which arise from each stage in the gateway review.

The national information technology programme is fully committed to external reviews being undertaken on a timely basis.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the cost of maintenance of the Integrated Care Records database in (a) 2003–04 and (b) 2004–05. [134283]

Mr. Hutton: The integrated care records service (ICRS) is one element of the National Programme for Information Technology in the national health service. Central funding for the National Programme for IT in the NHS is to be made available from the Spending Review 2002 as follows—£370 million in 2003–04, £730 million in 2004–05 and £1.2 billion in 2005–06.

The costs for the ICRS are being calculated as part of the on-going procurement and financial management processes within the Spending Review 2002 envelope.

Maintenance costs are subject to current procurement negotiations.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the cost of establishing the database for Integrated Care Records System; and how long he expects the inputting of the records to take. [134284]

Mr. Hutton: The integrated care records service (ICRS) is one element of the national programme for information technology in the national health service. Central funding for the national programme for IT in the NHS is to be made available from the Spending Review 2002 as follows—£370 million in 2003–04, £730 million in 2004–05 and £1.2 billion in 2005–06.

The costs for the ICRS are being calculated as part of the on-going procurement and financial management processes within the SR 02 envelope.

Exact costs are subject to current procurement negotiations. Due to commercial confidentiality and sensitivity, it would not be in the public interest to reveal the details of the negotiations and the potential costs.

The content of the ICRS databases will be generated initially from information already held within NHS systems. This process will be undertaken by local service providers as part of the initial implementation phase during 2004.

The ICRS is not about entering historical data but about improving the capture, use and quality of current data and future support to patient care.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library the definition of the requirements for potential vendors of the NHS Integrated Care System. [134285]

Mr. Hutton: The initial output based specification for the integrated care record service was published in May 2003 and a revised and updated version providing refinements to the specification was published in August 2003.

These had been previously issued to short-listed suppliers to enable them to submit proposals in the national information technology programme procurement process and made available on the Department's website at www.doh.gov.uk/ipu/programme/index.htm.

Copies of both documents will be placed in the Library, but it must be noted that this document is a dynamic set of requirements and specifications that is subject to on-going review and updating.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether patients will be required to contribute to the cost of creating their electronic patient records on the NHS Integrated Care System. [134286]

Mr. Hutton: Patients will not be required to contribute towards the costs of their records on the integrated care records service.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he had with outside bodies (a) in the UK and (b) abroad about the introduction of an integrated care records system. [134357]

Mr. Hutton: Discussions have taken place with numerous stakeholders across Government Departments and the national health service through Royal Colleges, the NHS Confederation and other professional and representative bodies.

The recent meetings of the national clinical advisory board and the patient advisory board are major steps to improving the direct engagement and involvement of key clinical stakeholders and patient and carer representatives.

The national clinical advisory board is chaired by Professor Peter Hutton, Chairman of the Academy of Medical Royal Colleges. It consists of representatives from some 30 branches of the health service, including general practices, consultants, nurses, dentists, health visitors, midwives and pharmacists. It will meet every three months but will carry out work in between in sub-committees, providing the national programme with structured input from health care professionals.

The public advisory board is chaired by Marlene Winfield OBE, Head of Public Engagement for the national programme for information technology. The membership is made up of individuals drawn from groups such as the Patients Association, the Long-term Medical Conditions Alliance, Help the Aged, Mencap, Islington Health and Race Forum, Carers UK, the National Consumer Council and the Consumer's Association. It will initially meet every two months and will help to give detailed and structured input into the national programme.

Discussions are on-going with the health departments of Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. Finally we have held discussions with other jurisdictions including but not limited to the United States of America and several European countries.

Medical Staff

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) medical and clinical staff and (b) other types of staff were employed in the NHS in London in the most recently available survey of staffing. [133740]

Mr. Hutton: The number of medical and clinical and other types of staff employed in the national health service in London at the latest available date is shown in the table.

Medicines (Printed Information)

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that patients are provided with printed information on medicines dispensed to them. [132492]

Ms Rosie Winterton: There is a legal obligation on dispensing doctors and pharmacists to supply appropriate information to patients when dispensing medicines in the form of patient information leaflets or information included on the packaging itself. Since 1 January 1999, all licensed medicines in the United Kingdom have approved leaflets and labels and there has been a range of developments in recent years which have helped to ensure patients receive appropriate information. These include guidance for hospitals on dispensing medicines in original packs at the outset of a patient's stay that will be sufficient for discharge.

Also, in August 2002, the Medicines Control Agency, which was the predecessor to the Medicines and Healthcare Products Regulatory Agency, and the Department issued joint guidance on how compliance with the requirement to include appropriate written information to patients may be achieved.

Multiple Sclerosis

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish an update of the information supplied to the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam by the Sheffield University School of Health Related Research concerning the implementation of the risk sharing scheme for MS sufferers. [134065]

Dr. Ladyman [holding answer 27 October 2003]: Latest returns show that around 6,300 patients are currently receiving treatment with a disease modifying treatment for their multiple sclerosis. Around 300 patients each month are starting treatment.

NHS Treatment (Non-UK Nationals)

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what estimate he has made of the number of non-UK nationals treated by the NHS in London each year since 1997; [133736]

(2) what estimates he has made of the cost to the NHS in London of health tourism in 2002–03.

Mr. Hutton: The National Health Service (Charges to Overseas Visitors) Regulations 1989, as amended, places a duty on national health service trusts to establish whether a patient is eligible for free NHS hospital treatment and if not to levy a charge for any treatment provided. Trusts are not required to submit data on the numbers of overseas visitors treated or the costs of doing so, not least because overseas visitors, as defined by the charging regulations, are not automatically "health tourists".

Northwick Park Hospital

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the 2003–04 budget is for Northwick Park Hospital, Kenton; what the level of staffing is at the intensive therapy unit at the hospital; how many respiratory consultants there are at the hospital; how many patients have died in the ITU at Northwick Park hospital since 1 January; and what plans there are to move the high dependency unit closer to the ITU at Northwick Park Hospital. [133483]

Mr. Hutton: Northwick Park is one of the hospital units that form North West London Hospitals National Health Service Trust. The Trust's baseline budget for 2003–04 is £239 million.

Information on the level of staffing at the intensive therapy unit at Northwick Park Hospital is not collected centrally. Information from North West London Hospitals NHS Trust is that the intensive treatment unit (ITU) at Northwick park has nine nurses, one outreach nurse, an ITU junior doctor on call at all times (six on full shift rota, comprising four clinical fellows), one anaesthetic senior house officer, one anaesthetic specialist registrar. One additional anaesthetic resident registrar covers obstetrics, theatres and intensive care unit. One anaesthetic consultant is dedicated to intensive care unit cover.

In addition, physiotherapists are on call at all times. A daily dietetics ward round is carried out and speech and language therapists are available if necessary.

Information on medical staff within respiratory medicine is collected by NHS trust rather than by individual hospital unit and is shown in the table.

Information from North West London Hospitals NHS Trust is that there have been 73 deaths in the ITU since January 2003. There are no current plans to move the high dependency unit closer to the ITU at Northwick Park.

Post-operative Deaths

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research has been carried out into comparative post-operative death rates between England and other OECD countries. [129651]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 19 September 2003]: Although full international comparisons of health status and health outcomes are well developed in many areas, such as cancer and coronary heart disease mortality, there has been almost nothing equivalent on the subject of post-operative mortality. There are occasionally specific studies comparing individual hospitals, but the Department of Health is not aware of any systematic studies comparing post-operative mortality rates between countries.

Riversdale Hospital

Mr. Goodman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the Commission for Health Improvement will visit Riversdale Hospital in High Wycombe; when the Commission will report on its findings; and if he will make a statement. [135033]

Ms Rosie Winterton [holding answer 28 October 2003]: Riversdale Hospital is part of Buckinghamshire Mental Health National Health Service Trust. The Commission for Health Improvement (CHI) is currently conducting a clinical governance review of the trust.

CHI is scheduled to publish its report by the end of the year.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Humanities Teaching

16. Mr. Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the teaching of humanities in schools. [135247]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: In schools, humanities are normally taught through the separate subjects of geography and history. These are compulsory for all pupils aged 5 to 14. After the age of 14 they are optional but we are introducing a statutory entitlement at KS4 (ages 14 to 16) for all pupils to study a course in the humanities.

Drugs Education

17. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what recent guidance his Department has issued to schools on drugs education. [135248]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: The Department is currently updating its guidance to schools on all matters relating to drugs with a view to issuing new guidance in February 2004. This document will revise and consolidate existing guidance from the Department, specifically "Circular 4/95: Drug Prevention and Schools" and "Protecting Young People: Good practice in drug education in schools and the youth service" which was published in 1998.

Tuition Fees

18. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on proposals to introduce top-up fees for university courses. [135249]

Alan Johnson: From 2006/07, we are proposing to allow higher education institutions to charge variable fees of between £0 and £3,000 per year per course, subject to their having an Access Agreement approved by the Office for Fair Access. We intend to abolish up-front fees in 2006: instead students can defer paying their fees until after they graduate. Graduates will only start making repayments on their student loan once they are earning over £15,000, and then at a rate linked to their income.

We will continue to provide a means-tested grant to cover the standard tuition fee (£1,125 in 2003/04), and propose to introduce from 2004 a new additional grant of up to £1,000, as part of a package of measures to ensure that more young people continue to take up higher education opportunities. Access Agreements will focus on what institutions are doing to encourage more people from disadvantaged backgrounds to apply: they will be required to say how they will recycle a proportion of their additional fee income into bursaries and other financial support to students from poorer families.

Vocational Training

19. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on vocational training for school children aged between 14 and 16. [135250]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The Government are committed to a far-reaching agenda for change in the curriculum for 14 to16-year-olds.

We have already introduced new GCSEs in vocational subjects and more are intended to follow. We are using our 14 to 19 Pathfinders to test new ways to deliver progression for pupils post-16. One of the key issues my right hon. Friend has asked Mike Tomlinson's 14 to 19 Working Group to consider is a stronger and more coherent vocational offer across the whole 14 to 19 phase. The group's recommendations are due in summer 2004.

GCSE (Specialist Schools)

Ms Dari Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment he has made of the performance of specialist schools in achieving 5 A* to C grades at GCSE compared to the national average; and if he will make a statement. [135244]

Mr. Miliband: Based on provisional data, in 2003, specialist schools averaged 56.1 per cent. of pupils achieving five or more GCSEs at grades A*-C, compared to the national average of 48.7 per cent[1]. This is one of the reasons why we want every school that is ready to take on the challenge of specialist status.

[1] Specialist schools cover the 979 maintained, mainstream schools which were operational specialists as at September 2002, with 2003 GCSE/GNVQ results.

GMOs

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the trial sites where GMOs are being released into the environment, including in each case the six-figure grid reference. [133406]

Mr. Morley: I have been asked to reply.

There are currently five active consents allowing companies to undertake clinical trials of GM bacteria for the development of vaccines in England. The sites of each release are set out in the table. There are currently no field trials of genetically modified crops taking place in the UK.

Graduate Employment

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimate he has made of the percentage of graduates who are employed in jobs requiring a graduate qualification three years after graduation. [134340]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Survey evidence suggests that, three years after graduation 65 per cent. of employed graduates are in jobs for which their academic qualifications are a prerequisite. A further 14 per cent. of graduates undertake jobs which do not necessarily require a degree but nevertheless make use of their graduate level knowledge or skills. Therefore, around 80 per cent. of employed graduates utilise their undergraduate degrees to a greater or lesser extent three years after graduation[1].

Although around 20 per cent. of graduates are employed in non-graduate jobs at this point, research following earlier cohorts of graduates up to seven years after they have graduated[2] suggests that the proportion falls to around 10 per cent. for men and 15 per cent. for women, as graduates settle further into the labour market. Furthermore, the rate at which graduates move out of non-graduate occupations in the early years following their graduation was similar for 1995 graduates and for those graduating 15 years earlier (1979/1980).

Graduate Employment Premium

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the graduate employment premium for lifetime earnings in comparison with (a) those with two Level 3 qualifications who do not enter university and (b) the overall cohort of school-leavers. [134123]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information is not available in the exact form requested. Previous analyses of the Labour Force Survey (LFS) estimate that first degree graduates earn on average around 120,000 more—in present value terms—over their working lives than those with two or more A-levels[1].

An equivalent estimate comparing the lifetime earnings of graduates with the population as a whole is not available. However, separate analyses of the LFS show that individuals with first or sub degree qualifications earn on average around 50 per cent. more than non-graduates[2]. The 50 per cent. premium is measured in a different way from the £120,000 lifetime earnings differential. In particular the comparator groups and methodologies used differ. However, both estimates provide evidence that individuals with Higher Education qualifications earn considerably more than those without.

[1] DfES analysis of Spring 2002 Labour Force Survey data. The analysis involved constructing a lifetime earnings stream for first degree graduates and comparing it against the lifetime earnings of A-level holders. Both earnings streams were discounted, adjusted for real earnings growth and other factors affecting earnings, other than the qualification itself. The difference between the two earnings streams summed to £120,000.

[2] DfES analysis of Summer 2001-Spring 2002 Labour Force Survey data. The analysis involved taking the ratio of average earnings of all first and sub degree holders to the average earnings of all non-graduates, which equalled 50 per cent.

Grammar Schools

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the future of grammar schools. [134093]

Mr. Miliband: Our position on selection by academic ability at 11 is clear—we do not wish to see it extended. Where grammar schools currently exist, we continue to support local decision making.

This can take place either through the process of a parental petition and ballot, or the publication by the school's governing body of statutory proposals to end selection. We have made clear that local authorities have a responsibility to look at standards in their area, and they may also publish statutory proposals to alter the pattern of school places.

Higher Education

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of higher education students are drawn from the lowest third of families measured by household income. [135243]

Alan Johnson: The requested data are not available.

The data we currently collect for student support purposes is not based on household income since current arrangements assess the income of natural parents only. From 2004 we are moving to a new assessment based on household income.

Physics Teachers

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many teachers were in training specialising in physics in each of the last five years for which information is available. [135459]

Mr. Miliband: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the Answer that I gave on 27 October 2003, Official Report, columns 69–70W.

Post-compulsory Learning

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on progress on the development of a national credit framework for qualifications in post-compulsory learning. [134984]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Following the commitment given in "21st Century Skills Realising Our Potential" to developing a credit framework for adults, we have written to both the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority (QCA) and the Learning and Skills Council (LSC) on 9 September 2003. The QCA will continue to deliver the reform programme on unitisation of all qualifications within the National Qualifications Framework (NQF) and then work with awarding bodies to assign credit values to the full range of units in the NQF. The LSC has been asked to review the credit systems currently operating outside the NQF and to identify how the application of credit to this other provision might drive quality and flexibility in further education and how such credit might be developed to provide progression into the NQF and higher education.

Special Educational Needs Tribunal

Jonathan Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what reasons were given by the President of the Tribunal for allowing the Special Educational Needs Tribunal hearing to be heard in public on the last six occasions. [135314]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Regulations provide for SENDIST hearings to be in private unless:

(a) both parties request a public hearing, in which case the tribunal has no discretion;

(b) the President orders that the hearing should be in public.

The President of the Special Educational Needs and Disability Tribunal has never exercised his discretion to order that a hearing should be in public.

Teacher Vacancies

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many vacant head teacher posts existed in (a) primary schools, (b) secondary schools, (c) special schools and (d) all schools, expressed as percentage of the total number of head teachers, in each year since 1997, broken down by local education authority. [133679]

Mr. Miliband: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Work Placement

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many fatalities there have been among trainees on work placement since the learning and skills councils took over responsibilities, broken down by learning and skills council in the North West. [134278]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: There has been one fatality among trainees on work placement in the North West since the Learning and Skills Council took responsibility for work based learning in April 2001. This took place in the area covered by Greater Manchester Learning and Skills Council. The Department takes the health and safety of learners very seriously and is working with the Learning and Skills Council to ensure that robust arrangements are in place. Any fatality is a matter of serious concern and we are considering what lessons can be learned to ensure that learners in the learning and skills sector are safe learners.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Afghanistan

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the security situation in northern Afghanistan. [133761]

Mr. Mullin: The Minister of State at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), returned from a visit to Mazar-e Sharif in northern Afghanistan where he saw evidence that steady progress is being made towards stabilising the security situation there. In general there have been fewer security problems in the north of Afghanistan than in the south. But there have been long-standing tensions between various factions, most notably between the leaders of the two biggest factions. The Afghan Government moved quickly to defuse the most recent flare-up between them earlier this month, supported by the UN and the UK-led Provincial Reconstruction Team (PRT) based in Mazar-e Sharif. The Afghan Interior Minister then brokered a comprehensive peace agreement covering five northern provinces. Implementation of this is being monitored by the UN and the UK PRT. The Afghan Government have now reached agreement with the two commanders on merging their factional forces under neutral and central government command. A number of senior personnel in local civilian and police posts have been replaced by new appointees, which will contribute further to weakening local power bases.

Algiers Agreement

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent steps he has taken to ensure that (a) Ethiopia and (b) Eritrea comply with their commitments under the Algiers Agreement. [134586]

Mr. Mullin: In my meetings with the Ethiopian ambassador on 16 October and the Eritrean ambassador on 11 September, I stressed the need for both parties to comply with their commitments under the Algiers Agreement. I also made clear to both parties that the Boundary Commission decision is legally binding and that they should engage in dialogue to address the issues between them.

EU Constitution

Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what mechanisms he plans to establish to allow for the UK to withdraw from its obligations under the EU Constitution Treaty. [134009]

Mr. MacShane: None. The UK will honour its international treaty obligations until such time as Parliament decides to repeal the Acts that give effect to them.

Hong Kong

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the development of democracy in Hong Kong. [134201]

Mr. MacShane: The Basic Law of the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region (SAR) contains provisions regarding the methods of selecting the Chief Executive of the SAR and the formation of the Legislative Council. The Basic Law (Annexes I and II) provides for possible changes to these methods from 2007 with the "ultimate aim" being the election of the Chief Executive and all members of the Legislative Council by universal suffrage.

The SAR Government have recently announced that they will start consulting the public about constitutional reform in early 2004. We welcome this. We have made it clear that we hope that the SAR Government will make early progress towards the Basic Law's ultimate aims of universal suffrage, at a pace in line with the wishes of the Hong Kong people.

Iran

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Syria about the arrest and deportation to Iran of (a) Mr. Ebrahim Khodabandeh and (b) Mr. Jamil Bassam. [134674]

Mr. MacShane: Jamil Bassam and Ebrahim Khodabandeh are not British nationals, so the UK has no legal right of consular access. After the two men were detained in Syria, our embassy in Damascus repeatedly asked the Syrian authorities for information, but the Syrian authorities did not respond to any of the embassy's four formal notes.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to (a) visit and (b) secure the return to Britain of (i) Mr. Ebrahim Khodabandeh and (ii) Mr. Jamil Bassam, both held in prison in Tehran; and what representations he has made to the Iranian Government about their treatment and rights. [134675]

Mr. MacShane: Jamil Bassam and Ebrahim Khodabandeh are not British nationals, so the UK has no legal right of consular access. Our Embassy in Tehran has made it clear to the Iranian Government that we are taking a keen interest in the human rights of these two men. On 5 August Iranian authorities told our Embassy that Mr. Bassam and Mr. Khodabandeh were well, that they continued to be held during investigations and that the Iranian judicial authorities had noted our call for due process. We have urged the Iranian Government on a number of occasions to allow a visit by the International Committee of the Red Cross. We are not aware that one has taken place.

Iraq

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what forums will be used to prosecute crimes against humanity that occurred in Iraq under Saddam Hussein's regime. [134217]

Mr. MacShane: The Governing Council is developing the idea of a Special Iraqi Tribunal to prosecute those suspected of serious human rights abuses under the former regime. No final decision has yet been reached.

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on investment in Basra International airport; and who is responsible for its (a) fabric and (b) reconstruction. [134863]

Mr. MacShane: UK military forces are currently responsible for operations at Basra airport, including maintenance of essential facilities. The Iraqi Ministry of Transport and the Coalition Provisional Authority are considering reconstruction and investment.

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when it was originally intended to open Basra International airport to non-governmental commercial and passenger flights; why it has remained closed to such flights; and when it is now expected to open for them. [134864]

Mr. MacShane: It has always been our intention that Basra airport should be opened to commercial aviation as soon as possible, once the relevant security and other requirements have been met.

Israel

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what investigations he has undertaken to establish whether (a) components manufactured in the UK have and (b) equipment manufactured in the UK has been used by the Israeli authorities in (i) their military strike in Syria, (ii) incursions into refugee camps in Gaza and (iii) other activities in the Palestinian areas since the resignation of Abu Mazen. [134657]

Mr. MacShane: We have not carried out specific investigations following these incidents but we routinely tour the Occupied Territories, often in difficult and dangerous conditions, to assess the situation on the ground and the activities of the Israel Defence Forces, including the equipment they use.

However, when considering licence applications for the export of controlled goods we make risk assessments at the licensing stage, including assessments about the proposed end-users and potential end-use of the proposed export. We would not issue a licence unless we were fully satisfied that the equipment would not be misused. Many UK exports have been components for pieces of technology embedded in other systems and are therefore not very visible. The UK has not sold main equipment such as tanks, aircraft, warships or artillery to Israel since May 1997.

Since the outbreak of the violence in the Occupied Territories in September 2000, we have taken account of Israeli military tactics in our licensing decisions. The Consolidated EU and National Arms Export Licensing Criteria clearly sets out our commitment to take account of the risk that exports might be used for either internal repression, prolonging an armed conflict or affecting regional stability.

Malaysia

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Malaysian high commissioner concerning the remarks of the Malaysian Prime Minister on 18 October; and if he will make a statement. [134508]

Mr. Mullin: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer the Minister of State at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien) gave to the hon. Member for Moray (Angus Robertson) on 28 October 2003, Official Report, columns 186–87W.

Dr. Mahathir's comments about Jews in his speech to the Organisation of the Islamic Conference Summit on 16 October were totally unacceptable. My hon. Friend summoned the Malaysian high commissioner on 17 October, and made our position clear. I said it was particularly regrettable that some welcome messages in Dr. Mahathir's speech—such as negotiation as the right path to peace, and the futility of terrorism—had been overshadowed by these comments.

Nicaragua

Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the closure of the British embassy in Managua. [135017]

Mr. Rammell: The British embassy in Managua will close by the end of March 2004. This decision was as a result of budgetary constraints which led us to review how we could maintain our diplomatic presence in Central America in a more cost-effective way. The Government remain committed to maintaining a substantive relationship with Nicaragua. I confirmed this to the Nicaraguan Foreign Minister when he visited London on 23 October. We are seeking agreement for the British ambassador to San José as non-resident ambassador to Nicaragua. DFID will retain its presence in Nicaragua and the intention is that their Senior Representative will assume the role of Chargé d'Affaires.

Somalia

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the progress of the Somali Peace Conference in Kenya; what assistance his Department has (a) offered and (b) given to the conference; and if he will make a statement. [134720]

Mr. Mullin: Despite a number of difficulties, there have been some positive outcomes to the Somalia reconciliation talks, including a ceasefire agreement and significant dialogue among the parties. The United Kingdom, through the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Department for International Development, has provided support to the conference running costs, to the African Union ceasefire monitoring process, to satellite broadcasting of the proceedings, and to other facilitation activities. We expect to give further support to enable Somalis to take forward any satisfactory outcome of the conference.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions (a) he, (b) members of his Department and (c) representatives of the United Kingdom Government have had since August with representatives of the governments participating in the Somali Peace Conference; what problems have been highlighted (i) to him and (ii) by him; and if he will make a statement. [134721]

Mr. Mullin: I discussed the progress of the reconciliation talks with Foreign Minister Musyoka of Kenya earlier this month. An official from our High Commission in Nairobi contributes by acting as an observer to the conference, undertaking regular discussions with other members of the international community, Somali leaders and representatives of the facilitating "frontline states". The principal recent concern of all international observers has been the need to ensure inclusiveness in the conference. We have been pressing all parties to address this issue.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with representatives of the Government of Djibouti regarding its decision of 19 October to withdraw from the Somali Peace Conference in Kenya; what issues were raised by the Government of Djibouti; and if he will make a statement. [134722]

Mr. Mullin: Our First Secretary at the British High Commission in Nairobi responsible for Somali affairs has discussed Djibouti's withdrawal with their envoy to the talks. Their principal concerns about the management of the conference and the lack of inclusiveness of Somali representation there were addressed in Kampala last week during the summit of IGAD, the regional intergovernmental body for the Horn of Africa. I understand that, as a result, Djibouti is reconsidering its position.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of (a) the security situation, (b) the political situation and (c) social stability in (i) Somaliland and (ii) the rest of Somalia since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [134717]

Mr. Mullin: Somaliland organised successful local and Presidential elections, in 2002 and 2003 respectively, which have consolidated security and stability in the area. However, in recent weeks there have been three murders of Western expatriates in Somaliland, including most recently on 20 October the murder of two British schoolteachers in the town of Sheikh. We continue to monitor the security situation in Somaliland closely. At present we advise against travel to the Sool and Sanaag regions of Somaliland, and against all travel to other parts of Somalia.

Elsewhere in Somalia the situation remains unsettled without any form of effective Government or prospect of early elections. The area is principally run by armed factions and there is little stability or security.

Turkey

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer of 16 October 2003, Official Report, column 336W, on Turkey, if he will make a statement on Turkey's plans for the reconstruction of Iraq presented to him on 25 September; what plans had been presented earlier; and how the latest plan differed to the earlier ones. [134426]

Mr. MacShane: Since 25 September, the Turkish Government have agreed in principle to deploy troops to Iraq for a period of one year as a contribution to stability during reconstruction in that country. No final decision on deployment has been made.

UN Arms Embargoes

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) pursuant to his answer of 6 October 2003, Official Report, column 1117W, on UN arms embargoes, whether dialogue still continues on the Berlin-Bonn process; [135108]

(2) on UN arms embargoes, whether the Government have plans to call on Security Council members to restart discussions on the Berlin-Bonn process. [135109]

Mr. MacShane: The Government are committed to the use of sanctions, when necessary, that are appropriately targeted and effectively implemented and enforced. The UK regularly discusses how to improve sanctions measures with other UN member states. We do not, however, plan to call for the Bonn-Berlin process to be re-started as that initiative has concluded and its findings were published in 2001. This document serves as a valuable point of reference, which the Government use when considering the use of arms embargoes and travel and aviation related sanctions.

UN Sanctions

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer of 6 October 2003, Official Report, column 1118W, on UN sanctions, what discussions the UK has had with other Governments about restarting this initiative. [135112]

Mr. MacShane: The UK has had no discussion with other Governments about restarting this initiative.

West Bank/Gaza Strip

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of (a) the extent of demolition and destruction of infrastructure in (i) the West Bank and (ii) the Gaza Strip in 2003 and (b) the cost of repair to housing and infrastructure due to damage associated with actions by the Israeli Defence Forces; and if he will make a statement. [134429]

Mr. MacShane: Various agencies, including the World bank and United Nations, do maintain audits of destruction and damage to Palestinian infrastructure resulting from Israel Defence Forces (IDF) action. The Office of the Special Co-ordinator in the Occupied Territories (UNSCO) estimates that 2,986 Palestinian homes have been destroyed, and 29,197 homes partially destroyed or damaged, in the West Bank and Gaza Strip between October 2000 and August 2003. These figures do not take into account the demolition or destruction of other civil and private Palestinian property, or infrastructure, including water supplies, roads and cultivated land. Reliable figures for this year are not yet available. It is also difficult to give an accurate figure for the total cost of repair to Palestinian infrastructure.

Reports by these agencies and other NGOs indicate widespread damage and destruction to Palestinian infrastructure throughout the Occupied Territories. I also refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 29 October 2003, Official Report, column 282W. We have raised our serious concerns with the Government of Israel and will continue to do so.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the British High Commission in Zimbabwe last visited final recipients of food aid delivered through the UK's bilateral aid programme; and if he will make a statement. [135208]

Mr. Mullin: The Department for International Development (DFID) is responsible for monitoring the implementation of the food aid which is part of the UK's bilateral aid programme for Zimbabwe. DFID staff are in very close contact with United Nations World Food Programme (WFP) and Non-Governmental Organisations (NGOs), and receive regular reports from those who are responsible for delivering food aid. DFID and High Commission staff also make regular field visits as part of this process. A senior London-based DFID official visited a feeding scheme between 20 and 23 October 2003, and High Commission staff and a senior visiting FCO official plan to visit another scheme later this month.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Agriculture Research

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the level of government funding was for research into (a) organic agriculture, (b) conventional agriculture and (c) GM agriculture in each year since 1990. [133851]

Mr. Morley: The table shows spending on research by Defra against the categories requested from 200102 and, where data for earlier years are available, from MAFF and DETR.

Abandoned Vehicles

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many abandoned vehicles were collected in Leeds in 2002–03; what the average length of time was from notification to collection; and if she will make a statement. [132740]

Mr. Morley: 1,707 abandoned vehicles were removed and destroyed in Leeds in 2001–02, the most recent year for which data are available from the Municipal Waste Management Survey. Information on the length of time from notification to a local authority of an abandoned vehicle to its collection is not collected as part of the survey.

John Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the impact of SI2002/746 on the London Borough of Havering's ability to deal with abandoned vehicles. [133266]

Mr. Morley: Local authorities' performance in dealing with abandoned vehicles is assessed annually through the Municipal Waste Management Survey, which since 2000–01 has recorded the number of abandoned vehicles reported by each local authority.

The first data covering the period following the introduction of SI2002/746 will be available in summer 2004, when the Municipal Waste Management Survey 2002–03 is published.

Bathing Water Directive

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of proposals to establish a national water bill collection system to pay to meet the costs of the coastal and bathing water clean-up under the EU Bathing Water Directive. [135143]

Mr. Morley: The Government have no plans for national water charges. The costs of water services in each area reflects the regional or local costs of providing those services in a sustainable way. Any national system of bills to pay for some or all of water companies' obligations would involve cross-subsidy of some companies by the customers of others. This would reduce the incentives and responsibility on companies to deliver services efficiently.

In taking decisions on environmental programmes, we will continue to take into account the individual circumstances and levels of charges in each company area.

Committee on Radioactive Waste Management

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) when she will announce the membership of the new Committee on Radioactive Waste Management; [134262]

(2) when she will announce her decision on the future of the radioactive waste management Committee. [134263]

Mr. Morley: An announcement will be made shortly.

Communal Composting

Mr. Swire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what measures she has taken to ensure the continuation of communal composting schemes. [132655]

Mr. Morley: The UK has made use of its discretion under Article 11(1)(b) of the Waste Framework Directive (75/442/EEC as amended by 91/156/EEC) to provide an exemption from the licensing requirements of Article 10 for composting operations. Licence exemptions are a less onerous form of control than licences and are provided to encourage the recycling of waste.

The current composting exemption restricts the location of composting operations either to the place where the waste is produced or where the final composted material is to be used. We have recently carried out a consultation exercise on the revision of this exemption. The proposed revision would allow waste to be collected from numerous sources and, after composting, to be distributed. We also propose to widen the current exemption to include screening, chipping, shredding, cutting, pulverising or storage of the waste as part of a composting operation. One of the aims of the review is to encourage the recycling of waste by composting by ensuring that the regulatory controls are applied to communal and other composting operations in a way which is proportionate to the risk to the environment and human health.

Mr. Swire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions she has had with her European counterparts on the introduction of licensing requirements for communal composting schemes; and if she will make a statement. [132656]

Mr. Morley: The lists of waste disposal and recovery operations that currently require a licence are set out in Articles 9 and 10 of and Annexes IIA and IIB to the Waste Framework Directive (75/442/EEC as amended by 91/156/EEC). Composting is included in Annex IIB. The European Commission is currently conducting a consultation exercise on a Communication entitled "Towards a thematic strategy on the prevention and recycling of waste". In the light of a study being undertaken on behalf of the Commission, the Communication proposes a review of the Annex IIA and IIB lists. The UK attended a workshop held by the Commission in July 2003 to discuss its study; and UK intends to submit a response to the Commission's Thematic Strategy consultation which ends on 30 November 2003.

Mr. Swire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what estimate she has made of the number of communal composting schemes in the UK; and what estimates she has made of the number of schemes likely to pay for an exemption from licensing. [132657]

Mr. Morley: The Department has recently carried out a consultation exercise in England and Wales on the revision of the current licensing exemption for composting. A regulatory impact assessment (RIA) was published as part of this consultation exercise and is available on the Department's website. The RIA records that the proposed revision will principally affect about 90 sites operated by members of the Community Composting Network (CCN); other establishments or undertakings which are not part of CNN may be affected but it has not been possible to estimate their number; and that 30 of the 90 CNN sites will not pay exemption charges because they compost less than 10 tonnes of waste a year.

Deposit Schemes

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent progress she has made in her investigation of deposit schemes operating in other European countries, with particular reference to Denmark. [134503]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 27 October 2003]: As a first step, we have commissioned consultants to review existing deposit and return or recycle schemes in Europe, the USA, Canada, Australia and New Zealand. We expect this study to be completed in the new year.

EU Directives

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what EU directives have an impact on (a) energy efficiency, (b) waste minimisation, (c) marine pollution, (d) air quality, (e) climate change, (f) renewable energy, (g) fly-tipping, (h) packaging, (i) end of life vehicles, (j) the disposal of hazardous waste, (k) incineration, (l) recycling, (m) water quality, (n) coastal erosion, (o) fuel poverty, (p) flood defence, (q) wind power use, (r) domestic waste management, (s) industrial waste management, (t) landfill, (u) greenhouse gas emissions and (v) timber procurement. [133259]

Mr. Morley: A great many EC Directives apply in the field of the environment and will consequently have an impact on the areas (a) to (v) listed. Some of these will be specific to those areas while others will be of horizontal application and will impact on many of those areas, such as the Directives on environmental impact, assessment or conservation of natural habitats. All may be found by running appropriate textual searches on the EC's legislation website (www.europa.eu.int/eur-lex/en/search/index.html).

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs whether the Government are negotiating on draft EU directives with regard to (a) energy efficiency, (b) waste minimisation, (c) marine pollution, (d) air quality, (e) climate change, (f) renewable energy, (g) fly-tipping, (h) packaging, (i) end of life vehicles, (j) the disposal of hazardous waste, (k) incineration, (l) recycling, (m) water quality, (n) coastal erosion, (o) fuel poverty, (p) flood defence, (q) wind power use, (r) domestic waste management, (s) industrial waste management, (t) landfill, (u) greenhouse gas emissions and (v) timber procurement. [133260]

Mr. Morley: The Government are currently negotiating on the following draft EU Directives and other legislation.

Marine pollution

A proposal for a Directive on ship-source pollution and on the introduction of sanctions, including criminal sanctions, for pollution offences;

Air quality

A proposal for a Directive relating to arsenic, cadmium, mercury, nickel and polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons in ambient air;

Climate change and greenhouse gas emissions

A proposal for a Decision for a monitoring mechanism of the Community greenhouse gas emissions and the implementation of the Kyoto Protocol;

A proposal for a Directive amending the Directive establishing a scheme for greenhouse gas emission allowance trading within the Community, in respect of the Kyoto Protocol's project mechanisms;

A proposal for a regulation on certain fluorinated gases;

Packaging

A proposal for a Directive amending Directive 94/62/EC on packaging and packaging waste;

Water quality

A proposal for a Directive on the quality of bathing water;

A proposal for a Directive on the protection of groundwater against pollution;

At this time, there are no current negotiations on the other categories raised in the question.

European Emissions Trading Scheme

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the implementation of the European Emissions Trading Scheme. [133256]

Mr. Morley: The EU Emissions Trading Scheme is due to start on 1 January 2005 and is one of the policies being introduced across Europe to tackle emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases in order to combat the serious threat of climate change.

The Directive requires members states to implement the Scheme by 31 December 2003. We have consulted publicly on the UK's draft Implementing Regulations and will be continuing work on these in the coming months.

All member states are also required by the Directive to let the Commission have their National Allocation Plan by 31 March 2004. In order to meet this deadline we are intending to publish the first draft of our plan for consultation in early December 2003. The Plan will set out the overall cap on emissions for installations within the traded sector and the way that we propose to allocate this cap between industry sectors.

The UK are likely to be among the first to publish a draft National Allocation Plan. Defra are working hard with others and are confident that we will meet the deadlines involved. I believe that this provides a clear signal that the Government are committed to achieving its target of reducing greenhouse gas emissions by 20 per cent by 2010.

Fuel Poverty

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many fuel poverty households there are in each London authority area; and what her estimate is of the number of children living in fuel poverty households. [135164]

Mr. Timms: I have been asked to reply.

The available information from the English House Condition Survey indicates that in 2001, there were 148,000 fuel poor households in London. This is based on fuel poverty defined as occurring when a household needs to spend more than 10 per cent. of its income (including housing benefit and income support for mortgage interest) on all fuels in order to maintain a satisfactory heating regime.

More detailed breakdowns for the London area are not available as the sample size for the survey is not large enough to enable reliable detailed regional estimates of fuel poverty to be produced.

In England in 2001 there were 1.7 million households in fuel poverty. Of these, 210,000 contained children.

These figures are available at: www.dti.gov.uk/energy/consumers/fuel_poverty/index.shtml

Gas Boilers

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans she has for implementing the inspection of gas boilers below 100kW to limit their (a) carbon dioxide emissions and (b) energy consumption. [133584]

Mr. Bradshaw: Article 8 of the Energy Performance of Buildings Directive requires:

(a) the regular inspection of boilers of an effective rated output of 20 kW to 100 kW. This requirement applies to boilers fired by non-renewable liquid or solid fuels, but leaves it to member states to decide whether to apply the requirement to boilers using other fuels, such as gas. A one-off inspection of heating installations older than 15 years with a rated output of over 20 kW is also required; or

(b) the provision of advice to users on the replacement of boilers. We are currently considering which of the above options to adopt, and if we choose to proceed with option (a) whether to include boilers fired by the other fuels such as gas in the regular inspection arrangements. We will be seeking views from the heating industry and other interested parties on this.

GM Crops

Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs pursuant to her answer of 23 October 2003, if she will list the scientific studies published on (a) horizontal gene transfer, (b) the effect of growth promoters on gene suppression and gene hot spotting and (c) allergenicity; and where these studies have been peer reviewed. [135074]

Mr. Morley: The GM Science Review (at http://www.gmsciencedebate.org.uk/report/default.htm) published in July 2003 reports the current state of knowledge on horizontal gene transfer, allergenicity and the potential for generating recombination hot spots, and lists relevant publications and scientific studies. The Science Review does not cover in depth the effect of growth promoters on gene suppression as this issue is not relevant to the GM crops currently under consideration for approval. We do not maintain a list of such publications.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what (a) time limits there are and (b) timetable is in place for her Department's decision-taking relating to the (i) process of licensing GM crops and (ii) releases of genetically modified seeds into the environment. [135138]

Mr. Morley: Case-by-case decisions on applications to release GM crops for commercial cultivation are governed by EC Directive 2001/18. This sets out clear timescales for each stage of the decision-making process. Before a GM crop can be granted consent for commercial importation or cultivation, its release is subjected to an assessment by all EU member states to ensure that it poses no significant risk to human health or the environment. If the UK is the lead competent authority, then it has 90 days to assess the application for compliance with the requirements of the Directive. If the UK is not the lead competent authority, then it has 60 days to forward any comments on applications where another member state has forwarded a favourable opinion to the Commission. As decisions are subject to collective EU agreement, it is not possible to say when a decision on a specific application might be taken, but we do not expect any final decisions before early 2004.

For releases into the environment (i.e. for purposes other than placing on the market), the Directive requires the relevant competent authority to assess applications and respond to the applicant within 90 days. The 90-day clock, however, is stopped for any periods of time during which the competent authority is awaiting further information. There are currently no field trials of genetically modified crops taking place in the UK nor any application being assessed by the Department.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what (a) discussions she has had with and (b) advice she has received from the insurance industry in respect of liability for GM contamination of non-GM farmland. [135140]

Mr. Morley: We have not had any discussions with, or received advice from, the insurance industry on this subject. We will consider it when we have received the report due from the Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission on co-existence and liability.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs whether she has set a timetable for public consultation on the reports from (a) the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment, (b) the Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission and (c) other commissioned bodies which have either reported or are yet to report on work intended to inform her Department about the use of GM crops. [135145]

Mr. Morley: With regard to (a), ACRE'S advice on the results of the Farm Scale Evaluations will inform our assessment of the relevant crops as each application for consent is considered. To assist its deliberations, ACRE will be holding two open meetings to take evidence from other experts and stakeholders. The first of these will be in London on 25 November 2003 and the second in Edinburgh on 4 December 2003. Details are on the Defra website. There is separate provision in Directive 2001/18/EC for the public to be consulted on applications for the marketing of GM crops.

With regard to (b), we will consider how to proceed once we have received the AEBC's report on coexistence and liability.

With regard to (c), we do not envisage any further public consultation exercises at this stage to inform our policy on GM crops. We will decide our policy in the light of all the available information, including the report of the GM public debate.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the (a) earliest and (b) latest possible date is for the publication of the Government response to the report on the public consultation on GM science, GM Nation. [135146]

Mr. Morley: The Government are committed to responding to the GM public debate. No decision has yet been taken on timing, but we anticipate publishing our response in early 2004.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what decisions relevant to future assessments as to the appropriateness of licensing GM crops she plans to make before her Department has responded to the GM Nation report. [135148]

Mr. Morley: As decisions are subject to collective EU agreement under Directive 2001/18, it is not possible to say when decisions might be taken. There are currently 21 Part C marketing applications being processed across the EU, 12 of which include cultivation. The UK is not the lead member state for any of the applications for cultivation and nor are we presently considering any such applications on which other member states lead. 10 of the 12 applications are still at the initial stage of being assessed by the lead member state. Positive assessments were forwarded on the other two applications earlier this year and the UK submitted reasoned objections. The UK will be required to respond to any favourable assessments provided by other member states as they are received. We do not expect any final EU decisions on any application before early 2004.

Hunting/Fishing

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans she has for changes to the regulatory framework for (a) fishing and (b) shooting other than those resulting from the Hunting Bill, if enacted. [133516]

Mr. Bradshaw: This Government have no plans to change the regulatory framework for fishing or shooting.

When contemplating changes to other legislation the Government consider carefully how best to achieve their aim while protecting other sports from damage that may result from any legal precedent set. However, there may be relatively minor changes that occur indirectly following amendments to certain related legislation. For example, the Environmental Protection (Restriction on the Use of Lead Shot) (England) (Amendment) Regulations 2003, introduces minor changes to the list of sites in Schedule 1 to The Environmental Protection (Restriction on the Use of lead Shot)(England) Regulation 1999. Specifically the New Forest, Avon Valley (Hereford) and River Derwent and Tributaries (Cumbria) and Stanford Training Area, are removed from the list of sites as not being important to waterfowl; the Tweed Estuary is reinstated to the list because it has significant importance for these species. These changes come into force on the 31 October 2003. From this date it will be legal to use lead shot in the New Forest providing people are not shooting species listed on Schedule 2 of the 1999 Regulations, such as ducks and geese.

Persistent Chemicals

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent assessment her Department has made of the need to tighten controls on persistent chemicals. [134190]

Alun Michael: The UK Government have been working with the European Commission and stakeholders to develop proposals for a new regulatory regime to tighten controls on substances that are very persistent and very bioaccumulative, as well as those that are persistent, bioaccumulative and toxic. The need for a more precautionary approach to managing the risks from these chemicals is set out in the UK Chemicals Strategy, published in 1999. This can be found on Defra's website at: http://www.defra.gov.uk/environment/chemicals/ukpolicy.htm

It will be some time before the new EU regulatory system is up and running. In the meantime, we intend to press ahead with encouraging voluntary action in the UK as envisaged in the UK Chemicals Strategy. The Chemical Stakeholder Forum was set up under the Strategy to advise on action to address people's concerns about chemicals. The Forum's criteria for identifying chemicals of concern includes those that are very persistent and very bioaccumulative, as well as those that are persistent, bioaccumulative and toxic. Details of the Forum's activities can also be found at the above website address.

Further information about the forthcoming EU regulatory proposals and the Government's position on these can be found at: http://www.defra.gov.uk/environment/chemicals/eufuture.htm

Pollution (Landfill)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the number of incidences of pollution from landfill sites in each of the last five years; and how many (a) fines and (b) prosecutions have resulted. [131905]

Mr. Morley: Information on the number of incidences of pollution from landfill sites is available only from 2000 onwards.

The details are as follows:

In 2000 there were 1,157 incidents;

In 2001 there were 2,018 incidents;

In 2002 there were 994 incidents; and

To date in 2003 there have been 448 incidents recorded.

Those incidents have resulted in fines totalling £239,500 from 23 successful prosecutions. It should be noted that each prosecution could be for more than one offence.

Power Stations (Waste)

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the definition of coal fired power station ash as waste. [133254]

Mr. Morley: The definition of waste in force in the United Kingdom is the definition in Article 1(a) of the Waste Framework Directive (as amended). It provides that waste means,

> "... any substance or object ... which the holder discards or intends or is required to discard."

Whether or not a substance such as power station ash is discarded as waste is a matter which must be determined on the facts of the case and the interpretation of the law is a matter for the Courts. The European Court of Justice has issued several judgments on the interpretation of the definition of waste and the meaning of "discard".

It rests, in the first place, with the producer or holder of a substance to decide whether it is being discarded as waste. The Environment Agency is designated as a "competent authority" for the purposes of the Directive and is responsible for the application of its controls to substances discarded as waste. Power station ash discarded as waste is discussed in the Government's "Waste Strategy 2000" (paragraphs 8.139–8.143) (Cm 4693–2).

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when she will announce her decision on the Environment Agency's proposal on the future regulation of disposals of radioactive waste from British Nuclear Fuels plc Sellafield. [134264]

Mr. Morley: The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Secretary of State for Health—the responsible Ministers under the Radioactive Substances Act 1993—are currently considering the Environment Agency's proposed decision following its review of the radioactive discharges from the Sellafield site. They will make an announcement about the decision they reach on the Agency's proposal as soon as possible once the full assessment has been completed.

Waste Incineration Directive

Alistair Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent representations she has received on the Waste Incineration Directive 2000/76/EC. [134367]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The Department has received 45 responses to the consultation on Guidance on Directive 2000/76/EC which requested responses by 16 May 2003. Four Parliamentary Questions and two items of Ministerial Correspondence have been received since that date.

Alistair Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what consultation is taking place in relation to the implementation of Waste Incineration Directive 2000/76/EC; and when this consultation began. [134368]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 27 October 2003]: "Guidance on Directive 2000/76/EC on the incineration of waste" was published for consultation by my Department and the Welsh Assembly Government on 7 February 2003 following the entry into force on 28 December of The Waste Incineration (England and Wales) Regulations 2002. Responses were requested by 16 May and the Department is considering the draft guidance in the light of the 45 responses received.

Alistair Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, what the Government's policy is on the size of incineration systems affected by Waste Incineration Directive 2000/76/EC; and if she will make a statement. [134381]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The Waste Incineration Directive applies to incineration plant that fits the description of the terms "technical unit" or "plant" which are used in the Directive. Draft guidance on the meaning of these terms is given in "Guidance on Directive 2000/76/EC on the incineration of waste" which the Department and the Welsh Assembly Government published for consultation on 7 February 2003.

Waste Management

Mr. Swire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what estimate she has made of the impact of (a) licensing requirements and (b) notification fees on government targets on waste management. [132658]

Mr. Morley: The waste recovery operations that require a licence are set out in Article 10 of and Annex IIB to the Waste Framework Directive (75/442/EEC as amended by 91/156/EEC) and have been in force in the UK since May 1994. Composting is included in Annex IIB to the Directive.

Member states have discretion under Article 11(1)(b) of the Directive to adopt "general rules" providing exemptions from the licensing requirements of Article 10. The Department has recently carried out a consultation exercise in England and Wales on the revision of the current licensing exemption for composting. A regulatory impact assessment was published as part of this consultation exercise and is available on the Department's website. Licence exemptions are a less onerous form of control than licences and they are provided to encourage the recycling of waste and the attainment of recycling targets.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what her policy is on (a) the incineration of hazardous waste in cement kilns and (b) the importation of such waste for that purpose. [133106]

Mr. Morley: Cement kilns and other co-incineration plants can play a significant role in the treatment of hazardous waste. Evidence given to the House of Commons EFRA Select Committee inquiry on hazardous waste last year suggests that cement kilns have capacity to deal with significantly more hazardous waste than at present. I am keen to ensure that all treatment options for hazardous waste are considered, and that there should be a diversity of management options available. The UK Management Plan for Exports and Imports of Waste sets out Government policy in relation to the export and import of hazardous waste, including for the incineration of waste in cement kilns. The plan is currently under review in the light of recent European case law, and the on-going review of the Council Regulation (EEC) No. 259/93 on the supervision and control of shipments of waste within, into and out of the European Community.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps the Government are taking to encourage waste collection authorities to segregate waste paper from organic material in the waste stream. [133116]

Mr. Morley: The Government have set challenging targets (Statutory Performance Standards) for recycling and composting for all local authorities in England and Wales. It is up to each authority to decide which materials to collect, and in what manner, in order to meet those targets, based on local conditions. Their decision will be informed by the strength of the market for each material in the local area, and any quality requirements imposed by processors.

We are committed to reviewing the recycling and composting targets in 2004, in light of the progress made by local authorities in meeting their 2003–04 Statutory Performance Standards.

Water Efficiency

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps she is taking to encourage water efficiency in the (a) home and (b) commercial sector. [135470]

Mr. Morley: The Water Bill, currently before Parliament, contains a range of measures to advance water conservation. I have also asked Ofwat and the Environment Agency to review jointly the current and potential contribution that water efficiency can make to balancing the supply and demand for water. In addition to this more strategic work, Government are already engaged in a number of activities to encourage water efficiency in different sectors. Envirowise provides advice and guidance to businesses to promote water minimisation, and the Enhanced Capital Allowance scheme has recently been extended to include sustainable water use technologies. I am also considering the feasibility of introducing a product labelling scheme to help domestic consumers identify water efficient fittings and appliances. This will complement the existing duty on water undertakers to promote the efficient use of water by their customers.

Water Sewers

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent assessment she has made of the causes of misconnections to surface water sewers. [135129]

Mr. Morley: Under section 106 of the Water Industry Act 1991, anyone wishing to make a connection to a public sewer must notify the relevant sewerage undertaker. If a sewerage undertaker is not informed of a proposal to connect, and a connection is subsequently made, the undertaker can, under section 109 of the Water Industry Act 1991, close the communication and recover any reasonable costs incurred.

Assessments of the causes of unlawful connections to public sewers are a matter for sewerage undertakers, on a case by case basis.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the number of misconnections to surface water sewers and the environmental impact this has had in the last five years. [135130]

Mr. Morley: Under section 106 of the Water Industry Act 1991, anyone wishing to make a connection to a public sewer must notify the relevant sewerage undertaker. If a sewerage undertaker is not informed of a proposal to connect, and a connection is subsequently made, the undertaker can, under section 109 of the Water Industry Act 1991, close the connection and recover any reasonable costs incurred.

Assessments of the numbers of unlawful connections to public sewers are a matter for sewerage undertakers.

The Environment Agency's role is to grant consents for discharges from sewers and to monitor pollution incidents. Where pollution from sewers is detected, the Agency can take action either against the sewerage undertaker or in co-operation with the undertaker against an illegal discharger to the sewer as appropriate. Normally the Agency would expect the sewerage undertaker to take appropriate enforcement action using its powers under the Water Industry Act 1991. The environmental impacts of unlawful connections to public sewers are a matter for the Agency.

Written Answers to Questions

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Criminal Justice Board (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Solicitor-General if she will make a statement on the work of the Crown Prosecution Service with the Nottingham Criminal Justice Board. [135225]

The Solicitor-General: The Chief Crown Prosecutor for CPS Nottinghamshire is a very active member of the Local Criminal Justice Board and chairs two of its sub groups. One of these, which includes Victim Support, has engineered considerable improvements for dealing with vulnerable and intimidated witnesses. The group are now pioneering a system to provide updates and guidance to victims about their cases.

The Chief Crown Prosecutor also leads a group which is working on ways to improve communications between the agencies and the community. A regular bi-monthly bulletin is to be published for MPs and community groups which will explain the work of the board and the progress it is making in dealing with the offences that disrupt and disturb local communities. On behalf of the board, the Chief Crown Prosecutor is also leading an initiative to ensure all schools in Nottinghamshire are aware of the work and structure of the Local Criminal Justice Board.

The Crown Prosecution Service is also a major contributor to the board's delivery group which is tasked with narrowing the justice gap, bringing more persistent offenders to justice, and decreasing the cracked and ineffective trial rate.

Domestic Violence

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Solicitor-General if she will make a statement on her policy on prosecution of offences arising from domestic violence. [135228]

The Solicitor-General: The CPS handles around 13,000 cases involving domestic violence each year which are conducted in accordance with the Crown Prosecution Service revised policy on prosecution of cases of domestic violence issued in November 2001. The policy focuses on the safety of the victim and children, while holding abusers accountable for their actions.

EU Fraud

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Solicitor-General what mechanism she has for co-operating with the EU authorities in prosecuting fraud cases involving EU funds. [135229]

The Solicitor-General: Member states may request mutual legal assistance in gathering evidence by invoking the European Convention on Mutual Legal Assistance 1959. The UK prosecuting authorities can similarly seek assistance from other member states.

The United Kingdom Central Authority (UKCA) at the Home Office receives incoming requests for assistance. The Metropolitan Police, the Serious Fraud Office and Customs and Excise would gather evidence in England and Wales in response to an incoming request.

The European Community institutions established the European Anti Fraud Office (Office Europeen de lutte antifraude—OLAF) in 1999 as a successor to the Task Force for the co-ordination of fraud prevention (UCLAF). It is an independent body, but remains part of the European Commission. This is the principle authority with responsibility for investigating fraud involving EU funds.

Football (Prosecutions)

Bob Russell: To ask the Solicitor-General how many professional footballers have been charged in the past 12 years for (a) acts of violence and (b) disorderly behaviour during matches. [135230]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service holds no central records on the occupation of defendants in criminal cases or on particular offences

Iraq

Glenda Jackson: To ask the Solicitor-General, pursuant to her answer of 20 October, Official Report, column 352W, on Iraq, to the hon. Member for Medway, what constituted the effects in UN Security Council Resolutions 678 and 687 which, combined with Resolution 1441, provided a legal base for the use of force in Iraq. [134468]

The Solicitor-General: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Stone on 17 March, Official Report, column 515W. This set out the written answer given by the Attorney General in the House of Lords on the same day, which explained how, in his view, authority to use force against Iraq existed from the combined effect of resolutions 678, 687 and 1441.

Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Solicitor-General how many allegations of bribery of a foreign public official have been passed to the Serious Fraud Office since 14 February 2002; and how many of these allegations have resulted in an investigation; and whether any charges or arrests have been made under Part 12 since that date. [132361]

The Solicitor-General: Part 12 of the Act came into force in February 2002. The Act is not retrospective and to prosecute under the provisions of Part 12, all elements of the overseas offence must have taken place after February 2002. The very nature of such offences is that they can take some time to surface, and as such a period where no prosecutions are instituted is to be expected.

There have been no specific referrals made to the SFO where bribery of a foreign public official is the sole or principle allegation, or where it has been appropriate to invoke powers under the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001. As such no investigations have been commenced where the focus has been on Part 12 offences.

PRIME MINISTER

Iraq

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Prime Minister whether the Chiefs of Staff expressed unease to him in March regarding the proposed war against Iraq. [136075]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on 16 September 2003, Official Report, column 635W.

Madrid Initiative

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if he will make a statement about the Madrid Initiative in response to Pakistan's capacity to export nuclear weapons; [135390]

(2) what discussions he has had with his Madrid Initiative counterparts regarding Pakistan's capacity to export nuclear weapons. [135391]

The Prime Minister: The first meeting of the Proliferation Security Initiative was held in Madrid on 12 June. Subsequent meetings were held in July, August and October in Brisbane, Paris and London respectively.

The Proliferation Security Initiative aims to counter the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, their delivery systems and related materials by any state or non-state actor. No specific countries have been identified as primary targets of the Initiative.

We regularly urge all states to sign, ratify and abide by the obligations of all treaties and conventions covering the development of such weapons.

Official Buildings

Norman Baker: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the buildings within a mile of Parliament for which the staff of 10 Downing street have responsibility, giving in each case the date of acquisition; and whether acquisition was in each case (a) as a result of a departmental transfer and (b) a new acquisition by the Government; and what the buildings are used for. [134421]

The Prime Minister: None.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

County Courts (Security)

Mr. Love: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what measures are being taken to improve the safety and security of staff working in county courts. [134914]

Mr. Leslie: The DCA and Court Service take the health, safety and security of its employees very seriously. The Department has minimum security standards for county courts. The purpose of these standards is to ensure that appropriate security arrangements exist to protect staff, judiciary and court users. The Department undertakes a rolling programme of inspections to ensure that standards are being met. Security reviews also take place following any major incident. The standards are kept under review to ensure that they properly take account of any new or emerging risks and threats. The Department also has a rolling programme of fire safety and general health and safety inspections to ensure that its buildings are safe and all relevant legislation is being complied with.

Edmonton County Court

Mr. Love: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs, if he will make a statement on the progress made in reconstructing Edmonton County Court since September. [134915]

Mr. Leslie: On 1 September 2003, a suspected arson attack resulted in extensive damage to Edmonton County Court. Following an extensive programme of replacement and improvements, the court was able to fully re-open for business on 13 October 2003.

To alleviate the fears of court users and help prevent damage to the building by similar future attacks, a number of security improvements, including the installation of CCTV cameras, are being put in place.

EDS

Dr. Cable: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs if he will list payments made to EDS in respect of the courts' computer systems in each of the last five financial years; and if he will make a statement. [134231]

Mr. Leslie: The following net payments were made to EDS in the last five financial years in respect of the courts' computer systems (LOCCS contract):

	£ million
1998–99	5.92
1999–2000	14.35
2000–01	24.9
2001–02	33.4
2002–03	17.5

The pattern of expenditure reflects the wide-ranging programme, beginning in 1999, to modernise the Department's work, to increase its efficiency and provide better customer service, which has varied the level of payments from year to year. This programme included the provision of new services, such as:

modifications to the court case management system to include a module for family work;

modernisation of the jury summoning system;

modern IT support for the Judiciary; and, the Money Claims Online project.

Privy Council Judicial Committee

Lady Hermon: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs, what countries use the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as their final court of appeal; how many cases have been heard by the Judicial Committee from each of these countries in each of the past five years; and if he will make a statement. [134824]

Mr. Leslie: The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is the final court of appeal for the independent Commonwealth countries listed in the first column of the table, as well as for the United Kingdom overseas territories and Crown dependencies. The table shows the number of appeals from the countries concerned disposed of by the Judicial Committee in each of the five years up to 2002. Some of these appeals were disposed of without a hearing.

Number of appeals

Country	1998	1999	2000	2001	2002	Total
Antigua and Barbuda	2	—	1	2	—	5
The Bahamas	4	2(1)	3	3(1)	5	17(2)

[1] An appeal lies from the Court of Appeal of Brunei to the Sultan and Yang di-Pertuan, in civil cases only. By agreement between Her Majesty and the Sultan these appeals are heard by the Judicial Committee who report their opinion to him instead of to Her Majesty.
[2] The appeal lies only in constitutional cases affecting a Banaban.
[3] New Zealand has recently legislated to abolish the appeal for all cases heard by the Court of Appeal of New Zealand after the end of 2003.
Note:
Figures in brackets (included in the total annual figure given) are for appeals disposed of without a hearing. These were mostly dismissed for non-prosecution or withdrawn.

Rape Cases

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what action he has taken to remove circuit judges from the list of those permitted to try rape cases in the last two years. [134939]

Mr. Leslie: Section 75 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 states that the Lord Chief Justice, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, can, by means of a practice direction, determine the cases or classes of cases suitable for allocation to High Court Judges, Circuit Judges and Recorders. From time to time successive Lord Chief Justices have issued such practice directions. In October 2001, the current Lord Chief Justice, Lord Woolf, issued a practice direction entitled 'Directions by the Lord Chief Justice for the Classification of the business of the Crown Court and Allocation to Crown Court Centres'. This Practice Direction again determined that all High Court Judges and those Circuit Judges and Recorders, approved for that purpose by the Senior Presiding Judge, with the concurrence of the Lord Chief Justice, can hear rape cases.

Judges trying rape cases are, of course, under constant public scrutiny. Where problems about judicial conduct become apparent to the Court of Appeal, the papers are referred to the relevant Presiding Judge, or to the Senior Presiding Judge personally. Any complaints, as well as any information suggesting possible inappropriate judicial behaviour, are immediately investigated, and reports in the media of judicial behaviour which, if correct, would give rise to concern, are checked for correctness and completeness by the Presiding Judges. It is, of course, open to the Lord Chief Justice, acting on his own initiative, or on the recommendation of the Senior Presiding Judge, to remove any individual authorisation. The Lord Chief Justice has not had occasion to do this in the last two years.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Banking Services

Linda Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions she has had with clearing banks about the need to ensure their services are accessible to people who wish to conduct their business on a face-to-face basis and the role which post offices and sub-post offices can play in achieving this. [135016]

Mr. Timms: None. This is a commercial matter for the banks. Banking and other financial services are central to the Post Office's strategy for the future of the network. With almost 17,000 offices, Post Office Ltd has one of the largest retail networks of any organisation in Europe and the Government's investment of £480 million on computerising the post office network means that the Post Office can achieve a new role as a convenient place for people to do their banking

Universal banking services which successfully went live on 1 April, and these services together with Post Office Ltd's plans for an expansion of network banking (commercial arrangements between the Post Office and individual banks providing access to standard bank accounts at post office counters) should lead to a substantial increase in the number of people using post offices for banking transactions.

CDs

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps her Department is taking to protect the interests of consumers from copy protected music CDs. [133410]

Ms Hewitt: Rights owners must be able to use technology to protect their works against unauthorised copying and be free to issue their products, such as music CDs, in copy-protected format. However, these products should be identifiable as such, and we welcome music industry guidelines which recommend clear labelling as regards compatibility with various types of consumer equipment on which the CDs could be expected to be playable.

Electricity

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will list, for each of the last five years, applications for construction of new electricity generation capacity for which her approval has been (a) sought and (b) given, broken down by (i) type, (ii) size and (iii) proposed or actual in-service date. [132433]

Mr. Timms: The following is the information requested:

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what contingency plans her Department has to prevent power failures in the United Kingdom. [134126]

Mr. Timms: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to her on Tuesday 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 118W.

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps she is taking to ensure continuity of electricity supply; and if she will assess the likely effect on companies and individuals of widespread power cuts. [134236]

Mr. Timms: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for the Vale of York on Tuesday 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 118W.

Euro

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many speeches she has made since June 2003 supporting entry into the euro. [131719]

Ms Hewitt: I refer my right hon. Friend to the answer given by the Financial Secretary on 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 142W.

European Power Networks (Balkans)

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made on European power networks for the Balkans; what remains to be done; when it is expected to be completed; and if she will make a statement. [135441]

Mr. Timms: Following proposals from the Commission, the countries of the South-East Europe electricity market signed a Memorandum of Understanding—the Athens Memorandum—in November 2002 which would create a single electricity market in the area by 2005, with rules reflecting those of the EU's internal market. The Memorandum also set up a number of institutions collectively called the 'Athens Process'. The agreement paves the way for the eventual integration of the regional electricity market into the wider European one.

The process is taking place in close co-operation with all international donors active on a regional basis and the Stability Pact.

Information Technology

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in what ways her Department is promoting the use of information technology solutions as a replacement for paper work. [135509]

Mr. Timms: The DTI is promoting the use of information technology solutions in a number of ways, both in conveying key messages to the business community and in the way the Department itself enables its own business processes. UK Online for Business was launched in September 2000 with the aim of promoting the benefits of information and communication technologies. The programme provides impartial advice on how e-business can help businesses reduce costs and increase efficiency by integrating their internal processes and working with customers and suppliers online. This core use of ICT and the more specific usage of e-business technologies to engage, for example, in e-procurement, accounts and collaborative design will provide business with the real potential to reduce and replace paper work.

The DTI is working with industry to establish a UK Oil Portal on the world wide web, which will enable all business processes associated with granting consents, approvals and regulatory reporting across all Government Departments to be undertaken electronically in a secure manner.

DTI's Export Control Organisation (ECO) has a number of in-house databases and makes constant use of electronic records when processing licence applications and in responding to requests for information from Government Ministers, Parliament and exporters. The ECO has also recently introduced a facility to enable applications to be made over the Internet.

Internally, at DTI we are making increasing use of online internal business processesfor our finance and personnel systems, and use our intranet for mainstreamcommunication to staff. We have had an electronic document and records management system for all our five thousand headquarters staff since April 2003, replacing the previous paper system.

Internet Access

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) households (i) have internet access and (ii) have broadband access, and how many (b) businesses have (1) internet access and (2) broadband access, broken down by (A) constituency and (B) postcode. [134488]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 27 October 2003]: In the second quarter of 2003, 12.0 million (48 per cent.) of households in the UK were connected to the internet from the home, according to the latest ONS statistics published on 30 September 2003. Oftel's research found that 65 per cent. of SMEs had internet access at end August 2003. Oftel publishes data on the combined total take-up of broadband by UK homes and businesses. At end September 2003, there were over 2,628,100 broadband subscribers, of which 2,341,000 were residential broadband subscribers and 288,000 were business broadband subscribers. Oftel monitors the UK narrowband and broadband markets. The findings are published regularly on its website http://www.oftel.gov.uk. Statistical data on take-up of the internet in the UK is published regularly by the ONS on its website http://www.statistics.gov.uk.

Data broken down by constituency and postcodes level are not available.

Mineworkers' Pension Scheme

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when she will decide whether to extend the eligibility criterion for the lump sum payment to certain members of the Mineworkers' Pension Scheme from five years' service to four years and six months' service; and if she will make a statement. [135589]

Mr. Timms: The intention of the scheme to help those MPS members on the lowest pensions who left British Coal before or shortly after 1975 is to address the problem of retired mineworkers who receive very low pensions in spite of lengthy service in the industry. For this reason, mineworkers with less than five years contributory service were excluded. I have no plans to revisit these criteria.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the tracing exercise to locate members of the Mineworkers' Pension Scheme for whom no contact details are known will be completed; and if she will make a statement. [135590]

Mr. Timms: It is expected the tracing exercise will be completed by the end of the summer 2004.

Mobile Telephone Calls

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much was spent on mobile telephone calls by her Department in the last financial year. [135506]

Ms Hewitt: Responsibility for the provision of mobile telephones for official purposes and for payment of the associated call charges was devolved to individual directorates, agencies and NDPBs at the end of March 1993. Since August 1997, the DTI has increasingly made use of the central Mobile Telecommunications contract managed by the Office for Government Commerce. This contract provides a call-off arrangement for DTI users at advantageous prices ensuring that the Department obtains good value for money. Due to the devolved responsibility for mobile telephone management the only information that can be provided at non-disproportionate cost is the total expenditure with DTI's main suppliers of mobile telephony. From the information currently available, expenditure last year was £342,964 which included both equipment and call charges.

Post Office Card Account

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which bank supports the Post Office card account; at what location customers' details are kept with this bank; which other banks were considered for support of card accounts; and if she will make a statement. [135593]

Mr. Timms: These are matters that fall within the day-to-day responsibility of Post Office Ltd. and I have therefore asked the Chief Executive to reply direct to the hon. Member.

Renewable Energy Grants

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will recognise Solartwin as a new technology in relation to the awarding of Clear Skies grants. [135893]

Mr. Timms: Solartwin was recognised as an innovative technology when it was developed with a DTI SMART award funding. Solartwin has been on the list of Clear Skies approved products for some months now.

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reasons the Clear Skies Grant Scheme requires the use of digital thermometers. [135894]

Mr. Timms: The Clear Skies criterion does not stipulate the use of a digital thermometer where a differential temperature controller is used that can be set to limit the temperature of the water in the cylinder. Systems that do not employ this type of controller are required to use a digital thermometer as these give the clearest indication the system is working efficiently and also due to the high temperatures that can be reached give the most accurate temperature readings, therefore acting as a safety device to ensure individuals do not touch the system in error and get burnt in the process.

Stamp Duty Land Tax

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of the impact of increases in Stamp Duty Land Tax on her policies for promoting business, trade and industry; and if she will make a statement. [135609]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

The Government has introduced disadvantaged areas relief which provides an exemption from stamp duty land tax for transactions in non-residential land in Enterprise Areas. This will provide a major boost to businesses investing in commercial premises in those areas.

In addition the changes I announced on 20 October to the structure for charging Stamp Duty Land Tax on the rental element of new leases will assist small and medium-sized enterprises and business start-ups.

Telephone Exchanges

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which body owns telephone exchanges in Great Britain. [135327]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 30 October 2003]: With the exception of Kingston upon Hull, local telephone exchanges in the UK are owned by BT. In the Kingston upon Hull area, they are owned by Kingston Communications.

Cable Companies also have facilities in areas where they have a network presence.

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) whether a regulatory assessment has been made of the costs of upgrading telephone exchanges to broadband exchanges; and if she will make a statement; [135328]

(2) which body is responsible for ensuring that companies other than British Telecom are not asked to pay an uncompetitive price for upgrading telephone exchanges to make them broadband enabled; [135329]

Mr. Timms [holding answers 30 October 2003]: Telephone exchanges can be upgraded for broadband by their owners, or by other telecommunications providers by means of local loop unbundling. In pursuit of its broadband target, the Government is keen to see as many exchanges as possible upgraded for broadband. Nonetheless, decisions on upgrading are a commercial matter for the companies concerned.

WALES

Bechtel

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the contracts for consultancy and work carried out by Bechtel in each year since 1997, stating in each case (a) the nature of the work, (b) the value of the contract and (c) the duration of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [133580]

Mr. Touhig [holding answer 22 October 2003]: The Wales Office was established in 1999. Bechtel have not been contracted to carry out any consultancy work for the Wales Office since then.

Stamp Duty Land Tax

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the impact of increases in stamp duty land tax on economic regeneration policies in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [135613]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

The Government has introduced disadvantaged areas relief which provides an exemption from stamp duty land tax for transactions in non-residential land in Enterprise Areas. There are 363 wards in Wales which qualify for this relief, representing the bottom 42 per cent. of areas in the national index of deprivation. The measure provides a major boost to businesses investing in commercial premises in Wales.

TRANSPORT

Air Travel

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the results of the SPASM computer model run on the assumptions that air travel would by 2030 pay the same rates of tax as those currently applicable to car travel. [135183]

Dr. Howells: The modelling shows that, with aviation fuel taxed at the same rate as motor vehicle fuel and with VAT imposed on all flights departing from UK airports, the number of passengers using UK airports would rise from 180 million in 2000 to around 315 million in 2030. This assumes that the increase in tax causes the same percentage decrease in demand for air travel.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the responses from the public to the consultation on the Future of Air Transport in the United Kingdom will be made available for public inspection. [135192]

Dr. Howells: We have received over 400,000 responses to the consultation. These are being analysed, and an index and retrieval system is being developed. We shall make the responses available before the end of this year, except where consultees have explicitly requested confidentiality.

Responses from some key stakeholders are already in the public domain, and can be viewed on the relevant web sites.

Gatwick Airport

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to the answer of 11 September 2003, Official Report, column 372W, on runway capacity, what the net economic benefit would be from building a new wide spaced runway at Gatwick, counting only benefits to UK residents. [135219]

Dr. Howells: The net economic benefits, to UK residents only, of building a new wide spaced runway at Gatwick, over and above the benefits from maximum use of existing capacity at south east airports, is approximately £2 billion, assuming all costs and benefits are discounted at 3.5 per cent. from 2000 to 2060. This estimate also takes into account a three year delay in benefits and includes a 44 per cent. increase in costs to reflect the risk in estimating costs for engineering works.

Highways Agency

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what costs the Highways Agency has borne in dealing with illegal occupations of its land at Foston, Derbyshire in the last 12 months. [134709]

Mr. Jamieson: I have asked the Acting Chief Executive of the Highway's Agency, Mr. Stephen Hickey, to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Stephen Hickey to Mr. Mark Todd, dated 3 November 2003:

The Transport Minister, David Jamieson, has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions asking what costs have been incurred in dealing with illegal occupation of land at Foston, Derbyshire, in the last 12 months.

The total cost is not yet known as the Agency have not yet had the site cleared and have not received all invoices for the legal costs.

To date they have incurred Solicitors fees of £3559. This figure will rise as they had to apply to Derbyshire County Court for a Writ of Restitution to enforce the earlier eviction notice.

The total cost of securing the site with concrete blocks is £1,800, the blocks will remain following the site clearance until the land is tenanted.

We are working closely with the Environment Agency to ensure that the land is thoroughly cleared of any debris. It is estimated that the clearance of the land will cost approx £24,000.

Piracy

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many British registered ships have been the subject of attack by pirates in each half year for the last five years; in which areas of the world these attacks have taken place; what the cost in (a) human, (b) freight and (c) shipping terms has been; and what steps he is taking to deal with the problem. [134964]

Mr. Jamieson: The number of British registered ships that have been the subject of attack by pirates since 1998, and the areas of the world where these attacks have taken place, are as follows:

	January to June	July to December
1998
Americas	3	—
Indian Sub-Continent	1	—
South East Asia	—	2
1999
South East Asia	—	1

Indian Sub-Continent	1	1
South East Asia	3	2
2003
Africa	2	—
Americas	2	—
Far East	1	—
South East Asia	4	—

Note:
These figures are for the British Fleet, and include the United Kingdom, Crown Dependencies and Dependent Territories combined fleets.

There have been no reported instances of any seafarers being killed on a British ship during the period, and no British ships have been stolen. Ship equipment, stores, personal effects and cash have been stolen during attacks but an exact inventory is not held centrally.

Concerted action by the international community is the key to addressing the problem. The UK has participated in several counter piracy seminars in "hotspot" areas, has prepared and issued Codes of Practice for the investigation of piracy incidents and the registration of "phantom" (stolen) ships, and raised the matter at international events, including the United Nations General Assembly.

The UK Government meet the maritime industry on a regular basis to discuss how best the UK can continue to help tackle the problem of piracy. In November 2002 revised counter piracy advice was re-issued to all UK seafarers, and we have also issued advice on measures and equipment to assist ship operators.

The new IMO requirements for ships to have internationally agreed security measures in place by July 2004 will also help to protect them from piracy attacks.

Road Safety (Child Pedestrians)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many child pedestrians were injured on roads, broken down by local highway authority, in each of the last three years. [134754]

Mr. Jamieson: The information requested has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Vehicle Licensing

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what procedures are in place at the DVLA to stop documents being stolen when they are being returned to the DVLA because the addressees have moved. [135119]

Mr. Jamieson: DVLA expects to issue approximately 16 million vehicle registration documents and over six million driving licences this year. On past experience, less than half of 1 per cent. of this (around 110,000 items) mail will be found by Royal Mail to be undeliverable and will be returned to the Agency.

Undelivered mail is opened under secure conditions at DVLA and the contents dealt with according to strict handling procedures. A check of DVLA records is made to compare the name and address shown with that provided by the customer. If a contact telephone number is present, the customer is contacted. Where discrepancies are identified, the problem is corrected and documents re-sent. If no error has been made, the documents are held securely for a time to allow the customer to contact the Agency. Where no further contact is received, the documents are destroyed under secure conditions.

Undelivered identity documents, e.g. passports and birth certificates, are collected by staff from a specific team. Where no address discrepancies are present, these documents are also held securely pending contact from the customer. Where no contact is forthcoming, documents are returned to their issuing authorities, the relevant embassies or to the Home Office as appropriate.

West Coast Main Line

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects modernisation of the West Coast main line (a) to commence and (b) to be completed. [134588]

Mr. McNulty: Work to upgrade the West Coast Main Line is already under way. Completion is currently projected by 2007–08.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Delayed Discharges

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to extend the Community Care (Delayed Discharges etc.) Act 2003 to Northern Ireland; what steps he is taking to tackle the issue of delayed discharges from hospitals in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [134831]

Angela Smith: I am not planning to extend the provisions of the Community Care (Delayed Discharges etc.) Act 2003 to Northern Ireland or to introduce equivalent legislation in Northern Ireland. The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety has made it a requirement on Health and Social Services Boards to invest part of the annual additional allocations for community care services to ensure timely discharge from acute care in hospital. Furthermore the Secretary of State's Draft Priorities and Budget paper, which is currently out for consultation, proposes a new target for the Health and Personal Social Services designed to reduce the maximum waiting time for community care services for people who are medically fit for discharge so that by March 2006 no assessed person should wait for more than eight weeks in an acute hospital, other than in exceptional circumstances.

Loyalist Decommissioning

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the progress made in decommissioning arms held by Loyalist terrorists. [134962]

Jane Kennedy: In 2003 the Loyalist Commission, along with the UDA representatives, met the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning. The Prime Minister has stated clearly that the IICD will resolutely continue to pursue complete decommissioning by all paramilitary organisations, helping to bring about a permanent end to paramilitary activity in all its forms.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what estimate he has made of the amount of arms and ammunition held by Loyalist terrorists. [134975]

Jane Kennedy: Under Part II, Paragraph 1a of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information "Information whose disclosure would harm national security or defence", it would be inappropriate for the Government to comment as the information requested by the hon. Member is only available from intelligence sources.

The Government and the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning will resolutely continue to pursue complete decommissioning by all paramilitary organisations in order to bring a complete and permanent end to paramilitary activity in all its forms.

Police (Northern Ireland) Act

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the total cost has been of changes brought about by the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000; and if he will make a statement. [134820]

Jane Kennedy: The Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000 provides the legislative framework for the implementation of the changes recommended in the report of the Independent Commission on Policing. These include the creation of the Policing Board, the setting up of District Policing Partnerships, changes to the planning arrangements, provisions relating to recruitment and severance, and the legal basis for both the Oversight Commissioner and the RUC GC Foundation. Given the range of direct and indirect costs, it would not be practical to place a specific figure on the total amount incurred as a result of the legislation.

Police Ombudsman

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much has been spent on the Police Ombudsman's office in Northern Ireland since 6th November. [136072]

Jane Kennedy: The Police Ombudsman reports the cost of running her office in each financial year since its formation is as follows:

2002–02	[1]7,821,378
2003–03	6,858,897

The Police Ombudsman advises that from 1 April to 30 September 2003 the cost of running the office has been £3,104,907.

[1] This figure represents expenditure by Police Ombudsman's Office from its establishment on 6 November 2000 until 31 March 2002.

Provisional IRA

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what his assessment is of the Provisional IRA's capacity to carry out (a) targeting, (b) intimidation and (c) racketeering activities in Northern Ireland. [134633]

Jane Kennedy: Under Part II, Paragraph 1a of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (Information whose disclosure would harm national security or defence), it would be inappropriate for the Government to comment as the information requested by the hon. Gentleman is only available from intelligence sources.

We now call on all paramilitary organisations to bring a complete and permanent end to paramilitary activity in all its forms.

Research and Development

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) successful and (b) unsuccessful applications were received for the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment's Research and Development programmes in each of the last three years; and what the total amount was of funding allocated for research and development programmes. [133869]

Mr. Pearson: Since 1 April 2000 the Innovation, Research and Technology Division of Invest Northern Ireland (and the predecessor agency, the Industrial Research and Technology Unit), supported 1,038 applications and rejected 143 applications for research and development activities. A total of £77,524,907 in grants was offered to successful applicants. Details are provided in the following table.

	Successful applications	Rejected applications
2000–01	304	83
2001–02	293	86
2002–03	310	47
2003–04	131	25
Total	1,038	143

[1] As of 21 October 2003

Road Gritting

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will change the decision to reduce the gritting of roads and streets in North Belfast. [134634]

Mr. Spellar: I have asked the Chief Executive of Roads Service to write to the hon. Gentleman in response to this question. A copy of the letter will be placed in the Library.

Stamp Duty Land Tax

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the impact of increases in stamp duty land tax on economic regeneration policies in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [135611]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

The Government has introduced disadvantaged areas relief which provides an exemption from stamp duty land tax for transactions in non-residential land in Enterprise Areas. There are 237 wards in Northern Ireland which qualify for this relief, representing the bottom 42 per cent. of areas in the national index of deprivation. The measure provides a major boost to businesses investing in commercial premises in Northern Ireland.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Chagos Islands

Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the nationality and residential status are of the Chagos islanders; who is responsible for their well-being on arrival in the UK; and if he will nominate a Minister to meet hon. Members and concerned county councils to discuss provision of services and their costs for the islanders. [131664]

Mr. Rammell: By virtue of the British Overseas Territories Act 2002, most Chagossians, together with most of the inhabitants of the other Overseas Territories, became British citizens (as well as Overseas Territories citizens) on the commencement of the Act on 21 May 2002. They thereby acquired the right to enter and take up residence in the UK. As regards their entitlement to state services the Chagossians who have come to the UK have the same rights, and are treated in the same way, as other British citizens coming here from overseas.

The Chagossians were advised that, on arrival in the UK, they would not automatically be eligible for the whole range of state benefits and that they should therefore have sufficient funds at their disposal to support themselves until they had fulfilled the required habitual residence test.

Ministers would be pleased to meet hon. Members and concerned county councils, at the appropriate time, to discuss these matters.

Afghanistan

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the payment system to poppy growers in Afghanistan (a) last year and (b) this year; which countries met the cost of the system; and how much in sterling each paid; how many growers took part; how much each poppy grower received; and what the take-up rate was. [134865]

Mr. Rammell: In 2002, the Afghan Government considered it appropriate to offer a one-off programme of compensation payments to opium poppy farmers on the basis that the poppy crop had been planted during the Taliban regime. The UK provided financial assistance worth £21.25 million in order to support the new regime's commitment to tackle drugs production but it was the responsibility of the Afghan authorities to administer the system of payments. We understand from the Afghan authorities that they provided compensation of $1,750 per hectare. Information about the total number of farmers who took part is not available. The Afghan Government estimated that 17,000 hectares of poppy were destroyed.

In 2003, the Afghan Transitional Authority ran a non-compensated eradication programme through the Province Governors. The UK was not involved in this programme. There has not been any estimate of the amount of poppy destroyed.

Departmental Expenditure (Official Residences)

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much the Department spent on (a) maintenance, (b) renovation, (c) council tax and (d) running costs of residential properties used by Ministers and officials in each year since 1997. [134689]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: In the UK the Foreign and Commonwealth office maintains official residential accommodation for my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary at No 1 Carlton Gardens. The spend each year on (a) maintenance, (b) renovation, (c) council tax and (d) running costs since 1997 is as follows:

	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000	2001–01	2001–02	2002–03
Maintenance	19,093	3,510	24,561	15,918	1,245	4,089
Renovation	3,354	15,246	—	—	—	—
Council tax	202	325	350	375	410	491
Running costs—rent	15,225	25,180	27,300	54,000	54,000	54,000
Utilities	6,637	8,049	1,620	4,723	5,251	3,971
Total	44,511	52,309	53,831	75,016	60,906	62,551

A downward rent review in 1995 resulted in a credit of £46,200 being received for overpaid rent during the 1997–98 period. A rent review in April 2000 resulted in a rate increase.

EU Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the evidential basis used to support the statements in A Constitutional Treaty for the EU: The British Approach to the European Union Intergovernmental Conference, Cm 5934, that (a) outside the EU the UK would have less, not more, control of its economy, (b) the proposed constitution is no more than a tidying-up exercise, (c) the proposed constitution is arguably the most significant development since the foundation of the EEC and (d) the national Governments of member states remain in control. [135455]

Mr. MacShane: In relation to point (a) the full quotation from the White Paper makes our position clear: "Outside the EU, we would have less, not more, control of our economy—because to continue to trade with the Union, we would still have to be bound by its rules. But we would end up with much less say in shaping them." On point (b), the White Paper does not contain any such statement. On point (c), the White Paper does not say this. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister comments in his foreword that the enlargement of the EU to 25 member states "will arguably be the most significant development since the foundation of the EEC". Concerning point (d), the White Paper provides the basis for this statement as follows: "The Union's powers clearly derive from the member states; and the draft Treaty preserves the principle that the most important decisions on EU issues are taken, by unanimity, by the Governments of member states."

Great Lakes Region

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his Answer of 22 October 2003, Official Report, column 615W, on the Great Lakes Region, what monitoring took place of the Interim Emergency Multinational Force; and what monitoring is taking place of the UN Organisation Mission in the Democratic Republic of Congo Ituri Brigade. [135215]

Mr. Mullin: The actions of the Interim Emergency Multinational Force (IEMF) was monitored and evaluated by the Political and Security Committee of the EU. The IEMF's operations were also discussed by EU member states.

The work of the Ituri Brigade of the UN Organisation Mission in the DRC (MONUC) is regularly monitored by the UN's Department of Peacekeeping Operations in New York and by the UN Security Council through regular reporting. MONUC also provides weekly briefings to diplomatic missions in Kinshasa. Representatives from our embassy regularly visit the region and discuss the situation there with the UN Secretary General's Special Representative.

Guantanamo Bay

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent progress has been made in discussions between the USA and UK Governments regarding the British detainees at Guantanamo Bay; and whether the possibility of repatriation remains under discussion. [135181]

Mr. Mullin: Discussions between the Government and the US Administration about the British nationals detained at Guantanamo Bay continue. A number of options are still being considered, including the possibility of repatriation.

Iraq

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs from which country the information on Iraq's alleged attempt to procure uranium from Niger was obtained; and whether he has asked that country if its details may be publicly released. [133399]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: As has been said before in response to questions on this subject, the Government will not identify the source of the information received. The information was passed to the Government in confidence by the Government of another state, and is therefore covered under Exemption 1(c) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

We did seek authority from the originators to release the information to UN inspectors. This permission was not granted. We subsequently urged the Government concerned to make the information available themselves.

Kosovo

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action has been taken to pursue those responsible for the murder in the summer of two Serbian boys by snipers in Kosovo; and if he will make a statement. [135437]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: My right hon. Friend the Minister of State at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Denis MacShane) issued a press statement on behalf of the Government on 14 August condemning the attack.

The NATO-led force in Kosovo (K-FOR) and the UN Peacekeeping Mission (UNMIK) immediately launched efforts to pursue those responsible. The Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General (SRSG) established a special investigative team. K-FOR deployed 300 troops, tracker dogs, and increased ground and air patrols. UNMIK police set up mobile reserve units to conduct random vehicle checkpoints, and vehicle and foot patrols targeted with the specific aims of interdicting movement of persons with weapons and checking for criminals.

The UK fully supports the ongoing efforts of UNMIK Police and K-FOR to find the perpetrators of this terrible attack.

St. Helena

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the last ministerial visit from his Department to St. Helena was; and when the next one will be. [135658]

Mr. Rammell: St. Helena has never had a visit by a Foreign and Commonwealth Office Minister. There are no current plans for an FCO ministerial visit to the island.

Mr. James Miller

Nick Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to persuade the Israeli Government to disclose to Mrs. Sophy Miller the Israeli Defence Force report into the killing of her husband Mr. James Miller. [135025]

Mr. Mullin: This issue has been raised with the Israelis on a number of occasions, most recently by my Noble Friend the Baroness Symons of Vernham Dean during her recent visit to Israel. The Israelis explained that the results of the General Command Inquiry will be one of the sources used for the Military Police investigation which we and James' family have been pressing for, and could therefore not be released prematurely. The Military Police investigation is now underway and the Israeli Government have assured us that the full results will be presented to the family.

Somalia

Mr. Best: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions the UK Government have had with the leaders of the Somalialand region of Somalia about their aspirations for an independent state. [132249]

Mr. Mullin: I met with senior members of the Somaliland administration/authorities on 3 October. They referred to Somaliland's aspiration to be an independent state. The UK Government have no plans at present to recognise an independent Somaliland.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the Government has taken to support independent broadcasters broadcasting to Zimbabwe from outside Zimbabwe. [135209]

Mr. Mullin: We have made clear our support for strong, independent media reporting on Zimbabwe. The Government works with a variety of civil society and media organisations in and outside Zimbabwe to this end. We do not publish details of our co-operation with such organisations.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has raised the issue of Zimbabwe with the South African Government during their recent visit to the UK; and if he will make a statement. [135210]

Mr. Mullin: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and I had useful discussions about Zimbabwe with Foreign Minister Zuma and other South African participants in the recent London conference.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy (a) to unilaterally strengthen sanctions against Zimbabwe and (b) to seek the strengthening of sanctions against Zimbabwe by the EU. [135216]

Mr. Mullin: We keep our policy on sanctions against Zimbabwe under regular review. We favour multilateral sanctions wherever possible because these have a greater practical impact and send a stronger political signal.

The EU sanctions on Zimbabwe were imposed in response to serious violations of human rights and the rule of law. The present sanctions expire in February 2004. We and our EU partners will decide then, in the light of the situation in Zimbabwe, whether to maintain or amend the present arrangements.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will press for the extension of EU targeted sanctions on senior Zanu PF officials to include spouses and children. [135221]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: When EU sanctions against Zimbabwe come up for renewal in February 2004 we and our EU partners will assess whether the Zimbabwe Government continues to engage in serious violations of human rights and of the rule of law. If the EU judges that the situation in Zimbabwe has deteriorated further it may consider extending the sanctions. It would choose to extend them in such a way as to have maximum impact on the decision makers in the Zimbabwe Government. Extending them to relatives of those on the sanctions list (within the limits of other relevant international obligations, for instance the Convention on the Rights of the Child) remains a possibility.

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer of 21 October 2003, Official Report, column 537W, on the Zimbabwe cricket tour, what advice was given to the England and Wales Cricket Board by his Department's officials on the matter of the political situation in Zimbabwe. [135369]

Mr. Straw: FCO officials have not provided ECB officials with detailed briefing on the current political situation in Zimbabwe. The basic facts about this are in any event in the public domain. The ECB has not requested such a briefing so far in advance of the England cricket team's tour of Zimbabwe which is scheduled for late 2004. FCO officials have informed ECB officials about some key dates coming up in relation to Zimbabwe. They will continue to respond to requests from the ECB and other organisations for information on the political situation inside Zimbabwe and on safety and security issues.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Abandoned Vehicles

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many abandoned cars have been removed by local authorities in England in each of the last five years; and at what estimated cost to public funds. [133528]

Mr. Morley: Information on abandoned vehicles was collected for the first time in the Municipal Waste Management Survey covering the financial year 2000–01. Data up to the latest year for which they are available are shown in the following table:

Financial year	Number of abandoned vehicles removed	Estimated cost (£ million) [1]
2000–01	230,000	Between 6.9 and 11.5
2001–02	293,000	Between 8.79 and 14.65

[1] Based on estimated disposal costs of between £30 and £50 per vehicle.

Beef Exports

Ian Lucas: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the value was of United Kingdom exports of beef to the United States of America in each year since 1997. [133983]

Mr. Bradshaw: The table shows the value of United Kingdom exports of beef to the United States of America since 1997.

United Kingdom Beef Exports to United States of America

1997	6,904
1999	3,175
2000	3,160
2001	13,537

Note:
There were no UK exports of beef to the United States in the years 1998, 2002 and 2003 (January to July).
Sources:
1. HM Customs and Excise.
2. Data prepared by Statistics (Commodities and Food) Consultancy Trade and IT, ESD and Defra.

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the steps the Government is taking to encourage the resumption of beef exports. [134668]

Mr. Bradshaw: It has been possible since 1 August 1999 to export UK beef under the stringent rules of the Date-based Export Scheme (DBES). Beef exports resumed in September 2002 following the ending of foot and mouth disease restrictions and changes to the rules of DBES to make it easier for companies to participate. To date there are four slaughterhouses in the Scheme.

We submitted papers to the European Commission in support of our case for further changes to the DBES and our request for restrictions to be lifted so that the UK can trade on the same basis as other member states in April 2003 and June 2003 respectively. These papers as updated are currently being considered by the European Food Safety Authority (EFSA). In addition, we have extended the period of rebates on DBES eligibility checks and Meat Hygiene Service supervision charges until the end of June 2004 for slaughterhouses entering the Scheme before the end of 2003. We have also identified with industry a number of key markets so that lobbying can be targetted effectively.

Common Agricultural Policy

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans she has to use regional average payments to implement the Common Agricultural Policy reforms; and if she will make a statement. [134125]

Mr. Bradshaw: The deadline for responses to our consultation exercise on whether to adopt the regional average payment model of the Single Payment Scheme ended on 24 October 2003. Those responses will help inform our decisions on this matter, which we hope to announce within the next few months.

Departmental Energy Efficiency

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much (a) electricity and (b) other energy her Department has used in each year since 1997 (i) in total and (ii) per square metre; what the projected use is for each of the following years for which forecasts are made; what plans she has to reduce usage; and if she will make a statement. [135052]

Mr. Bradshaw: The answer in respect of parts (a) and (b) parts (i) and (ii) for all Government Departs is shown in the attached table. Due to a number of uncertainties about the future structure of the Department arising from the Review of Rural Delivery and the Independent Review of Public Sector Relocation it is not possible to make accurate estimates of projected energy use in future years.

A number of measures are in place to reduce energy usage. From 1 November, all new contracts by central government department must meet minimum energy efficiency standards as well as value for money, when purchasing certain types of product. Types of products that must meet energy efficiency criteria include IT equipment, gas boilers, white goods (e.g. fridges and washing machines), televisions, lighting systems and light-bulbs.

All but the smallest Defra sites work to reducing energy below a site-specific benchmark. Energy audits are regularly commissioned for those above benchmark and remedial action is taken as necessary, On-going energy efficiency awareness campaigns seek co-operation from staff in economy of use.

In addition, new targets for energy use on the Government Estate are being developed under the Framework for Sustainable Development on the Government Estate. Targets will be based on current Government policy on energy use and Will be published before the end of the year.

Notes:

[1] All data for fossil/heating energy is weather corrected to the 1990–91 20 year degree day average This is for consistency sincere old campaign was weather corrected to the 1990–91 20 year average and the new campaign to the 1999–00 20 year average. This explains any differences between these figures and those published in the new campaign.

[2] The Cabinet Office had four agencies transferred out of its control between 1999–2000 and 2000–01

[3] The Cabinet Office had nine Regional Government Offices transferred to its estate between 2000–01 and 2001–02

[4] Previously the Lord Chancellor's Department

[5] The Department for Culture, Media and Sport have inconsistencies in their data for 2000–01 and so 2001–02 was used as their base year for the new campaign. This explains why their figures are the same for 1999–2000 to 2001–02 These inconsistencies also mean it is not meaningful to compare 2001–02 with data prior to 1999–2000

[6] DFES use some heat that is produced by a CCL exempt source. This has been included with the fossil fuel

[7] Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs energy performances for the Main Estate and Laboratories in 2001–02 include consumptions from the additional buildings and longer worked hours by staff dealing with the foot and mouth emergency The Main Estate also reflected additional fully air-conditioned buildings as part of a new Agency in DEFRA.

[6] The Department for International Development moved offices during 2001–02, therefore their floor area for this year has been calculated based on the proportion of the year they were in each office
[9] The Department for Trade and Industry had 3 Regional Government Offices transferred out of their estate in 2001–02
[10] The Department for Transport, Local Government and the Regions previously known as Department for the environment, Transport and the Regions.
[11] The Department for Transport, Local Government and the Regions had six Regional Government Offices transferred out of their estate in 2001–02
[12] The Department for Work and Pensions is the result of an amalgamation of the Department of Social Security and Employment Services which occurred in full in April 2002. Therefore previous separate returns for the two departments have been added together to allow comparison.
[13] The Foreign and Commonwealth Office returns for 2000–01 include their Wilton Park executive agency for the first time. This accounts for approximately 4 per cent. of the increase.
[14] In 2000–01 the Foreign and Commonwealth Office brought back into use the Old Admiralty Building, progressively relocating staff from 8 Cleveland Row, Cromwell House, 1 Palace Street and 20 Victoria Street. It retained reporting responsibilities for the vacated buildings until March 2001.
[15] It was not possible to report consistently on a small proportion of prisons throughout the three years This was mainly due to missing or incomplete data on those specific prisons.
[16] Inland Revenue 1999–2000 data was fell to be too inconsistent to be used in the comparison, therefore 2000–01 has been used in its place.
[17] The Army included energy consumption from overseas bases other than Germany for the first time in 2001–02; therefore this is entered separately
[18] For the new campaign the financial year 2001–02 is the baseline for the Army and this figure has been applied retrospectively to 1999–2000 and 2000–01 but with energy consumption from 2 sites of the Joint Helicopter Command (Odiham and Benson) removed from the 1999–2000 and 2000–01. This therefore takes into account the fact that these two sites were transferred from the RAF to the Army in April 2001.
Actual figures for these two sites have been used since they were recorded by the RAF prior to their transfer, hence the Army retrospective figure is not the same across these three years.
[19] The Civil estate of the MOD figures do not include the London offices, with the exception of 3–5 Scotland Yard This is due to difficulties in obtaining the data as these buildings are run under PFI contracts.
[20] The civil estate of the MOD have not been able to provide figures prior to 2001–02, therefore this is being used in previous years to allow comparisons 1997–98 and 1998–99 have been entered using figures from the last year the Civil estate completed a return
[21] Defence Logistics Organisation were not in existence prior to 2000–01, therefore the figures for 2000–01 have been used in 1999–2000 to allow comparison
[22] In July 2001 the Defence Research Agency was split into DSTL and a private company, QinetiQ Therefore since July 2001 consumption in buildings used by QinetiQ have not been included
[23] The RAF have made significant savings in 2001–02 in part due to the transfer of two Joint Helicopter Command sites (Odiham and Benson) to the Army in April 2001

Environmental Targets

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what targets the Government have set for (a) energy efficiency in the UK, (b) waste minimisation, (c) marine pollution, (d) air quality, (e) climate change, (f) renewable energy, (g) fly-tipping, (h) packaging, (i) end of life vehicles, (j) the disposal of hazardous waste, (k) incineration, (l) recycling, (m) water quality, (n) coastal erosion, (o) fuel poverty, (p) flood defence, (q) wind power use, (r) domestic waste management, (s) industrial waste management, (t) landfill, (u) greenhouse gas emissions and (v) timber procurement. [133258]

Mr. Morley: Government's targets and goals include the following:

On climate change, greenhouse gas emissions, and energy efficiency (e, u, a), the UK Climate Change Programme is designed to deliver our Kyoto Protocol target to reduce greenhouse gas emissions to 12.5 per cent. below 1990 levels by 2008–12, as well as set us on a path towards our domestic goal of a 20 per cent. reduction in carbon emissions by 2010. The Government stated in the Energy White Paper our expectation for more than half the emissions reductions in the Programme to come from energy efficiency. In the White Paper, the Government also accepted the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution's recommendation that the UK should put itself on a path towards a reduction in carbon dioxide emissions of some 60 per cent. from current levels by about 2050.

For renewable energy and wind power use (f, q) the Government's aim is that by 2010, 10 per cent. of the UK's electricity should be supplied from renewable sources and our aspiration is that by 2020, to double renewables' share of electricity from our 2010 target. There are currently no specific targets for particular forms of renewable energy such as wind power.

On fuel poverty (o) the goal of the Government and Devolved Administrations is the eradication of fuel poverty as far as reasonably practicable by 2016–18, and in England and Wales for vulnerable households by 2010. In addition, in England we have a target to reduce fuel poverty among vulnerable households by improving the energy efficiency of 600,000 homes between 2001 and 2004.

For domestic waste management, recycling and landfill (l, r, t) the targets are to recycle or compost 17 per cent. of household waste by 2003–04 and 25 per cent. by 2005–06 and, from the Landfill Directive, by 2010 to reduce biodegradable municipal waste landfilled to 75 per cent. of that produced in 1995; by 2013 to 50 per cent. and by 2020 to 35 per cent.

For waste minimisation and incineration (b, k) there are no set targets, but Government policy is to drive waste management up the waste hierarchy; this hierarchy has landfill at the bottom and minimisation at the top.

For packaging (h), current (2002 and 2003) targets are 59 per cent. for recovery and 19 per cent. for material-specific recycling. A consultation on targets for 2004–08 has just closed.

For the disposal of hazardous waste and industrial waste (j, s), the Waste Strategy 2000 set a target to reduce the amount of industrial and commercial waste sent to landfill to 85 per cent. of the 1998 level by 2005. This target includes hazardous waste.

On end of life vehicles, the End of Life Vehicles Directive has not yet entered into force in the UK. The main targets will be 85 per cent. of all ELVs reused or recovered and 80 per cent. reused or recycled by January 2006, rising to 95 per cent. reused or recovered and 85 per cent. reused or recycled in 2015.

There are currently no targets for fly-tipping (g).

For air quality (d), the Air Quality Strategy sets targets for carbon monoxide, lead, nitrogen dioxide, particles, sulphur dioxide, benzene and 1,3-butadiene.

For water quality (m), the Government has targets that at least 91 per cent. of English rivers achieve their river quality targets by 2005; and that at least 97 per cent. of bathing waters in England meet the mandatory coliform standards in the 2005 bathing season.

For marine pollution (c), the targets for reducing and eliminating marine pollution are generally those set out in the strategies on hazardous substances, radioactive substances and eutrophication agreed in the OSPAR Convention for the Protection of the Marine Environment of the North East Atlantic and relevant EC Directives.

For coastal erosion and flood defence (n, p), targets are to aim, by the encouragement of sustainable defence measures (including timely and effective flood warning systems), to have no loss of life through flooding; and by investing £397 million over the Spending Review period (2003–06), to reduce the risk of flooding to life, to major infrastructure, environment assets and to some 80,000 houses.

On timber procurement (v) the UK Government are committed to, seek to procure products made from timber that has been legally felled and grown in a forest or plantation managed to sustain biodiversity, productivity, vitality and to prevent harm to other ecosystems and indigenous or forest dependent people. Targets for sustainable public procurement will be published in early 2004 as part of the Framework for Sustainable Development on the Government Estate.

Farm Values

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what changes have taken place in the last three years in the value of (a) farmland and (b) farms and farm buildings. [134667]

Mr. Bradshaw: Estimates are available only for the value, in the UK, of farm land and farm buildings combined. Statistics are also available on the average price of sales of farm land in England. The following tables show the most recent available data for each, in current and real terms (1995 prices).

Fisheries

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will estimate the amounts of each fish species removed by fishing vessels other than those registered in the UK from each of the statistical fishing regions which fall within the UK's national waters, in each of the past five years. [133992]

Mr. Bradshaw: The information requested is available from data submitted by Member States and others to the European Commission on their landings offish from the ICES Divisions that surround the UK coast (Divisions IV, VI and VII), and a copy of results has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

GM Crops

Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs in relation to the farm scale evaluations of GM crops (a) which herbicides were used in the maize trials and whether these will continue to be legally available to farmers, (b) who was responsible for the independent measurement of maize yields and herbicide inputs and (c) whether comparisons between GM and non-GM maize yields were of crops using identical herbicide use. [134923]

Mr. Morley: All of the herbicides used in the GM crop farm-scale evaluations, both on the GM crops and the non-GM equivalents, are listed in full in the scientific papers published on 16 October 2003 (see Champion et al. 2003; "Crop management and agronomic context of the farm scale evaluations of genetically modified herbicide tolerant crops'"; Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society (B). 358 (1439): 1801–1818. A copy of this journal has been placed in the Library. Three herbicides used in the maize trials have been withdrawn as part of the EU review programme of pesticide active ingredients. The herbicides Atrazine and Simazine can be used for a further 18 months. Cyanazine can be used until the end of December 2003.

The independent research team carrying out the evaluations audited the herbicide use by the farmers and monitored growth stages of the crops to compare yields. They concluded that the trials were conducted fairly. This approach and conclusion was endorsed by the independent Scientific Steering Committee and again independently assessed and by the journal referees; see Champion et al. 2003 for more details.

Comparisons were not made using identical herbicide regimes as the purpose of the trials was specifically to assess the impact on wildlife of the different herbicide regimes used on the GM and non-GM crops.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will list (a) Government-commissioned research and inquiries, (b) peer-reviewed research undertaken by others, (c) non-peer-reviewed research undertaken by others and (d) other information or sources of data upon which her Department will draw in making its decisions on the licensing of GM crops; and if she will set out for each item of work commissioned by her Department the date on which it was (i) commissioned and (ii) placed or expected to be placed in the public domain. [135139]

Mr. Morley: An application for consent to grow a GM crop must be supported by a dossier of information about the particular GM crop, its properties and behaviour. In considering whether to license a particular Genetically Modified Organism for release in the UK my Department seeks the advice of the Government's statutory advisers on the release of GMOs—The Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE). In making advice ACRE will consider the application and any available relevant information on the implications of the proposed release. This will include relevant data or literature whether commissioned by the Government or by others, and whether peer reviewed or not peer reviewed.

Details of Government-commissioned GMO related research work are available on our website at www.defra.gov.uk/environment/gm/research. This includes details of completed projects and links to download or order any published reports. In addition to those projects listed on the website the following table shows other Defra funded research projects currently under way and indicates when they are expected to be published.

The volume of GMO related work published by others, either in peer-reviewed or non-peer reviewed publications, is vast and continually growing. The body of literature was recently reviewed by the GM Science Review Panel as part of the GM Dialogue, and their final report is available at www.gmsciencedebate.org.uk. This report has been made available to ACRE. In addition ACRE members are kept informed of any new publications as and when they appear.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when the Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission report on co-existence and liability of GM and non-GM seeds and crops will be published. [135141]

Mr. Morley: We expect this report to be published by the end of November.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions she has had with representatives of the organic farming and growing sectors on (a) co-existence with GM crops and (b) liability for cross-contamination of GM crops. [135142]

Mr. Morley: Defra Ministers and officials have had many discussions on GM crops with representatives of the organic sector. For example, the co-existence of GM and organic crops was considered at a meeting of the Organic Action Plan Group chaired by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary (Commons), on 17 September 2003, and I had a meeting on 29 October 2003 with several organic groups to hear their views on GM issues.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the weight she will give to the results of the GM Nation consultation exercise in making decisions on the future use of GM biotechnology. [135147]

Mr. Morley: GM biotechnology has a wide range of current and potential applications, for example, in the areas of health care, medicines, genomics, animal and plant health, food and agriculture. The results of the GM Nation? exercise will help to inform us in making policy decisions in these areas.

Magnox Power Stations

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when she will announce her decision on the Environment Agency's proposed decision on the Magnox power stations; and whether the continued operation of the Magnox stations is justified in accordance with the requirements of European law (Article 6 of Council Directive 96/29/Euratom). [134265]

Mr. Morley: An announcement will be made as soon as possible.

GM Inspectorate

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many persons are employed in the GM Inspectorate in terms of (a) individuals and (b) whole-time equivalents; what the figures were in each of the last five years; what the total staff cost was in each of those years; what their functions were; and what assessment she has made of the achievements of the staff of the Inspectorate. [132456]

Mr. Morley: The Defra GM Inspectorate comprises inspectors based at the Central Science Laboratory and at the Health and Safety Executive (HSE). Prior to 2000 all the work was carried out by HSE inspectors. Details of staff numbers and costs for the last five years are in the table.

	HSE			CSL
	Staff	Whole-time equivalents (staff years)	Costs (£)	Staff	Whole-time equivalents (staff years)	Costs (£)
1998–99	4	0.7	105,000	N/A	N/A	N/A
1999–00	4	1.1	76,434	N/A	N/A	N/A
2000–01	5	0.35	52,000	5	0.97	95,116
2001–02	5	0.2	21,600	5	3.10	222,490
2002–03	6	0.3	33,670	5	2.04	237,849
2003–04	5	0.76	—	4	3.71	—

The functions of the GM Inspectorate at CSL are primarily to monitor compliance in England and Wales with consents issued under Directive 2001/18 on the deliberate release of genetically modified organisms (GMOs) both for placing on the market of GMOs as or in products (Part C) and for any other purpose (Part B) and to ensure that the provisions of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and related legislation are adhered to. The Inspectorate also conducts research to underpin its forensic work, and maintains links with inspectors elsewhere in the UK and throughout the EU.

The Inspectorate at HSE reports on the environmental aspects of contained uses of GMOs (other than GM micro-organisms) in England, Scotland and Wales, under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and related legislation and monitors compliance with consents issued under Part B of Directive 2001/18 for clinical trials of GMOs.

The number of inspectors deployed reflects the numbers of consents and releases to be monitored, this varies from year to year. For example there are currently no GM crop trials taking place but there were over 120 crop trials in 2002.

The Inspectorates' performance is regularly monitored. A measure of their achievement is that there has been no evidence of harm to the environment from GM crop releases or from GMOs kept under contained use conditions. The Inspectorate at CSL publishes an annual report.

Noise Nuisance

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will bring forward proposals to amend the statutory noise nuisance provisions of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to include excessive noise from cars driven off road on public open spaces. [134394]

Mr. Bradshaw: The Government see no need to amend the existing provisions under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 which could be used to abate excessive noise from cars driven off road on public open spaces. Police lead on this issue as they have a wide range of relevant powers, and unlike local authority officers, are able to pursue offenders across ground.

From 1 January 2003 the police have new powers under sections 59 and 60 of the Police Reform Act 2002 to seize vehicles, which are being driven in a careless and inconsiderate manner, and in a way which causes alarm, distress or annoyance.

Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when she expects to receive the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee's Annual Report. [134074]

Mr. Morley: The Annual Report of the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee for 2002–03 is likely to be submitted formally to the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, and to her Ministerial colleagues in the Devolved Administrations for Scotland and for Wales, in the latter part of November. It will be made public at the same time.

Regional Producers Ltd. (Wiltshire)

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what Government support has been given in the last three years to Regional Producers Ltd. (Wiltshire); and what recent discussions she has held with Regional Producers Ltd. (Wiltshire) about their future viability. [133059]

Mr. Bradshaw: Regional Producers Ltd. (Wiltshire) was set up using funding from Business Link for Berkshire and Wiltshire and the South West of England Regional Development Agency. The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has had no discussions with Regional Producers Ltd. (Wiltshire) about their viability.

Renewable Energy

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what proportion of biofuel sold in the United Kingdom was recycled cooking oil in the last year for which figures are available. [134376]

Mr. Bradshaw: Currently, half of the two million litres of biodiesel sold each month in the UK comes from recycled vegetable oil. The remainder is imported and is manufactured from virgin rape seed oil.

Rural Affairs Forum

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many speakers from the private sector will address the Rural Affairs Forum's Conference on Rural Regeneration. [135592]

Alun Michael: The purpose of the Rural Affairs Conference is to enable people from every sector of rural interest to engage in a wide-ranging discussion of issues affecting rural communities and to advise the Government. The value of the Conference will derive largely from the discussion and debate among a number of people including Ministers and those with academic, business and public sector expertise. Professor Peter Midmore will offer his perspective on the changing countryside in the 21st century, while breakout groups will involve business representatives and will be led by people including a representative of the Country, Land and Business Association and representative from Co-operatives UK.

Stamp Duty Land Tax

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the impact of increases in stamp duty land tax on her policy for rural economic regeneration and diversification; and if she will make a statement. [135610]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

The Government has introduced disadvantaged areas relief which provides an exemption from stamp duty land tax for transactions in non-residential land in Enterprise Areas, including some rural areas. This will provide a major boost to businesses investing in commercial premises, including agricultural premises, in those areas.

In addition the changes I announced on 20 October to the structure for charging Stamp Duty Land Tax on the rental element of new leases will assist small and medium-sized enterprises such as smaller farms.

Surface Water

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much was allocated (a) in England and (b) to Essex County Council for surface water alleviation schemes in each of the last five years for which figures are available; how much is allocated in each case in 2003–04; and how much she expects to allocate in each case in 2004–05. [135166]

Mr. Morley: Funding for surface water alleviation schemes comes from several different sources.

Funding for local authority surface water alleviation schemes falls wihtin the Environmental, Protective and Cultural Services part of the local government finance settlement. Environmental, Protective and Cultural Services covers a wide range of services totalling more than £10 billion each year. Within this budget, no specific allocation is made for surface water alleviation schemes, but the proportion attributed on average is very small.

Defra provides grant aid to the flood and coastal defence operating authorities—the Environment Agency, local authorities and (in areas with special drainage needs) internal drainage boards—to assist with their capital works and related projects and studies to manage the risk of flooding from watercourses and the sea. Grant paid to all authorities in England (in cash terms) is set out as follows. The figures in the table include items such as contributions to the Environment Agency for their work on flood warning including public awareness, catchment flood management plans and the new National Flood and Coastal Defence Database. They exclude supplementary credit approvals for local authorities and grant for projects to manage coastal erosion although significant flood risk benefits often arise from the latter.

	£ million
1998–99	35.0
1999–2000	34.8
2000–01	34.8
2001–02	57.9
2002–03	78.4
2003–04	80.0

For 2004–05 the total allocation is £137 million but the split between flood defence and coastal erosion is still being considered.

No grant has been paid to Essex County Council although substantial sums have been paid to the Environment Agency and district councils for projects in Essex.

Highways authorities and water companies also have responsibilities for some types of surface water alleviation schemes.

Coastal Defence

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many coastal defence projects using timber are under way; how much funding her Department has provided for these projects; and what measures have been taken to ensure that this timber is from sustainable sources. [134504]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 27 October 2003]: Defra does not collect information on the materials used by operating authorities in coastal defence projects and it would involve disproportionate cost to do so.

Defra's guidance to operating authorities on the use of resources is that care should always be taken to minimise any detrimental impacts on biodiversity and the wider environment. It is preferable to use resources that are abundant rather than those that are scarce, and to use those resources as efficiently as possible. In addition, where timber is used, Defra encourages operating authorities to obtain tropical and native timbers from certified and sustainable sources.

[illegible]er Procurement

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what form she plans the central point of expertise on Government timber procurement (CP[illegible]) will take; how it will function; and who will s[illegible] it. [134557]

Mr. Morley: Plans for a central point of expertise on timber (CPET) are not yet finalised. I will make a further statement when the key decisions have been taken.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what responses her Department received to its consultations on the establishment of a central point of expertise on Government timber procurement regarding what type of central point of expertise on timber procurement should be established; and how she plans to act on these recommendations. [134558]

Mr. Morley: The concept of a central point of expertise on timber (CPET) was one of the recommendations made by consultants ERM in their scoping study report published on 6 August 2002. That report was made in the light of consultations with stakeholders, primarily at a meeting on 25 March 2002. A second consultation meeting was held on 2 September 2002 and written comments were received from various interested parties too. A record of the two meetings can be viewed on the Tropical Forest Forum's website at http://www.forestforum.org.uk/tradeb.htm

The recommendation for a CPET, which was broadly agreed by the stakeholders, suggested that the service could be provided either by a suitably qualified civil servant or by a commissioned service contract to an appropriately qualified consultant. Stakeholders generally held the view that they should be involved in the key decisions taken by a CPET to ensure transparency and a degree of independence.

Early in 2003 Defra held discussions with potential service providers to discuss how a commissioned service could be set up, how it would operate and what key outputs it would be expected to deliver. Following those discussions Defra has been considering the options available to ensure that the CPET would provide best value for money given the resources available. I will make a further statement when the key decisions have been taken.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs pursuant to the answer of 1 September 2003, Official Report, column 860W, on timber, what progress has been made in the establishment of a central point of expertise on Government timber procurement (CPET); what funding has been allocated to the CPET; and when the CPET will be operational. [134577]

Mr. Morley: Since 1 September the Government have been reviewing options for establishing a central point of expertise on timber (CPET). Decisions on funding will be made when that review is completed and the CPET will be established as soon after that as possible.

CABINET OFFICE

Bechtel

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list the contracts for consultancy and other work carried out by Bechtel in each year since 1997, stating in each case (a) the nature of the work, (b) the value of the contract and (c) the duration of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [135902]

Mr. Alexander: The Cabinet Office and COI have had no contracts for consultancy and other work with Bechtel since 1997.

DEFENCE

Suez Medal

20. Laura Moffatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the time scale for awarding the Suez medal to veterans. [135563]

Mr. Caplin: I am delighted to be able to tell my hon. Friend that the first medals to eligible Suez veterans were presented on 27 October. Over 12,000 applications have been received so far. All medals will be issued as quickly as possible and it is anticipated that over 900 will have been despatched by the end of this week in time for them to be worn on Remembrance Sunday.

Ms Dari Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when Suez medals will be awarded to veterans. [135554]

Mr. Caplin: I am delighted to be able to tell my hon. Friend that the first medals to eligible Suez veterans were presented on 27 October. All medals will be issued as quickly as possible and it is anticipated that over 900 will have been despatched by the end of this week in time for them to be worn on Remembrance Sunday.

Sierra Leone

21. Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the role of his Department in Sierra Leone. [135564]

Mr. Ingram: The United Kingdom has played, and continues to play, a prominent role in helping to restore peace in Sierra Leone. We remain committed to help establish a peaceful and stable Sierra Leone which is no longer at risk from internal and external armed conflict. We are also working closely with the Government of Sierra Leone in support of their wider Security Sector Reform programme and in support of the UN mission; UNAMSIL.

Iraq

22. Ross Cranston: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current security situation in Iraq. [135565]

Mr. Hoon: Although recent attacks in Iraq have received wide coverage, we should not forget that much of the country is remarkably stable. The vast majority of attacks against the coalition are concentrated in a limited area in and to the North West of Baghdad. Coalition forces, under US leadership, are working hard to counter these threats and will not be deflected from that mission. Across the country, meanwhile, increasing numbers of Iraqi police are on patrol, reconstruction continues and normal civil activities are pursued without incident.

The situation in the British area of responsibility also remains generally calm, although vigilance is still required in the face of occasional incidents.

23. Tom Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the security situation in Iraq. [135566]

Mr. Hoon: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston).

24. Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Service personnel are deployed in Iraq. [135567]

Mr. Hoon: There are currently around 11,000 UK Service personnel serving in Iraq.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the total cost is of munitions used by the armed forces in Iraq over the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [135379]

Mr. Ingram: The total cost of operations in Iraq during financial year 2002–03 has been published in the Departmental Resource Accounts for that year. The detailed costs of munitions consumed over the latter part of the last 12 months are still being calculated and I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent assessment he has made of the morale of United Kingdom personnel serving with Headquarters, Combined Joint Task Force, in Baghdad. [130332]

Mr. Ingram: All Commanders constantly monitor morale as part of their duties. Within the Combined Joint Task Force-7 Headquarters in Baghdad, morale is assessed to be good.

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what secure rest and relaxation facilities are available to off-duty United Kingdom military personnel in Baghdad. [130331]

Mr. Ingram: Servicemen in Baghdad are never off-duty, but the Baghdad Support Unit has been specifically set up to provide the support needed by all British Forces in Baghdad. Given the operational circumstances, all personnel are relatively comfortably accommodated. All United Kingdom staff have access to elements of the Operational Welfare Package including internet, welfare phones, radio, TV and sports equipment. Rest and Relaxation (R&R) is taken out of theatre, in either the UK or Germany.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps are being taken to reduce the risk to coalition troops of attacks by former Ba'athist elements and other terrorist groups in Iraq. [132133]

Mr. Ingram: Force Protection is one of the highest priorities for United Kingdom Forces. Commanders on the ground employ appropriate Force Protection measures in accordance with threat assessments. The security situation is under constant review and Commanders adapt protection measures to reflect different circumstances. Coalition partners are responsible for the provision of their own force protection.

Astute Class Submarines

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the construction of the (a) second and (b) third units of the Astute Class. [134955]

Mr. Ingram: Construction of the second and third Astute Class submarines is proceeding in accordance with the agreed programme.

The keel of the second submarine, HMS Ambush, was laid on 22 October 2003 by the Minister for Defence Procurement, at BAE Systems' shipyard at Barrow-in-Furness. Construction is progressing well and we are confident that the same high levels of fabrication quality seen on HMS Astute will be achieved on HMS Ambush.

Construction of the third boat in the Class, HMS Artful, is underway, with the manufacture of hull rings and bulkheads progressing satisfactorily.

C130 Aircraft

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what have been the (a) highest and (b) lowest monitored mission readiness rates for RAF C130 aircraft of each type in the past three years. [134484]

Mr. Ingram: The required Readiness States for C130 Force Elements in each of the last three years have been met.

As monitored mission readiness rates is not a term with a precise military definition, I have interpreted this as serviceability rates, figures for which arebased on a snapshot of serviceability taken at 8:00 am each day. For the C-130J, these figures start from May 2002, when all aircraft had entered service; for the C-130K, they start from November 2001, as prior to this time a number of aircraft were out of service but awaiting return to Lockheed Martin.

	Highest serviceability rate (percentage)	Lowest serviceability rate (percentage)
C-130J	69	46
C-130K	76	37

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what problems have been experienced with the engines of the RAF's C130J aircraft; and if he will make a statement. [134485]

Mr. Ingram: The Hercules C-130J aircraft is powered by the Rolls-Royce Allison turbo prop engine. Some problems with the engine turbine blades have been identified when the engine is operated at maximum continuous power for long periods. Work is continuing with Lockheed Martin and Rolls-Royce to identify a solution.

Chartered Airlines

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which airlines have been chartered to fly British forces personnel to deployments in each of the past three years. [134460]

Mr. Ingram: During the past three financial years and during the current financial year to date, British Forces personnel have been deployed on aircraft chartered from the airlines set out below:

Civilian Rescues

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many civilians in non-war situations have been rescued or aided by the British armed forces (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) elsewhere in each of the last five years; and what the total cost to public funds was; [129609]

(2) what plans he has to recover all or any of the cost of civilian rescues by the armed forces in non-war situations from (a) those rescued and (b) other third parties. [129610]

Mr. Ingram: The armed forces can rescue or aid civilians in a very wide range of circumstances, both at home and overseas.

With the exception of the RAF and Royal Navy's Search and Rescue (SAR) effort, information on the numbers of civilians rescued by the armed forces—for example during land-based peace keeping operations, or routine deployments by RN ships at sea—is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Although the military SAR teams' primary purpose is to recover aircrew from crashed military aircraft, over 90 per cent. of callouts each year are to civilian incidents. RAF and Royal Navy SAR units make an essential contribution to the search and rescue effort around the UK, forming part of the national UK SAR coverage throughout the year for air, land and maritime operations.

The following table gives the number of civilians assisted by Armed Forces Search and Rescue Units in the UK and abroad.

Civilians assisted by Armed Forces Search and Rescue Units

	1998	1999	2000	2001	2002

[1] RCC—Rescue Co-ordination Centre

MOD policy on charging is based on Chapter 23 of "Government Accounting" (GA). Goods and services provided to the department or other agency or authority having policy and therefore financial responsibility should be charged for unless there are exceptional circumstances.

In 2001 MOD simplified its charging regime in the UK for MACC assistance, allowing emergency assistance to be given free where there is a danger to life (rather than only "immediate" danger which applied previously), and at full cost once the danger has passed. Emergency MACC is a rapid response by the Services to sudden disaster. Search and rescue tasks in support of the UK Ambulance Authorities for Medevac transfers, attract a charge at the "no-loss cost" rate, that is levied by the MOD to recover its out of pocket expenses. The basis for other charges for search and rescue tasks is currently under review.

It is not possible to provide detailed information on the costs charged for Military Aid to the Civil Community (MACC). Costs of individual operations are by and large reimbursed direct to the budgets which incurred the costs.

Courts Martial (Scotland)

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the court martial trials conducted in Scotland since 1997; how many of these concluded in conviction of the accused; how many were dismissed; and if he will make a statement. [135201]

Mr. Caplin: The number of Service personnel tried by Courts-Martial held in Scotland since 1997 together with the number of convictions, acquittals and subsequent dismissals from the armed forces are as follows:

	Service personnel tried	Convictions	Subsequent dismissal	Acquittals
1997[1]	17	17	3	0
1998	22	17	6	5
1999	21	18	7	3
2000	14	11	2	3

[1] RAF figures cover the period 1 April to 31 December 1997.

These figures do not indicate the number of offences committed in Scotland. The majority of cases are heard in permanent court centres, of which there is none in Scotland.

Cyprus

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his (a) policy is and (b) procedures are in place for British (i) forces personnel and (ii) employees from the Sovereign base areas visiting the occupied areas of Cyprus. [135012]

Mr. Ingram: British Forces Cyprus Service Personnel, UK Based Civilians, authorised UK Officials and their dependants and specified close relatives are permitted to visit Northern Cyprus. Such personnel either cross as tourists or on passes arranged by the British High Commission. The procedures for issuing passes remain under review in the light of on-going political developments affecting the island.

Defence Spending

Kevin Brennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of defence spending per capita in each of the home countries of the United Kingdom in 2003–04. [135559]

Mr. Ingram: The Defence Aim is to deliver security for the people of the United Kingdom and the Overseas Territories by defending them, including against terrorism; and to act as a force for good by strengthening international peace and stability. We do this by providing a world-class national capability—not a specifically regional one. No estimate of the nature suggested has therefore been made.

Separated Service

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the frequency of detached duties for (a) medical staff, (b) RAF regiment personnel and (c) catering staff. [133156]

Mr. Ingram: The Naval Service has introduced a maximum limit for separated service for junior rates of 660 days in a rolling three-year period, and to date, no-one has exceeded this limit. While Royal Navy medics and chefs are examples of current shortage categories and some personnel are stretched, the aim is that this will be balanced out over a three-year period.

The Army introduced Separated Service recording in December 2002, but will not have sufficiently mature information for release until mid-2004, by when there will have been a minimum of 12 months data for analysis. Information on the frequency of detached duties for medical staff is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. For catering staff, chefs are embedded in every deployable Army unit and again specific details on individuals are not held centrally.

The RAF introduced a Separated Service (SS) recording system on 1 April 1997 to monitor the amount of time personnel spend on detached duty. The levels of Separated Service[1] for operational reasons, from September 2002 to August 2003 for medical staff, RAF regiment personnel and catering staff were as follows:

[1] An incidence of Separated Service is recorded when an individual is absent from their parent unit for three nights or more.

	Branch/trade[1]
	Medical	RAF regiment	Catering
Less than 90 days

European Rapid Reaction Force

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with his EU counterparts on the European Rapid Reaction Force; and if he will make a statement. [135457]

Mr. Hoon: There is no European Army or standing European Rapid Reaction Force nor any EU agreement to create one. Forces are offered by EU Member states for EU crisis management operations on a voluntary, case-by-case basis. This is no different from the arrangements for NATO crisis management operations. Member states have, however, set themselves a Headline Goal to be able to deploy within 60 days, and sustain for at least one year, some 50–60,000 personnel on crisis management operations including smaller rapid response elements available and deployable at very high readiness. I discussed the improvement of European military capabilities, in particular the creation of a European Defence Agency for capability development, with my EU counterparts at the Informal meeting of EU Defence Ministers in Rome on 3–4 October.

Hawk 128

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the capability the Hawk 128 Advanced Jet Trainer will give the RAF to train pilots for the (a) Eurofighter Typhoon and (b) Joint Strike Fighter. [135547]The

Mr. Ingram: The Hawk 128 will provide RAF and Royal Navy pilots with a modern and highly capable training aircraft. This will ensure our future pilots are capable of meeting the demands of the next generation of highly capable frontline aircraft, such as Typhoon and Joint Strike Fighter.

HMS Cambeltown

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when his Department (a) will publish the report into HMS Cambeltown running aground in 2001 and (b) expects to announce the costs of (i) recovery and (ii) repair; and if he will make a statement. [134957]

Mr. Ingram: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Infantry Battalions

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has (a) to disband and (b) to amalgamate Army infantry battalions. [133488]

Mr. Ingram: There is a continuing need to assess force structures in order to ensure that we have the balanced, flexible forces needed to meet the full range of operational contingencies. However, there are currently no plans to disband or amalgamate Army infantry battalions, nor are there plans to reduce the current overall strength of the Army. The White Paper to be published later this year will provide an updated statement of defence policy.

JTIDS Capability

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which aircraft are fielded with joint tactical information and distribution system capability; what other types of aircraft will receive JTIDS capability; and when it will be installed in each type. [134462]

Mr. Ingram: The Joint Tactical Information and Distribution System (JTIDS) is operational on the following types of UK aircraft: Sentry E-3D, Tornado F3, Nimrod R, VC10 and Tristar Tanker aircraft and Sea King AEW. It is also being fitted on Typhoon, Nimrod MRA4 and Sentinel R Mkl. Installation is planned on Future Strategic Tanker Aircraft in 2005, Tornado GR4 and Harrier GR9 in 2006, A400M in 2007 and Joint Combat Aircraft in 2010. These dates can be up to two years before in service date to allow for integration and acceptance. Other future aircraft types are also expected to be fitted with this capability.

Low Flying

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many complaints he has received of low flying by RAF fast jets in each year since 2000. [135410]

Mr. Caplin: The number of complaints received by the Ministry of Defence Lower Airspace Complaints and Enquiries Unit for low flying by RAF fast jets over the last four calendar years was as follows:

	Number of complaints
2000	2,699
2001	2,612
2002	3,009
2003	[1]2,735

[1] Up to end September.

Mutual Defence Agreement

Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the joint working groups since 1997 conducted under the auspices of the 1958 Mutual Defence Agreement. [134906]

Mr. Caplin: Joint Working Groups conducted since 1997 under the auspices of the 1958 Mutual Defence Agreement have exchanged technical information on the following subjects:

Radiation Simulation and Kinetic Effects Technology
Energetic Materials
Nuclear Materials
Warhead Electrical Components and Technologies
Non-nuclear Materials
Nuclear Counter Terrorism Technology
Facilities
Nuclear Weapons Engineering
Nuclear Warhead Physics
Computational Technology
Aircraft, Missile and Space System Hardening Laboratory Plasma Physics
Manufacturing Practices
Nuclear Warhead Accident Response Technology
Nuclear Weapon Code Development
Nuclear Weapon Environment and Damage Effects
Methodologies for Nuclear Weapon Safety Assurance

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his Department's assessment is of the implications for the long-term future effectiveness of the United Kingdom's nuclear weapons of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty. [133722]

Mr. Hoon: As was made clear in the Strategic Defence Review, Supporting Essay Five, Chapter 14, we will, for as long as Britain has nuclear forces, ensure that we have a robust capability at the Atomic Weapons Establishment to underwrite the safety and reliability of our nuclear warheads, without recourse to nuclear weapon test explosions or any other nuclear explosion. This approach is consistent with our continued support for the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty.

Piracy

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the contribution that his Department is making to tackling piracy on the high seas. [134954]

Mr. Ingram: The Ministry of Defence acts in concert with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Department for Transport in seeking to tackle both piracy on the high seas, and maritime armed crime, which takes place in states' territorial waters. The Defence Intelligence Staff is actively engaged with national and international defence intelligence and maritime security communities, as well as commercial shipping and other organisations, to promote wider awareness, understanding, and co-operation in dealing with this growing world wide problem. The Defence Intelligence Staff also produces reports and analyses, including the "Worldwide Threat To Shipping", published on the World Wide Web at http://www.rnreference.mod.uk.

In addition, under international law, the Royal Navy, like all other navies, is obliged to render assistance to other mariners. The RN deploys ships worldwide on a range of tasks, and in the event that a RN ship encounters a clearly defined case of piracy on the high seas, RN policy is to counter the incident and arrest those responsible in accordance with the appropriate rules of engagement. Commanding Officers on all RN ships are given guidance on the threat, and on recommended courses of action. Responses to individual incidents of maritime armed crime in territorial waters are a matter for the State which holds jurisdiction.

Private Alison Croft

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the principal recommendations of the Board of Inquiry Report on the death of Private Alison Croft at Dalton Barracks in Abingdon, Oxfordshire, on 28 September 2002 were; when the Board was convened; when it was completed; and for how many hours it sat. [132190]

Mr. Ingram: The Board of Inquiry will not be convened until the Oxfordshire Coroner's inquest has ruled.

Private William Graham

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the rank and regiment of officers provided legal representation for Private William Graham following the fatal shooting of Private Anthony Green. [132196]

Mr. Ingram: A civilian lawyer provided legal representation.

Procurement

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) on which occasions since 1997 procurement decisions have been taken on the basis of criteria other than value for money; and if he will make a statement; [134132]

(2) what studies have been commissioned by the Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Equipment Capability) on the value for money of domestic procurement; and if he will make a statement. [134133]

Mr. Ingram: Information derived from all individual procurement decisions taken throughout the Department, of which there are many thousands each year, is not held centrally and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

However, value for money is a fundamental factor in all our procurement decisions . In assessing value for money we take account of the long term implications of decisions, including their industrial and wider economic impact. As set out in the Government's Defence Industrial Policy we seek to maximise the economic benefit to the UK from our defence expenditure, a healthy and globally competitive defence industry and the development of a high value technologically-skilled industrial base, consistent with the Governments wider manufacturing strategy.

QinetiQ

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans QinetiQ has for its future operations at Defford in Worcestershire. [135466]

Mr. Caplin [holding answer 30 October 2003]: The Ministry of Defence retains a business interest in the Defford site and is discussing the future of the facilities there with QinetiQ.

Saudi Arabia

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the (a) role and (b) activities of his Department's Saudi Arabian project office. [132896]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 20 October 2003]: The Director General of the Saudi Armed Forces Project (DGSAP) and his staff are responsible for fulfilling the Ministry of Defence's obligations under Government-to-Government arrangements with Saudi Arabia covering the supply of military aircraft, naval vessels, weapons and associated support services, commonly known as the Al Yamamah Programme (AY). In this role, DGSAP officials are involved in the negotiation of the AY contracts, the monitoring of the programme, prime contractor performance in respect of the delivery of goods and services to the Saudi Armed Forces, and, when satisfied, the endorsement of claims made in accordance with the terms of the AY contracts for payment by the Saudi Government. In pursuit of these activities DGSAP staff are based both in the United Kingdom and Saudi Arabia.

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what reports he received regarding improper practices in relation to BAE Systems' (a) operations in, and (b) contracts with, Saudi Arabia; and if he will make a statement; [133098]

(2) what discussions he had with the Serious Fraud Office in relation to BAE Systems' (a) operations in, and (b) contracts with, Saudi Arabia; and if he will make a statement; [133099]

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) when the Permanent Secretary or other officials (a) first received and (b) first read the papers sent by the Serious Fraud Office on 8 March 2001 in respect of allegations against British Aerospace/BAE Systems and Robert Lee International; [132916]

(2) whether the contents of the papers sent by the Serious Fraud Office to the Permanent Secretary on 8 March 2001 in respect of allegations against British Aerospace/BAE Systems and Robert Lee International were communicated in any way to the then Secretary of State or his successor; [132917]

(3) what investigations took place within his Department into the contents of the papers sent by the Serious Fraud Office to the Permanent Secretary on 8 March 2001 in respect of allegations against British Aerospace/BAE Systems and Robert Lee International; [132918]

(4) how many times (a) the Secretary of State, (b) his predecessors, (c) the Permanent Secretary and (d) other Ministry of Defence officials have met representatives of British Aerospace/BAE Systems to discuss issues relating to Saudi Arabia since May 1997. [132919]

Mr. Ingram: The Serious Fraud Office (SFO) wrote to the Permanent Secretary of the Ministry of Defence in March 2001 about allegations of fraud in connection with a sub-contractor to BAE Systems. The SFO informed the Permanent Secretary that there was insufficient evidence to support a criminal investigation of the fraud allegations, but wished to bring it to his attention in case Government money might be involved. The Permanent Secretary established that the allegations were not of direct relevance to the Ministry of Defence, as they related to the role of a sub-contractor (Robert Lee International) to BAE Systems, and Government money had not been involved. Having been informed, however, that the Chairman of BAE Systems was already aware of this matter, the Permanent Secretary raised it with the Chairman, in the context of the Government's robust anti-fraud policy, for any further inquiries he deemed appropriate.

Since the allegations of fraud were not a matter for the Ministry of Defence, it was not considered necessary to bring them to the attention of the Secretary of State. Ministers and officials at the Ministry of Defence have discussed issues related to Saudi Arabia with representatives of BAE Systems on numerous occasions since 1997.

Service Accommodation

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with (a) the Defence Housing Executive and (b) Defence Estates concerning the future of the married quarters estate. [133377]

Mr. Caplin: I have had discussions with the Chief Executives of both agencies on a range of topics. These have included the married quarters estate.

Shoeburyness Firing Range

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the new range in Shoeburyness. [134094]

Mr. Caplin: The Shoeburyness ranges are included in the Long Term Partnering Agreement that has been negotiated with QinetiQ for the delivery of a long-term test and evaluation capability to the Ministry of Defence. This agreement came into effect on 1 April 2003.

Trafalgar Class Submarines

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Trafalgar Class submarines are available for operational tasking. [134463]

Mr. Ingram: There are four Trafalgar Class submarines available for operational tasking:

HMS Turbulent, HMS Tireless, HMS Torbay, HMS Triumph.

Type 45s

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what delays there have been to the Type 45 programme; and what the in-service date is for the first of the class. [135393]

Mr. Ingram: The currently approved in-service date (ISD) is November 2007 but this has always been challenging. Full production of the first of class started a few months behind the original schedule and the programme is currently under review. Any change will be announced when that work is complete, later this year.

Weapons of Mass Destruction

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his Department's assessment is of the threat to the United Kingdom and its interests from ballistic missiles in the aftermath of the Iraq war; and if he will make a statement. [133720]

Mr. Hoon: I refer the hon. Member to the Ministry of Defence paper, "Missile Defence, a Public Discussion Paper", which was published in December 2002. A copy is available in the Library of the House. It is also available at: www.mod.uk

Since that assessment was published, coalition operations in Iraq have successfully removed the threat of ballistic missiles that were held by, or under development by, the former Iraqi regime.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Antisocial Behaviour

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department will take to encourage social landlords to take more enforcement measures against anti-social tenants; and what assessment he has made of the implications for the Anti-Social Behaviour Action Plan of the awarding of costs against the housing association in the case THCH v. Mr. Joseph Loomes. [134580]

Keith Hill: I have been asked to reply.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is extending the range of tools that social landlords can use to tackle anti-social behaviour. These include broadening the range of landlords who can take out injunctions against tenants who behave in an anti-social manner, introducing a power for social landlords to demote secure and assured tenants to a less favourable form of tenancy, and generally ensuring that the responses to anti-social behaviour are appropriately focused on the needs of the community. In addition, social landlords will be required to prepare and publish policies and procedures in relation to anti-social behaviour, which will be available to tenants and other residents.

It is the responsibility of social landlords to ensure that they use the appropriate enforcement measure to address the variety of anti-social behaviour cases that may arise. However, the general purpose of the measures in the Anti-social Behaviour Bill is to encourage and facilitate social landlords taking a more active approach in their dealings with anti-social behaviour.

The definition of anti-social behaviour used in Part 2 of the Anti-social Behaviour Bill refers to conduct which is capable of causing nuisance or annoyance rather than behaviour which has actually caused nuisance or annoyance to named individuals. This makes it clear that landlords can use evidence from people other than the direct victims of the behaviour in proceedings for injunctions or demotion orders. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister hopes that this will encourage more social landlords to be proactive in their management of such behaviour, for example by using professional witnesses in situations where individual victims are too scared or intimidated to give evidence.

Regarding the specific case mentioned, it does not have any significant implications for the Anti-social Behaviour Action Plan, as the judgment is specific to that case. However, the broadening of injunctive powers included within the Anti-social Behaviour Bill mentioned earlier should make it easier for registered social landlords, including Tower Hamlets Community Homes, to undertake successful court action.

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from (a) the Durham constabulary, (b) the Local Government Association and (c) other interested parties concerning problems in obtaining anti-social behaviour orders. [134650]

Ms Blears: I am not aware that any representations from Durham constabulary regarding problems with Anti-Social Behaviour Orders (ASBOs) have been received. We work closely with the Local Government Association and other interested parties concerning ASBOs.

Legislative changes were introduced by the Police Reform Act 2002 to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of ASBOs in response to problems identified by the Home Office review of ASBOs published in April 2002. These changes were accompanied by Home Office guidance on both ASBOs and Acceptable Behaviour Contracts (ABCs) which was distributed to local authorities and police in November 2002.

The Anti-social Behaviour Bill builds on these improvements. The ASBO measures respond to the experiences of relevant authorities and the needs of witnesses and victims and are intended to close loopholes, making ASBOs more easily obtainable for all cases where they would be appropriate.

The Home Office is also setting up an action line, website and training academy which will provide support for agencies to enable them to use the full range of interventions for tackling anti-social behaviour.

Child Abuse

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Government will adopt the recommendation of the Home Affairs Committee that the statutory reporting restrictions, which preserve the anonymity of victims of sexual offences, are extended to persons accused of historical child abuse. [128358]

Paul Goggins: The Government believes that there should be no change in the law relating to anonymity. In our view, informed and strengthened guidance to the police and the media is preferable to any change in legislation. The Police Code of Conduct provides that information which comes into the possession of the police should be treated as confidential. It should not be used for personal benefit and neither should it be divulged to other parties except in the proper course of police duty. Unauthorised disclosure of information on a suspect by a police officer is likely to be considered a breach of this Code. Such a breach would mean that an officer's conduct had not met the appropriate standard for the purposes of the Police (Conduct) Regulations, and disciplinary proceedings might commence. An officer could face dismissal or even prosecution, depending on the circumstances of the case.

We have reached an agreement with the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) that it will amend its media and disciplinary guidelines to all forces to give greater prominence to the rules that govern the release of information about anyone suspected of, but not yet charged with, an offence. We are working to ensure that the guidelines are consistently and robustly enforced. Similarly, Ministers are in discussion with media representatives to assess how unhelpful or intrusive reporting of such cases can be avoided with a view to amending and strengthening the Press Complaints Commission's Code of Practice. Closed Circuit Television

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what funding is available to finance the introduction of CCTV cameras in (a) schools and (b) town centres; and if he will make a statement. [134595]

Ms Blears [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The Crime Reduction Programme Closed Circuit Television (CCTV) Initiative funded 684 CCTV schemes across England and Wales. The main areas covered by these schemes were town centres/shopping centres, car parks, residential areas, community shopping areas, hospitals, and rail stations.

Under the Small Retailers in Deprived Areas (SRDA) Initiative, £15 million was provided to improve security of small retailers, including the provision of CCTV where appropriate. In year one of the initiative (2001–02) approximately 50 per cent. of the projects involved the installation or upgrading of CCTV in either individual shop units or covering shopping parades or precincts. In year two (2002–03) it rose to almost 70 per cent. and in year three (2003–04) it is 63 per cent.

Both the CCTV and SRDA Initiatives are fully committed and drawing to a close. Future CCTV schemes can be financed through the Building Safer Communities (BSC) Fund, which is used to strategically tackle local crime reduction priorities through a number of interventions including CCTV. For 2003–04 the fund provided local Crime and Disorder Reduction Partnerships with £72.3million.

Section 5 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 requires the responsible authorities of the CDRP to work in co-operation with other bodies, including education, in completing a crime and disorder audit and strategy. This engagement should ensure access to funding if it is considered a priority for the area. The CDRP can then consider whether installing CCTV cameras in schools and town centres fits with its local priorities.

Community Support Officers

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to increase the powers of community support officers. [134936]

Ms Blears: Subject to Parliamentary approval the Anti-social Behaviour Bill will extend the following powers to Community Support Officers (CSOs):

The power to disperse groups.

The power to issue a fixed penalty notice for graffiti and fly-posting.

The power to issue a fixed penalty notice to parents for truancy.

The power to stop cyclists in order to issue a fixed penalty notice for cycling on a footpath.

Crime Statistics

Paddy Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many crimes were committed per head of population in the (a) Avon and Somerset, (b) Bedfordshire, (c) Leicestershire, (d) Nottinghamshire and (e) South Yorkshire police force areas in the last five years for which figures are available. [135044]

Ms Blears [holding answer 29 October 2003]: The requested information is given in the table.

Number of crimes recorded by the police per 1,000 population

Police force area	1998–99	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02	2002–03
Avon and Somerset	102	99	99	118	117
Bedfordshire	89	96	88	92	108
Leicestershire	101	102	92	94	104
Nottinghamshire	131	133	135	154	159
South Yorkshire	102	101	96	104	120

There was a change of counting rules for recorded crime on 1 April 1998, which had the effect of increasing the number of crimes counted. Numbers of offences for years before and after this date, and figures calculated from them, are therefore not directly comparable.

The National Crime Recording Standard (NCRS) was introduced across England and Wales in April 2002. Some police forces adopted the Standard prior to this date. Bedfordshire, Leicestershire, Nottinghamshire and South Yorkshire police force areas introduced the Standard in April 2002, and Avon and Somerset police introduced the Standard in October 2000. Broadly, the NCRS had the effect of increasing the number of crimes recorded by the police. Therefore, following the introduction of the Standard numbers of recorded crimes and figures derived from them are not comparable with previous years.

Dog Thefts

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to increase penalties on conviction for the theft of pet dogs; and if he will make a statement. [132838]

Ms Blears [holding answer 21 October 2003]: There are no plans to increase penalties for the theft of pet dogs. The courts already have robust sentencing powers for theft: the current maximum penalty is seven years imprisonment.

The Government believe that these penalties sufficiently reflect the seriousness of the offence.

Mobile Phones

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the cost was to his Department of mobile phones supplied to ministers and officials in each year since 1997. [123149]

Fiona Mactaggart: To provide the hon. Member with a full answer will incur disproportionate cost. I can, however, provide information on mobile phones and associated equipment purchased via our central procurement unit since 1997, which is as follows:

Total expenditure, mobile phones and associated equipment

1997	175.00
1998	5,516.16
1999	163,933.83
2000	146,201.48
2001	46,491,25

The cost of mobile phones and associated equipment purchased for core Home Office staff via our central procurement unit during 2002 was £64,750. Information is not held centrally on call and line rental charges and could be provided, again, only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) prosecutions and (b) convictions there have been under the Mobile Telephones (Reprogramming) Act 2002. [133970]

Ms Blears: The information requested is not available through our formal statistical channels. Court proceedings for offences under the Mobile Telephone (Re-programming) Act 2002 only became identifiable in the statistics collected centrally in January 2003. Statistics for 2003 will be published in the autumn of 2004 to ensure all court data is validated and corrected.

However, police forces have been running operations and several arrests and charges have already been made under the Act. I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 7 July 2003, Official Report, column 641W.

North Wales Police

Ian Lucas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many community support officers have been employed by North Wales police in each of the last three years for which figures are available. [134507]

Ms Blears: The first year in which community support officers (CSOs) could be recruited was 2002–03. North Wales police had no CSOs in that year. This financial year, they planned to recruit eight CSOs and all eight commenced employment on 1 September 2003.

People Trafficking

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to increase penalties for those engaged in the trafficking of (a) women and (b) children for the illegal sex industry in England and Wales. [134353]

Beverley Hughes: The Government takes very seriously the issue of trafficking people for sexual exploitation. At present, the Nationality, Asylum and Immigration Act 2002 contains an offence of trafficking for prostitution, which makes it an offence, punishable by up to 14 years imprisonment, to traffic someone (whether an adult or a child) into or out of the United Kingdom for the purposes of exploiting them in prostitution.

The Sexual Offences Bill, introduced into the House of Lords on 28 January 2003 proposes new comprehensive offences of trafficking for sexual exploitation to replace the stop-gap offence introduced by the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002. These new offences tackle the movement of people into, within and out of the UK for the purposes of sexual exploitation, and will also carry maximum penalties of 14 years imprisonment. The offence relating to trafficking within the UK applies equally to UK nationals trafficked from place to place in the UK, and to foreign nationals brought here and then moved around from place to place within the UK. This is the first time that the trafficking of UK nationals within the UK has been tackled in legislation.

Internationally, we are committed to addressing the issue of trafficking by our involvement with the EU Framework Decision on combating the trafficking of human beings, and the UN protocol to prevent, suppress and punish trafficking.

We believe 14 years is the appropriate maximum penalty for trafficking an adult or child. This is the highest determinate penalty available to the courts and we consider that it provides a proportionate response to the range of criminal behaviour involved in trafficking. Where the trafficked person is also subjected to a sexual or violent offence, this can be charged in its own right and the offender will then additionally be liable for the penalties that attach to those offences.

Police

Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many ex-police officers are being paid a pension because of early retirement through ill health; and what monitoring systems are in place to ensure that the ill health is not transient. [134543]

Ms Blears: The requested figures are not centrally available. However the number of ill-health retirements within the police service has been falling over recent years from a level of 14.8 per 1,000 officer strength in 1997–98 to 8.8 per 1,000 in 2001–02.

Regulation K1 of the Police Pension Regulations 1987 gives the police authority the discretion to review whether the disablement of a person in receipt of a police ill-health pension has ceased. Such reviews can be held at intervals that the authority considers appropriate. We would expect police authorities to continue to review the circumstances in any case where it was felt that there was a reasonable prospect for the cessation of disablement and that the former officer could be re-engaged.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been killed in each of the last five years by the police (a) during police action, (b) as a result of police pursuits and (c) in police custody. [134728]

Ms Blears: In each of the last five years, for which Home Office figures have been published, the total number of people who died during or following police action are as follows.

1998–1999—67
1999–2000—70
2000–2001—52
2001–2002—70

Within those totals:

1997–98

Eleven died during or following police pursuits and 40 died in or following police custody.

1998–99

Four died during or following police pursuits and 41 died in or following police custody.

1999–2000

Ninteen died during or following police pursuits and 30 died in or following police custody.

2000–01

Seventeen died during or following police pursuits and 25 died in or following police custody.

2001–02

Thirty died during or following police pursuits and 22 died in or following police custody.

John Mann: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) police officers and (b) crimes committed there were in police authority areas in England in the last year for which figures are available. [135320]

Ms Blears [holding answer 30 October 2003]: The latest published information on the number of police officers by police force area in England is published in Table 1 of 'Police Service Strength, England and Wales, 31 March 2003' (Home Office Statistical Bulletin 11/03).

The latest published information on the number of crimes recorded in each police force area in England is contained in Table 6.04 of 'Crime in England and Wales 2002/03' (Home Office Statistical Bulletin 07/03).

Copies of both publications are available in the Library.

Prisoners

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are held (a) over 50 miles and (b) over 100 miles from their committal court town. [133395]

Paul Goggins: An individual prisoners' court details are recorded to show first court appearance, committal, remand, conviction or sentencing. Information specifically on committal court details could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

As at 30 September 2003, the latest date for which information is available, details of all types of court information, including committal, remand, convicting and sentencing, were available for 71,089 prisoners, or 96 per cent. of the total prison population of 73,741 on that day. This information is shown in the following table.

Distance from court town

	Number of prisoners	As a percentage of the total population[1]
Held under 50 miles from their court town	44,955	63
Held between 50 and 100 miles from their court town	15,254	22
Held over 100 miles from their court town	10,880	15
Total	71,089	100

[1] Based on the 96 per cent. of the population for which court data is available

Private Office Costs

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the running costs have been of ministers' private offices in his Department in each year since 1997. [123104]

Mr. Blunkett: Running costs for my department, Ministers' offices, the Private Office Management Support Unit and Parliamentary Secretariat for each year from 1997 were as follows:

Year	Pay costs	Other running costs
1997–98	1,551,644	572,622
1998–99	1,566,018	1,202,633
1999–2000	1,619,459	791,588
2000–01	1,223,794	841,809
2001–02	1,643,622	943,022

The running costs for the whole of Private Office—including non Ministerial Offices—in 2001–02 was £4,492,704 and in 2002–03 was £5,176,925. Changes in financial recording systems from 2001 mean that it is no longer possible, without disproportionate cost, to separate the cost of Ministerial from non-Ministerial offices. Consequently this figure is not directly comparable with those provided prior to 2001–02, which did not include the cost of the offices of the Permanent Secretary, the Director General, Resources and Performance, Special Advisers, as well as the Typing Centre and the Ministerial Briefing Unit, which was largely created by bringing together existing staff in other Directorates. The figure for 2002–03 also includes office running costs for an additional Minister.

Probation Service

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offenders under the supervision of the Probation Service are categorised as (a) low, (b) medium or (c) high risk. [133972]

Paul Goggins: Information about risk of harm is collected through the Offender Assessment System (OASys) that is being implemented in the National Probation Service and the Prison Service. We currently have standardised information in a comparable format from some 5,000 OASys assessments in four probation areas. Analysis of this data produces the percentages for the level of risk of harm shown in the table.

Until next summer, when we will have data from all 42 probation areas, we will not know whether this profile reflects the pattern across the National Probation Service. Until then we will not be able to say with confidence how many offenders under probation supervision fall into each risk of harm category.

Level of risk of harm	Percentage of offenders based on data from four areas
Very high	0.4
High	6.5
Medium	25.1
Low	68.0
Total	100

Silverlands

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the estimated open market value of Silverlands, Chertsey was (a) at 30 June 2001 and (b) after the completion of refurbishment works in summer 2002; what the open market value is now; and what the total cost of works carried out to the property since 30 June 2001 is. [131504]

Fiona Mactaggart: Prior to the start of the conversion works in July 2001, Silverlands was valued by the district valuer at an open market value of £2.3 million.

The last district valuer valuation of June 2002 contained an open market value, following conversion works, between £3.25 and £3.5 million.

The Department of Health has not undertaken any subsequent valuations on this property.

The total cost of works carried out to the property since June 2002 is minimal.

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average monthly cost of (a) maintenance and (b) security of Silverlands, Chertsey was to government departments in the last five years. [131505]

Fiona Mactaggart: There was nil expenditure for the Home Department except for the period between September 2001 and June 2002, in which a total of £3.7million was spent on the Silverlands refurbishment project, of which approximately £2.8million related to maintenance and £0.9million to security. The average costs of the project were:

(a) maintenance: £280,000 per month

(b) security: £90,000 per month.

All figures are inclusive of VAT.

The final account and retention release, and associated fees, are still outstanding on the project. These are currently estimated at about £320,000.

In addition to the above, the Department of Health has advised us that:

(a) maintenance cost prior to and after refurbishment has been minimal

(b) the following has been spent on security per month:

August 1999 to December 2001—Average £10,000

July to October 2002—£55,000

October2002 to June 2003—£22,000

June 2003 onwards £13,000

This averages £15,795 per month.

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the cost to date is to (a) his Department and (b) the Department of Health of (i) building works and (ii) security provision at Silverlands, Chertsey. [131506]

Fiona Mactaggart: The cost to the Home Department of the refurbishment works to date is £3.7 million of which £2.8 million related to (i) maintenance and £0.9 million related to (ii) security. The final account and retention release, and associated fees, are still outstanding on the project. These are currently estimated at about £320,000. These figures are inclusive of VAT.

In addition to the above the Department of Health has advised us that (i) building works has been minimal and (ii) security provision at Silverlands, Chertsey, to date has cost £695,000.

Terrestrial Trunked Radio System

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) of 4 June 2003, Official Report, column 462W, on the Terrestrial Trunked Radio System, what reports he has received from police officers of ill health effects which they attribute to TETRA. [134738]

Ms Blears: The Home Office has received no reports from police officers of ill-health effects which they attribute to TETRA. We were however made aware by representatives of the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) and the Police Federation that some early users of the system were concerned about potential health effects of the TETRA technology. We have addressed these concerns by taking independent expert advice and setting up a long-term research programme. The experts concluded that it was unlikely that TETRA technology could pose a risk to health, and this has been confirmed by the research results to date. More information can be found at www.homeoffice.gov.uk/docs/tetra.html.

Violent Crime (Easington)

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many violent crimes occurred in the Easington sub division of the Durham County Police Authority in (a) 2000, (b) 2001 and (c) 2002; and if he will make a statement. [134651]

Ms Blears: Numbers of violent crimes which occurred in Easington are recorded and published at Basic Command Unit (BCU) level. Violent crime is comprised of violence against the person, sexual offences and robbery. The requested information is given in the table.

Number of violent crimes recorded by the police for Easington Basic Command Unit

	Crimes recorded
	Violence against the person	Sexual offences	Robbery
1999–2000	729	48	21
2000–01	629	35	22
2001–02	820	39	35
2002–03	1,095	33	51

The National Crime Recording Standard (NCRS) was introduced across England and Wales in April 2002. Some police forces adopted the Standard prior to this date. Durham police force introduced the Standard in January 2002. Broadly, the NCRS had the effect of increasing the number of crimes recorded by the police. Therefore, following the introduction of the Standard, numbers of recorded crimes are not directly comparable with previous years.

SCOTLAND

Stamp Duty Land Tax

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the impact of increases in stamp duty land tax on economic regeneration policies in Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [135612]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

The Government have introduced disadvantaged areas relief which provides an exemption from stamp duty land tax for transactions in non-residential land in Enterprise Areas. There are 135 areas in Scotland which qualify for this relief, selected by reference to the national index of deprivation. The measure provides a major boost to businesses investing in commercial premises in Scotland.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Alcohol Labelling

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations she has received regarding bringing alcohol labelling in line with those placed on tobacco products. [132758]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I have been asked to reply.

The Department of Health has received a number of representations consisting of correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members and from members of the public. The Department has also received a petition from the British Association for the Study of the Liver, the British Society for Gastroenterology and the British Liver Trust. My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety at the Home Office (Ms Blears), has received similar representations in her role as Sponsor Minister for the Strategy Unit Project to develop an Alcohol Harm Reduction Strategy for England.

Anti-doping Policy

John Mann: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans she has to recommend the classification of additional anabolic steroids. [135527]

Mr. Caborn: The Government have no plans to make recommendations on the classification of additional anabolic steroids. This is a matter entirely for UK Sport, the UK's national anti-doping agency, to ensure that all dope test samples are analysed in accordance with the Olympic Movement's Anti-Doping Code of prohibited substances and methods (January 2003), and from January 2004, the World Anti-Doping Code list of prohibited substances and methods.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will make a statement on the efficacy of drug-testing procedures in sports, with particular reference to football. [135086]

Mr. Caborn: The UK is at the forefront of the international sporting community's fight against doping in sport The UK's national anti-doping policy is in line with the International Standard for Doping Control which requires sport's governing bodies to carry out a robust in and out of competition dope testing programme. This policy ensures that all sports in the UK have consistent anti-doping procedures and regulations that are transparent and fair to their athletes. It is a matter for the UK's national anti-doping agency, UK Sport, and sport's governing bodies to administer this policy.

UK Sport is working with sport's governing bodies, including the Football Association, on implementing the world anti-doping code into their drug testing programmes which will result in the harmonisation of anti-doping processes across countries by the 2004 Olympic games in Athens.

Bechtel

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will list the contracts for (a) consultancy and (b) other work carried out by Bechtel in each year since 1997, stating in each case (i) the nature of the work, (ii) the value of the contract and (iii) the duration of the contract; and if she will make a statement. [134731]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 29 October 2003]: DCMS have no record of any contract with Bechtel over the period 1997 to 2003.

Fair Shares Programme

Mr. Challen: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much Lottery money has been distributed through the Fair Shares programme; and what assessment she has made of the effectiveness of the programme. [135652]

Estelle Morris: The fair share initiative aims to ensure that those communities at greatest disadvantage do not lose out from Lottery funding. In its first year of operation, over £31 million has been distributed through the Community Fund's grants programmes targeted at fair share areas; grants of between £200,000 and £2.2 million have been committed under the New Opportunities Fund's 'fair share: transforming your space' programme; and a £50 million fair share Trust has been set up, to be delivered by the Community Foundation Network. The programme has achieved 90 per cent. of its projected funding target for 2002–03. Now that these building blocks are in place, I expect to see a steady increase in the flow of funding over the remaining two years of the programme.

National Lottery

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much money raised from the National Lottery has been spent in (a) East Yorkshire, (b) West Yorkshire and (c) Greater London, in each of the past four years for which figures are available. [135335]

Estelle Morris: The requested information is in the following table.

This information is derived from the Department's National Lottery awards database which contains information provided by the distributing bodies.

East Yorkshire is taken as the area of the hon. Member's constituency, West Yorkshire comprises Bradford, Calderdale, Kirklees, Leeds and Wakefield local authority areas.

	East Yorkshire	West Yorkshire	Greater London
1999	912,015	46,778,718	410,955,361
2000	440,600	35,725,974	229,659,961
2001	1,007,825	39,472,855	324,572,862
2002	286,344	68,784,738	357,138,602

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will list the Lottery awards made by each funding body in Somerset in each year since 2000. [135420]

Estelle Morris: 811 Lottery awards have been made since 1 January 2000 in Somerset.

Dates of Lottery awards, name of recipients, and the Lottery distributor concerned will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will list the Lottery awards made by each funding body in (a) the North West, (b) Lancashire and (c) Chorley in each year since 2000. [135523]

Estelle Morris: 8,881 Lottery awards have been made since 1 January 2000 in the North West region. 1,721 Lottery awards have been made since 1 January 2000 in Lancashire. 179 Lottery awards have been made to Chorley since 1 January 2000.

The information concerning the North West region was placed in the Libraries of both Houses in response to a question from the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) on 29 October 2003, Official Report, column 274.

Olympic Games

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what estimate she has made of the percentage of the hotel rooms planned to be available in London by the time of the 2012 Olympics which will be of an inspected standard; [135830]

(2) what percentage of funding she estimates will be spent on improving hotel facilities in the event of a successful 2012 London Olympic bid. [135843]

Tessa Jowell: The assessment of the cost and benefit implications of bidding for and staging the Olympics and Paralympic Games in London in 2012 undertaken by Arup in May 2003, drawing on London Tourist Board figures, projected up to 200,000 rooms in hotels/guest houses as potentially available within International Olympic Committee (IOC) visitor travel time requirements of one hour.

Detailed information on accommodation is required by the IOC for the applicant city questionnaire, and London 2012 Ltd., the company set up to prepare the Olympic bid, are undertaking further work to verify and refine these figures. We would look to the LDA, working in partnerships with local authorities, agencies and businesses, to consider what action or investment they might take, including the development of their existing tourism infrastructure, to capture the benefits from the Olympics.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans she has to involve (a) arts and (b) cultural organisations in developing the London Olympic Bid for 2012. [135832]

Tessa Jowell: The Olympics are not just about Sport; they will embrace the wider cultural life of the capital and of the country. One of the IOC requirements for the Games is for a Cultural Olympiad, a four year long cultural and educational programme around the Games which can be used to build community support and involvement. The plans for this Olympiad will form a part of the Candidature file which London 2012 Ltd. are preparing to submit to the International Olympic Committee in November 2004 and my Department will ensure that the relevant arts and cultural organisations are involved in their development.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what percentage of hotel rooms in London were classified as substandard in the last year for which figures are available. [135842]

Mr. Caborn: We are not aware of any such classification. In November 2002, the London Development Agency (LDA) report 'Improving the Quality of Visitor Accommodation in London' (commissioned by DCMS) estimated that 38 per cent. of London's serviced accommodation establishments were covered by the National Quality Assurance Standards (NQAS) schemes for serviced accommodation. The LDA is working hard to encourage further subscription. The report also found that 57 per cent. of hotel rooms in London belonged to branded hotel chains.

This Department is committed to raising accommodation quality through the NQAS schemes, and through supporting skills and training in the industry. To tackle under-performing establishments that are ineligible for NQAS, we are currently piloting a 'Fitness for Purpose' initiative in six local authorities, including the London boroughs of Greenwich and Camden. The aim is to help failing accommodation providers to meet minimum legal requirements on health and safety, food hygiene, trading standards and fire safety.

Stamp Duty Land Tax

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment she has made of the impact of increases in stamp duty land tax on her policy for (a) the preservation of historic piers and regeneration of seaside towns and (b) for public houses and other licensed premises; and if she will make a statement. [135615]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

The Government have introduced disadvantaged areas relief which provides an exemption from stamp duty land tax for transactions in non-residential land in Enterprise Areas, including several areas in seaside towns. This will provide a major boost to businesses investing in commercial premises in those areas. No assessment has been undertaken of the effect on the preservation of historic piers.

The impact of stamp duty land tax on public houses and other licensed premises was considered and discussed as part of the recent consultation process.

Tourism

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans she has to use the creative industries in the promotion of British tourism (a) within the United Kingdom and (b) abroad. [135834]

Mr. Caborn: VisitBritain promotes Britain overseas as a tourist destination and it promotes England to the domestic market. The creative industries are an important element in its campaigns. VisitBritain's website promotes creative events taking place across the country such as opera, ballet, film, exhibitions and arts festivals. VisitBritain's current European "Short Breaks" campaign has a strong cultural message, taking advantage of the European Capital of Culture competition. Other examples of campaigns include a "movie map" which uses film locations to encourage tourism, campaigns based around individual films such as Harry Potter and Johnny English, the sponsorship of a forthcoming Britain-related fashion show in Argentina and the launch of an animated film in Japan based on the famous 'Moving Castles' Novel by Dianna Wynne Jones. Domestically, VisitBritain has worked with Warner Classics to produce an 'Essentially England' CD-Rom which uses classical music to promote tourism.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many foreign visitors she estimates visited (a) Bath, (b) York, (c) Liverpool, (d) Snowdonia, (e) Edinburgh, (f) Stratford upon Avon and (g) London in 2002–03. [135838]

Mr. Caborn: The following table shows the number of visits made by foreign residents to these places in 2002, since data on visits to areas around the UK are produced by calendar year.

Area	Number of visits made by foreign residents in 2002
Bath	205,000
York	230,000
Liverpool	193,000
Snowdonia	Not available
Caernarfonshire and Merionethshire (includes Snowdonia)	21,000
Edinburgh	849,000
Stratford Upon Avon	110,000
London	11,603,000

Note:
Figures for Snowdonia alone are not available, but figures are available for the combined regions of Caernarfonshire and Merionethshire, which contain Snowdonia.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

International Student Visas

Mrs. Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills which universities have the largest numbers of students studying on international student visas. [129426]

Alan Johnson: Information on the number of non-European Union students studying at higher education institutions in England for 2001/02 shows that the largest number of these students are studying at the universities listed in the following table. Information is not collected on the visa status of these students.

Institution	Number

Employment and Social Policy, Health and Consumer Affairs Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the outcome was of the Employment and Social Policy, Health and Consumer Affairs Council on 20 October 2003; what the Government's stance was on the issues discussed, including its voting record; and if he will make a statement. [133984]

Mr. Pond: I have been asked to reply.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment Relations, Competition and Consumers (Mr. Sutcliffe), represented the UK at the Employment, Social Policy, Health and Consumer Affairs Council in Luxembourg on 20 October 2003.

The Council held a public debate on the Commission Communication on Immigration, Integration and Employment.

The UK stated that immigration alone would not solve Europe's demographic problem and that the Employment Strategy provided the appropriate framework for improving the participation of immigrants in the labour market. Several delegations argued that member states should meet their demand for additional labour from national and European sources before seeking immigrants from outside the EU.

On integrating immigrants, the UK stressed the need to provide language, skills and citizenship training for recent and next generation immigrants to prevent social exclusion and burdens on the public purse and argued that a job was the best means of social integration.

The Council adopted Conclusions on the open method of co-ordination of adequate and sustainable pensions. There will be a progress report to the Council on 1 December 2003 about pensions indicators.

The Council reached political agreement on a Directive protecting workers from the risks from exposure to electromagnetic fields and waves, as well as on the decision to renew the spending programme to prevent and combat violence against women, young people and children (Daphne II). The UK supported both decisions.

The Council agreed an orientation towards political agreement on Chapters 7 and 8 of Regulation 1408/71 on social security coordination. The chapters cover pre-retirement benefits and family benefits.

The Council agreed an orientation towards a political agreement on a Regulation amending Regulation 1408/71 to align provisions in readiness for the launch of European Health Card in June 2004.

The Council approved the opinion of the Social Protection Committee on a Commission Communication on streamlining open co-ordination in the field of social protection.

The Council adopted without discussion a resolution on transforming undeclared work into regular employment in the context of the European Employment Strategy, and a resolution encouraging member states to consider the provision of various services for victims of trafficking.

Under Any Other Business, the Belgians presented a short paper on Growth and Competitiveness.

No Health or Consumer Affairs items were on the agenda.

No votes were taken at this Council.

Fieldwork

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) what assessment he has made of the implications of access to field work in schools for the promotion of environmental awareness; and whether the provision for field work within the national curriculum will ensure that enough employees with adequate skills are available to bodies who carry out environmental impact assessments; [135904]

(2) what assessment he has made of whether the encouragement of fieldwork as a teaching method is adequately supported by teacher training courses; [135905]

(3) what assessment he has made of the Growing Schools Initiative as a sufficient alternative to a formal requirement for out of classroom activity for the (a) science GCSE and (b) biology A-level curricula; [135906]

(4) whether his Green Action Plan for Education will specify the need for out of class room activity as part of the national curriculum for appropriate subjects. [135907]

Mr. Miliband: No assessment has been made of the implications of access to fieldwork in schools for the promotion of environmental awareness. It is important to note, however, that there are requirements for Education for Sustainable Development both in Geography and in Science, including science GCSE and AS/A Level qualifications.

Although the National Curriculum is not designed to provide vocational training, under the proposed 14–19 reforms set out in the Green Paper 'Excellence and Opportunity', young people would have greater flexibility in selecting their options, and may choose to pursue courses which cover environmental impacts.

No assessment has been made of whether the encouragement of fieldwork as a teaching method is adequately supported by teacher training courses. However, under the standards for qualified teacher status and requirements for initial teacher training, teacher trainers use non-school settings such as fieldwork, visits to museums and other off-site locations. All newly qualified teachers are now required to be able to plan opportunities for pupils to learn in out-of-school contexts. Teacher training providers can also take trainees' prior achievement into account. This means, for example, that a trainee teacher who has previously worked in a fieldwork centre can have this experience taken into account when their training needs are assessed.

In addition to this, we anticipate that, over time, our new Science Learning Centres, the preferred suppliers for six of which along with a national centre were recently announced, will help science teachers and technicians to develop their skills in out of the classroom teaching.

No assessment has been made of the Growing Schools Programme providing an alternative to out of classroom activity for Science GCSE or 'A' level biology because it is not an alternative. Growing Schools supports teachers in using the outdoors for teaching subjects across the curriculum for pupils of all ages, including in Science GCSE and Biology A level.

The Department's Sustainable Action Plan for Education and Skills does not specify the need for out of classroom activity as part of the National Curriculum. However the Geography programmes of study at Key Stages 1, 2 and 3 do specify the requirement for all pupils to carry out fieldwork investigations outside the classroom.

Funding (Primary Schools)

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the funding arrangements for primary school non-contact time. [135469]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 30 October 2003]: Many primary teachers already receive non-contact time as part of their regular timetable. As a result of the National Agreement on raising standards and tackling workload, all teachers will be entitled to 10 per cent. guaranteed time for planning, preparation and assessment (PPA) from 1 September 2005.

The costs of implementing this contractual change in primary schools will vary. Many schools have already done so; others will need to take a rigorous look at how they use their existing resources. The more radical approach a school takes in pursuing workforce reform, the lower the cost is likely to be. Schools that abandon unnecessary tasks; reform their use of support staff; maximise the contribution of ICT and reduce reliance on expensive supply teachers will be able to deliver guaranteed PPA time from their base budgets.

The announcement, on 29 October, of a package of measures to deliver greater stability in school budgets for 2004–05 and 2005–06 will also help primary schools plan for the introduction of guaranteed PPA time.

Further and Higher Education

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many people resident in Tynemouth constituency are (a) further and (b) higher education students. [130387]

Alan Johnson: Figures are not available at constituency level. The available figures cover North Tyneside LEA.

In 2001/02,16,445 people resident in North Tyneside LEA attended Further Education (FE) sector colleges.

In 2002/03, 856 people resident in North Tyneside LEA were accepted through the Universities and, Colleges Admissions Service (UCAS) onto full-time undergraduate courses.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many people in (a) Chesham and Amersham and (b) Buckinghamshire are (i) further and (ii) higher education students. [129891]

Alan Johnson: Figures are not available at constituency level. The available figures cover Buckinghamshire LEA.

In 2001/02, 19,396 people resident in Buckinghamshire LEA attended further education (FE) sector colleges.

In 2002/03, 3,316 people resident in Buckinghamshire were accepted through the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service (UCAS) onto full-time undergraduate courses.

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many people beginning higher education courses in 2002 had previously attended a fee-paying school. [130382]

Alan Johnson: The available information is from the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service (UCAS) and covers full-time undergraduate entrants. Figures are in the table.

Accepted applicants through UCAS to undergraduate courses by previous educational establishment, 2002 entry

Learning Support Units

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) how much funding each learning support unit has attracted for each year since 1997, broken down by local education authority; [133681]

(2) what funding has been provided to each learning support unit in each year since 1997, broken down by local education authority; [133682]

(3) how many learning support units in England (a) opened and (b) closed in each year since 1997, broken down by local education authority. [133683]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 30 April 2003, Official Report, column 411W.

Literacy/Numeracy Strategies

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the contractual penalties incurred by contractors responsible for the delivery of primary (a) literacy and (b) numeracy strategies for failure to meet targets set by the strategies in the last three years. [131342]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: The responsibility for the achievement of the primary literacy and numeracy national targets lies solely with the Department for Education and Skills. The contractor responsible for the delivery of the primary literacy and numeracy strategies, CfBT Education Services, provides educational and operational support under the strategic direction of the Department.

Medical Examinations (Schools)

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills at what age medical examinations are normally carried out on school pupils. [134795]

Dr. Ladyman: I have been asked to reply.

The provision of medical examinations for pupils at school is a matter for local primary care trusts to consider in accordance with professional advice.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when he will reply to the questions of the hon. Member for Edmonton, Refs (a) 120769, (b) 120770, (c) 120771, (d) 120772 and (e) 120773, tabled on 19 June. [125007]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: Replies were issued on:

(a) 23 September
(b) 7 July
(c) 14 July
(d) 14 July
(e) 30 September

Phonics Teaching Methods

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make an assessment of the need for further clarification of the National Literacy Strategy's Framework for Teaching guidance on phonics instruction. [135022]

Mr. Miliband: As outlined in the Department's response in August to Professor Greg Brooks' report of the phonics seminar held in March 2003, we agree that some clarification of the National Literacy Strategy's Framework for teaching is required and the Primary Strategy is developing further guidance, including a supplement to the "Progression in Phonics" material. This supplement will be made available to teachers towards the end of the spring term 2004.

Pupil Safety

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what measures he proposes to take to ensure that (a) local education authorities and (b) individual schools (i) take steps to assess the safety of pupils on journeys between home and school and (ii) take action where appropriate to improve their safety. [135476]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In September 2003, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and I launched an Action Plan to encourage more children to walk, cycle and take the bus to school where it is safe for them to do so. We are encouraging all schools to put in place School Travel Plans, which will be developed jointly by schools, parents, local authorities and others. Safety will be an important consideration, and my Department is providing capital funding which can be used for safety related changes to school premises. Outside school premises, local authority highways departments are responsible for road safety and are an integral part of the school travel planning process.

Local education authorities arrange home to school transport where they consider it is necessary for pupils to get to school. In deciding on appropriate provision, they must consider several matters including pupils' ages and the nature of their routes to school. In "Travelling to School: an Action Plan", we set out proposals to encourage local authorities to trial innovative school transport arrangements, and we identified pupils travelling along routes that their parents consider unsafe as a group who could benefit from exemplar schemes.

School Funding (Suffolk)

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his answer of 7 July 2003, Official Report, column 632W, on school funding (Suffolk), what representations he has received from Suffolk county council about the funding of schools in Suffolk. [135794]

Mr. Miliband: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations from the local authority and schools in Suffolk about the funding of schools. He made a statement to the House on 29 October 2003 about support for schools in 2004–05 and 2005–06.

Skills

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment his Department has made of the effect on the UK skills base of those on low incomes choosing not to seek new employment because of concerns over short term cash flow problems. [129862]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: This Department has not made an assessment of the effect on the skills base if those on low incomes choose not to seek new employment. The recent Skills Strategy White Paper sets out a number of measures aimed at ensuring individuals have the skills they need to be employable, and work productively in a flexible labour market. In addition, the 'Department for Work and Pensions is committed to making work pay for all those who are able to work, and to supporting households, including low-income households, in sustaining employment.

The Department for Work and Pensions believe that most people moving from one job to another will be able to manage until they receive payment from their new job, as wages are paid in arrears. For those in receipt of working tax credit, continuity of payment is maintained when people move from one job to another, as long as the gap between jobs is no more than seven days. The new working tax credit has been extended to people aged 25 and over without children. If people receive the child tax credit, this continues to be paid direct to the main carer throughout any changes in employment. People in low paid employment may also be entitled to housing benefit and council tax benefit.

People who are unable to manage while waiting for payment of wages, leading to a serious risk to their own health or safety or that of their family, may be able to get an interest free Crisis Loan. Repayment of a Crisis Loan does not start until the period of crisis is over and the rate of repayment takes account of a person's income and other commitments to avoid hardship.

Student Loans

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what action he is taking to ensure that student loans associated with top-up fees are available to students whose faith precludes the charging of interest. [134497]

Alan Johnson: Student loans are not commercial loans. The Government uprates the value of the outstanding loan in line with the general rate of inflation, to make sure that all borrowers pay back the same amount that they borrowed in real terms. We understand that some students believe that this precludes them from taking out such a loan. However, a recent survey of students by religious group, conducted for the report "Minority Ethnic Students in Higher Education", found that 64 per cent. of Muslims reported having a student loan; that was only slightly less than Hindu groups (66 per cent.), Sikh groups (66 per cent.) and Christian groups (69 per cent.)[1]

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills has met representatives from the Federation of Student Islamic Societies (FOSIS) on 8 July to discuss their concerns regarding student loans. Officials from my Department have also held further discussions with FOSIS representatives recently and will continue to do so.

Teenage Pregnancy

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what action is being taken to tackle teenage pregnancy in deprived areas; and if he will make a statement. [120773]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: The similar geography of teenage pregnancy and deprivation suggests that while there is still much work to do, the encouraging 10 per cent. decline in England's under 18 conception rate from 1998 to 2001 has been largely achieved through targeted work in deprived localities with high numbers of conceptions by:

The allocation of funding to teenage pregnancy partnerships based on teenage pregnancy rates.

The use of research and toolkits to address the needs of vulnerable groups. For example, "Teenage Pregnancy and Neighbourhood Renewal: Learning from New Deal for Communities" which details good practice in new deal for community areas and share the main learning points from that practice.

New deal for communities and other neighbourhood renewal pathfinder programmes are given support and guidance in tackling teenage pregnancy as an issue through learning events and written guidance.

Encouraging local strategies to target wards with a high number of teenage conceptions.

The development of a programme of work to improve our understanding of the relationship between teenage pregnancy and socio-economic factors.

The association between deprivation and teenage pregnancy is well established and reflected in the under 18 conception rates for local authorities across England. To achieve its national targets of halving the under 18 conception rate and reducing the inequality in rates between wards by at least 25 per cent. by 2010, the teenage pregnancy strategy must focus its work on deprived areas with high conception rates.

Tuition Fees

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what action he will take to alleviate hardship arising from top-up fees for students whose family relationship has been broken. [134496]

Alan Johnson: We expect the student support arrangements for students that are either irreconcilably estranged from their parents or whose parents are no longer living together to continue as they are now, when variable fees are introduced from 2006. The current arrangements are set out as follows:

If a student is irreconcilably estranged from his or her parents, they are treated as independent for the purposes of assessing student support. Where such a student's personal income while on the course is below £10,000, they are entitled to the full fee remission grant to cover the standard fee and to a full maintenance loan. If their income is £15,200 or below, they will be entitled to the full higher education grant when this is introduced from 2004.

If a student's parents are no longer living together, the income to be used for the purposes of assessing student support will continue to be that of the parent considered to be most appropriate. If that parental income is £15,200 or below, the student will be eligible for a full higher education grant; if below £20,970, they will be eligible for the full fee remission grant to cover the standard fee; and if below £31,230, a full maintenance loan.

Both types of students will be able to take out a loan for fees to cover the balance of the fee above the standard fee once variable fees are introduced.

Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what advantages in charging top-up fees will accrue to universities with (a) high levels and (b) low levels of students from low income backgrounds. [135472]

Alan Johnson: No university will be advantaged or disadvantaged in terms of additional fee income by the makeup of their intake. It will be for universities to assess the advantages and disadvantages of charging fees and what level of fee they should charge, up to the maximum of £3,000, provided they have an access agreement.

University Drop-out Rates

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the drop-out rate was at universities in England and Wales in each year since 1997. [130377]

Alan Johnson: The latest available figures giving non-completion rates for students starting full-time first degree courses in England and in Wales are as follows:

Non-completion for students starting full-time first degree courses in England and Wales

Students starting courses in:	Non completion rate (percentage) [1] England	Wales
1999/2000	16	15
1998/99	16	14
1997/98	16	16

[1] Non-completion is regarded as those who do not gain a qualification from their original course or from any other course and do not transfer to another institution.

Source:
HEFCE Performance Indicators

Figures published in 2003 by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) show that the UK as a whole has one of the lowest non-completion rates among OECD countries.

University Students (Buckinghamshire)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of A-level students from (a) the Chesham and Amersham constituency and (b) Buckinghamshire secured a place at university in the last year for which figures are available. [129889]

Alan Johnson: The available information shows that, in 2002, the proportion of 18-year-olds resident in Buckinghamshire who obtained two or more A levels and who were accepted onto a full-time or sandwich undergraduate course in the UK via the Universities and Colleges Admission Service (UCAS) was 65 per cent. compared to the national average of 61 per cent.

Figures are not available at constituency level.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

European Legislation

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Leader of the House what plans he has to bring forward proposals to reform the procedures used by the House for scrutiny of European legislation. [134846]

Mr. Hain: I have no current plans but would welcome Members' views on whether our procedures for scrutiny of European legislation need to be reformed. I intend to consult with Members on all sides of the House on the way we engage with the European legislative process and how we might do so more effectively.

TREASURY

Council Tax

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the increase in the level of income tax which would be required if council tax were abolished and the same revenue were raised through an increase in the basic rate of income tax. [135365]

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the change in the level of income tax which would be required if council tax were abolished and the same revenue were raised through an increase in basic rate income tax. [135750]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the hon. Members to Table C8 on p.257 of the 2003 Financial Statement and Budget Report which is available in the Library of the House, and table 1.6 of Inland Revenue Statistics, available on their website at www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk/stats/tax expenditures/q_t061:htm.

Stamp Duty Land Tax

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact of increases in stamp duty land tax on his policies for promoting employment in the retail sector; and if he will make a statement. [135608]

Ruth Kelly: The impact of stamp duty land tax on the retail sector was considered and discussed as part of the recent consultation process.

Aircraft Duties

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list the rates of (a) duty and (b) VAT on fuel for (i) aircraft on international flights, (ii) aircraft on domestic flights, (iii) cars, (iv) buses and (v) trains; [135176]

(2) if he will set out proposals for the future taxation of air travel, with particular reference to (a) duty on aviation fuel and (b) VAT on airline tickets in his next Pre-Budget Statement. [135177]

John Healey: Fuels duties are levied in accordance with fuel types and usage, and not be reference to the types of vehicle in which they are used. Customs and Excise Budget Notice 31/03, "Hydrocarbon Oils: Duty Rates", sets out the rates of duty applicable for different types of fuels, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

In the UK, VAT is charged at the standard rate of 17.5 per cent. on fuel used in cars, buses, trains and aircraft on domestic flights. Fuel used in aircraft on international flights is zero-rated.

Debt Reduction (Serbia and Montenegro)

Harry Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects The London Club to deliver on its agreement to 65 per cent. debt reduction for Serbia and Montenegro; what has been the reason for the delay in doing so to date; what negotiations are still going on regarding this matter; what assessment he has made of whether this commitment will be fulfilled; what would be the implication of non-fulfilment of The London Club's commitment for debt relief upon that agreed by The Paris Club; and if he will make a statement. [135442]

John Healey: The Government expects all creditors, including those creditor banks sometimes known as the "London Club", to agree a debt restructuring with Serbia and Montenegro comparable to that provided by the "Paris Club" of official creditors in November 2001. The Government understands that negotiations between the Serbia and Montenegro authorities and some creditors are continuing. We have made clear to the Serbian authorities that the UK Government supports the case for comparable treatment, although there are no UK banks among the leading private sector creditors.

Economic Forecasts

Mr. Howard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the Treasury's quarterly estimates of the output gap since 1990; and whether the estimates have been revised since publication of the 2003 Budget Red Book. [135779]

Mr. Boateng: Treasury estimates of the output gap were published in Chart B4 on page 226 of the 2003 Financial Statement and Budget Report (HC 500). These estimates will be updated in the light of latest GDP data in the forthcoming Pre-Budget Report.

Gold Sales

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 13 February 2003, to the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), Official Report, column 861W, on gold sales, what the precise proceeds were in US dollars of the sale of 395 tonnes of gold; and what the proceeds would have been at the afternoon fix on 31 October 2003. [135350]

Ruth Kelly: The total proceeds from the sale of 395 tonnes of gold were US$3,496 million. At the afternoon fix on 31 October 2003, the total value of this gold was US$4,908 million. The gold sales between July 1999 and March 2002 reflected a prudent decision to reduce over-exposure to a single asset in the net reserves portfolio. Thus, the difference between these two figures quoted do not represent the real financial impact of the sales, as the proceeds from the gold sales were invested in euro, dollar and yen interest-bearing assets that have also increased in value over this period. The gold sales reduced risk by around 30 per cent. (as measured by value-at-risk) and are not expected to deliver a loss in return when measured over the medium to long-term; the appropriate time horizon for such a decision.

Golden Rule

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the extent of compliance with the golden rule until 1 June 2006 on the basis of his annual forecasts. [135347]

Mr. Boateng: As stated in Budget 2003:

> "The projections for the public finances show that the Government is firmly on track to meet its strict fiscal rules over the economic cycle, including in the cautious case, and while meeting its international and public spending commitments: the average current budget since the start of the current cycle in 1999–2000 is comfortably in surplus, ensuring the Government remains on track to meet the golden rule, using cautious assumptions and in the cautious case".

An interim forecast update will be published, as usual, in the Pre-Budget Report.

Mortgages

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions the Treasury has had with the Financial Services Authority about including the need for financial stress testing for consumers applying for mortgages. [136285]

Ruth Kelly: The Government legislated in June 2003 to give the Financial Services Authority responsibility for regulating mortgage business with effect from 31 October 2004. The detail of the regulatory regime for mortgages is a matter for the FSA.

However, we are aware that the FSA has recently published its new rules for mortgage sales. These rules, which take effect from 31 October next year, mean that:

> mortgage advisers have to recommend a mortgage that is suitable. Where they consider that the consumer will be unable to afford a mortgage the rules mean that they must not make any recommendation; and > regardless of whether or not advice is provided, mortgage lenders must be able to show that they took account of the consumer's ability to repay before agreeing to any mortgage.

Self-assessment

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many self-assessment forms have been issued in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement on groups of people to whom the issue of forms has been extended since 1 January 1998. [135360]

Dawn Primarolo: The table shows the number of returns issued and gives a breakdown of those numbers.

There have been no changes to the criteria that govern who are and who are not required to complete and submit a Self-Assessment Return since 1 January 1998.

Number of returns issued

Period of return	1998–99	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02	2002–03
Bulk annual issue	7,424,907	7,267,592	7,237,749	7,309,336	7,130,076

Timber

Sue Doughty: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what source of paper is used for banknotes; and what measures have been taken to ensure that all timber used in this paper comes from (a) legal and (b) sustainable sources. [136015]

Ruth Kelly: The paper used for UK banknotes notes is not made from timber. It is manufactured by a specialist paper manufacturer from cotton fibre and linen rag, which gives its crisp and distinctive feel and makes it tougher and more durable than the more common wood pulp paper. Using copious amounts of water, the cotton is broken down into individual fibres and reformed into reels of paper of the quality required.

Stamp Duty Land Tax

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the proportion of leases which will pay (a) less stamp duty, (b) more stamp duty and (c) the same amount of stamp duty following the recent changes to the charging of stamp duty on leases. [135069]

Ruth Kelly: The effect of the introduction of Stamp Duty Land Tax on 1 December 2003 (including the effect of the changes announced recently) is:

	Percentage
Paying less duty	[1]74
Paying the same duty	[2]15
Paying more duty	11

[1] Of which 72 per cent. reduced to nil.
[2] All of which currently pay nil.

As a result of the increases in the thresholds for commercial and residential leases, from 1 December 2003, 87 per cent. of leases will pay no Stamp Duty Land Tax (compared with 15 per cent. who were exempt under stamp duty) and a further 2 per cent. will pay less Stamp Duty Land Tax than they would have paid stamp duty.

As a result of the changes, only 11 per cent. of leases will pay more Stamp Duty Land Tax than they would have paid stamp duty.

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect of changes to the charging of stamp duty on leases on the (a) retail sector and (b) licensed trade. [135072]

Ruth Kelly: Detailed consultation with a wide variety of representative bodies, including those for the retail and licensed trade, were held both before and after publication of the Finance Bill 2003. Both during and after these meetings, much useful information was shared.

Overall for commercial leases, the increase in the threshold from £60,000 to £150,000 will exempt 53 per cent. of the leases which would have paid stamp duty (in addition to the 9 per cent. of leases which currently pay no stamp duty) and the introduction of the 'slice' system will reduce the duty payable on another 5 per cent. of leases from that due under stamp duty.

It is accepted that different sectors will be affected differently, according to the sectoral distribution of lease lengths and rentals. The percentage of leases in particular sectors which are newly exempt or will pay less under SDLT are highly sensitive to these factors.

From data supplied by a representative body covering part of the licensed trade, analysis shows that, before 1 December 2003, 1.16 per cent. of leases taken out by its members were exempt whilst, if these leases were to be taken out on or after 1 December 2003, 37.43 per cent. would be exempt (for those leases within the data supplied.)

Tax Credits

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what his latest estimate is of expenditure on each tax credit in each year from 2003–04 to 2005–06; and if he will make a statement; [130561]

(2) if he will list the types of tax credits (a) provided by and (b) planned to be introduced by the Government giving their cost in each case in each year from 1997–98 to 2005–06; and if he will make a statement. [130015]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the hon. Member to my answer to the hon. Member for Havant on 16 May 2003, Official Report, column 489W.

Further information on Government expenditure on tax credits was set out in Chapter A of the Financial Statement and Budget Report 2003, and can also be found on the Inland Revenue National Statistics website: http://www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk/stats.

The information will be updated in the Pre-Budget Report.

Sir Archy Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the number and proportion of families that are likely to have to repay a proportion of their tax credits due to reassessment of their income. [134927]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 27 October 2003, Official Report, column 37W, to the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb).

Working Tax Credit

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received since 1 May on the 30 hour earnings rule applied to working tax credit; and if he will make a statement. [135374]

Dawn Primarolo: Entitlement to Working Tax Credit depends on a person being in "qualifying remunerative work". Claimants with responsibility for a child or qualifying young person, or who are disabled, must work for at least 16 hours a week to qualify for Working Tax Credit. Working Tax Credit extends in-work support to workers without children or a disability, provided they are aged at least 25 and work for 30 or more hours a week.

Since 1 May 2003. Treasury Ministers have received a small number of letters from hon. Members on the hours rules in Working Tax Credit.

VAT

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what receipts his Department received in respect of VAT on new (a) buildings and (b) schools during the last three years. [135275]

John Healey: The information requested is not available. Traders' VAT returns contain no information on the items upon which VAT is charged.

VAT (Audio Books)

Mr. Soley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his policy is on the removal of value added tax on audio books used by the visually impaired; and if he will make a statement. [135456]

John Healey: The Government recognises the importance of audio books to the visually impaired. Audiotapes and other specially designed equipment for visually impaired people are free from VAT. However, under long-standing formal agreements with our European partners, the UK is not permitted to extend the scope of this zero rate or to introduce any new ones.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Rail Safety (Overcrowding)

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what steps the Government are taking to tackle the health hazards arising from overcrowded trains. [134183]

Mr. McNulty: I have been asked to reply.

The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) advise that there is no hard evidence about health hazards from overcrowded trains. HSE is a member of a steering group led by the Rail Safety and Standards Board which is beginning to look into the effects resulting from overcrowding on trains, and has an interest in similar Rail Passenger Council research.

Alcoholics

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (1) what financial allowance is available for recovering alcoholics; who qualifies for this help; and what other assistance is available; [132943]

(2) under what circumstances assistance to recovering alcoholics would be withdrawn; and how their eligibility for re-application is assessed. [132944]

Maria Eagle: People with disabilities and health problems, including alcohol-related problems, have full access to the services of Jobcentre Plus; regardless of which benefit, if any, is being claimed. In addition, Progress2work LinkUP pilots are now running in several areas across the country. These pilots will further develop our work-focused provision for disadvantaged groups such as alcohol misusers.

Financial assistance may be available from the benefit system, depending on individual circumstances; for example, Disability Living Allowance may be awarded where a person has a requirement for personal care. Benefits may be withdrawn where the conditions of entitlement are no longer satisfied following a change of circumstances. Eligibility for a repeat claim is assessed according to individual circumstances at the time of making that claim.

Benefit Payments

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pension and benefit recipients have been contacted regarding the transferring of the payment of their pension or benefit to direct payment; of these, how many have opted to have their pension or benefit paid into (a) a standard current bank or building society account, (b) the new bank or building society account and (c) a post office card account; and how many have failed to select an option. [135199]

Mr. Pond: I refer the hon. Member to the Written Answer I gave the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) on 28 October 2003, Official Report, column 207W.

Child Support Agency

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will make a statement on progress in transferring Child Support Agency cases from the old system of calculation to the proposed new system. [134211]

Mr. Pond: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Moray (Angus Robertson) on 16 September 2003, Official Report, columns 696–97W.

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many prosecutions have been initiated in the last year for provision of false information to the Child Support Agency. [134341]

Mr. Pond: Since April 2002 the Child Support Agency has initiated 15 prosecutions against clients for providing false information. Of the 14 prosecutions that have currently been heard in court the defendant was found guilty in every case.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, how many complaints were received per month from Child Support Agency clients (a) in the six months previous to the introduction of the new child support system and (b) in the last three months, in the latter case identifying how many of the complaints came from (i) clients of the old system and (ii) clients of the new system; what percentage of total clients the complaints represented per month; and if he will make a statement. [131447]

Mr. Pond: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mr. Doug Smith. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Doug Smith to Mr. Angus Robertson, dated 27 October 2003:

The Secretary of State, in replying to your recent Parliamentary question about the Child Support Agency promised a substantive reply from the Chief Executive.

You asked about the numbers of complaints received by the Agency in the 6 months prior to the introduction of the new child support system and in the last 3 months (identifying the number received from clients on the old and new systems) and what percentage of our total clients these figures equate to.

The figures you requested are summarised in the following tables:

Complaints received prior to the introduction of the new child support system

Month	Number of complaints received	Percentage of total clients
September	1,238	0.11
October	1,318	0.12
November	1,263	0.12
December	958	0.09
January	1,316	0.12
February	1,515	0.15
Monthly Average	1,268	0.12

In April 2003 we changed our complaints handling processes. This has ensured the more accurate recording of complaints and ensured the recording for the first time of telephone complaints. I have included below information on written complaints only, for a more representative comparison.

This new system has recorded the following number of complaints:

Complaints received in the three months up to August 2003

Month	Total complaints received	Percentage of total clients	Written complaints received	Percentage of total clients
June	2,174	0.21	1,666	0.16
July	2,684	0.24	2,017	0.18
August	2,320	0.19	1,725	0.14

It is not possible to make an exact split between complaints from clients within the old and new arrangements because the affairs of some clients span both.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions for how many days in each of the last five years Cold Weather Payments were made to residents whose homes were allocated to the (a) Leeds and (b) Nottingham weather stations. [135087]

Mr. Pond: Cold Weather Payments (CWPs) provide extra help to vulnerable people towards the additional costs of heating which result from a period of very cold weather in the area where they live. If the average recorded or forecast temperatures fall to 0°C or below over seven consecutive days, CWPs are automatically triggered. The payments continue to be made for each seven day period that the relevant temperature criteria are met.

Since 1998–99 CWPs were made once, during 2001–02, to eligible residents whose homes were covered by the Leeds weather station. Over the same period, CWPs were made twice during 2000–01 and once during 2001–02 to eligible residents whose homes were covered by the Nottingham weather station.

Departmental Publications

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how his Department decides which of its publications should be distributed for display in post offices. [135483]

Mr. Pond: The decision as to which publications are displayed via the Post Office network is made within the Department's Communications Directorate.

Senior managers meet at least every three months to agree the future publications and information to be displayed. The choice is driven by the needs of our customers and is closely linked both to the calendar year and the timing of other marketing work happening across the Department. An example of this is the display of posters and provision of leaflets from October 2003 to April 2004 in support of the Winter Fuel Campaign.

Bi-lingual versions of the agreed publications are provided to Post Offices in Wales.

Employee Pension Rights

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will make a statement on procedures to protect employee pension rights in cases of employer insolvency due to fraud, with particular reference to requirements under the 1980 Insolvency Directive. [135092]

Malcolm Wicks [holding answer 28 October 2003]: The Pensions Compensation Board helps members of occupational pension schemes where the assets of the scheme have been reduced through dishonesty and the employer is insolvent. This is an important protection for scheme members and will act as a last resort for schemes seeking to restore their funding position.

As stated in the Green Paper ("Simplicity, security and choice: Working and saving for retirement", December 2002), we intend to increase protection to those schemes that suffer from acts of dishonesty where the employer is insolvent. In future these pension schemes will be compensated for the full amount lost.

The new Pension Protection Fund will ensure greater protection for members in all cases of insolvency, not just those that arise due to fraud.

We take our obligations under Article 8 of the Insolvency Directive seriously and the European Commission has confirmed that we have met those obligations.

Employment Statistics

John Mann: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many people have found work to date in 2003, broken down by progress to work area. [135330]

Mr. Browne: The information has been placed in the Library.

Employers Liability Insurance (Construction Sector)

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions when he next plans to meet the National Federation of Roofing Contractors to discuss insurance premiums. [134947]

Mr. Browne: Officials from the Department met representatives of the National Federation of Roofing Contractors (NFRC) and other small businesses in the construction sector with the Department of Trade and Industry and the Office of Fair Trading to talk about the difficulties in the Employers' Liability Insurance market on 20 February 2003.

Although the Department has no plans at present for a further meeting specifically with the NFRC, the Department's Ministers continue to meet with construction interests, most recently with the Construction Confederation on 28 October.

We are aware of the good work that the NFRC has been doing in responding to the difficulties that its members have been encountering in seeking to obtain Employers' Liability Insurance at a reasonable price.

Minimum Income Guarantee

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners with dependent children were receiving the Minimum Income Guarantee in 2002–03. [135214]

Malcolm Wicks: At the date of the final quarterly survey in 2002–03, the number of claimants receiving the Minimum Income Guarantee with dependants under the age of 19 was 28,600.

Notes:
1. Figures have been rounded to the nearest hundred.
2. Figures are based on a 5 per cent. sample, and are therefore subject to a degree of sampling variation.
3. MIG recipients are defined as Income Support benefit units where the claimant, and/or partner is aged 60 or over.

Opportunity for All Report

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the cost was of (a) preparing, (b) printing and (c) distributing Opportunity for All Fifth Annual Report 2003, Annual Report on Health, Poverty and Social Exclusion. [135083]

Mr. Pond: Opportunity for all—Fifth Annual Report 2003 (Cm 5956) sets out the Government's strategy for tackling poverty and social exclusion.

The production, printing and distribution of the report, including its summary and alternative formats, cost approximately £90,000 in total.

The report was produced by the Department for Work and Pensions but is based on contributions from a wide range of officials across other UK Government Departments and the Devolved Administrations. Determining the overall cost of preparing the report in terms of staff time could therefore be achieved only at disproportionate expense.

The report is available in the Library.

Pension Credit

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if an individual who has recently purchased an annuity he deems to have voluntarily deprived themselves of capital in order to succeed in making a claim for pension credit. [134412]

Malcolm Wicks: Pension credit is designed to target more money on the poorest pensioners and to reward those making modest provision for their retirement. Where an individual has disposed of capital, consideration may be given as to whether the expenditure was reasonable in the circumstances of the case.

The main purpose of this is to guard against people giving away capital, (or an income) to increase entitlement. However, it is not necessarily the case that a pensioner would be able to increase their entitlement by purchasing an annuity. The actual income generated by the annuity would be taken into account whereas if the money was treated as capital the first £6,000 would be ignored.

If a person purchased a deferred annuity, (or another product which does not give them an income straightaway) for example, the deprivation rule may be considered in the light of the considerable body of case-law which has developed on similarly worded provisions.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions whether his Department deems an individual who has had a claim for pension credit turned down but then purchases (a) a level annuity, (b) an index-linked annuity, (c) a deferred annuity and (d) a single premium whole life insurance policy to have voluntarily deprived themselves of capital in order to succeed in making a claim for pension credit. [134414]

Malcolm Wicks: An individual may be treated as still possessing capital in any of these circumstances, but it is not necessarily the case that they will be.

Decisions are made in the light of the circumstances of each case and the considerable body of case-law which has developed on similarly worded provisions.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners have received an increase in their entitlement under the pension credit scheme in (a) Chorley, (b) the North West and (c) the UK. [134442]

Malcolm Wicks: The information requested is not available for Chorley or the North West region.

Around half of all pensioner households will be eligible for Pension Credit and stand to gain on average £400 a year (around £7 a week).

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State reported on 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 5WS, around 1.9 million pensioner households have already been awarded Pension Credit and over 1.15 million pensioners households will get more money than they would have before.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners he estimates have yet to apply through the pension credit scheme in (a) Chorley, (b) the North West and (c) the UK; and what efforts are being made to simplify the pension credit process to make it easier for pensioners to claim their entitlement. [134443]

Malcolm Wicks: The information is not available in the format requested but we estimate that around 500,000 pensioner households in the North West and Merseyside are eligible for Pension Credit.

The application process has been designed to be straightforward. All pensioners need do is ring our Pension Credit Application Line. Calls are free on 0800 991234 (apart from some mobiles). The Pension Service then sends the completed application form to pensioners to check, sign and return, together with any necessary documentation. The Pension Service is able to offer alternative ways of applying to suit individual circumstances, including a textphone number and a paper application form. An application form can be downloaded from the Pension Credit website at www.thepensionservice.gov.uk. Pensioners can also be put in touch with The Pension Service's local service and can be seen face-to-face either in a local surgery or, where appropriate, in the pensioner's home.

The Pension Service provides a wide range of information and support on benefits to older people through our network of local service surgeries. Local Pension Service surgeries are held on a regular basis across all areas of the country, often in partnership with other organisations such as local authorities and Age Concern. Details of the most convenient surgery for individual pensioners and their carers can be obtained by telephoning 0845 60 60 2 65.

The Pension Service wrote to all hon. Members at the end of July providing a full list of surgeries and opening times in individual constituencies; however I am happy to list here the regular surgeries that take place in the Chorley area:

Chorley One Stop shop, Council Offices, Union Street
Eccleston Library
Fosterfields Day Centre', Eaves Lane
Clayton Green Library
Buxton Library
Belmont Day Ward, Chorley Hospital
Adlington Library
Coppull Library

Mr. Keith Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what estimate he has made of the number of residents in the Manchester, Withington constituency who (a) qualify for pension credit and (b) have so far applied for pension credit. [134510]

Malcolm Wicks: The information is not available in the format requested.

Around half of all pensioner households will be eligible for pension credit and stand to gain on average £400 a year (around £7 a week).

As at May 2003, the number of minimum income guarantee recipients in Manchester Withington was around £3,200. These are the latest figures available.

We intend from November to publish monthly reports on the progress of pension credit take-on, which will include information on the number of applications.

Notes:
1. The MIG figure has been rounded to the nearest hundred.
2. The MIG figure is based on a 5 per cent. sample, and therefore subject to a degree of sampling variation.
3. Government office region/parliamentary constituency are assigned by matching postcodes against the relevant ONS postcode directory.
4. MIG recipients are defined as income support benefit units where the claimant, and/or partner is aged 60 or over.

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many people in (a) Scotland and (b) the Hamilton, South constituency he estimates are entitled to (i) the income-related element and (ii) the savings-related element of the Pension Credit. [134573]

Malcolm Wicks: The information is not available in the format requested.

As at May 2003, the number of Minimum Income Guarantee recipients in Hamilton, South was around 2,800. These are the latest figures available.

Around 400,000 pensioner households are eligible for Pension Credit in Scotland.

We intend from November to publish monthly reports on the progress of Pension Credit take-on, which will include information on the number of successful applications.

Notes:
1. The MIG figure has been rounded to the nearest hundred.
2. The MIG figure is based on a 5 per cent. sample, and therefore subject to a degree of sampling variation.
3. Government office region/parliamentary constituency are assigned by matching postcodes against the relevant ONS postcode directory.

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will make a statement on administrative problems which have occurred for pensioners accessing Pension Credit. [134644]

Malcolm Wicks: There have been no administrative problems which have significantly affected pensioners' ability to apply for Pension Credit. The Pension Credit application line (0800 99 1234), which is the main method of applying, is working well and has taken over 1.1 million calls since it became operational on 7 April. Calls are free (except for some mobile phones) and friends and family can use the application line and apply on pensioners' behalf if they are unable to make the call themselves. The Pension Service is able to offer alternative ways of applying to suit individual circumstances, including a textphone number and a paper application form. An application form can be downloaded from the Pension Credit website at www.thepensionservice.gov.uk. Pensioners can also be put in touch with The Pension Service's local service and can be seen face to face either in a local surgery or, where appropriate, in the pensioner's home. Our marketing campaign, at the heart of which is a direct mail pack to pensioner households, is designed to produce a steady build up of Pension Credit applications. I refer the hon. Member to the written statement given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Andrew Smith) on 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 5WS.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what increase in expenditure on pensions in the parliamentary constituency of Brent North has resulted from the introduction of pension credits. [135121]

Malcolm Wicks: The information is not available in the format requested. Around half of all pensioner households will be eligible for pension credit and stand to gain on average £400 a year (around £7 a week).

It is estimated that pension credit will cost around an extra £2 billion a year.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions for how many pensioners in the parliamentary constituency of Brent, North there will be an increase in their pension as a result of the introduction of the Pension Credit. [135122]

Malcolm Wicks: The information is not available in the format requested.

As at May 2003, the number of Minimum Income Guarantee recipients in Brent, North was around 2,400. These are the latest figures available.

Around 1.9 million pensioner households have already been awarded Pension Credit and over 1.1 million pensioner households will get more money than they would have before.

We intend from November to publish monthly reports on the progress of Pension Credit take-on, which will include information on the number of successful applications.

Pensioners' Benefits

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what estimate he has made of public expenditure on (a) disability and (b) carers' benefits for pensioners as a percentage of gross domestic product in (i) 1997–98, (ii) 2002–03, (iii) 2010, (iv) 2020, (v) 2030, (vi) 2040, (vii) 2050 and (viii) for other years for which estimates have been made. [134473]

Maria Eagle: The information requested is in the table.

Projected expenditure on disability and carers' benefits

Percentage of Gross Domestic Product

	1997–98	2002–03	2010–11	2020–21	2030–31	2040–41	2050–51
Disability benefits	0.47	0.52	0.54	0.49	0.48	0.45	0.38
Carers' benefits	[1]—	0.01	0.01	0.01	0.01	0.01	0.01

[1] Values lower than 0.005 per cent of GDP.

Notes:

1. Disability benefits are Disability Living Allowance and Attendance Allowance.
2. Carers' benefits cover Carers' Allowance only.
3. Projections are those underlying the Budget 2003 Economic and Fiscal Strategy Report, Annex A.
4. Gross Domestic Product assumptions up to 2005–06 are as underlying the Budget 2003 Economic and Fiscal Strategy Report, thereafter real economic growth is assumed to be 2.0 per cent. per year.
5. Current government policy on uprating of benefits is assumed throughout.
6. Expenditure is for Great Britain.
7. Figures are rounded to the nearest 0.01 per cent. of Gross Domestic Product.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what estimate he has made of public expenditure on (a) the basic state pension, (b) SERPS and (c) the state second pension as a percentage of gross domestic product in (i) 1997–98, (ii) 2002–03, (iii) 2010, (iv) 2020, (v) 2030, (vi) 2040, (vii) 2050 and (viii) for other years for which estimates have been made. [134476]

Malcolm Wicks: The information requested is in the table.

Projected expenditure on basic state pension, Serps and second state pension

Percentage of gross domestic product

	1997–98	2002–03	2010–11	2020–21	2030–31	2040–41	2050–51
Basic state pension	3.7	3.6	3.5	3.1	3.2	2.9	2.4
SERPS	0.4	0.6	0.8	0.8	0.6	0.4	0.2
Second state pension	0	0	0.1	0.2	0.5	0.9	1.5

Notes:

1. Figures for 2010 onward are consistent with the Government Actuary's Quinquennial Review of the National Insurance Fund laid before parliament on 27 October 2003. 1997/98 is based on DWP outturn information and 2002–03 is based on estimated outturn information.
2. All figures expressed as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product
3. Expenditure is for Great Britain
4. The amounts shown for SERPS and Second State Pension in the above table only include projected expenditure on additional retirement pension. Amounts paid with incapacity benefit and widows'/survivors' benefits are excluded. Expenditure on contracted-out rebates, for employees who contract-out of second state pension, is not included in the figures shown above.
5. All projections assume current government policy remains in place until the end of the period. The estimates for basic state pension are based on uprating (in April) of an average 0.25 per cent. above the relevant (previous September) 12 months' Retail Price Index. This is to reflect the current policy for uprating the basic state pension by 2.5 per cent. in years where RPI uprating would be lower than 2.5 per cent.

Pensions (Direct Payment)

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many pensioners responded to the first letter from his Department regarding nomination of an account into which future pension payments could be made; and how many did not. [134806]

Mr. Pond: We do not have the information requested. This information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Key figures on the progress of conversion to Direct Payment are available in the Library updated every four weeks.

Pensions/Minimum Income Guarantee

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what increase in Government spending on (a) pensions and (b) the minimum income guarantee there has been in Brent North since 1997. [135120]

Malcolm Wicks: The information that is available is in the table.

£ million

	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02	2002–03
Expenditure on Income Support for the Under 60s/Minimum Income Guarantee
Great Britain	3,773	3,619	3,781	4,095	4,486	4,481
Brent North	8	8	8	9	10	10
Expenditure on State Retirement Pensions
Great Britain	33,557	35,575	37,775	38,718	41,893	44,346
Brent North	—	—	40	41	44	47

Notes:
Estimates are based on a combination of samples of 5 per cent. of benefit recipients and Great Britain out-turn expenditure data.
Figures are in nominal terms.
Figures for state retirement pension in Brent North are unavailable prior to 1999–2000.
Figures for 2002–03 are based on estimated expenditure, as at Budget 2003.

Bereavement Benefits

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what steps have been taken in the last 12 months to ensure that information about (a) bereavement pension and (b) bereavement payment is available as widely as possible. [135485]

Mr. Pond: Information is available from local Jobcentre Plus and Social Security offices, and the Department for Work and Pensions website gives information about Bereavement Benefits together with leaflets and claim forms for downloading. A fully revised version of leaflet NP45 'A guide to Bereavement Benefit' for professional advisers and members of the public was published in May this year. Leaflets D49 "What to do after a death in England and Wales" and D49S "What to do after a death in Scotland" are reviewed and revised as necessary annually.

In addition, we have been working with funeral directors, Registrars and voluntary groups such as Cruse, National Association of Widows and Citizens Advice Bureaux who may be contacted by bereaved people.

We have worked with Registrars to amend the social security form for notifying the Department of a death (BD8) to draw greater attention to the fact that it can be used to initiate a claim for bereavement benefits, this went to print in April 2003 and has been in use by Registrars since then. Within the last year we have also arranged for Funeral Directors to be able to obtain Bereavement Benefit claim packs so that they can be given directly to bereaved people.

We keep under review the way that information is made available about bereavement benefits so that bereaved people, at this very difficult time in their lives, know about their potential right to benefit and can act on it at the right time.

Sign Languages

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will place in the Library a copy of the submission of the Government to the Bureau of the Steering Committee on Education (Council of Europe) outlining its proposals and position statement on the legal recognition of sign languages. [135936]

Maria Eagle: Yes.

Stakeholder Pensions

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many new stakeholder pensions have been taken up by individuals (a) without any other form of occupation pension provision and (b) from the initial target group of those earning between £10,000 and £20,000 a year. [135015]

Malcolm Wicks: The information requested in (a) is not available. Information relating to (b) is contained in the following table.

Annual earnings of stakeholder pension policy holders	Number of stakeholder pension sales by earnings group in 2001–02 tax year
Under £10,000	200,000
£10,000 to £20,000	330,000
£20,000 to £30,000	160,000
£30,000 to £40,000	40,000
£40,000 to £50,000	10,000
£50,000 to £60,000	10,000
£60,000 and above	20,000

Notes:
1. 60,000 of sales were to people not in work (e.g. children, spouses, the unemployed and pensioners).
2. Numbers do not sum to total sales in tax year because of rounding of information bands to the nearest 10,000.
3. Earned income data is derived from the Survey of Personal Incomes (SPI) and consists of all income chargeable under Schedule E (mainly pay, private and occupational pensions, retirement annuities and state retirement pensions) Schedule D Cases I and II (self-employment income), and miscellaneous other earnings.
4. The SPI is a representative sample of nearly 200,000 individuals, drawn from the Revenue's Self Assessment, Pay As You Earn and Claims systems. Where we have been able to match these individuals to the SPI, primarily those with earned income, the totals in the tables are based on this sample.

Unemployment Benefits

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what range of benefits is available for those unable to find a job; under what circumstances are these benefits withdrawn; and what compulsory tasks the unemployed are asked to do in searching and applying for jobs. [132947]

Mr. Browne: The main benefit available to people seeking work is Jobseeker's Allowance. They may also be able to receive Housing Benefit, Council Tax Benefit and Disability benefits depending on their particular circumstances. Child Benefit and Child Tax Credits can be claimed by all families with children.

In order to receive Jobseeker's Allowance a person must be available for and actively seeking work. When they make a claim for Jobseeker's Allowance they agree the steps they will take to actively seek work. This is recorded on their Jobseeker's Agreement and reviewed on a regular basis. Jobseekers may also have to comply with a Jobseeker's Direction issued by their Adviser. This could be, for example, apply for a specific job vacancy or to attend a training course. Failure to comply with these requests without good cause could lead to a benefit sanction.

Before a sanction is applied an independent Decision Maker will consider statements from the jobseeker and their Personal Adviser, together with the Jobseeker's Agreement and any other evidence supplied by the jobseeker. If benefit is disallowed the jobseeker is advised of their right to have the decision reconsidered or to appeal.

Details of the steps that Jobseeker's are required to take are set out in Volume 4, Chapter 21, Paragraphs 21826 to 21828 of the Decision Makers Guide a copy of which is available in the Library.

Winter Fuel Payment

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will estimate how many people who became newly entitled for the 2003–04 winter fuel payment and who needed to make a claim before 19 September in order to receive their payment before Christmas failed to do so; and what the value was of such payments. [134107]

Malcolm Wicks: We estimate that for winter 2003–04, there could be around 600,000 people newly entitled to a Winter Fuel Payment. Around half of these will need to claim because they will not be in receipt of a relevant benefit which qualifies them for an automatic payment.

By 19 September 2003, around 170,000 claim forms had been received and processed for payment, although some of these may have been from people entitled to an automatic payment. However, since then a further 24,000 claims were received and processed for payment.

We are unable to provide any reliable estimate of the value of unclaimed winter fuel payments because some people aged 60 or over are excluded, others choose not to claim and payments are based on household composition.

Where a person needs to claim, it is up to them whether they do so, and we publicise the availability of these payments. They have until 30 March 2004 to make their claim for this winter.

Workplace Diseases

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will take steps to limit liability in employers' liability cases involving workplace diseases to the date of the publication in medical journals of research showing clear links between workplace practices and diseases. [136172]

Mr. Browne: We do not have any plans to introduce such a system.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Afghanistan

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much the United Kingdom has contributed to Afghanistan in each year since 2000; and what percentage of these amounts has gone towards (a) reconstruction, (b) military purposes and (c) emergency aid in each year. [133853]

Hilary Benn: Since 2000 the UK has provided 687 million to Afghanistan. Distinctions between reconstruction or development assistance, and emergency or humanitarian assistance are problematic, especially in situations like Afghanistan after the initial emergency in 2001 was over. For example, assistance managed by our Humanitarian Affairs department to support re-opening of schools or the immunisation of children, clearly has an immediate effect as well as contributing to longer-term development.

In the financial year 2000–2001 £5 million was spent on humanitarian assistance. There was no spend for military or reconstruction work.

In financial year 2001–2002 out of £265 million provided by the UK, £45 million (17 per cent.) was spent on humanitarian and reconstruction assistance. Most of this went to humanitarian needs because our reconstruction effort was just beginning. £220 million (83 per cent.) was spent on military operations.

In financial year 2002–2003 the UK contributed a total of £396 million. £86 million (21 per cent.) was spent on humanitarian and reconstruction assistance. This was shared roughly equally between humanitarian assistance and reconstruction. £310 million (79 per cent.) towards supporting military operations in Afghanistan.

In the current financial year the UK, to date, have provided £26 million for humanitarian assistance and reconstruction. The great majority of these funds have focused on reconstruction. This years figures for expenditure in support of military operations in Afghanistan will be published in the Winter Supplementary Estimates.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance is being provided to train Afghan women as (a) nurses, (b) doctors and (c) other medical professionals; in what parts of Afghanistan such assistance is being provided; what resources have been committed in support of such training; and over what time period. [134570]

Hilary Benn: The Department for International Development has provided some technical assistance to the Ministry of Health in Afghanistan but is not directly involved in the training of medical professionals.

The Afghanistan Ministry of Health has estimated a budget of $173 million to implement several national health programmes this year. More than $130 million has been already committed by donors, including the European Community, to which DFID contributes 19 per cent., for these programmes. Most of these programmes are nationwide. These programmes incorporate training components including the training of women. However, a breakdown showing training and resources targeted specifically at women is not currently available.

AIDS, TB and Malaria

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of the Global Fund to fight AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria. [134716]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: The UK has a long-term financial commitment to the Global Fund to Fight HIV/AIDS, TB and Malaria which will provide the fund with a total contribution of $280 million by 2008. It is too early to judge the effectiveness of the fund in combating these key diseases of poverty. We are working closely with the fund to ensure it has effective working procedures so that it can meet its overall goals.

We have therefore made it clear that UK funding will be subject to the GFATM reflecting a clear poverty focus, achieving a better financing system, integrating the fund's activities more effectively with national programmes and meeting agreed benchmarks to monitor its effectiveness. I am pleased to report that good progress was made at the recent sixth board meeting in Thailand on many of these issues.

Angola

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what estimate he has made of the impact of delays in the shipment of food aid to Angola on the humanitarian situation in the country. [135204]

Hilary Benn: The principal provider of food aid in Angola is the World Food Programme. WFP's current programme began in July 2002 and is due to end in December this year. It is 90 per cent. funded. The operation has both emergency relief and recovery, or rehabilitation, elements.

We understand that due to delayed international maize shipments, the World Food Programme (WFP) is expecting shortfalls in cereals during November and December. The World Food Programme will continue to give priority to the sick and malnourished under social and nutritional programmes and these vulnerable groups will continue to receive full rations. This will minimise the negative humanitarian effects of the disruption of deliveries. However, there will be reduced availability of food aid for rehabilitation and recovery programmes.

At the end of 2002 DFID contributed £2 million to WFP in food aid in Angola, in response to their appeal for assistance with the food pipeline. We continue to closely monitor the humanitarian situation in Angola and will respond to urgent humanitarian needs.

Botswana

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will make a statement on the (a) aim, (b) structure and (c) methods of the European Union projects in Botswana to which his Department makes a financial contribution with particular reference to the effect their implementation (i) has and (ii) has had on the Gana and Gwi; and if he will make a statement. [134455]

Hilary Benn: Along with other EU member states DFID contributes to the European Development Fund (EDF), which supports projects in Botswana on the basis of a strategy agreed between the EU and the Government of Botswana. The strategy for the period 2001–07 highlights the challenges of poverty, unemployment and HIV/AIDS, and commits the EU to focus its programme mainly on human resource development. The strategy recognises that poverty is especially prevalent among those living in the remotest parts of Botswana and among ethnic minorities, but does not contain specific objectives for the impact of the EU programme on particular ethnic groups.

Burundi

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment his Department has made of the security situation in each of Burundi's provinces since 1997; what impact the developments have had on the access of aid workers to each region; and if he will make a statement. [134423]

Hilary Benn: The security situation in Burundi remains unstable and fluctuates according to each province. Access for aid workers is severely constrained and both sides have tried to manipulate humanitarian assistance by controlling access.

However, with the recent positive development in Burundi with the signing of the Pretoria Protocol on 8 October on power sharing between the FDD (Nkurunziza) and the Government of Burundi it is hoped that there will eventually be some improvement. We will continue to monitor the situation.

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office provides updated Travel Advice on Burundi on its website. We always recommend reading this before travelling to Burundi.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment his Department has made of the peace accord signed in October by the President of Burundi and Pierre Nkurunziza of the Forces for the Defence of Democracy; what his assessment his Department has made of the impact the accord has so far had on (a) internally displaced people and (b) refugees from Burundi in neighbouring countries; and if he will make a statement. [134448]

Hilary Benn: The UK welcomes the signing of the Pretoria Protocol on 8 October between the FDD (Nkurunziza) and the Government of Burundi. This is a positive step towards implementation of the 2 December 2002 ceasefire agreement between the two parties. Further talks to resolve outstanding issues including an implementation timetable, immunity, army integration and registering the FDD as a political party, are due to take place soon. The UK is working with the Government of Burundi and our international partners to ensure momentum is not lost.

As this accord is part of an on-going peace process, there has as yet been very little tangible effect on internally displaced people and refugees from Burundi in neighbouring countries.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many people have (a) been internally displaced in Burundi and (b) became refugees from Burundi in (i) Tanzania and (ii) Rwanda in each year since 1997, what projects aimed at these people his Department has funded; and if he will make a statement. [134449]

Hilary Benn: United Nations Office for the Co-ordination of Humanitarian Affairs (UNOCHA) gives the following figures for the total numbers of Internally Displaced People in Burundi since 1999. We have not been able to establish what proportion have been newly displaced in each year:

December 1999—808,004
November 2000—524,055
October 2001—632,809
February 2002—475,509
June 2002—487,469

The United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) gives the following figures for the numbers of Burundi refugees in Rwanda and Tanzania since 1997:

1997—6,900
1998—1,400
1999—1,400
2000—1,000
2001—1,700
2002—1,554
2003—1,207

Figures for numbers of refugees in Tanzania are as follows:

1997—459,400
1998—473,800
1999—499,000
2000—438,400
2001—521,200
2002—370,861
2003—353,132

Our assistance to internally displaced people and refugees is covered under our humanitarian response to the needs of those most vulnerable. This focuses on health and nutrition support through international relief organisations. So far this financial year we have provided funding of £400,000 through Medecins Sans Frontieres for medical support in Bujumbura Rural and nutrition programmes in Karuzi. We are about to make a contribution of £500,000 to the UN Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal 2003, and are currently considering further proposals from other international NGOs and agencies.

Locusts (North Africa)

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment his Department has made of the danger posed to (a) Algerian, (b) Mauritanian, (c) Sudanese, (d) Niger and (e) Moroccan crops by the reported increase in migratory desert locusts in North Africa; what impact this has had on (i) food stocks in and (ii) humanitarian aid allocated to the area; and if he will make a statement. [134725]

Hilary Benn: The United Nations Food and Agriculture Organisation (FAO) is monitoring the situation in North Africa closely. On 17 October, they issued an alert regarding desert locust outbreaks in Mauritania, Niger and Sudan. Since then an outbreak has also been reported in Mali. FAO are aware that southern Algeria, southern Morocco and the Red Sea coastal plains could also be at risk in the coming weeks.

FAO are assisting national Governments in the region to respond to the threat through their Emergency Prevention System, which was set up in 1994 to help Governments control locust outbreaks in their early stages. The outbreaks have not yet had any significant impact on crops or food stocks and there has been no call for humanitarian assistance. The UK is in close touch with FAO on the issue and will carefully consider any calls for further assistance.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance he will provide to restart the investigation and trial of those responsible for the November 2002 massacres of civilians in Ankoro, in northern Katanga Province of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. [135203]

Hilary Benn: We are providing £700,000 in assistance to the Transition Institutions of the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC), which include the President and Vice Presidents, the Parliament, the Senate, the Supreme Court, the Assembly and five Democracy Support Commissions (Elections, Human Rights, Anti-Corruption, Media and Truth and Reconciliation). We are also providing technical support to a European Community-led mission on the justice sector.

These are all part of our effort to help end human rights abuses that have been so prevalent in the DRC for such a long time. We are not providing any specific assistance regarding restarting the investigation and trial of those involved in the November 2002 massacre in Ankoro.

On the humanitarian side, we are providing £420,000 to Action Against Hunger to carry out an Emergency Nutritional Programme in Katanga Province. We are planning to provide funding through the International Rescue Committee for a basic health services programme in five provinces of DRC, including in northern Katanga.

East Africa

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what action he will take in response to the report of 15 October of the United Nations Food and Agricultural Organisation on expected harvests in East Africa. [133763]

Hilary Benn: The Food and Agriculture Organisation (FAO) Foodcrops and Shortages report of October 2003 presents a mixed picture of prospects in East Africa. In general production is expected to be better than last year. FAO judges, however, that in a number of countries low production is anticipated. This is expected to lead to the requirement for international assistance in the form of food aid.

The FAO reports are an important element in building up a picture of likely humanitarian needs. As one of the largest contributors of humanitarian assistance, including food aid, in Africa, we use the FAO reports, along with other evidence from Government, INGO and UN sources to target our humanitarian response.

ECOWAS

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development whether his Department will offer (a) funding and (b) other support to ECOWAS in its attempts to establish a small arms unit in Abuja, Nigeria. [135136]

Hilary Benn: DFID recognises that more needs to be done to assist ECOWAS and its member states to combat small arms problems in West Africa. Currently the department is not funding ECOWAS in this area, but it is planning to meet with other donors and with the ECOWAS Secretariat in the forthcoming months to discuss the issue in more detail.

Ethiopia

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what his policy is on the resettlement by the Ethiopian government in the Southern Nations, Nationalities and People's Region; and if he will make a statement. [136273]

Hilary Benn: I refer the hon. member for Meriden to the answer that I provided her on 6 October 2003, Official Report, column 1009W.

Food Aid Programmes

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will make it his policy not to use GM products in food aid programmes until further evaluation has been conducted of the long-term effects of GM products (a) throughout the food chain and (b) for direct consumption by humans. [135066]

Hilary Benn: DFID's approach to GM food and developing countries is based on the principle that both the health of people and the environment are of primary concern. Developing countries are entitled to make their own informed choices about whether or not to adopt GM technologies, and to build the capacity to manage their safe development and use. The following principles are therefore employed in relation to UK food aid contributions:

- Recipient governments should be given adequate information on the type of food they receive and its characteristics, including whether genetically modified;
- Recipient governments should be allowed to decide on its acceptability; and
- Donors should accept the decisions of recipients and accommodate them as far as possible. For example, if milled cereals are preferred rather than whole grain to avoid GM grain being planted as seed then this should be arranged.

While respecting the need and sovereign right of recipient governments to take an informed decision, I believe that issues raised by GM crops do need to continue to be addressed separately.

Food Initiatives

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent assessment he has made of the impact that humanitarian aid in the form of food initiatives can have on local markets in developing countries. [135065]

Hilary Benn: Food aid can be vital for saving lives during humanitarian crisis but inappropriately used it also has the potential to disrupt local markets, investment and food production. We have not undertaken a general assessment of the impact of humanitarian food aid initiatives on local markets in developing countries recently. However this is one of a number of issues considered by DFID when planning humanitarian aid interventions and when monitoring and reviewing individual programmes.

Generic Drugs

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what action his Department is taking to make generic drugs available for treatment in developing countries. [135186]

Hilary Benn: The UK Government are committed to increasing access to medicines in the developing world. The factors recognised by the World Health Organization (WHO) that can improve poor peoples' access are; affordable pricing, sustainable financing, reliable health and supply systems and the rational selection and use of existing drugs.

Clare Short chaired a UK high level working group on Increasing Access to Essential Medicines in the Developing World, which examined the factors above in detail. The working group made a series of recommendations for action, which are being taken forward by a number of major stakeholders.

The UK has played a leading role in setting up initiatives such as the Global Fund to fight AIDS, TB and malaria (GFATM), which supply both generic and patented drugs. We want to play our part in making the Global Fund an effective instrument in the fight against AIDS, TB and malaria and recognise that to do this, it needs predictable and sustainable financing. With this in mind, the UK pledged an additional US$80 million to the GFATM (US$40 million per annum over two further years). This will extend our current commitment to 2008 and bring our total contribution to the GFATM to US$280 million. Our funding will be subject to the GFATM achieving a better financing system, agreed benchmarks to monitor effectiveness, and to improve integration of the fund's activities with national programmes. This is one of a range of mechanisms for tackling HIV/AIDS; the UK also works with other partnerships, such as the Global TB drug Facility, that procure both generic and patented drugs.

In addition an agreement was reached at the recent World Trade Organization (WTO) ministerial conference in Cancun in September that will enable poor countries with no, or insufficient, manufacturing capacity in the pharmaceutical sector to import generic versions of patented medicines. The UK Government worked to secure this agreement and believe it to be a very significant step. The option to use compulsory licensing provides a useful bargaining tool for governments negotiating prices with suppliers of patented medicines and should encourage the latter to reduce prices. We will monitor its impact and work with developing countries to ensure that its implementation helps promote access to essential medicines.

Global Fund

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment he has made of the Global Fund's public-private partnership structure. [135182]

Hilary Benn: We support the Global Fund's partnership with not only government and the private sector but also civil society and affected communities. We have not carried out any assessment of this aspect of the Global Fund. However, we are now starting a programme of work to look at different aspects of the operation of global health partnerships and the working of public-private partnership structures may form part of that.

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what the target level set by the UN is for UK input into the Global Fund. [135184]

Hilary Benn: The UN has not set a target level for UK contributions to the Global Fund to Fight HIV/AIDS, TB and Malaria. The UN did set a target of $10 billion a year to be spent in on HIV/AIDS in low income, high HIV impact countries in the UNGASS Declaration of Commitment on HIV/AIDS, signed in 2001.

Recently, UNAIDS (the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS) have produced a report on "The state of HIV/AIDS financing", which estimates that total resources required to combat AIDS will amount to approx US$ 10.7 billion in 2005 and US$14.9 billion by 2007, rising as implementation capacity (physical and human) improves.

The UK is making a significant contribution to the fight against AIDS. Our total contribution to the Global Fund to Fight HIV/AIDS, TB and Malaria will be US$280 million by 2008. Most of DFID's HIV/AIDS spending goes direct to developing countries, through Government, NGOs or the private sector. Last year we invested over £270 million on HIV/AIDS related bilateral work. We are committed to increasing our activities and spending over the next five years. We also provide significant contributions to support the HIV/AIDS programmes of multilateral agencies, including the United Nations.

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what the estimated donation in 2004 to the Global Fund from the UK Government is; and what plans the Government has to increase its funding in future years. [135185]

Hilary Benn: The UK has a long-term commitment to the Global Fund to Fight HIV/AIDS, TB and Malaria and recognises that in order to be effective it needs predictable and sustainable financing. The UK recently extended its pledge by a further 2 years to 2008 bringing our total contribution to US$280million.

The pattern of our disbursements has been agreed with the Global Fund Secretariat—for the financial year 2003–04 the UK has provided £25 million, and for the financial year 2004–05 we will provide £30 million.

UK funding will be subject to the GFATM reflecting a clear poverty focus, achieving a better financing system, integrating the Fund's activities more effectively with national programmes and meeting agreed benchmarks to monitor its effectiveness. I am pleased to report that good progress was made at the recent 6th Board meeting in Thailand on many of these issues.

HIV (Sub-Saharan Africa)

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what the UK's contribution to HIV programmes in Sub-Saharan Africa was (a) as a percentage of GDP and (b) in real terms in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement on EU aid for HIV programmes in Sub-Saharan Africa. [134961]

Hilary Benn: The UK's contributions to HIV programme were as follows:

Sub-Saharan Africa expenditure on HIV

	1998–99	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02	2002–03
Total contribution (£ million)	32	42	149	149	184
UK GNI (£ million)	849,900	896,734	936,586	993,770	1,063,090
Percentage total contribution of GNI	0.004	0.005	0.016	0.015	0.017
Total contribution (£ million) in real terms using GDP deflators at market prices 2002–03 = 100	36	45	158	153	184

DFID welcomes the fourfold increase of programmed European Community financial support to fighting HIV/AIDS and other major communicable disease to 1.117 billion Euro for the period 2003–06. This is equivalent to 280 million Euro per year.

The UK Government have full confidence in the EC's HIV/AIDS programmes, and in particular recognises the value of and supports the Community's "Programme for Action: Accelerated action on HIV/AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis in the context of poverty reduction".

International Debt

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment he has made of the proposals for the establishment of an international body to supervise the investment of cancelled debts. [135063]

Hilary Benn: The Government believe that all proceeds from debt relief should be channelled through nationally-owned poverty reduction strategies. These plans, drawn up by the countries themselves, set out how all aid flows—not only debt relief but also grants and loans—will be spent in order to maximise poverty reduction. So far, 46 countries have developed full poverty reduction strategies, and a further nine are in the pipeline. The Government believe that this form of national ownership is important, and that it would be inappropriate to pass this responsibility on to an international body.

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what conditions his Department places on aid to developing countries to ensure responsible and sustainable expenditure in future when debt has been cancelled. [135067]

Hilary Benn: Debt relief must be linked to poverty reduction. Each country that has qualified for debt relief under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries' (HIPC) Initiative must develop and implement a nationally-owned and led poverty reduction strategy. This strategy forms the framework for spending all donor resources, not only debt relief. This improves aid effectiveness and ensures the maximum possible impact on poverty reduction.

Governments in HIPC countries lead national processes to develop Poverty Reduction Strategy Papers (PRSPs), in participation with civil society. These strategies set out the policy actions Governments propose for reducing poverty.

Together with the World Bank and the IMF, we have been ensuring that PRSPs are costed and priorities are reflected in medium term expenditure frameworks and the annual budget. Annual progress reports and regular budget reviews provide the principal mechanisms for assuring ourselves that all aid, and savings from debt relief, are channelled in ways that have the greatest impact on poverty reduction.

Iraq

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development whether the additional funding for reconstruction in Iraq announced on 14 October will come from planned expenditure for the Department. [134487]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The £248 million committed since the beginning of this financial year has been found without any changes to existing programmes. This includes substantial contingency funding from both DFID and the Treasury's Central Reserve.

Over the next two years, funding for the reconstruction of Iraq includes £50 million reallocated from planned programmes, together with DFID contingency funding of £115 million and contributions from other Departments. Our Public Service Agreement includes the commitment to increase the share of our bilateral programme going to low income countries to 90 per cent. by 2005–06. As a consequence of the temporary increase in funding for Iraq, which we expect to return to middle income status soon, we will also need to move a further estimated £50 million from middle income country Programmes to low income country programmes. This is in line with our commitment to the 90 per cent. target. The reallocation of planned expenditure should be viewed in the context of a development assistance budget that will increase by £900 million over the current spending review period 2003–06.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when refugee repatriation to Iraq will recommence; and what assistance he is offering the UNHCR to return to Iraq. [135116]

Hilary Benn: The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has made clear that refugee repatriation to Iraq will begin once conditions have become conducive to their safe and dignified return. The Department for International Development has provided £1.75 million to UNHCR since the start of the conflict to assist with their work in Iraq and neighbouring countries.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when the Baiji oil refinery complex in Iraq will undergo its maintenance phase; and what impact this will have on oil supplies in Iraq. [135123]

Hilary Benn: The Baiji refinery provides more than half of Iraq's refined oil products. Major maintenance work on it is much needed and long overdue. According to the Iraqi Ministry of Oil, the most urgent work will begin in December 2003, with one of the refinery's three units being taken out of service at a time. It is expected that the initial focus will be on the gasoline equipment, while keeping the diesel and kerosene plants working as far as possible throughout the winter. Major work is expected to be deferred until the spring in order to allow for additional fuel reserves to be built up. Taking the refinery off-line when demands are high and reserves are low could risk disrupting supplies significantly. Meanwhile, fuel is being imported to help meet current demand.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what efforts are being taken to reduce smuggling of fuel products in Iraq. [135124]

Hilary Benn: UK forces are maintaining a long-term presence in the Arabian Gulf to intercept smugglers. Coalition forces have recently been supported by HMS Sutherland and HMS Kent. The UK is also training the Iraqi Riverine patrol service to monitor the Shatt al Arab waterway and Khawr Zubayr. Once trained, an element of this force may provide the core element of Iraqi Coastal Defence force. Measures to enhance border security have been agreed with neighbouring countries and UK forces routinely provide support to Iraq border guards.

In a recent anti-smuggling operation, from 6 to 26 October 2003 covering the whole of the UK area of responsibility, 291 people were arrested, weapons were confiscated and over 50 vehicles, 28 barges and 12 boats suspected of smuggling oil and copper were detained. Suspected smugglers have been handed over to the Iraqi authorities to face trial. Over 2,000 US troops supported the UK-led forces in Multinational Division South East.

This campaign has been supported by the implementation of a legal framework, through CPA Order No. 12 of 31 August 2003, which allows the confiscation of property such as trucks or ships used in the theft of natural resources or state property.

Fuel prices are low in Iraq compared with elsewhere in the region. Until this disparity is reduced, and the economic incentive it provides is diminished, smuggling is likely to remain a problem.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what action the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq is taking to ensure the equitable distribution of fuels. [135125]

Hilary Benn: With the exception of kerosene, the supply of fuel in Iraq at the end of September was the best since the cessation of hostilities. This was largely due to extensive imports of gasoline, LPG and diesel by the Coalition Provisional Authority and the Iraqi State Oil Marketing Organisation. Imports are expected to continue into 2004 while Iraq's refining capacity recovers and the country regains self-sufficiency in fuel. The Ministry of Oil is also working towards establishing adequate reserve stocks to provide a buffer for unexpected disruptions in supply or surges in demand.

The distribution of fuel is a challenge. Pipelines are susceptible to sabotage and theft, and the dilapidated state of many limits their capacity. Road and rail transport, which is being used to help compensate for these problems, also faces capacity constraints. The Coalition Provisional Authority is taking steps to strengthen security for pipelines and other installations by providing better communications, centralised control systems, a more integrated approach and improved incident response times.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what action he is taking to increase the supply of LPG bottles available outside Baghdad. [135128]

Hilary Benn: The overall supply of LPG cooking gas in Iraq has improved significantly in recent months, coming close to meeting demand by the end of September 2003. However, efficient distribution throughout the country has been hampered by an over-centralised management system and communications difficulties.

Management of the distribution system has been improved over recent weeks with the installation by the Coalition Provisional Authority of better communications systems between critical locations, and much closer co-ordination between the CPA and the sections of the Ministry of Oil responsible for distribution.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development pursuant to his answer of 6 October 2003, Official Report, column 1011W, on schooling in Iraq, whether an assessment has been made of the balance between the sexes of the children taking exams in June and July. [135137]

Hilary Benn: No assessment has been made of the balance between the sexes of the children who took exams in Iraq during June and July. The administrative systems in the country do not at present have the capacity to collect such information.

Jordan

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what efforts he is making to assist the Jordanian Government in reducing congestion in the port of Agaba and the delays this is causing to humanitarian shipments destined for Iraq. [135115]

Hilary Benn: DFID is not currently assisting the Jordanian Government. However, we understand that, despite the congestion in the port, the Jordanian Government are continuing to provide support to the World Food Programme to ensure the timely delivery of food and non-food items into Iraq.

Liberia

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance his Department is providing to Merlin in their effort to provide medical assistance to (a) Zwedru, Grand Geden County and (b) Greenville, Sinoe County, in Liberia; and if he will make a statement. [134454]

Hilary Benn: DFID approved a grant of £250,014 to Merlin on 22 September for the provision of health care, and supportive water and sanitation activities in the South and South-East of Liberia. This funding included support to activities in Zwedru and Greenville. On 12 October Merlin began providing health care in Zwedru and distributing essential medicines in Greenville, Sinoe County. Through DFID funding Merlin is supporting the county hospital in Zwedru, and has set up three primary health clinics in the towns of Janzohn, Toe Town, and Zleh (Grand Gedeh County). Merlin is also supporting the Greenville hospital out-patient department.

Since June 2003, DFID has provided a total of £876,629 to support Merlin's activities in Liberia.

Malawi

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many people he estimates are living in poverty in Malawi. [134390]

Hilary Benn: The most authoritative figure for the proportion of people living in poverty in Malawi came from the 1998 Integrated Household Survey. It estimated that 65 per cent. of the population of Malawi were poor of whom 27 per cent. were classified as "ultra-poor". The survey will be repeated later this year. A UN survey in 1993 estimated that 63 per cent. of the population of about 12 million were poor.

Mali

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will make a statement on the prevalence of tuberculosis in Mali; and what action he is taking to assist in the treatment of people suffering from tuberculosis in Mali. [135205]

Hilary Benn: According to the Malian National Campaign Against Tuberculosis, the number of reported tuberculosis cases in Mali has risen from 1,886 cases per year in 1995 to 2,757 in 2002. This is partly due to the prevalence of the disease among HIV/AIDS sufferers. The Malian Government have recently launched a fresh initiative to persuade tuberculosis patients to come forward for treatment.

DFID does not have a direct development assistance programme to Mali. Our assistance is mostly channelled through multilateral agencies, including the EC, and amounted to an estimated £12 million in 2001. However, DFID is playing a major role in supporting tuberculosis control worldwide. We support tuberculosis research programmes at the London and Liverpool Schools of Tropical Medicine, as well as providing significant contributions to the Medical Research Council and the World Health Organisation to tackle tuberculosis and other diseases. We have also committed US$280 million over seven years to the Global Fund to fight Aids, Tuberculosis and Malaria (GFATM). Decisions on which countries receive assistance are made on the basis of technical merit by the GFATM. Mali has not received support from GFATM for tuberculosis programmes, but will have another opportunity to apply in 2004.

Maternal Health

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development (1) what response his Department will make to the report on maternal mortality published on 20 October by the World Health Organisation, UNICEF and the UN Population Fund; and if he will make a statement; [134466]

(2) what assessment his Department has made of global trends in maternal health; what impact this assessment has made on his Department's funding policy; and if he will make a statement. [134467]

Hilary Benn: DFID works with international partners to monitor global trends in progress towards the Millennium Development Goal of improving maternal health and its associated target of reducing the maternal mortality ratio by 75 per cent. between 1990 and 2015. The report on maternal mortality in 2000 published on 20 October by the World Health Organisation, UNICEF, and the UN Population Fund estimates that there were 529,000 maternal deaths worldwide in 2000, with a maternal mortality ratio of 400 maternal deaths per 100,000 live births. The majority of the burden is borne in sub-Saharan Africa and South Asia.

The report is important in highlighting the magnitude of the problem. Inadequate information systems in many poor countries mean there is a high degree of uncertainty around the estimates and so they are less useful in assessing trends over time. A proxy indicator for monitoring trends is the proportion of births attended by a skilled health worker. Skilled attendant coverage in developing countries increased from 42 per cent. in 1990 to 52 per cent. in 2000 but there was substantial variation between regions. Coverage rose significantly in East and South East Asia and in Northern Africa. It is highest in Latin America, at 85 per cent. In contrast, there has been little progress in sub-Saharan Africa and South Asia, where women give birth without assistance from skilled attendants in more than half of cases.

Evidence from middle-income countries suggests that significant progress can be made through improved access to skilled attendance at birth, timely access to emergency obstetric care in the event of life-threatening complications, family planning services and action to address unsafe abortion. Strengthening the health system is central to an effective response. If poorer countries are to make similar progress, substantially increased action is needed.

DFID is focusing attention on this Millennium Development Goal. Our Public Service Agreement includes targets on skilled attendance in Africa and Asia. Our approach includes advocacy in the international arena, support to countries to strengthen health systems and maternal and reproductive health services, and support for research and improved measurement tools. Since 1997 we have committed approximately £1.5 billion to support countries to strengthen health systems. In addition we are supporting the maternal health work of international multilateral agencies and international NGOs.

Reconstruction Funding

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what impact the additional funding for reconstruction of Iraq announced on 14 October will have on his Department's projects for middle income countries. [134486]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 27 October 2003]: Funding for the reconstruction of Iraq will not affect programmes for middle income countries in this financial year. However, in the light of the needs in Iraq and our commitment to increase the proportion of our direct assistance to low-income countries to 90 per cent. by 2005–06 we will make reductions beyond those currently planned, to other middle income country programmes over the next two years, particularly in 2005–06.

Final decisions have not yet been taken on where reallocation will occur, However, in order to protect funding for the poorest countries they are likely to involve reductions in planned spending of around £100 million for middle income countries, other than Iraq, over the two years 2004–06. This includes the reallocation of £50 million for Iraq. As a consequence of the temporary increase in funding for Iraq, which we expect to return to middle income status soon, we will also need to move a further estimated £50 million from planned middle income country programmes to low income country programmes. This in line with our commitment to the 90 per cent. target. The reallocations of planned expenditure should be viewed in the context of a development assistance budget that will increase by £900 million over the current spending review period 2003–06.

Safe Drinking Water

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what reports he has received on (a) the delivery of food aid to Zimbabwe to its final recipients and (b) allegations of its subsequent confiscation by local members of Zanu-PF; and if he will make a statement. [135206]

Hilary Benn: The WFP and the international NGOs all provide detailed reports on the distribution of their food aid. An incident reporting procedure has been established by WFP and if there is any politicisation of the food aid the distribution is halted immediately and is only resumed once problems have been rectified. There has been one isolated minor incident reported several months ago when food aid was confiscated by Zanu-PF officials. This was dealt with effectively by WFP and in recent months no such incidents have been reported

The grain marketing board handles the government's food relief programme and the distribution is largely controlled by Zanu-PF officials, with the army, police and other party officials getting preference.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment he has made of the World Food Programme's aid programme in Zimbabwe. [135207]

Hilary Benn: DFID staff based in Harare maintain very close contact with the world food programme and its operations in Zimbabwe. We are confident that they are implementing an effective programme under very difficult circumstances. The WFP undertake their own internal evaluations of their activities and we review the reports regularly.

We have recently provided a further £5 million to the WFP for its operations in Zimbabwe and of this £0.5 million will be used to further improve its monitoring and reporting capacity.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what proportion of the population of Zimbabwe has access to a plentiful supply of safe drinking water. [135257]

Hilary Benn: It is not possible to provide accurate figures as many services are declining as a result of the deteriorating economy.

According to the national environmental health office in the ministry of health and child welfare (MOHCW), access to safe water in urban areas is above 90 per cent. This figure will be an overestimate as a result of the rapid increase in urban migrations and the rapid increase of un-serviced informal settlements in semi-urban areas (especially Harare and Bulawayo). City councils are having difficulties in procuring water treatment chemicals due to lack of foreign exchange.

The rural proportion had an estimated 75 per cent. coverage but this will vary around the country. This will also be an over estimation because it does not take account of the distance people may have to travel to get to the water point or the large number of water points that are not operational.

Somalia

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment his Department has made of the security of deployed aid workers in (a) Somaliland and (b) other regions in Somalia; in what ways the security situation has changed since April; and if he will make a statement. [134755]

Hilary Benn: Since it declared independence from the southern Somalia, Somaliland has developed stability and greatly improved security. In December 2002 and April 2003, Somaliland organised successful municipal and presidential elections, which cemented its democratic credentials and helped to maintain security and stability. Unfortunately, in recent weeks there have been three murders of European expatriates in Somaliland including, on 20 October, the murder of two British schoolteachers in the town of Sheikh. There is no hard information on the motives for these killings and we await the outcome of on-going investigations by the Somaliland authorities. We and the rest of the international community continue to monitor the security situation in Somaliland closely, and we are reviewing our travel advice.

Elsewhere in Somalia the situation remains unsettled without any form of effective Government or early prospect of elections. IGAD-sponsored reconciliation talks in Kenya are being reassessed following last week's IGAD Summit and could make progress soon. The region is principally run by armed factions, and there is no guarantee of stability or security there. The UK currently advises against travel to Southern Somalia, where a Kenyan aid worker was recently murdered. UN agencies and international organisations still run humanitarian operations in the south. Somalia has been in a volatile situation since the onset of the civil war in the late 1980s and collapse of the government in 1991.

Although there have been a number of deaths of Europeans there has been no real change in the overall security situation since April 2003.

St. Helena

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many wind turbines have been installed in St. Helena; when it was done; what it cost; how much revenue has been generated; whether the turbines have been economically viable; and if he will make a statement. [135659]

Hilary Benn: As a result of earlier studies, which had identified high fuel costs of power generation and significant potential for wind energy, three wind turbines were installed on Deadwood Plain in St. Helena in 1999. The cost, which totalled approximately £300,000, was met by DFID from our development assistance programme to St. Helena. Due to various technical problems, the turbines operated only intermittently until October 2002. Since then, they have not been in operation at all. Although this performance of the turbines has been extremely disappointing, fuel savings totalling some £140,000 did accrue to St. Helena while they were operational. This suggests that wind power should be economically viable for St. Helena, under conditions of continuous wind turbine operation. With further DFID support, therefore, the St. Helena Government has commissioned work to investigate the problems that arose and to propose options for the future. The report, which should be available by the end of this year, will be carefully considered jointly by the St. Helena Government and DFID.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when the Government agreed to fund a breakwater to provide safe landing for tourists visiting St. Helena; and when it will be completed. [135662]

Hilary Benn: All embarkation and disembarkation of passengers in St. Helena entails transit by launch between the harbour steps at Jamestown and ships anchored offshore. The St. Helena Government's policy, which we fully support, is that safety must be paramount in this process. All reasonable precautions are taken, and are regularly reviewed, to ensure that this is the case; and, on occasions where sea conditions are particularly difficult, passenger transit may be suspended altogether. Past studies have not demonstrated to DFID satisfaction that a breakwater, which could be costly to construct, would substantively improve the situation and/or be justifiable on technical and economic grounds. Although the St. Helena Government remains committed to the concept, therefore, we hitherto have not agreed to fund it. In their current proposals for possible European Union assistance, however, the St. Helena authorities are including plans for wharf improvements and an investigation of alternative options for passenger landing arrangements at Jamestown. We shall be monitoring this proposed work very carefully; and we will keep the matter under regular review, in consultation with the St. Helena Government.

Crop Dumping

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps the Government is taking to stop the practice whereby subsidised crops are grown in America and in EU member states and are subsequently dumped on African countries. [135062]

Hilary Benn: The Government acknowledges the damaging impact that dumping and trade-distorting subsidies have on developing countries' agriculture sectors. We fully support the commitment made at the Doha Ministerial meeting in 2001, which agreed that agriculture negotiations would aim to achieve: substantial improvements in market access; reductions of, with a view to phasing out, all forms of export subsidies; and substantial reductions in trade-distorting domestic support.

The UK has long advocated the reform of the CAP to reduce its trade distorting impacts and to enable farming in Europe to become more sustainable and market focussed. The deal agreed by EU Agriculture Ministers on 26 June this year marks a significant shift in the EU's agricultural policy. The decoupling of subsidies from production should connect European farmers much more closely to the market and have real impacts on reducing excessive production, which results in dumping and harms developing countries. Proposals for reform to other EU commodity regimes, including cotton have been submitted and are currently under discussion.

The UK is committed to ensuring real reductions in OECD agricultural subsidies, as well as to making progress in other areas of concern not only to African developing countries. These include improving market access for agricultural products and establishing fair rules for special and differential treatment to safeguard food security and rural development in Africa.

Trade (Africa)

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment his Department has made of the impact of the Institution for the Multilateral Protection of pan-African Commercial Transactions on direct investment in Africa; what regional differences there are; what impact the work of the Institution has had on development (a) throughout Africa, (b) in the regions with the highest increase in direct investment and (c) in the regions with the lowest increase in direct investment; and if he will make a statement. [134422]

Hilary Benn: DFID has not made an assessment of the impact of the Institution for the Multilateral Protection of pan-African Commercial Transactions on direct investment in Africa. We believe such an assessment would be most appropriately carried out by the World bank who provided a $5 million IDA (International Development Association) loan for the establishment of the Africa Trade Insurance Agency (as IMPACT is also known) in 2001 and as such the initiative will be subject to IDA procedures for assessment and review.

World Bank Projects

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development whether it is his policy to support World Bank projects for new roads only when subject to a full environmental impact assessment. [136095]

Hilary Benn: All World Bank projects must be subjected to an initial environmental assessment. This determines the environmental category of the project and the level of requirement for appraisal and implementation. All documents are in the public domain in the recipient countries.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps he is taking to ensure that World Bank support for transport projects does not require the closure of railway lines. [136096]

Hilary Benn: In considering whether to finance transport projects, it is World Bank practice to conduct a thorough assessment of the alternative modes of transport available, taking into account social, environmental and economic issues.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what action he has taken to encourage the Zimbabwean Government to end the ban on importation of grain by private entrepreneurs and other organisations. [135340]

Hilary Benn: Given the substantial food aid needs in Zimbabwe, this issue is a high priority. Together with the other major donors (EU and USAID), we are promoting the liberalisation of imports and promotion of the private sector through the UN agencies, and especially the world food programme. Increased liberalisation of the domestic grain markets is also required as the present prices and controls make private grain imports uneconomic.

The Government's national economic revival programme (NERP) indicates that the private sector have an important role to play in addressing the humanitarian needs. Government, however, continue to be reluctant to liberalise grain trading and marketing and to allow the private sector a more significant role. If anything, the political initiatives at present tend towards greater control and more controlled prices.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what measures (a) his Department and (b) non-governmental organisations have taken to assess the (i) nutritional and (ii) food security status of all populations in Zimbabwe. [135345]

Hilary Benn: In January 2003, DFID provided £2.58 million to Unicef to undertake nutrition surveys and emergency supplementary feeding programmes in four countries affected by the food security crisis in southern Africa. This included Zimbabwe, where £0.25 million was spent on a nutrition survey. The field work was undertaken in February 2003 and the results were shared with the donor community in June 2003.

In addition, DFID has been the major contributor to the vulnerability assessments that have been undertaken in the affected countries of southern Africa. These have been used to identify the most vulnerable groups and communities in Zimbabwe. Three assessments were undertaken between June 2002 and May 2003. In addition, we are supporting, together with the EU, the first urban vulnerability assessment in Zimbabwe. This should be completed by the end of November 2003.

John Snow International-UK (JSI-UK), with DFID funding, have undertaken a survey of households affected by HIV/AIDS in Harare, which included measures of household food security and the nutritional status of children.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Access Officers

Brian Cotter: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many local authorities employ an access officer; how many do not; and if he will make a statement. [135387]

Mr. Raynsford: The information requested is not held centrally, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost, Under the Disabilities Discrimination Act 1995 local authorities, as service providers, have to consider making reasonable adjustments to the way they deliver their services so that disabled people can use them. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will be initiating some research next year to assess local government's performance in meeting the needs of people with disabilities and ensuring that people with disabilities have full access to services.

Area Investment Frameworks

Tim Loughton: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list the Area Investment Frameworks which have been set up. [134790]

Yvette Cooper: There are 10 Area Investment Frameworks in development in the South East. They coincide with the Priority Regeneration Areas agreed by the Region in producing and implementing the Regional Economic Strategy and comprise:

Coastal West Sussex
Brighton and Hove
Hastings and Bexhill
Rest of East Sussex
Isle of Wight
Southampton
Portsmouth/SE Hampshire
North Kent—Thames Gateway
East Kent
Channel Corridor Kent—Folkestone/Ashford.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how much funding has been granted to Area Investment Frameworks in Sussex; and from what sources. [134791]

Yvette Cooper: Funds are currently focused on development of the Area Investment Frameworks (AIF). The South East England Development Agency (SEEDA) provided £220,000 for delivery of the four AIFs in Sussex a figure matched by other publicly funded bodies. In future years it is intended that AIFs will guide existing expenditure of a wide range of publicly funded bodies.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many people work for Area Investment Frameworks in Sussex. [134793].

Yvette Cooper: Area Investment Frameworks do not have employees as this is a process rather than a structure.

Arm's-length Management

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the impact on public finances of money invested in housing refurbishment by (a) an arms length management organisation and (b) a council housing department. [135909]

Keith Hill: In 2002–03 local authorities invested around £2.5 billion in investment and maintenance of housing from their own resources and funds provided by Central Government.

The resource provided for Arms Length Management Organisations (ALMOs) is additional to the resource that the local authority receives through mainstream housing funding.

The Sustainable Communities Plan published in February announced that for 2003–04 to 2005–06, about £2 billion of additional investment is being made available to councils who set up acceptable arms length arrangements which deliver services which are rated as excellent (3*) or good (2*) by the Housing Inspectorate. This is in addition to the support given in 2002–03 of about £56 million.

Building Regulations

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the impact of regulations on the building industry on balancing demand and supply in the housing market; and what recent discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry regarding regulation of the building industry. [121445]

Keith Hill: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is currently considering the balance of regulation regarding the housing market and is taking into account the views of other Government Departments and looking forward to the conclusions reached by the Barker Review of Housing Supply.

Citizens Advice Bureaux

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how much funding the Government have provided to citizens advice bureaux in each of the last 10 years; what steps he is taking to ensure that the Citizens Advice Bureaux network is resourced to provide services to citizens excluded from conventional financial advice; and what recent discussions he has had with local authorities about the level of funding to citizens advice bureaux. [135874]

Phil Hope: This Government value highly the contribution that citizens advice bureaux (CABx) make to local communities. We believe that these services are best provided in a way which ensures that they meet the needs of the local community. Decisions about grant funding for individual CABx are therefore for the relevant local authority to make in the light of local priorities. The Local Government Finance Settlement 2003–04 provided local authorities with some £43 billion of general grant; this is an increase of 25 per cent. in real terms since 1997. In addition to this the Department for Trade and Industry provides funding for the national organisation of citizens advice directly.

I have not had any recent discussions with local authorities about the level of funding for citizens advice bureaux.

Council Housing

Mr. Purchase: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister (1) what proportion of capital expenditure invested in local authority owned homes is supported by direct Government grant, where the homes are managed by (a) the local authority and (b) an arm's length management organisation; [135195]

(2) on what basis he has calculated Government-funded remission of interest charges on capital investment made to improve local authority homes managed by (a) the local authority and (b) an arm's length management organisation. [135196]

Keith Hill: Housing Revenue Account (HRA) subsidy is calculated for each authority taking account of actual interest costs incurred on borrowing to finance approved capital investment in housing, plus an amount that each authority currently has to set aside to repay the principal. Nationally, the average amount met by HRA subsidy in 2002–03 was some £1.6 billion, 10 per cent. of outstanding borrowing. Arms length management organisations (ALMOs) in Rounds 1 and 2 of the programme are also eligible for additional HRA subsidy, currently calculated at a flat rate of 10 per cent. of assumed additional capital investment by the ALMO. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has proposed that these flat rate arrangements, which were designed to provide incentives to authorities setting up the first ALMOs, will be harmonised for future years and brought into line with the normal arrangements for supporting capital investment in housing, based on actual interest rates.

Departmental Costs

Mr. Flight: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the cost was to his Department for (a) ministerial cars and drivers, (b) taxis, (c) train travel, (d) the use of helicopters, (e) airline tickets and (f) chartered aeroplanes in each year since 1997. [123077]

Yvette Cooper: With regards to the cost of ministerial cars and drivers I refer the hon. Member to the letter sent by Nick Matheson, the Chief Executive of the Government Car and Despatch Agency on 17 September 2003.

The Government annually publishes the overall costs of all ministerial overseas travel that includes cost of train tickets, airline tickets, use of helicopters and cost of planes chartered for ministerial travel. The next list for the period 1 April 2003 to 31 March 2004 will be published at the end of the financial year.

The information regarding the remaining parts of the question is not held centrally, and could be provided only at disproportionate costs.

Elliott Review

Mr. Michael Foster: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what account was taken of the Elliott Review of the Area Cost Adjustment when deciding to use the New Earnings Survey to calculate wage rates. [135650]

Phil Hope: The Government use the new earnings survey (NES) for the area cost adjustment (ACA). The NES is the best data for the purpose because it is drawn from a 1 per cent. sample of everyone in employment, a far larger sample survey than the main possible alternative the labour force survey (LFS).

The Elliott review recommended that the LFS should be used as the data source for the ACA. This was on the grounds that the LFS includes data on the educational attainment of survey participants. However detailed occupation data is included in the NES. A report by the Warwick Institute for Employment Research (IER) concluded that the use of the NES for calculating the ACA does not result in any significant bias as a consequence of the inability to standardise for education, because of the detailed information on the occupation and industry of survey participants contained in the NES.

Housing Market Renewal Pathfinders

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many staff there are, and what the annual running cost in 2003–04 is, of each of the Housing Market Renewal Pathfinders in England; and if he will make a statement. [134610]

Yvette Cooper: Currently each pathfinder has the following numbers of staff supporting scheme development and delivery co-ordination; Birmingham

Sandwell (seven full-time and four part-time); East Lancashire (three full-time); Humberside (five full-time); Manchester Salford (nine full-time and seven part-time); Merseyside (four full-time); South Yorkshire (10 full-time); Newcastle (nine full-time and one part-time); North Staffs (six full-time); Oldham Rochdale (four full-time and seven part-time).

Annual running costs in 2003–04 are not yet available. All pathfinders will be using the part of the £2.66 million allocated for preparation of their strategic schemes. Running costs will vary from pathfinder to pathfinder depending on when the schemes are agreed and large-scale implementation begins.

Newspaper Advertising

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the expenditure of his Department and its predecessors was on newspaper advertising, broken down by title, in each year since 1997; and what estimate he has made for 2003–04. [119167]

Yvette Cooper: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister was created on 29 May 2002.

The amount spent on press advertising since the creation of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is tabled as follows. This press activity was part of the Fire Safety public information campaign during the industrial action by the fire fighters.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has no estimates for press advertising for 2003–04.

North-West Regional Assembly

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many (a) full-time and (b) part-time staff are employed by the North West Regional Assembly. [135796]

Mr. Raynsford: The North West Regional Assembly is a voluntary body. The details of its employees is a matter for the Assembly.

Spatial Strategy (East Midlands)

Phil Sawford: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many responses have been received in respect of the East Midlands sub-regional spatial strategy from (a) county and district councils, (b) parish councils, (c) hon. Members, (d) health trusts, (e) individuals and (f) others. [135621]

Keith Hill: In total 1,624 responses on the Milton Keynes and South Midlands Sub-Regional Strategy have been recorded to date:

(a) County and district councils—39 responses

(b) Parish and town councils—134 responses

(c) Hon. Members (MP/MEP)—6 responses

(d) Health trusts—5 responses

(e) Individuals—1,135 responses

(f) Others (Developers, Action Groups etc)—305 responses (includes 22 from Government agencies and statutory bodies).

Stamp Duty Land Tax

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the impact of increases in stamp duty land tax on his policy for urban and high street regeneration; and if he will make a statement. [135614]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

The Government have introduced disadvantaged areas relief which provides an exemption from stamp duty land tax for transactions in non-residential land in Enterprise Areas. There are 1,262 wards in England which qualify for this relief, representing the bottom 15 per cent. of the national index of deprivation. The measure provides a major boost to businesses investing in commercial premises in England.

Suffolk County Council

Mr. Spring: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister pursuant to his answer of 27 October 2003, ref. 134409, what representations he has received from Suffolk County Council regarding the local government finance settlement in the last 12 months. [135792]

Phil Hope: In the last 12 months officials received representations from Suffolk County Council on the 2003–04 provisional local government settlement and more recently on the balance of funding review.

Tenancy Deposit Scheme

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to reform the Tenancy Deposit Scheme to provide for the fast return of deposits to tenants by landlords; and if he will make a statement. [135588]

Keith Hill: Following disappointing take-up and having reached the end of Government powers to fund the voluntary pilot Tenancy Deposit Scheme, the Scheme is being wound up. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is currently considering the lessons from this, and will wish to take into account the Law Commission's review of tenure legislation when it publishes its interim findings on 5 November. Officials will be holding a seminar in December to discuss the case for linking legislation for compulsory measures to the Law Commission's findings.

Wind Farms

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to issue new planning policy guidance on onshore wind farms. [136194]

Keith Hill: A draft of the new Planning Policy Statement 22 (PPS22) on renewable energy will be issued for public consultation shortly.

HEALTH

Food Supplements

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he has taken to press for maximum permitted levels for nutrients in supplements to be set at the upper safe level currently applicable in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [134739]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Government's view is that the law should permit the sale of food supplements that are safe and properly labelled. The United Kingdom continues to argue for European Union maximum permitted limits for vitamins and minerals in food supplements to be set on a safety basis.

The Government's position on specific EU proposals for maximum limits will be based on the upper safe levels and guidance levels recommended by the independent expert group on vitamins and minerals.

Radioactivity in Food and the Environment Report

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to receive the Food Standards Agency report on "Radioactivity in Food and the Environment", 2002. [134073]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Food Standards Agency published the report on "Radioactivity in Food and the Environment" for 2002 on 29 October 2003. Copies of the report have been placed in the Library.

For the first time, this report will contain data from monitoring of radioactivity in food and the environment throughout the United Kingdom. The report is a collaboration between the FSA, the Scottish Environment Protection Agency, the Environment Agency and the Environment and Heritage Service of Northern Ireland.

Sexually Transmitted Diseases

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many people in each health trust in England are registered as suffering from (a) AIDS and (b) other sexually transmitted diseases; and what the equivalent figures were for each of the last two years; [134478]

(2) how many current recipients of NHS treatment for AIDS he estimates are not British citizens; [134479]

(3) what action he is taking to ensure that treatment provided to non-UK citizens for AIDS does not result in inferior levels of treatment for British citizens suffering from other sexually transmitted diseases. [134480]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answers 27 October 2003]: Data on HIV and AIDS for individual health trusts are not held centrally, although data are held by region. The table gives figures broken down according to English region for 2000 to 2002 (the latest available).

Eligibility for free NHS hospital treatment is based on residency in the UK, not on nationality. Anyone who is ordinarily resident in this country is entitled to free treatment, except when there are statutory charges for services, such as prescription charges. Anyone who is not ordinarily resident in the UK may be charged for any hospital treatment they receive, unless exempt under the provisions of the National Health Service (Charges to Overseas Visitors) Regulations 1989. Whether chargeable or not, no one receives preferential treatment for HIV/AIDS or any other health condition on the basis of their nationality, but are treated according to clinical need.

Data on the citizenship of people who receive NHS treatment for HIV/AIDS are not collected.

Arthritis

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines the Government has issued to primary care trusts on prescribing TNFa to arthritis sufferers. [133919]

Dr. Ladyman: The Department has not issued guidelines on the dispensing of anti-TNF drugs. The National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE) issued guidance on these drugs in March 2002. They recommended that consultant rheumatologists, or consultant paediatric rheumatologists in the case of juvenile idiopathic arthritis, should prescribe these drugs, in accordance with the guidelines set out by the British Society for Rheumatology (BSR) or British Paediatric Rheumatology Group (BPRG).

The Government expect NICE guidance to be implemented in all areas as expeditiously as possible.

Ashford (Middlesex) Hospital

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 212W, on Ashford (Middlesex) Hospital, what facility is out of commission; and on what date each part of it ceased to be used. [134058]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 23 October 2003]: I must apologise to the hon. Member for an error in my response to him on 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 212W.

Facilities for the proposed new independent sector treatment centre will be provided by Ashford and St. Peter's Hospitals National Health Service Trust but the final solution will depend upon negotiations between the trust and the preferred provider for this unit.

Improved capacity managed by the Ashford and St. Peter's Hospitals NHS Trust has meant that because of increased throughput of patients as day surgery cases and changes in operating schedules, the trust announced the temporary closure of the Fielding Ward from 31 October for a period of five months.

This is unrelated to the proposals for a new treatment centre.

British Heart Foundation

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much funding has been allocated to the British Heart Foundation in 2002–03; and for which projects. [133925]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Department did not allocate funding to the British Heart Foundation (BHF) in 2002–03. The Department works closely with the BHF on the full range of heart disease policies and values highly its distinctive contribution to preventing heart disease and improving care and services for patients.

Cancelled Operations

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many operations were cancelled in England since January; and how many of these were due to delayed discharge. [129487]

Mr. Hutton: Data are collected quarterly on the number of operations cancelled by hospitals for non-clinical reasons: at the last minute (that is, on the day the patients are due to arrive or after arrival in hospital or on the day of their operation) and, in 2002–03 only, on the day of surgery.

Cancelled operations data at England level and by national health service trust and strategic health authority level are available in the Library and on the Department's website at www.doh.gov.uk/hospitalactivity/data_requests.htm

The data collected on cancelled operations for non-clinical reasons are not broken down into the reasons for cancellation. Therefore, no data can be provided on how many operations are cancelled due to delayed discharge from hospital.

Car Parking (Queen Mary's, Sidcup)

Mr. Horam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which organisation has the contract for organising car parking at Queen Mary's Sidcup NHS Trust; and what income the Trust has derived from this contract in each year. [134072]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 30 October 2003]: The company responsible for organising car parking at Queen Mary's Sidcup National Health Service Trust is CP Plus Ltd. The agreed annual value was £150,000, which has now altered to £151,029 due to changes in number of spaces available and inflation.

Cataract Operations

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many people are waiting for cataract operations in each trust within the Thames Valley Strategic Health Authority area; [131400]

(2) what the latest average waiting time is for cataract operations in each trust within the Thames Valley Strategic Health Authority area. [131401]

Ms Rosie Winterton [holding answers 14 October 2003]: The Department does not hold any data on cataracts, as only specialty based data are collected centrally.

However, ophthalmology data as a whole for trusts in the Thames Valley Health Authority area are shown in the table.

Chronic Disease

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he has taken to improve access to treatment for sufferers of chronic diseases. [134803]

Dr. Ladyman: Our substantial increased investment in the national health service will have the effect of improving access to treatment for all patients, including those with chronic diseases. Over the years 2003–04 to 2007–08, expenditure on the NHS in England will increase on average by 7.4 per cent. a year over and above inflation—a total increase over the period of 43 per cent. in real terms. This will take the total spent on the NHS in England from £56 billion in 2002–03 to over £90 billion in 2007–08 and lead to better services for all patients.

Maximum waiting times have fallen over the past few years and will continue to do so. By the end of 2005, the maximum waiting time for a first out-patient appointment with a consultant will fall to three months and the maximum wait for in-patient treatment will fall to six months. This will help all NHS patients, including those with chronic disease.

We are also producing a national service framework (NSF) for long-term conditions. The NSF, which we hope to publish by December 2004, will concentrate on neurological conditions and also have generic value for people with other long-term conditions and disabilities and will inform the future planning of services.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been spent by his Department on chronic disease sufferers, broken down by main categories of chronic disease, in each of the last six years. [134804]

Dr. Ladyman: The information requested is not collected centrally. Strategic health authorities and primary care trusts receive unified allocations to cover the costs of hospital and community health services, discretionary funding for general practice staff, premises, computers and primary care prescribing.

The level of funding made available for the drugs, staffing and other costs of providing services for patients with chronic diseases are determined locally. It is for strategic health authorities, in partnership with primary care trusts and other local stakeholders, to determine how best to use their funds to provide health services for their populations, including those with chronic disease.

Clinical Negligence

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the cost of clinical negligence claims in the NHS for each year since 1997. [134397]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The National Audit Office (NAO) summarised accounts for the national health service (England), show expenditure for claims and associated costs for clinical negligence for each year since 1997 to be as shown in the table.

£ millions

	Amount
1996–97	235
1997–98	144
1998–99	221
1999–2000	373
2000–01	415
2001–02	446

Changes to accounting policies imposed by the NAO over the years mean that the expenditure amounts are not directly comparable.

Cost Collection Exercise

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what conclusions he has drawn from the annual reference cost collection exercise about the cost of activity carried out for the NHS (a) by non-NHS service providers and (b) by the NHS. [133717]

Mr. Hutton: The 2003 reference cost collection exercise has for the first time included a requirement for the collection of data relating to services provided to national health service patients by the private sector. However, this does not include services commissioned from the voluntary and charitable sectors, and therefore it will not be possible to draw conclusions about the cost of activity carried out for the NHS by non-NHS providers as a whole.

It is currently anticipated that publication of 2003 reference cost data on the Department's web site, and in hard copy, will take place before the end of November. Publication will be accompanied by analysis and commentary similar to that provided in previous years.

Dental Access Centres

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each dental access centre (a) the average charge for a missed appointment and (b) the proportion of patients charged for missed appointments. [132297]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Information on missed appointments at dental access centres is not collected centrally, and we have no information to indicate that any dental access centres seek to levy charges for missed appointments.

Diagnostic and Treatment Centres

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what criteria were used in selecting the bidders for the first wave of the diagnostic and treatment centres scheme. [133934]

Mr. Hutton: The selection of the preferred bidders followed detailed evaluation of the submitted tenders. The evaluation criteria included clinical quality, building proposals, human resources, speed of mobilisation and delivery, affordability, value for money, bidders' corporate structure and price. There was a structured scoring mechanism against each of these criteria and total scores assessed between bidders. All preferred bidders are subject to final contract negotiation and agreement and schemes will proceed only if they provide the required level of value for money for national health service commissioners.

Digital Hearing Aids

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what qualifications are required to fit digital hearing aids; and how many people qualified to fit digital hearing aids are employed by (a) the NHS and (b) the contractors (i) Ultravox and (ii) Ormerod. [133594]

Dr. Ladyman: Although there are significant differences between the way digital and analogue hearing aids are fitted, there is no specific additional qualification to fit digital hearing aids. The Institute of Hearing Research estimates that 659 national health service employees have so far been trained as part of the modernising hearing aid services project to fit digital hearing aids. This includes people whose training has so far been cascaded from those trained directly. The Department does not collect information about how many private sector contractors can fit digital hearing aids.

Doctor Numbers

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which primary care trusts have been classified as being in under-doctored areas on the basis of the number of general practitioner principals, or equivalents, per weighted head of the population; what funding is being targeted at these primary care trusts in order to aid general practitioner recruitment; and if he will make a statement. [128903]

Mr. Hutton: The Department of Health definition of an under-doctored primary care trust (PCT) is that its number of whole time equivalent (wte) NHS Plan general practitioners (GPs) per 100,000 weighted population is less than the national average. As at the March 2003 workforce census the national average was 55.55 wte NHS Plan GPs per 100,000 weighted population.

The PCTs, which were identified as being under-doctored as at 31 March 2003 are listed as follows.

PCTs have been given an average cash increase exceeding 30 per cent. over the three years 2003–06. PCTs will be able to use these extra resources to deliver on both national and local priorities including recruiting additional staff in primary care. Guidance issued to PCTs entitled "Shifting the Balance of Power: New arrangements For Managing General Medical Practitioner Appointments" encouraged all PCTs to increase GP numbers, particularly in under-doctored areas. PCTs are also able to recruit additional GPs supported by general medical services non cash limited funds.

In addition to this increase in resources the following initiatives are also designed to increase GP numbers in under-doctored areas:

The GP Golden Hello scheme has been implemented nationally. This pays up to £5,000 to new or returning GPs, and £12,000 if they go to work in an under-doctored area.

Under-doctored areas have also been prioritised in the distribution of the planned increase of 550 GP registrar training posts up to 2004. Furthermore £45 million has been allocated over three years to improve GP training premises and increase capacity in under-doctored areas.

Local Improvement Finance Trust (LIFT) aims to deliver modern patient centres premises that will help attract and retain GPs in these under-doctored areas. The Department has earmarked £195 million to support the development of NHS LIFT.

Drug Costs

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the percentage change in the average cost of drugs purchased by the NHS in each year since 1997. [134396]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The average annual percentage increase in the average net ingredient cost per prescription item for drugs was 4.9 per cent. from 1997 to 1998, 9.0 per cent. from 1998 to 1999, 1.3 per cent. from 1999 to 2000, 3.0 per cent. from 2000 to 2001 and 6.5 per cent. from 2001 to 2002. The average annual increase between 1997 and 2002 was 4.9 per cent. (2.5 per cent. at 1997 prices). Data relate to prescription items dispensed in the community in England.

Edgware Hospital

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on Edgware Hospital development with particular reference to (a) what diagnostic services and equipment are to be provided, (b) how the hospital will fit into the primary care trust's intermediate care strategy and (c) what plans there are to improve cross health service border usage by residents in Brent and Harrow. [132578]

Mr. Hutton: The new Edgware Community Hospital is under construction and is due for completion in the summer of 2004. The capital cost of the project is £35.7 million. The new community hospital will have a range of services, including: out-patients for children and adults, including a range of therapy services, day surgery, x-ray, urgent treatment centre with walk-in centre, birth centre, intermediate care services and services for older people with mental health problems.

Barnet Primary Care Trust continues to develop intermediate care service, which provide support for people in their own home and also in patient and day hospital facilities. Edgware Community Hospital is integral to this strategy.

Emergency Services

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospitals provide (a) acute services and (b) 24 hour accident and emergency services in England. [133726]

Ms Rosie Winterton: In the year 2001–02, there were 187 acute trusts in England, each of which may include more than one hospital that provides acute services.

In the first quarter of 2003–04, there were 210 major accident and emergency departments in England offering 24-hour services. In addition, there were over 50 single-specialty departments and over 240 minor injury units/national health service walk-in centres.

Flexible Working

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to increase (a) childcare options and (b) flexible working times for working mothers within the NHS. [133913]

Mr. Hutton: This Government recognise that to build quality services, the national health service relies upon the skill and dedication of staff, of whom over 70 per cent. are women.

Part-time working and extended maternity leave are well-established features of NHS employment, and have been for some time. However, as part of the drive to support all staff in the NHS, the NHS Plan, launched in July 2000 introduced the Improving Working Lives Standard, requiring a commitment by every NHS employer to offer a wide range of flexible employment opportunities by April 2003.

The NHS increasingly offers a wide variety of flexible working opportunities for all staff and supports this as a principle in all cases. A central requirement is to deliver practical measures which address the potential conflict between offering people the opportunity to work more flexibly and maintaining continuity of care on a 24 hours a day, seven days a week basis.

The NHS childcare strategy has provided central funding of over £70 million over three years to develop up to 150 extra on-site nursery facilities by 2004. So far, 140 nursery schemes, including both new and extensions to existing nurseries have been funded. Funding has been provided to help trusts and primary care trusts to employ childcare co-ordinators. The Government have committed a further £100 million to extend the NHS childcare strategy to ensure that the needs of all staff are met, including other forms of childcare for pre-school children and for older children, and to upgrade and subsidise existing NHS nurseries.

Food Advertising

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to introduce restrictions on the advertisement of food products during children's television scheduling; [134840]

(2) what assessment he has made of the impact of television advertisements for (a) high fat, (b) high salt and (c) high sugar products on the health of children. [134839]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The regulation of advertising is the responsibility of Department for Culture, Media and Sport.

The Food Standards Agency (FSA) recently published a review on the promotion of foods to children, which concludes that

> ". . . this review provides sufficient evidence to show that food promotion can and is having an effect on children, particularly in the areas of food preferences, purchase behaviour and consumption."

Food is more commonly advertised to children than adults and the foods that are advertised tend to be high in fat, salt and/or added sugars. The majority of children's diets do not meet current dietary recommendations.

We very much welcome the thorough FSA review. The detailed report is receiving careful consideration. The FSA is holding a wider stakeholder meeting to discuss the implications of the research. We strongly encourage industry to act responsibly when promoting foo[illegible]particularly to children.

We are committed to improving the diets of children and have a range of action in place, including the reform of the Welfare Food Scheme, action within schools (such as the Food in Schools Programme), the Five-a-day Programme, including the National School Fruit Scheme and work with industry to address sugar, fat and salt levels in the diet (working with the FSA).

Food Standards

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what regulations are in place governing (a) the quality and (b) the origin of meat served in restaurants. [133896]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 27 October 2003]: Meat sold for human consumption at retail or in catering establishments has to comply with the Food Safety Act 1990 and regulations made under the Act. These regulations require animals slaughtered in licensed slaughterhouses to undergo veterinary ante-mortem inspection, and their carcasses to be subjected to post-mortem inspection and health marked, if found fit for human consumption, under the supervision of an official veterinarian. There are no specific regulations dealing with origin of meat served in restaurants. However, if origin information is provided it must not be false or misleading.

Foundation Trusts

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the total size is of the funding facility being made available by the Department of Health to meet capital bids by the first wave foundation trust applicants. [133185]

Mr. Hutton: There will not be a specific allocation of capital to the financing facility. Monies disbursed will be a function of the aggregate of each national health service foundation trust's ability to borrow under the Prudential Borrowing Code and not of centrally allocated budgets.

Ian Lucas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether an area specified by an applicant for foundation trust status under sub-section 3(1)(a) of Schedule 1 to the Health and Social Care (Community Health and Standards) Bill may include an electoral area in Wales. [133981]

Mr. Hutton: No. The areas for the public constituency in question will be limited to England. However, if a national health service foundation trust's constitution includes provision for patients or carers of patients to be members of the public constituency, patients of that NHS foundation trust living in Wales would be eligible to join.

GPs

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health under what circumstances general practitioners can charge British citizens for a consultation. [132769]

Mr. Hutton: General practitioners may charge a British citizen for a consultation only if the patient is not registered with the GP's practice under the National Health Service.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what requirement there is in the NHS for patients to be given prior notice of the retirement of their general practitioner. [132773]

Mr. Hutton: Regulations place a duty on primary care trusts to give notice to patients if their registered provider will no longer be able to provide services whether because of retirement or for other reasons.

Havering Primary Care Trust

John Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the progress of the Local Investment Finance Trust scheme within the Havering primary care trust area. [133275]

Mr. Hutton: The Barking and Havering Local Investment Finance Trust scheme selected its preferred bidder in May 2003 and plans to reach financial close shortly.

Health Inequalities

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average journey time is for patients to the nearest (a) general practitioner surgery, (b) dentist and (c) accident and emergency unit in each county south of the River Thames. [134875]

Ms Rosie Winterton [holding answer 29 October 2003]: The Department does not collect information on journey times to health services.

Health Services (North-West)

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists work in the NHS in the North West of England. [134894]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The number of dentists working in the national health service in the North West of England at 30 June 2003 is shown in the table.

Number of dentists working in the NHS in the North West of England at 30 June 2003

	North west region
General Dental Service (GDS)	2,281
Personal Dental Service (PDS)	127
Community Dental Service (CDS)	172
Salaried Service of the GDS	16

Notes:

This data relates to 30 June 2003 except for CDS Dentists. The figures for CDS dentists are from 30 September 2001 which is the latest available data.

Dentists working in more than one dental service are included in each service, apart from dentists working in both the PDS and GDS who are counted in the GDS only.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients have been treated in hospitals in the North West in each year since 1992. [134985]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested is shown in the table.

Health Strategy (Children/Adolescents)

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether his Department contributed to the World Health Organisation's discussion forum on the planned strategy on the health of children and adolescents. [133923]

Dr. Ladyman: Yes. The Department was represented at the World Health Assembly meeting in May 2003 and the World Health Organisation's Regional Committee for Europe in September 2003, both of which discussed the development of a comprehensive strategy on the health of children and adolescents.

Hospital at Night Project

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the first report on the Hospital at Night project is due to be completed. [133223]

Mr. Hutton: Information about the Hospital at Night project is currently available on the Configuring Hospitals website at www.doh.gov.uk/configuringhospitals. Further information will be made available on the site as the project progresses.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which hospitals are participating in the Hospital at Night project. [133224]

Mr. Hutton: The following four sites are piloting the hospital at night concept across adult acute specialties:

Morecambe Bay National Health Service Trust.

Wirral Hospital NHS Trust.

Royal Liverpool and Broadgreen University Hospitals NHS Trust.

Homerton Hospital NHS Trust.

The methodology is being extended to maternity and paediatrics, and three pilots have been established:

South East London (a sector-wide pilot). This includes:

Bromley Hospitals NHS Trust
Guy's and St Thomas' Hospital NHS Trust
King's College Hospital NHS Trust
Queen Elizabeth Hospital NHS Trust
Queen Mary's Sidcup NHS Trust
The Lewisham Hospital NHS Trust
Newham Healthcare NHS Trust.
Morecambe Bay NHS Trust.

Hospital Machinery

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) ultrasound machines, (b) gamma cameras, (c) x-ray machines and (d) CT scanners the NHS has, in which hospital trust each machine is situated; and what the age of each machine is. [132780]

Miss Melanie Johnson: There is no information held by the Department of Health concerning the location or age of ultrasound scanners or x-ray machines. The latest available published data on locations of gamma cameras is available from a survey carried out in 2000 and is published at: http://www/canceruk.net/reports/gammadata/gammadata.htm

There are currently 322 computed tomography (CT) scanners installed in the National Health Service in England.

A programme to provide an additional 50 machines was announced on 22 May 2003 as well as funding to support a programme of replacement over the next three years. We anticipate there will be approximately 375 CT scanners by the end of 2004, and by December 2006, no CT scanner will be older than 10 years.

The list of CT scanners currently installed has been placed in the Library.

Working Time Directive

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health by what date NHS hospital trusts have to submit plans for the implementation of the European Working Time Directive changes due in 2004. [133222]

Mr. Hutton: National health service trusts have been asked to prepare fully costed and robust action plans to their respective strategic health authorities by 31 December 2003.

Hypertension

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much funding his Department has contributed towards National Blood Pressure Testing Week 2003; and what targets have been set. [130112]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Department of Health has agreed to contribute the majority of the costs for the Blood Pressure Association's National Blood Pressure Testing Week 2003.

We were aiming for a minimum of 70,000 individuals in England to have their blood pressure checked during the week, but early estimates based upon a random sample of testing stations suggest that the numbers tested were double this figure.

Besides the benefit to individuals of knowing their blood pressure numbers, the National Blood Pressure Testing Week helps to extend public and professional awareness of the problem of high blood pressure people through local and national media coverage and promotion of the event.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his Department is doing to help people with uncontrolled blood pressure. [130116]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Under the proposed new general medical services (GMS) contract general practitioners will be expected to produce a register of patients detailing the percentage with coronary heart disease whose notes have a record of blood pressure in the previous 15 months, and also the percentage of patients with coronary disease, in whom the last blood pressure reading (measured in the last 15 months) is 150/90 or less. The standard for records has indicators for the recording of blood pressure in patients aged 45 and over.

Additionally, the Department of Health is taking action to help prevent high blood pressure—through our work to improve diet, particularly to reduce salt in the diet, and to increase physical activity.

Infant Formula Milk

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to ensure that the Infant Formula and Follow-on Formula Regulations 1995 are being observed. [135036]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 29 October 2003]: Day to day enforcement of these regulations is the responsibility of local authority trading standards and environmental health services. Specific guidance on the enforcement of the regulations has been issued to local authorities by the local authorities co-ordinator of regulatory services. The Food Standards Agency routinely monitors and audits local authority food law enforcement services and provides specific advice on all aspects of food law enforcement, including these regulations, on request.

Integrated Care Records

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the impact of using the integrated care records system on the time general practitioners spend with patients. [134288]

Mr. Hutton: The package of new information technology applications and systems will greatly reduce the requirement for general practitioners to chase test results, referral letters, appointments, process non-standard summaries and information around prescriptions. The wasted time through patients failing to attend appointments will also be reduced.

There are significant efficiency opportunities for GPs, and the high degree of computerisation across GP practices already collects and maintains much of the data that will become standard.

The overall result will not be a reduction in the time GPs have available to spend with their patients. Indeed, the availability of accurate and up-to-date information through the integrated care records service will improve the quality of care that GPs are able to provide to their patients.

Medical Staff

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) general practitioners, (b) hospital doctors and (c) consultants in London are over (i) 45 and (ii) 55; and what proportion of the total these figures represent. [133739]

Mr. Hutton: The number of general practitioners, hospital doctors and consultants in London broken down by age is shown in the table.

Mental Health

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the efficiency of each Mental Health Review Tribunal English administrative office; and if he will make a statement. [134196]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Each Mental Health Review Tribunal office was examined in detail during the Robert Lee review. Robert Lee reported that each office had regional variations in efficiency and practice, linked to their geographical position and workload.

The benefits of consolidating the regional offices into one model across two closely linked centres, chime with those set out in the review of tribunals and the independent review of the Mental Health Review Tribunal administration.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the benefits of establishing a single English administrative office of the Mental Health Review Tribunal; and if he will make a statement. [134197]

Ms Rosie Winterton: In 2001, Sir Andrew Leggatt reported to the Lord Chancellor on his review of tribunals. His recommendations included a central administration for all tribunals.

In early 2002, Robert Lee undertook a review of the administration of the Mental Health Review Tribunal (MHRT). He reported in October, and a key recommendation was to reduce the four MHRT offices to one in order to support consistency of practice, systems and use of resources.

Both reports supported a single administration. Current plans are to rationalise the service over two centres in London. Benefits will be:

- consistency of approach to the management and listing of cases;
- better and more flexible use of staff and judicial resources; and
- assurance for the Secretary of State for Health that his statutory obligations are met.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what factors underlay (a) the decision to maintain the two London offices of the Mental Health Review Tribunal and (b) the timing of the reorganisation; and if he will make a statement. [134198]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The decision to consolidate the administration in the two London offices is based upon the availability of suitable accommodation and the retention of as much staff expertise as possible.

The timing is part of a project plan to deliver the consolidation of the administrative model by the end of this financial year.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his policy is on access to patient records by patients with mental illnesses. [134807]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Access to patient records by any patient, regardless of whether they are mentally ill, must be in accordance with the provisions of the Data Protection Act 1998.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his policy is on access to mental health records of patients by voluntary sector bodies providing care to those patients. [134808]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Access to mental health records by voluntary sector bodies must be in accordance with the Data Protection Act 1998, common law obligations of confidentiality and other relevant legislation.

Midwifery

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many student nurses and midwives who left their courses in each year since 2000 as a result of pregnancy did not return after maternity absence. [133013]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not available centrally.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what would be the annual cost nationally of (a) continuing the bursary for student midwives who have babies during their studies, (b) paying statutory maternity pay to these students and (c) paying maternity allowance to them. [133014]

Mr. Hutton: The Department does not collect information on the number of student midwives who suspend their training as a result of pregnancy. It is not, therefore, possible to assess the cost of continuing to pay bursaries to such students. Similarly, and although students in general are not eligible for either statutory maternity pay or maternity allowance (these being dependent on a woman satisfying qualifying conditions based on employment and earnings), it is not possible to estimate the notional cost of paying either of these to any group of national health service-funded students.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many student midwives and nurses enrolled on diploma and degree courses between 2000 and 2003; how many student midwives and nurses took maternity leave within that period; and how many diploma students, who took maternity absence, were required to repay part of their bursary. [133015]

Mr. Hutton: During the period 2000–01 to 2002–03 the national health service commissioned a total of 67,020 nursing and midwifery training places, including post-registration places for those qualified nurses training in midwifery as a second professional registration.

The Department does not collect information on the number of student nurses and midwives who withdraw from or suspend their training as a result of pregnancy.

Mrs. Dean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what estimate he has made of the number of midwives needed per 100,000 of the population to provide proper safety for mothers and their babies; [133088]

(2) how many midwives per 100,000 of the population there are in (a) the East Staffordshire Primary Care Trust area and (b) England. [133089]

Mr. Hutton: The Government has not made any assessment of the number of midwives needed per 100,000 population. The Government expects there to be 2,000 more midwives being employed in the National Health Service in 2006 than there were in 2000. Since 2000, there has already been an increase of 680 midwives in the NHS. As at September 2002, there were 23,249 midwives.

Information on staff in post figures for primary care trust areas is not available. Information on the number of midwives per 100,000 population in England and Shropshire and Staffordshire Strategic Health Authority is shown in the table.

Midwives employed in the NHS per 100,000 population as at September 2002

	Headcount	Whole-time equivalents
England	47	37
Shropshire and Staffordshire SHA	44	34

The Department funded the Royal College of Midwives to produce Birthrate Plus, a tool for assessing workforce requirements in maternity units. It is for individual units and trusts to decide whether to use it.

Mrs. Dean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many places are available for midwifery training; and if he will make a statement. [133090]

Mr. Hutton: In 2002–03, there were 1,433 pre-registration training places for midwifery; a further 677 nurses entered training for a second qualification as a midwife. The Government is committed to increasing the number of training places for midwifery; the NHS Plan pledged that, by 2004, there would be 5,500 more students entering training for a first qualification to become a nurse or midwife than in 1999. Since 1999–2000, there has been an overall increase of 4,249 towards the target, including 418, or 41 per cent., more midwifery training places.

National Staff Survey

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish the results of the national staff survey. [133929]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Commission for Health Improvement is expected to publish the results of the national survey in February 2004.

NHS Estate

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 52W, on the NHS Estate and health and safety, how many (a) beds and (b) patients are normally accommodated within the floor area concerned. [134067]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 27 October 2003]: This information is not collected in the format requested.

NHS Senior Management

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS trust chief executives there are in England and Wales, broken down by (a) sex, (b) background in medicine, (c) background in nursing, (d) background in a profession allied to medicine, (e) ethnic minority and (f) disability. [133514]

Mr. Hutton: There are currently 619 national health service trust chief executives in England, of whom 393 are male and 226 are female. Chief executives are not obligated to supply information on their ethnic group, nor on their background. The available information is shown in the tables. The Department does not hold information on disability of NHS trust chief executives.

Information for Wales is a matter for the devolved administration.

NHS Spending Limits

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what total capital spending limits are set for the NHS in the next three years. [133184]

Mr. Hutton: The table shows the net national health service capital expenditure plans for 2004–05 to 2006–07 (England).

NHS University

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment he has made of the impact on the recruitment and retention of NHS staff which would occur if the NHS University were to require its students to pay tuition fees; [133887]

(2) for which courses the NHS University is considering charging tuition fees; and what the expected level of such fees is; [133888]

(3) what discussions his Department has held with (a) NHS human resources managers and (b) trade unions about the impact which charging tuition fees for NHS University courses would have on workforce development; and if he will make a statement. [133889]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 27 October 2003]: The National Health Service University (NHSU) will provide additional high quality learning opportunities at all levels for people working in health and social care. It will not generally levy charges on students for the learning opportunities offered in its initial roll-out phase. The NHSU is currently working with local employers and commissioners, through strategic health authorities, to develop its longer-term business model, and expects to attract income from a wide range of public and private sources. Any decision to levy charges on NHS staff will take account of the need to increase and widen access to education and training within health and social care. There will be appropriate consultation on these matters with all the relevant stakeholders, including employers in the sector and trades unions.

NHS Waiting Lists

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have been removed from NHS waiting lists in each of the past three years because (a) they have died and (b) they have been admitted as an emergency for the same condition. [133247]

Mr. Hutton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on Thursday 22 May 2003, Official Report, column 971W.

Nurse Training

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much (a) time and (b) weighting is placed on hygiene and cleanliness in the standard training programme for an NHS nurse. [132308]

Mr. Hutton: Information on the time and weighting of hygiene and cleanliness training in pre-registration courses is not held centrally.

Pre-registration nursing education programmes are jointly approved by the regulator, the Nursing and Midwifery Council (NMC), and the relevant higher education institution. While the content must meet NMC and EU requirements, additional content may be included to reflect the employment needs of the local service providers. The current curriculum provides a grounding in nursing that would be progressed by undertaking post-registration training.

Nursing and Midwifery Council

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many full-time staff were employed by the Nursing and Midwifery Council in each year since 2000; how many of these staff were deployed in processing (a) European applications and (b) other applications; how many applications were received in each year since 2000; what the average length of time was for dealing with applications received in each year since 2000; and how many applications received in each year since 2000 were not dealt with within this average length of time. [132886]

Mr. Hutton: The Department does not collect this information. The Nursing and Midwifery Council is responsible for publishing information about its performance.

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will provide a breakdown by country of the applications (a) received and (b) rejected by the Nursing and Midwifery Council in each year since 2000. [132889]

Mr. Hutton: The Department does not collect this information. The Nursing and Midwifery Council is responsible for publishing information about its performance on applications it has received for registration and its decisions on those applications.

Paddington Health Campus Project

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what costs have been incurred by the Paddington Health Campus project on external consultants and advisers in each of the financial years since its inception. [132566]

Mr. Hutton: A total of £3.177 million has been spent to 31 March 2003 on advisers' fees for planning the Paddington Health Campus.

£1.479 million was spent on fees until October 2000 by the former Kensington and Chelsea and Westminster Health Authority (on behalf of the West London Partnership Forum) to provide a strategic outline case and an outline business case. These costs include fees forthe town planning application submissions necessary as a component of this process.

£231,000 was spent on fees between October 2000 and March 2001 by St Mary's Hospital National Health Service Trust on behalf of the Paddington Heath Campus project, whose partner organisations are St Mary's, the Royal Brompton and Harefield NHS Trust and Imperial College London.

£520,000 was then spent on fees in the financial year 2001–02 and £947,000 in 2002–03.

Patient Forums

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what the results have been of the campaign to recruit members of the public for patient forums; [133927]

(2) how many of the patient forums he expects to have a full quota of members by 1 December 2003. [133928]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The programme of recruitment to the patients' forums is still under way. We understand the national and local advertising campaigns have elicited a large number of applications, which are currently being processed by the Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health (CPPIH).

The CPPIH is on track for achieving full forum coverage by 1 December 2003.

Pharmacies

Brian Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what framework regulates (a) mail order and (b) internet based pharmacies; what monitoring his Department undertakes of their activities; and if he will make a statement. [135397]

Ms Rosie Winterton [holding answer 30 October 2003]: Mail order and internet-based pharmacies are governed by the provisions of the Medicines Act 1968 and, if they provide national health service pharmaceutical services, by the NHS Act 1977. The Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency (MHRA) is responsible for enforcing the provisions of the Medicines Act and related legislation which regulate the sale and supply of medicines. The MHRA does not routinely monitor internet-based pharmacies. However, its enforcement group investigates any allegations of illegal activity of which it is made aware.

In addition, the Royal Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain is responsible for inspecting all pharmacy premises for registration purposes under the Medicines Act, including mail-order and internet based pharmacies. Its code of ethics and standards sets out the further professional standards required of remote delivery and on-line pharmacy services including safe and secure transportation and delivery of medicines, patient confidentiality, provision of information and advice and record keeping.

Portable Oxygen Cylinders

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 2 October 2003, Offical Report, col. 1334W, on medical equipment how many portable oxygen cylinders have been purchased for (a) England, (b) each strategic health authority and (c) each NHS trust under the contract; and if he will make a statement. [132508]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The national contract is for the rental of portable oxygen cylinders, rather than the purchase. In 2002, a review revealed 18,000 cylinders from the contract were in place in National Health Service trusts in England. Information is not held centrally for each NHS trust or strategic health authority.

Primary Care Trusts

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the impact on the Adur, Arun and Worthing primary care trust area of his Department's health policies since 1997, expressed (a) in total terms and (b) by expenditure by head of population compared with equivalent national average figures. [134780]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Figures are provided for Adur, Arun and Worthing Primary Care Trust (PCT) and in total for all PCTs in England in 2002–2003.

It is not possible to provide any historic figures due to the re-organisation of the National Health Service. The Adur, Arun and Worthing PCT has only been in existence for the one year 2002–03.

Total commissioning expenditure and expenditure per resident head of population is shown—weighted population figures are not available for PCT areas. It should also be noted that the individual and national figures are not directly comparable because the strategic health authorities would have differing commissioning policies in different areas.

Risk Management

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which hospital trusts have achieved (a) CNST Level 3 and (b) a lower level of compliance. [132383]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Information on the levels of compliance for the clinical negligence scheme for trusts, as at 31 March 2003, published by the Commission for Health Improvement has been placed in the Library.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which NHS hospital trusts (a) do and (b) do not have a current risk management/quality control system in place. [132384]

Mr. Hutton: All national health service trusts have risk management and internal control systems in place.

As part of statutory reporting, chief executives are required to sign a statement on behalf of their board to the effect that they have reviewed the effectiveness of the system of internal control. This statement is published in the annual report and accounts of every NHS organisation.

School Meals

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of 4 to 7-year-olds are entitled to participate in the national school fruit scheme; and when he expects this scheme to be in place for all children. [133910]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The national school fruit scheme will entitle every child aged four to six in local education authority schools to a free piece of fruit each school day. Children aged seven or three will also receive fruit where they share classes with children aged six or four. Region-wide pilots for the scheme have been introduced so far in four of the nine English regions, with funding from the New Opportunities Fund, and nearly half of all eligible children in England are in schools that are participating in the scheme. We are examining the practicalities of the scheme through these pilots before rolling it out nationally next year.

Severance Payments

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many severance payments in excess of (a) £500,000 and (b) £700,000, including all benefits, have been made to NHS executives serving in the areas covered by the Surrey and Sussex and South West London strategic health authorities in the past 12 months. [132385]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not held centrally.

Sight Tests

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many free sight tests were given to (a) pensioners, (b) children and (c) others in (i) West Sussex and (ii) England in each year since 1997. [134779]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The table shows the number of National Health Service sight tests paid for in West Sussex Health Authority for 1997–98 to 2002–03. Figures for the number of sight tests by age are not collected centrally. The table shows the number of sight test in the categories "children aged 0 to 15" and "patient aged 60 and over".

Eligibility to NHS sight tests was extended to those aged 60 and over from 1 April 1999. There was an increase of 2.4 million sight tests between 1998–99 and 1999–2000 in England. It is fair to assume that the vast majority of this increase was due to newly eligible people aged 60 or over obtaining NHS sight tests.

However, some patients aged 60 and over will be eligible for sight tests for other reasons as well, for example, on income grounds. The classification for such patients will depend on the patient and the practitioner. The increase in the number of sight tests for those over 60 may therefore reflect an increasing awareness of the eligibility of over 60s.

Smoking

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the incidence of smoking is in the UK, broken down by ethnic origin. [133246]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information is not available in the form requested. The available data are shown in the table.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health where the smoking cessation co-ordinators in post at 31 March 2002 were based; and how many smoking cessation co-ordinators are in post. [133914]

Miss Melanie Johnson: On 31 March 2002, there were 109 smoking cessation co-ordinators (whole time equivalent) in post in the former health authorities. Further information is not available.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much funding has been allocated for the campaign to highlight the dangers of smoking (a) in 2003–04 and (b) 2004–05. [133915]

Miss Melanie Johnson: To date, a total of £24,103,130 has been committed to the tobacco information campaign in 2003–04. The final total for this year is not yet available and the sum allocated for 2004–05 has not been set.

Private Patients

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the total amount invoiced to private patients by NHS trusts was in each of the last five years. [135911]

Mr. Hutton: The Department does not keep any information relating to such invoices.

Social Care

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the running cost of the General Social Care Council was in each of the last five years. [134809]

Dr. Ladyman: The General Social Care Council has only been in operation since October 2001. Its operating costs were £4,034,000 in the financial year 2001–02 and £9,786,000 in the financial year 2002–03, its first full year of operation.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people are employed by the General Social Care Council. [134810]

Dr. Ladyman: The General Social Care Council currently employs 119 members of staff: 113 full-time and six part-time.

Waiting Lists

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people were on in-patient waiting lists for (a) Hull Royal Infirmary and (b) Castle Hill Hospital in the last month for which figures are available. [132524]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 16 October 2003]: Information relating to individual hospital sites is not held centrally. However, as at 31 August 2003, 10,349 patients were waiting for elective inpatient admission at the Hull and East Yorkshire Hospitals National Health Service Trust, none of whom had been waiting for more than 12 months.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list hospital trusts in London which have experienced an increase in (a) in-patient, (b) out-patient and (c) total waiting lists in the past two years. [133746]

Mr. Hutton: Information is not collected centrally on the total out-patient waiting list in London. National health service trusts which have shown an increase in their elective in-patient admission waiting lists are shown in the table.

Waiting Times

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the (a) average and (b) maximum waiting time in (i) England, (ii) each strategic health authority and (iii) each NHS trust for CT scans in each of the last six years. [132781]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Data is not collected centrally on waiting times for computed tomography (CT) scans. The length of time that a patient may have to wait for a scan is dependent on their clinical condition. Emergency cases need to be seen immediately. Other cases will be carried out as quickly as possible, dependent on the clinical priority of all patients waiting to be scanned.

Where a CT scan forms part of the diagnostic process for a patient urgently referred with suspected cancer, this will be covered by the target of a maximum two months wait from urgent referral to first treatment, which will be in place for all cancers by the end of 2005.

The Cancer Capital Modernisation Fund and the NHS Cancer Plan has provided funding for 200 new and replacement CT scanners to increase the capacity of diagnostic services by 2004.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Television (Rural Areas)

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport whether she plans to change her policy on the self-help scheme to provide assistance for rural residents outside the reach of analogue television signals. [135268]

Estelle Morris: We recognise the benefit of existing analogue self help schemes in extending terrestrial television to rural communities not reached by the broadcasters' television transmitters. These schemes continue to be licensed by my Department. We will be considering the potential of self help schemes to enable communities to receive digital television services in the context of on-going work under the Digital Television Action Plan.

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what her plans are for those rural areas that will be unable to receive analogue television signals in 2010. [135269]

Estelle Morris: The Government are committed to ensuring that terrestrial analogue broadcasting signals are maintained until: everyone who can currently get the main public service broadcasting channels in analogue form (BBC1, BBC2, ITV, Channel 4/S4C and Five) can receive them on digital systems; switching to digital is an affordable option for the vast majority of people; and as a target indicator of affordability, 95 per cent. of consumers have access to digital equipment. A Digital Television Action Plan is already in place, designed to deliver these pre-conditions for switching off analogue terrestrial transmissions. A copy of the Action Plan is available at www.digitaltelevision.gov.uk.

Departmental Energy Use

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much (a) electricity and (b) other energy her Department has used in each year since 1997 (i) in total and (ii) per square metre; what the projected use is for each of the following years for which forecasts are made; what plans she has to reduce usage; and if she will make a statement. [135049]

Mr. Caborn: The figures for the Department for Culture, Media and Sport for years 1997 to 2002 were provided to the hon. Member by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), on 3 November 2003, Official Report, columns 403–06W.

In the year 2003 the Department anticipates that it will use 415,000 KWH of electricity and 346,000 KWH of gas.

Consumption Figures in Kilowatt hours per square metre are 313 for electricity and for 260 gas.

In year 2004 the Department anticipates that it will use 4,450,000 KWH for electricity and 346,000 for gas.

Consumption figures per square metre would then be 335 for electricity and 260 for gas.

The Department is initiating energy audits and is working with Office of Government Commerce contractors to reduce consumption.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will list visits made by ministers in her Department in England in each of the last five years, broken down by constituency. [135524]

Mr. Caborn: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Olympic Games

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what funding has been made available to British sportsmen and women in preparation for the Olympic Games in Athens in 2004. [135831]

Tessa Jowell: Funding to our elite sportsmen and women is provided from the National Lottery. The Government committed £100 million to support elite British Sportsmen and women in the four-year period from the Sydney to the Athens Olympics. This commitment maintains the level of lottery funding to elite athletes at the same level in the run up to the Athens Olympics as was provided in the run up to the Sydney Games.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions she has had with disability groups on the involvement of disabled people in planning for the 2012 Olympic Games bid. [135841]

Tessa Jowell: Arrangements for holding the Paralympic Games form an important and integral part of hosting the Olympic Games. London 2012 is responsible for preparing the London Olympic bid and has appointed Mike Brace, Chairman of the British Paralympic Association, as a member of its board. Disability groups have been in contact with my officials about ensuring the London Olympic bid is inclusive and delivers a sustainable legacy.

Television Licence Fee

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much was paid in television licence fees by residents of Dumfries and Galloway in the last year for which figures are available. [135254]

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much was paid in TV licence fees by residents of Chorley parliamentary constituency in each of the last five years. [135522]

Estelle Morris: The information requested is not available, since TV Licensing, who administer the television licensing system for the BBC, do not maintain statistics of television licence sales and revenues by locality.

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what percentage of television licence fee holders in (a) Dumfries and Galloway, (b) Scotland and (c) the UK are able to receive (i) all five terrestrial television channels and (ii) Freeview. [135260]

Estelle Morris: The ITC and BBC advise that the available estimates of terrestrial television coverage are as follows:

	UK households	Scotland households
Analogue BBC1, BBC2, ITV, Channel 4	99.4	98.1
Analogue Five	80	[1]
Freeview digital terrestrial television (all multiplexes)	73.1	80.5

[1] Estimate not available

Further details of Five analogue terrestrial television coverage can be found at the website: www.five.tv and details of digital terrestrial television coverage at: www.dtg.org.uk and www.freeview.co.uk.

TRANSPORT

RAF Lyneham

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to increase air freight traffic through Lyneham; and if he will make a statement. [135023]

Mr. Ingram: I have been asked to reply.

I have taken the hon. Member's question to refer to civilian freight traffic. No steps have been taken to increase such traffic through RAF Lyneham; requests are considered on a case-by-case basis and are fulfilled on repayment terms, using irreducible spare capacity at the Station.

Air Travel

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the total demand for air travel in the UK in 2060, expressed as a multiple of the present number of passengers using Heathrow, on the basis of the forecast rates of growth used to calculate the economic benefits of various runway options in the consultation on the Future of Air Transport. [135187]

Dr. Howells: The forecasts presented in the consultation document, "The Future Development of Air Transport in the United Kingdom: South East", 2002, extended to 2030. No forecast has been made of the total demand for air travel in the UK in 2060. However, for the purposes of the analysis of economic benefits of runway options, the forecasts were projected forward to 2060, assuming a 50 per cent. increase in demand from 2030 to 2060.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to the answer of 11 September 2003, Official Report, column 373W, on air travel, what estimate has been made of the percentage change in the cost of air travel from 2000 to 2030, if no new runways were to be built in the UK. [135218]

Dr. Howells: The mid point forecasts in the consultation document: The Future Development of Air Transport in the United Kingdom-South East, assumed an underlying trend reduction in air fares of 1 per cent. per annum. In addition to this, if no new runways were built in the South East, passengers at Heathrow would pay a fare premium of £67.50 on a single journey in 2030. This fare premium would be higher if airport capacity outside the South East was also constrained, but no estimate has been made of this. The combined effect of these two factors would be an 18 per cent. increase in the cost of air travel in this case.

Airport Infrastructure

Mr. Challen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what (a) financial and (b) other support his Department will provide for new airport infrastructure, including associated transport links. [135651]

Mr. McNulty: The question of Government support for any new airport infrastructure is being considered in the context of decisions about future development. In our consultation, we invited views on the use of public money to support airport development and surface transport links, and we are analysing the responses. We will set out our policy in the air transport White Paper.

Deep Vein Thrombosis

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what funding the Government have contributed to the World Health Organisation's research into deep vein thrombosis; and what progress has been made in the research. [135477]

Mr. McNulty: To date, the Government have contributed approximately £400,000 to the WHO research project. We expect our total contribution to be in excess of £1.1 million. Epidemiological studies are being carried out in the Netherlands: two at the Leiden University Medical Centre and one at the Amsterdam Medical Centre. Clinical and physiopathological studies are being carried out in the UK.

At the Leiden centre, work is well advanced on the cohort study among business travellers, following a successful pilot study of the employees of an international company in Switzerland. The proposed methodology for the case-control study among frequent travellers was also piloted. However, for technical reasons an alternative methodology has been proposed, which I understand the Scientific Executive Committee responsible for the research protocols has approved in principle. At the Amsterdam centre, following extensive planning and preparation, the first test of the travel and non-travel immobility study will start shortly. This will comprise an eight-hour flight before, during and after which blood samples from volunteer passengers will be drawn for examination. Further tests will be carried out on the same volunteers to assess their clinical response to eight hours immobility, without travel, and eight hours engaged in normal activities.

The other stream of the research, examining the effects of hypobaria and hypoxia on the risk of deep vein thrombosis, is already under way under the auspices of Leicester University. Hypobaric chamber tests are being carried out at the aviation medical facilities at RAF Henlow to examine the effects of reduced atmospheric pressure on the cardio-vascular systems of volunteers seated for eight hours.

The World Health Organisation is due to publish the results of the research at the end of 2004 or early 2005.

Departmental Energy Use

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much (a) electricity and (b) other energy his Department has used in each year since 1997 (i) in total and (ii) per square metre; what the projected use is for each of the following years for which forecasts are made; what plans he has to reduce usage; and if he will make a statement. [135059]

Mr. McNulty: In respect of (a) and (b) I would refer the hon. Member to the answer given by the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw) on 3 November 2003, Official Report, columns 403–08W.

Energy management is delegated to local energy managers who are responsible for assessing usage and tailoring procurement decisions and awareness campaigns accordingly.

The Department is committed in its Greening Operations Policy Statement to reducing energy usage. The Department will communicate with staff and contractors about environmental policies and best practice and continue with office equipment 'switch off' and other energy awareness campaigns.

Airports Consultation

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether the report of the Inspector of the Terminal 5 Inquiry at Heathrow is included as part of the consultation into Future Development of Air Transport in the UK; [135291]

(2) if he will uphold the recommendations of the Inspector for the Heathrow Terminal 5 Inquiry in the forthcoming Aviation White Paper. [135292]

Mr. McNulty: In his decision of 20 November 2001 on the Heathrow Terminal 5 planning application, the then Secretary of State for Transport, Local Government and the Regions said that matters about the future of Heathrow airport (other than his decision on Terminal 5) would be for the review of airports policy and this would take account of the Inquiry Inspector's comments.

Paragraph 7.2 of "The Future Development of Air Transport in the United Kingdom: South East" consultation referred to the approval for Terminal 5 at Heathrow.

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether nitrogen dioxide is assessed as a relevant pollutant in section 7.29 of the Government's consultation paper The Future Development of Air Transport in the United Kingdom. [135293]

Mr. McNulty: Yes.

M5 (Roadworks)

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the (a) current and (b) projected roadworks on the M5 motorway between Bristol and Tiverton; and how long each section of work is expected to take. [135423]

Mr. Jamieson: I have asked the Acting Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Stephen Hickey, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Richard Bennett to Mr Adrian Flook, dated 4 November 2003:

I am writing on behalf of Stephen Mickey, who has been asked by David Jamieson to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the current and projected roadworks on the M5 motorway

The Highways Agency has a four-year rolling programme of works. This includes resurfacing (including overlay of concrete roads), the upgrade of signs and safety fence installations well as improvements to reduce congestion. Those works due to begin in this financial year are listed in Table 1. Those due to start in the next financial year are still subject to decisions on funding and prioritisation before a list can be provided.

Table 1

Scheme title and location	Approximate works duration
Works currently undertaken
M5 Junction 20–21 Resurfacing	Eight weeks
Works to be undertaken in 2003–04
M5 Junction 26–27 Concrete Resurfacing	13 weeks (starts March 04)
M5 Signing Upgrade	Rolling Programme
M5 Junction 19 Park and Ride Signing	Four weeks

Motorcycling

Lembit Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what assessment he has made of the safety proposals of the Government Advisory Group for Motorcycling; and if he will make a statement; [135880]

(2) what plans he has to introduce safety-related legislation regarding the use of motorised two wheelers; and if he will make a statement; [135881]

(3) what plans he has to promote motorcycles as an environmentally friendly alternative to cars; and if he will make a statement. [135882]

Mr. Jamieson: The Advisory Group on Motorcycling, which I chair, has been considering a range of issues related to the role of motorcycling, including safety and environmental performance. The Advisory Group is not due to report until next year, following which the Government will determine its strategy for motorcycling. It is too early to say what Government policy will include, as it would be inappropriate to pre-empt the findings of the Advisory Group.

Public Transport (Safety and Security)

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action the Government is taking to increase the (a) security and (b) safety of public transport in London. [135383]

Mr. McNulty: The Government fully support the British Transport Police (BTP) who as the police force for London's railways and London Underground are an integral part of the city's anti-terrorism policing strategy. There is very close liaison and co-operation between BTP and the rail industry, Transport For London (TfL), Government departments, the Metropolitan Police and other emergency services at all levels. The Health & Safety Executive, as rail regulator, also work closely with London Underground and the national rail operators on safety related issues.

In addition, TfL is part of a joint initiative with the Metropolitan police—the Transport Policing Initiative, which is aimed particularly at increasing safety and security on London's bus services.

The Secretary of State for Transport also issues the Strategic Rail Authority (SRA) with directions and guidance, which require the SRA to encourage train operators to participate in both the Secure Stations and Secure Car Park schemes, which award accreditation when specified standards of design and management are reached. Further to this, the Modern Facilities at Stations programme will provide CCTV at some of London's stations.

Rail Traffic Congestion (Birmingham New Street)

Richard Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the impact of rail traffic congestion at and around Birmingham New Street station on the performance of the national rail network. [135373]

Mr. McNulty: The Strategic Rail Authority (SRA) has developed a 'Capacity Utilisation Policy' aimed at delivering the most efficient use of the current network. Individual 'Route Utilisation Strategies' (RUS) will now be developed. The SRA intends to consult on the RUS for the West Midlands in Spring 2004. The outcomes are expected to include improved capacity and performance.

The SRA has also announced a new approach to the long term planning of the railway network through Regional Planning Assessments (RPAs). These will form the basis on which the development of Britain's railway is planned over the medium to longer term (5–20 years). The provisional date for the publication of the West Midlands RPA is Autumn 2004.

Railway Stations

John Thurso: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to his answer of 17 July 2003, Official Report, column 618W, on station improvements, if he will list the stations where improvements are (a) taking place and (b) being considered. [131454]

Mr. McNulty: Further to the answer I gave to the hon. Gentleman of 17 July: at Table 1 is a list of the Strategic Rail Authority's Rail Passenger Partnership (RPP) schemes that include station improvements and which have been approved for RPP funding. Table 2 lists a further 68 stations that are being considered by the Authority under its Modern Facilities at Stations Scheme (MFAS). The SRA and Network Rail are currently developing a schedule of work for the stations included in the programme. The timetable has yet to be finalised. Table 3 is a list of schemes in Scotland. Some of these are funded through RPP and some through the Incremental Outputs Statements scheme (IOS). In other cases new stations are also being provided as part of a wider project.

[3] Jointly funded through the SRA's Incremental Output Statements scheme and the Scottish Executive's Integrated Transport Fund

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects that Liverpool Lime Street station will be owned by Network Rail; and if he will make a statement. [136452]

Mr. McNulty: In common with the other 2,500 railway stations on the rail network, Liverpool Lime Street is already owned by Network Rail.

Network Rail are, however, in negotiations with First North Western to take operational control of the station. Network Rail inform me that negotiations are well advanced.

Speed Limits

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received in support of a review of the speed limits on roads; and what plans he has to undertake such a review. [135299]

Mr. Jamieson: The Road Safety Strategy, published in March 2000 gave a commitment to review guidance on setting local speed limits. The Transport Select Committee on Road Traffic Speed that reported last year also recommended a review of speed limit guidance and this was supported by local authorities and road safety professionals.

Work has already started on revised guidance to local authorities and we expect a first draft to be available in spring 2004.

Stansted Airport

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment his Department has made of the cross-subsidy in favour of Stansted Airport. [135629]

Mr. McNulty: Stansted is a designated airport subject to price cap regulation under the 1986 Airports Act. As such, the issue of cross-subsidy in favour of Stansted was considered by the CAA as part of its price cap review and decisions on BAA's London airports, published in February 2003. The Government will set out their policy on this issue in the Air Transport White Paper.

Transport Managers

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether it is mandatory for a transport manager to be in the employment of the licence holder under EU Directive 96/26. [135272]

Mr. Jamieson: Section 58 of the Goods Vehicles (Licensing of Operators) Act 1995 defines a transport manager as > "an individual who is in, or is engaged to enter into, the employment of the holder of a standard licence who, either alone or jointly with one or more other persons, has continuous and effective responsibility for the management of the transport operations of the business".

This complies with the requirements of EU Directive 96/26/EC in respect of transport managers.

It is for the statutorily independent traffic commissioners who administer the goods operator licensing system to interpret the law and to satisfy themselves that transport managers meet its requirements.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Afghanistan

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the extent to which the Administration of Mr. Hamid Karzai is considered to be a credible national Government across Afghanistan; and if he will make a statement. [133623]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: President Karzai and the Afghan Transitional Administration (ATA) are the legitimate Government of Afghanistan, following President Karzai's election by the Emergency Loya Jirga in June 2002.

Convention on Certain Conventional Weapons

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his Department's aims are at the Convention on Conventional Weapons negotiations in November; and if he will make a statement. [135848]

Mr. MacShane: The Government recognises the importance of the Convention on Certain Conventional Weapons and will continue to play an active role in the negotiations at the United Nations in Geneva. Our immediate aims for the November meeting will be to continue to work for conclusion of an agreement on a new and legally binding instrument on Explosive Remnants of War (ERW) and to reach consensus on a negotiating mandate for 2004 to take forward constructive work on Mines Other Than Anti-Personnel Mines (MOTAPMS).

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether his Department's representatives at the Convention on Certain Conventional Weapons negotiations in November will seek agreement on a mandate for future negotiations on cluster munitions. [135849]

Mr. MacShane: The UK will seek a mandate for negotiations on an instrument that could contain technical standards to be phased in for cluster munitions. This would aim to improve the reliability of cluster munitions so that fewer of them remain unexploded.

Ethiopia/Eritrea

Jeremy Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has held with the generals of (a) Ethiopia and (b) Eritrea concerning the implementation of the decision on the border dispute; and if he will make a statement. [136530]

Mr. Mullin: We have had no direct discussions with generals on either side on this subject. However, the UN Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea (UNMEE) Forces Commander has had regular, joint discussions with the military commanders of both sides in the Military Co-ordination Committee (MCC). And we are in close touch with the Governments of both countries.

European Commission Vacancies

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what role the UK representative office has in selecting candidates for European Commission vacancies; what guidelines have been issued on this process; and if he will make a statement. [135891]

Mr. MacShane: The European Commission is responsible for selecting candidates for vacancies within its services. Most such vacancies are filled through internal procedures by permanent Commission employees who have been recruited through open competition. For a small number of temporary appointments the Commission inform member states of vacancies and invite them to submit names of potential candidates. A Commission Selection Committee decides on such appointments.

Iraq

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the implications of opening Basra International Airport to non-governmental commercial and passenger flights for (a) trade with and (b) the reconstruction of Iraq. [135361]

Mr. Rammell: Opening Basra airport to commercial aviation would have a positive effect on trade and reconstruction. We intend that the airport should be opened to commercial aviation as soon as possible once the relevant security and other requirements have been met.

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions the coalition governments have had with Red Crescent officials regarding involvement in Iraq; and if he will make a statement. [135598]

Mr. Rammell: The Coalition Provisional Authority has had contacts with the Iraqi Red Crescent Society, which is active throughout the country. The Iraqi Red Crescent Society works with the local authorities in the search for, and identification of bodies in, mass graves; contacting families and assisting with burials; basic first aid; ambulance services; and rehabilitation of its four hospitals.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the United States State Department informed the Government of the outcome of the work undertaken by the working groups on the likely political, economic and security situation in a post-invasion Iraq. [135628]

Mr. MacShane: There have been frequent and regular meetings between the Government and members of the United States State Department before, during and after the conflict, at which all aspects of policy in Iraq have been discussed.

Land Mines

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what he is doing to combat the (a) production and (b) export of land mines worldwide. [136477]

Mr. Rammell: The Government considers universalisation of the Ottawa Convention to be the best means of combating the production, use, stockpiling or transfer of anti-personnel land mines. The United Kingdom was among the first states to ratify the Convention and continues to play a leading role in follow-up work, including encouraging the widest possible adherence to the treaty. Through our diplomatic missions overseas we have recently lobbied states not party to the Convention, urging their ratification or accession at the earliest opportunity.

Religious Freedom (Egypt)

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will raise the issue of religious freedom with the Egyptian Government and urge it to permit Muslim converts to Christianity to change their (a) religion and (b) names in their identity papers. [135499]

Mr. Rammell: The British Government is committed to promoting tolerance and mutual respect between religions. Although the majority of people in Egypt are Muslim, there is a large Christian minority who are free to practice their own religion. The Egyptian State upholds Article 18 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and their obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Egyptian citizens are therefore free to convert to Christianity. The lack of an administrative provision for converts to Christianity to change their religious affiliation on their identity cards is a problem. We understand that a suit has been brought in the Egyptian courts to remove this affiliation altogether.

Serbia

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans there are to rebuild the bridges at Novi Sad; and if he will make a statement. [135599]

Mr. MacShane: The 3 bridges destroyed at Novi Sad during the 1999 NATO intervention have been replaced. However, one of these is a temporary pontoon structure, which will be removed on completion of a €40 million European-Union funded reconstruction of the 'Sloboda' bridge, due in May 2005. The EU also contributed €22 million to the successful clearance of bris and unexploded ordnance from the riverbed, which was completed in June 2003.

Stability Pact

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of the European Union's Stability Pact for the Balkans; what projects have been completed; what projects are under way; what stage they are at; when they are estimated to be completed; what projects have been agreed to but have not yet commenced; what projects have been submitted for consideration and are awaiting decision; and which of these relate to Serbia and Montenegro. [135440]

Mr. MacShane: The Stability Pact for South Eastern Europe was established in 1999. It has helped the region address a wide range of issues in support of stabilisation, development and reform. The Stability Pact's activity is divided into three Working Tables: Human Rights and Democratisation (Working Table I); Economic Reconstruction, Development and Cooperation (Working Table II); and Security Issues (Working Table III). The Pact's umbrella currently covers 26 different initiatives. The Pact has six priorities for 2003: Local Democracy and Cross Border Cooperation; Media (both Working Table I): Regional Infrastructure/ Energy; Trade and Investment (both Working Table II); Organised Crime; and Managing and Stabilising Population Movements (both Working Table III).

The Pact has no budget (except for its own Secretariat) with which to fund or implement projects. Its principal function is to act as a conduit for project implementers and donors. It is therefore difficult to provide information on the status of projects profiled under the auspices of the Pact, as these remain owned by the donor(s).

In relation to Serbia and Montenegro (SaM), the Pact has helped with the following items under the six priorities during 2003:

Local Democracy and Cross Border Cooperation

Launch of the Nis-Skopje-Sofia local government Euroregion initiative.

Establishment of a network of National Associations and Local Authorities in South Eastern Europe (which will cover SaM).

Media

Production of a grid of media related projects (the most recent version had nine projects relating specifically to SaM).

Support for implementation of broadcast legislation in Montenegro.

Identification of donor funds to support specialist schools of journalism in the region, including one in Podgorica.

Regional Infrastructure/Energy

Support for Industry Round Tables in Prague in February and Sofia in October.

Assistance for a meeting of senior government Energy advisers from the region in Vienna in June was supported. SaM representatives participated in these.

Trade and Investment

Facilitation of discussions to help overcome obstacles to the practical implementation of SaM's bilateral free-trade agreements with the rest of the region.

Organised Crime

Experts' meetings organised within the South Eastern European Cooperation Process in June and October. SaM representatives attended these meetings.

Managing and Stabilising Population Movements

Facilitation of discussions on resolving the issue of pension payments for returnees between SaM and Croatia.

Support for a comprehensive return agreement between SaM and Bosnia Herzegovina, signed in October.

Further details can be found on the Stability Pact's website (www.stabilitypact.org).

Sudan

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps his Department is taking to (a) promote respect for human rights and justice among participants in the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development sponsored peace process in Sudan and (b) encourage the inclusion and participation in the peace process of hitherto excluded political parties and civil society groups. [136223]

Mr. Mullin: In their decision to end the civil war, the parties recognise that the principle of human rights must be at the core of any peace agreement. We have taken every opportunity to reiterate this message. On 14 October the Government of Sudan released from house arrest Dr. Hassan al-Turabi, the leader of the Popular National Congress, as well as other political prisoners. We welcome this step towards reconciliation of all parties.

We are considering ways to strengthen civil society participation in consolidating peace and, with others, to support the establishment of a Human Rights Commission and other relevant institutions following a peace agreement. We will also look at ways to support the development of an effective public administration and judicial system throughout Sudan.

Human Rights is at the forefront of our policy in helping Sudan reach a comprehensive peace agreement.

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department has made to the Government of Sudan since the end of the temporary ceasefire on finding a political solution to the conflict in Darfur. [136225]

Mr. Mullin: Our Embassy in Khartoum continues to focus on the issue of Darfur and is following closely both the humanitarian situation and the political dialogue at the Abeche peace talks.

We believe that the Abeche Agreement did not stipulate an end to the cease-fire and we call on both parties to respect that agreement. Our Ambassador to Sudan has spoken to the Government of Sudan on a number of occasions, and continues to do so, about the need for a process of political engagement.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Sudan on the house detention of Dr. Hassan al-Turabi. [136492]

Mr. Mullin: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to him on 23 October 2003, Official Report, column 713W. Dr. Hassan al-Turabi, and other political prisoners, were released on 13 October 2003.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the security agreement signed between the government of Sudan and the Sudan People's Liberation Army/Movement; and what assessment he has made of the prospects for long-lasting peace in Sudan. [136494]

Mr. Mullin: I refer my hon. Friend to the joint press statement made by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and my noble Friend the then Secretary of State for International Development (Baroness Amos) on 25 September in which they welcomed the Framework Agreement on Security Arrangements during the Interim Period. A copy of the statement is available on the Foreign and Commonwealth Office website: www.fco.gov.uk/policy/news/press-releases. We believe that this is a reflection of the commitment of both Parties and an important step towards peace.

We are encouraged by the progress made so far and are optimistic for the prospects of peace in the long term.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he has taken to trail assets moved by spouses and children of senior ZANU PF officials; and if he will make a statement. [135259]

Mr. Mullin: In 2002 the EU imposed an asset freeze on senior members of the Zimbabwe government. The list of targets includes Grace Mugabe, Robert Mugabe's wife. We are obliged to locate and freeze any assets held by her in the UK. While no other spouses or children of senior Zanu PF officials are on the sanctions list, if a UK bank suspects that an account in someone else's name is being used by or for a Zimbabwean on the sanctions list then it should be reported to the Bank of England.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response he has made to the threat by Mr. Robert Mugabe to use British citizens as hostages in the event of British action. [135310]

Mr. Mullin: Mugabe has made a range of threats in response to alleged British plans to intervene in Zimbabwe. There are no such plans.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his response to the Eighth Report of Session 2002–03 from the Foreign Affairs Committee on Zimbabwe, if he will now revisit his decision not to take steps to strip Mr. Robert Mugabe of his honorary knighthood. [135342]

Mr. Mullin: Our position on this remains unchanged. We do not view the removal of Mugabe's honorary knighthood, conferred on him in 1994, on the recommendation of the previous government, as an immediate priority. Our current efforts are focused on providing humanitarian assistance to the people of Zimbabwe, whilst encouraging the return of a democratically accountable government which respects human rights and the rule of law. We may nevertheless revisit this question in the future.

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his plans for (a) the consular section of the British High Commission in Harare and (b) the processing of applications for entry clearance from Zimbabwean nationals. [135428]

Mr. Mullin: The High Commission in Harare is currently offering a full range of consular and entry clearance services. There are no plans to change the consular services provided by the British High Commission in Harare, including the processing of entry clearance applications.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION

Expenditure

Mr. Prisk: To ask the hon. Member for Gosport, representing the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission what total expenditure by the Electoral Commission has been on (a) consultations, (b) pilot schemes, (c) conferences, (d) publications and (e) staffing costs for each financial year from 2001; and if he will make a statement. [135068]

Mr. Viggers: Total expenditure by the Electoral Commission, rounded to the nearest £1,000, on (a) consultations, (b) pilot schemes, (c) conferences, (d) publications and (e) staffing costs, for each financial year from 1 April 2001, is set out in the following table:

£000

	(a) Consultations	(b) Pilot schemes	(c) Conferences	(d) Publications	(e) Staffing
2001–02	69	n/a	1	697	1,371
2002–03	964	168	45	1,548	3,136
2003–04[1]	672	701	59	563	2,044

[1] To end September 2003.

Notes:

1. Figures given in columns (a) and (b) exclude staffing, publications and conference costs relating to these work streams. These costs appear as part of the global figures in columns (c), (d) and (e).
2. Consultation costs include consultation activities and public opinion research undertaken by the Electoral Commission in relation to policy reviews under section 6 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA) and to inform the preparation of statutory election reports under section 5 of PPERA. It also includes consultation exercises carried out by the Boundary Committee for England since April 2002 in relation to Periodic Electoral Reviews. Boundary Committee for England costs associated with consultations carried out as part of the current Local Government Reviews are also included; however, there is an offsetting Appropriation in Aid from the budget of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to meet these costs.
3. The Boundary Committee for England was established as part of The Electoral Commission on 1 April 2002. Costs for 2001–02 therefore do not include the costs associated with periodic electoral reviews of English local authorities, which in that year were being undertaken by the Local Government Commission for England.
4. The Commission first evaluated an electoral pilot scheme in April 2002. No costs were therefore incurred in 2001–02.
5. Staffing costs include secondees and agency staff.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Double Summer Time

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what research she has commissioned on the effects of the possible introduction of double summertime. [135833]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The Government have no current plans to alter the present summer time arrangements as previous research concluded that the disadvantages outweighed the benefits.

Fireworks

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps she is taking to tackle the public use of Chinese fireworks; and if she will make a statement. [135756]

Mr. Sutcliffe: Most fireworks sold to the general public in the United Kingdom originate in China. But whether fireworks are imported or made here in the UK, all which are intended for use by the general public must meet the requirements of the Fireworks (Safety) Regulations 1997 and the British Standard BS 7114, the safety standard governing the safe construction, testing and labelling of consumer fireworks.

We advise the public therefore to buy only fireworks marked as complying with "BS 7114 Part 2". Also it is illegal for shopkeepers to sell fireworks to the public which do not meet the requirements of the Fireworks (Safety) Regulations 1997 and BS 7114.

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) in respect of what (a) weight and (b) number of items of fireworks import licences were granted to Global Fireworks Ltd. (i) prior to 5 April 2002, (ii) between 6 April 2002 and 5 April 2003 and (iii) from 6 April 2003 to date; [135638]

(2) how many import licences for fireworks were granted to Global Fireworks Ltd. (a) prior to 5 April 2002, (b) between 6 April 2002 and 5 April 2003 and (c) from 6 April 2003 to date. [135646]

Mr. Sutcliffe: Licensing controls on imports of fireworks from China applied from 15 March 1994 to 10 March 2003. Licences specified weight of shipment rather than the number of items. The ending of the licensing regime was one of the conditions of China's entry into the World Trade Organisation (WTO). The following licences were issued to Global Fireworks Ltd.:

(a) Prior to 5 April 2002: four licences totalling 103,608 kg

(b) Between 6 April 2002 and 5 April 2003: no licences issued

(c) From 6 April 2003 to date: no licences issued.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps she is taking to tackle the sale of illegal fireworks through the internet; and if she will make a statement. [135784]

Mr. Sutcliffe: United Kingdom based companies selling over the internet are subject to the provisions of the Fireworks (Safety) Regulations 1997. We cannot legislate for those companies who operate outside the UK. However, we advise consumers to exercise the utmost caution when buying fireworks over the internet from outside the UK. Also it is illegal to supply fireworks in the UK which have not been classified by Health and Safety Executive's Explosives Inspectorate.

Scottish Aerospace Strategy

Sir Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of the efficacy of the Scottish Aerospace Strategy Initiative; what plans she has to establish a similar strategy for the aerospace industry in the North West of England; what discussions she has had with the Scotland Office about developing the aerospace industry in Scotland; and if she will make a statement. [134013]

Jacqui Smith: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has made no assessment of the efficacy of the Scottish Aerospace Strategy Initiative, as this is a matter of economic development and devolved to the Scottish Executive.

In May 2002, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry established the Aerospace Innovation and Growth Team (AeIGT) to produce a 20-year vision for the future of the aerospace industry across the whole of the UK and to make recommendations as to how to make that vision a reality. Those recommendations were published in June 2003 and give strategic direction for the aerospace industry across the UK, including the North West of England. The Chairman of the North West Regional Development Agency is a member of the AeIGT and continues to be, closely involved in its work. It is for the North West Regional Development Agency to consider the need for a regional strategy.

The Department has an on-going relationship with the Scottish Executive and its economic development agencies both as part of the dialogue of Working with the Regions and Devolved Administrations and in the context of the implementation of the AeIGT report.

Airbus/Aircraft Carrier Projects

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her policy is on the provision of launch aid to businesses in the supply chain for (a) Airbus and (b) aircraft carrier projects. [135405]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 30 October 2003]: The provision of Launch Investment is entirely discretionary. Each application is considered on its merits against a range of established criteria and against public expenditure constraints.

The Government are currently investing £530 million of Launch Investment to Airbus UK for the design and development of the Airbus A380 wings. The support provided to the prime contractor such as Airbus UK benefits the whole of the supply chain by securing strategically important projects for the UK. On the A380 programme more than 400 companies located throughout the UK are already contributing to the programme.

Launch Investment is only available to the civil aerospace sector and therefore aircraft carrier projects would not be eligible for support.

Arms Trade

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) pursuant to her answer of 6 October 2003, Official Report, column 1067W, whether her Department's proposals for secondary orders under the Export Control Act 2002 will comply with the text adopted by the plenary session of the European Parliament on 19 June 2003 (B5–0312/2003); [135102]

(2) pursuant to her answer of 6 October 2003, Official Report, column 1069W, if she will change her proposals on the secondary orders on export control to comply with the text adopted by the plenary session of the European Parliament on 19 June 2003 B5–0312/2003, regarding (a) full extraterritorial control and (b) a register of arms dealers. [135103]

Nigel Griffiths: The European Parliament resolution is exhortatory so the question of compliance with it does not arise.

Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many exhibitors at the recent Arms Trade Fair in London did not have licences to trade and possess such weapons in the United Kingdom; what proportion of the total exhibitors and traders were unlicensed; and on what basis they were allowed to continue to participate in the fair. [134905]

Caroline Flint: I have been asked to reply.

I understand from the Metropolitan police that 44 out of some 1,000 exhibitors required certificates of registration as firearms dealers. Of those, 41 needed the authority of the Secretary of State under section 5 of the Firearms Act 1968 to possess prohibited weapons. Many of the exhibitors were exhibiting items such as boats, vehicles, equipment and clothing for which no licensing was required.

A total of nine exhibitors arrived without the necessary documentation and arrangements were made for this to be rectified before they were allowed to exhibit any firearms.

Broadband

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will estimate the cost of broadband telecommunications charges to public bodies within the Ribble Valley constituency in 2002–03; and what plans there are for improving value for money. [131699]

Mr. Timms: Estimates of the cost of broadband telecommunications charges to public bodies within the Ribble Valley-constituency in 2002–03 are not available.

The Government are improving value for money through the aggregation of public sector demand for broadband connectivity. In the coming month, nine new Regional Aggregation Bodies (RABs) will be set up, one in each of the English regions to join up individual public sector requirements and present them to the market in larger units. They will deliver better value deals and drive up availability by making it more attractive to telecommunications companies to make the capital investment necessary to provide broadband in new areas. Their work will also improve broadband availability for non-public sector users in those areas by encouraging service providers to use the infrastructure to provide broadband services to the public and small businesses.

Community Interest Companies

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the timescale for the introduction of community interest companies. [136087]

Jacqui Smith: I announced in a Written Ministerial Statement on 10 July 2003, Official Report, column 62WS, that the Government intend to move ahead with legislation on Community Interest Companies, alongside some company law issues, as soon as parliamentary time allows.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions she has had with the Secretary of State for Health on the introduction of community interest companies as a means for delivering foundation hospitals. [136088]

Jacqui Smith: None. Subject to legislation, NHS Foundation Trusts are to be incorporated as public benefit corporations, as set out in the Guide to NHS Foundation Trusts and the Health and Social Care (Community Health and Standards) Bill.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will list the contributors to the Government's consultation on community interest companies. [136089]

Jacqui Smith: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced in a Written Ministerial Statement on 22 October 2003, Official Report, column 41WS, that a report on the outcome of the consultation on Community Interest Companies has been published. A list of the 134 respondents to the consultation is included at Annex A of the report. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of the Houses and on the DTI website.

European Software Patent Directive

Adam Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the Government's policy on the European Software Patent Directive. [135283]

Ms Hewitt: The Government's policy remains the same as that announced in 2001 after a public consultation on the patentability of software. The Government's conclusion from that consultation was to reaffirm the principle that patents are for technological innovations. Software should not be patentable where there is no technological innovation, and technological innovations should not cease to be patentable merely because the innovation lies in software. However, the consultation also concluded that business methods should remain unpatentable.

Subsequently, we have supported the introduction by the European Commission of a draft Directive on the Patentability of Computer-Implemented Inventions, in order to clarify the legal position across the European Union. Discussions on this Directive are on-going and I await the outcome of further discussions between the EU institutions on its progress.

Interpol

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to her answer of 6 October 2003, Official Report, column 1069W, on Interpol, for what reason her Department does not use Interpol's international weapons and explosives tracking system. [135113]

Nigel Griffiths: The DTI does not have responsibility for tracking weapons or explosives.

Manufacturing

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to encourage an increase in the capital per worker ratio in UK manufacturing. [134869]

Jacqui Smith: By maintaining a stable macroeconomic environment, together with measures such as reforming capital gains tax, making permanent enhanced capital allowances for small and medium-sized firms, and introducing the Research and Development Tax Credit, we are providing a climate conducive to investment for the long-term in UK manufacturing.

The global slowdown in 2001 and added uncertainty in 2002 have led firms to postpone investment decisions, but the UK's strong economic fundamentals mean that manufacturers are well placed to benefit when the global recovery shifts up a gear.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on manufacturing industry. [135581]

Jacqui Smith: While we should remain cautious, we may now be at the start of a recovery path, with positive data from the last four Chartered Institute of Purchasing and Supply (CIPS) surveys and manufacturing output from the Office for National Statistics up by 0.5 per cent. in the three months to August. However, the sector clearly remains under considerable pressure and we are doing all we can to help.

For example, the Manufacturing Advisory Service has been a real success as a major source of advice and support for small- and medium-sized manufacturers. Since it launched in April 2002, the Manufacturing Advisory Service has handled over 17,000 enquiries from manufacturing companies and has carried out over 3,000 diagnostic and advisory visits. Over 1,000 firms have benefited from in-depth consultancies to help them improve their productivity. The total value added benefit to firms helped by the Manufacturing Advisory Service is over £18 million.

Martu Aborigines

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment her Department has made of the (a) impact on and (b) cost to UK companies of the reclamation of land in 2002 by the Martu Aborigines of Western Australia; and if she will make a statement. [133640]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: None. Since no representations have been made to the Department on this issue.

Oil and Gas Industry

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations the Government have received from (a) the Oil and Gas Industry Liaison Team and (b) other parties concerning the proposed Energy Chapter in the draft European Constitution; and if she will make a statement. [135884]

Mr. Timms: The Oil and Gas Industry Liaison Team, in an open letter to the my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 22 October 2003, set out their view of the implications for the UK oil and gas industry posed by the Energy Chapter of the draft European Constitution. A number of organisations with UK oil and gas interests have also made representations to Ministers. Under the Treaty establishing the European Community, there is already Union activity in energy matters and we believe there is a strong case for making the legal base for policy in this area more transparent. However, the UK Government will only agree to an extension of competence in energy policy if it is consistent with British national interests.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what overseas visits (a) she and (b) her ministerial colleagues plan to make in the next year to promote trade with the United Kingdom. [135475]

Ms Hewitt: Next year's overseas visits programme for Ministers, in support of trade development and policy, has yet to be finalised. All plans will take into account other travel proposals across Government.

Post Office Closures

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many sub-post offices have closed in (a) Haltemprice and Howden constituency and (b) the East Riding of Yorkshire in (i) each of the last 12 months and (ii) the previous five years. [135923]

Mr. Timms: I am advised by Post Office Ltd. that data on post office numbers is not available in the form requested.

However, I understand that since March 2000 the company has recorded details of post office closures on the basis of Government Region and in the Yorkshire and Humberside Region as a whole, the numbers of net closures were as follows:

2000–01: 50

2002–03: 26 (including seven closures under the urban reinvention programme)

Post Office Ltd. produces information on post office closures on a quarterly basis. There were 19 net closures (including 18 closures under the urban reinvention programme) of post offices in the Yorkshire and Humberside Region to the end of June 2003, the latest quarter for which figures are currently available.

Pottery Products

Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent meetings she has had with her counterpart in the United States of America to discuss import tariffs on United Kingdom pottery products; and if she will make a statement. [135478]

Ms Hewitt: US tariffs on pottery products are being addressed as part of the ongoing WTO Doha Development Agenda multilateral negotiations on market access for non-agricultural products. In these talks the EU negotiates as one and maintains regular contact with other WTO members including the United States of America.

Printer Cartridges

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what steps her Department is taking to encourage the manufacture of reusable printer cartridges; [135887]

(2) what discussions she has had with (a) the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and (b) the National Assembly for Wales on the consequences of classifying printer cartridges as consumer products for (i) environmental targets and (ii) sustainable development commitments; [135889]

(3) what assessment she has made of the effects the exclusion of printer cartridges under the Waste Electrical and Electronic Equipment Directive will have on (a) the UK and (b) the Welsh re-manufacturing industry. [135890]

Mr. Timms: The transposition of the WEEE Directive into UK legislation is being overseen by an inter-departmental team, including officials from all of the Departments concerned and the devolved Administrations.

The Department has had extensive dialogue with cartridge manufacturers and the UK Cartridge Remanufacturers Association on the scope of the WEEE Directive in relation to printer cartridges, but there is no formal assessment by Government on the effects of inclusion or exclusion on either manufacturers or re-manufacturers.

My Department continues to welcome the reuse and re-manufacture of printer cartridges, as a useful contribution to sustainable consumption and production, but does not operate a promotional programme specifically aimed at encouraging printer cartridge re-manufacture.

Redundancies

Paul Holmes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many redundancies were notified, broken down by nation and region, in each year since 1997; what these figures represent as a percentage of the total work force, broken down by nation and region; and if she will make a statement. [133497]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The following tables show the available information. The notification requirements apply only where an employer proposes to make redundant 20 or more employees at one establishment. Such notifications should be made 30 days in advance. If an employer proposes to make 100 or more employees redundant at one establishment, the notifications should be 90 days in advance. In addition, there is no information about how many of the proposed redundancies actually take place. The purpose of the advance notifications is to alert trade unions and employment and other support services to likely future job losses. They do not purport to represent a measure of the numbers of redundancies occurring in the economy.

Table 1 shows the total numbers of proposed redundancies notified. Table 2 shows these numbers as a percentage of the total number of employee jobs in England, Scotland and Wales, respectively. There are no percentages for individual regions of England as the figures for notified proposed redundancies are not compiled on the same regional basis as those for employee jobs.

Regional Economies

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to strengthen regional economies in the UK. [134870]

Jacqui Smith: The Department jointly owns, along with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Treasury, a public service agreement to make sustainable improvements in the economic performance of all English regions and, over the long term, reduce the persistent gap in growth rates between the regions. The joint team taking this work forward has been reviewing the key drivers of economic growth in the regions and the market failures which result in under-performance in some of them, and examining the regional impact of current policies in the three departments and across Government. A coherent and effective package of policy proposals will then be developed to be taken forward as part of the next spending review and beyond.

In addition, strengthening regional economies and improving the economic performance of the regions forms one of the key areas identified in DTI's five-year strategy, launched in September 2003. Regional thinking will play a bigger role in DTI policy formation, so that national and regional strategies reinforce and complement each other. As part of this, DTI will consider regional impacts throughout its business planning process. The Regional Development Agencies (RDAs) have a pivotal role to play as strategic drivers of regional economic development. Funding for the RDAs under the Single Pot is set to rise: it will be worth £2 billion a year in 2005–06—up from £1.8 billion in 2003–04.

Shipbuilding/Offshore Industries

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) new starters and (b) people returning to the industry (i) have been trained and (ii) are being trained for the (A) ship building, (B) ship repair and (C) offshore industries under schemes supported by One NorthEast. [133392]

Jacqui Smith: Available figures[1] show that, over the last 12 months, 76 new trainees/apprentices joined ship building and offshore companies in the North East of England.

ONE NorthEast, the Learning and Skills Council, COGENT (the Sector Skills Council for the Oil and Gas Extraction, Chemicals Manufacturing and Petroleum Industries) and SEMTA (the Sector Skills Council for the Science, Engineering and Manufacturing Technologies) are working closely together on skills issues, including the development of a comprehensive Energy Cluster Skills Action Plan covering the offshore, marine, defence and renewables sectors. The Action Plan will identify sector skills gaps and propose solutions on issues including crafts levels, graduate skills and employee retention. An initial draft will be available in the next few weeks.

[1] The figures do not identify whether these places were created under the schemes supported directly by ONE NorthEast. Statistics are not broken down between new starters and those returning to the industry, nor are reliable statistics currently available separately for the ship building, ship repair and offshore industries.

Trade

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the relationship between Britain and (a) New Zealand and (b) Australia.

Ms Hewitt: Britain has a healthy bilateral trade relationship with (a) New Zealand and (b) Australia. From January to July 2003, bilateral trade in goods between the UK and New Zealand was worth £0.55 billion representing a 9 per cent. increase over the same period of last year, and bilateral trade in goods between the UK and Australia was worth £2.3 billion representing a 1.8 per cent. increase over the same period of last year.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment her Department has made of the impact of the Institution for the Multilateral Protection of pan-African Commercial Transactions on UK companies investing in Africa; and if she will make a statement. [134447]

Ms Hewitt: My Department has not made an assessment of the impact of the Institution for the Multilateral Protection of pan-African Commercial Transactions (IMPACT) on direct investment in Africa. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development confirmed that such an assessment would be most appropriately carried out by the World Bank, who provided a US $5 million IDA loan for the establishment of the Africa Trade Insurance Agency (as IMPACT is also known) in 2001, and as such the initiative would be subject to EDA procedures for assessment and review.

Waiapi Indians

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment her Department has made of the (a) impact on and (b) cost to UK companies of the 2002 judicial ruling to allow the Waiapi Indians of Amazonia to surface mine in their land; and if she will make a statement. [133641]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: None, since no representations have been made to the Department on this issue.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Call Centre Work

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs whether her Department plans to outsource call centre work to premises outside the United Kingdom. [132104]

Alun Michael: The Department has no plans to outsource call centre work to premises outside the UK, nor through OJEU procurement process at present.

Chicken Farming

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what regulations govern the (a) quantity and (b) type of therapeutic and non-therapeutic drugs given to chickens; and if she will make a statement on their use. [134704]

Mr. Bradshaw: The regulation of medicines given to chickens and all other animals is governed by European legislation. Directive 2001/82/EC requires all veterinary medicines, including therapeutic products, to be assessed against statutory criteria for quality and efficacy before they are authorised for use. This assessment in this context includes the health and welfare of the treated animal, the operator, the environment and the safety of consumers of any food products from the treated animals. All therapeutic antimicrobials are classified as Prescription Only

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

Medicines (POM) and can be administered only on the basis of a prescription issued by a veterinary surgeon. The Veterinary Medicines Directorate (VMD), an executive agency of Defra, is responsible for the authorisation of therapeutic veterinary medicinal products in the UK.

The authorisation and use of non-therapeutic products administered to farm animals in their feed is subject to controls set down by the European Union (Council Directive 70/524/EC as amended). Under these rules, such products cannot be authorised for use unless they satisfy statutory criteria designed to ensure that, at the level permitted in feedstuffs, they will not adversely affect human or animal health or the environment. Additionally, they may only be used in accordance with the terms set out in an annex to the Directive, which specifies the species in which they may be used, authorised dosage rates and the withdrawal periods that must be applied before animals can be slaughtered for human consumption. Non-therapeutic products administered to farm animals in their feed are authorised centrally in the EU.

Flooding

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the threshold score will be for securing funding from her Department for sea defence and flood alleviation schemes in the next period for which a threshold is set. [136153]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 3 November 2003]: In general, in order to be approved for grant aid, proposed schemes must satisfy the Department's economic, environmental and technical criteria and achieve a minimum threshold priority score which is set annually at around this time for the following financial year. Changes to the threshold do not affect schemes which have already been approved.

The threshold for projects to start in 2003–04 is 22 (out of a maximum possible score of 44). The Department is still analysing operating authority returns detailing their funding requirements for 2004–05 but I hope to be in a position to announce the threshold score for 2004–05 shortly.

Genetically Modified Crops

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the regulatory framework which will need to be put in place for the introduction of GM crops. [135760]

Mr. Morley: There is already a comprehensive regulatory framework for the control of GM crops, with several regulatory approvals being needed before a given crop could be introduced for commercial cultivation.

Under European Directive 2001/18/EC each particular GM crop must be judged on its own merits according to scientific evidence of any risks it may pose to human health or the environment. A person or company wishing to market such a GM crop must supply a detailed dossier of information and a detailed environmental risk assessment on that GM crop. This information is open to scrutiny by all 15 member states and their expert advisers and the European Commission and its expert advisers, and an EU-wide public consultation must be held. No GM crop may be grown commercially unless and until EU member states have agreed collectively that it is safe.

In addition, each GM crop will need approval under EU seeds legislation before it can be grown commercially. Also, any GM crop intended for use with a particular herbicide or pesticide will need approval under EU pesticides legislation. And any GM crop intended to be used as a food will need approval under EU novel foods legislation. Furthermore, from spring 2004 all GM crops and any products derived from them will become subject to comprehensive new EU GM traceability and labelling legislation, which significantly extends the provisions for traceability and labelling already required by Directive 2001/18.

In addition to these regulatory frameworks we will be considering the terms on which GM and non-GM crops might co-exist in the light of a report on this issue expected shortly from the Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what published research she has assessed on the (a) persistence and (b) invasiveness of (i) GM herbicide tolerant and (ii) other crops in disturbed habitats where herbicides and fertilisers are used; and what research she has commissioned on this subject. [136063]

Mr. Morley: When assessing the potential impact of the release of a GM crop in England the Department is advised by an independent statutory expert body, the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE). In considering each case, ACRE will take account of all available relevant information on the implications of the proposed release.

A large body of research has been published on the persistence and invasiveness of GM (and non-GM) crops and weeds in disturbed, improved and tilled land. This includes Government-commissioned work and work conducted independently of Government. The body of literature was recently reviewed by the GM Science Review Panel as part of the GM Dialogue, and their final report is available at www.gmsciencedebate.org.uk. Section 6.2 of that report specifically refers to the potential persistence and invasiveness of GM crops. This report has been made available to ACRE.

Details of all Defra-commissioned GMO related research work are available on our website at www.defra.gov.uk/environment/gm/research. This includes details of completed projects and links to download or order any published reports. Several of these include a consideration of persistence and invasiveness, including:

'Environmental Risks of Herbicide-Tolerant Oilseed Rape' (March 1999);

'Investigation of Feral Oilseed Rape Populations' (February 1999);

'Monitoring largescale releases of genetically modified crops, incorporating report on project EPG 1/5/30: monitoring releases of genetically modified crop plants' (December 2002);

'Consequences for agriculture of the introduction of GM crops' (October 2003).

A further project investigating aspects of persistence of oilseed rape is currently underway entitled 'Factors affecting cross-pollination in oilseed rape varieties, particularly of low male fertility, growing under typical UK conditions' and due to be completed in 2006.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what research has been (a) commissioned and (b) published about the biochemical implications of introducing genes coding for enzymes under the control of host gene regulation systems; and what the implications are of this in respect of the host GM plant. [136169]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 3 November 2003]: The Department has not commissioned research into the biochemical implications of introducing genes coding for enzymes under the control of host regulatory elements because it is not relevant to the risk assessment of current GM crop releases. However, there has been a large volume of research commissioned elsewhere, which would inform decision making if this issue became relevant to proposed releases in the future.

The biochemical implications of using regulatory elements will vary in each specific case, and where relevant, would be taken into account by our expert advisers alongside other factors. In general, the use of regulatory elements native to plants will result in lower levels of transgene expression than those derived from bacteria and viruses as used in current GM crops (e.g. 35S cauliflower mosaic virus promoter).

There is a possibility that introducing copies of regulatory elements that are already present in the host plant could result in partial or complete silencing of native genes under the control of these elements. In recent years, there has been a substantial body of high quality research on 'gene silencing', an issue which is addressed in Chapter 3 of the GM Science Review, published in July 2003 (http://www.gmsciencedebate.org.uk/).

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what research has been (a) commissioned and (b) published about the (i) behaviour and (ii) fate in the environment of toxins used in the production of GM insect resistant crops. [136190]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 3 November 2003]: In July 2001 the Department commissioned research into the "Environmental Impact of Bt Exudates from Roots of Genetically Modified Plants". We expect it to be published early in the new year on the Defra website. Other publications regarding the issues on the behaviour and fate in the environment of toxins (Bt) used in the production of GM insect resistant crops have been considered recently in the GM Science Review, which was published in July 2003. No GM insect resistant crops have been grown or trialed in the UK apart from two small scale research trials involving potato and strawberry plants in the mid-1990s.

Adam Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the legal processes relating to the EU directive on the GM contamination threshold for conventional seeds. [135273]

Mr. Morley: The European Commission has decided that the appropriate mechanism for establishing statutory thresholds for the adventitious presence of approved GMOs in conventional seeds would be as follows:

1. The thresholds would be set, by species, in the Regulatory Committee established under the Directive on the deliberate release into the environment ofGMOs(2001/18/EC);

2. These same thresholds would then be inserted into the seeds marketing Directives by agreement in the Standing Committee on Seeds.

Fish Stocks (Irish Box)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many square miles of water off the Irish coast have been opened up to European fishing fleets as a result of removal of restrictions relating to the Irish box; and what steps are being taken to protect fish stocks in this area. [134836]

Mr. Bradshaw: The Irish Box, part of Western Waters, was established by Council Regulation (EC) No 685/95. It comprises the area to the west of Great Britain south of latitude 56 30° North, east of longitude 12 West and north of latitude 50 30° North and includes some some sixty to sixty five thousand square miles of water in parts of ICES Sub Areas VI and VII. Effort ceilings for Community vessels over 18 metres operating in specified fisheries within Western Waters, including the constituent parts of the Irish Box, were subsequently set by Council Regulation (EC) No 2027/95. Under new measures agreed by the Council of Ministers on 13 October 2003, to take effect no later than 1 August 2004, separate effort ceilings will no longer operate for the Irish Box other than for a smaller management area off the south west coast of Ireland designed to protect juvenile hake stocks. Future fishing effort by vessels over 15 metres in the Irish Box will fall to be contained within new effort ceilings to be established for the totality of Areas VI and VII on the basis of actual fishing effort in those areas between 1998 and 2002. In addition a statement added to the minutes of the 13 October Council states that in this and other areas where vessels have previously been excluded the Commission and Member States concerned shall carefully monitor fishing activities in order to ensure that such activities are consistent with the measures already in place for the conservation of fisheries resources.

Live Sheep Exports

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many live sheep were exported from Dover to Europe on 18 September; when and where health certification was carried out in respect of the sheep; how many of the sheep were rejected as unfit for the intended journey (a) during inspection for health certification purposes and (b) at Dover docks, and to where those sheep were taken; and what the address was of the final destination given on the route plan for each of the consignments. [135179]

Mr. Bradshaw: The information is requested is as follows:

Date	18 September 1993
Total animals	2,615
Where consignments were certified	England and Scotland
Animals rejected at certification	0
Animals rejected at Dover docks	0
Destination	France

The sheep for the consignment above were certified within 24 hours prior to export. There were no rejected animals either during health certification or at Dover docks. The consignment was of sheep for further fattening which were transported to holdings in France.

Livestock Markets

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions she has had with representatives from (a) the Meat and Livestock Commission, (b) local authorities and (c) the livestock industry about the (i) extent and (ii) impact of livestock market closures. [136192]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 3 November 2003]: In consultation with its stakeholders the Department keeps the network of livestock auction markets throughout the country under review. This includes the extent and impact of closures in view of the importance of these enterprises in the rural economy.

Meat Inspections

Mr. Weir: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent discussions she has had with (a) EU representatives, (b) the Food Standards Agency and (c) the Scottish Executive on the impact of proposals on animal welfare from the European Commission to replace independent meat inspection with inspection by the meat industry. [133120]

Mr. Bradshaw: Defra officials continue to liaise with the European Commission, other Government Departments and the Devolved Administrations on issues relating to primary production and animal welfare and the proposed Food Hygiene Regulations.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when she expects to receive the detailed proposals for better controls on intermediate level radioactive waste conditioning and storage as reported in the Government's First Progress Report to the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee on Managing Radioactive Waste Safely. [134075]

Mr. Morley: Advice from the regulators is expected shortly.

Restaurants (Local Produce)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps are being taken to encourage restaurants to use local produce. [133895]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 27 October 2003]: As part of the Department's Strategy for Sustainable Farming and Food, we have agreed a programme of measures aimed at helping find new outlets (including restaurants) for locally produced food and drink. Implementation of the programme is being led by Food from Britain in England with the help of additional funding from this Department and includes:

- regional food exhibitions and meet the buyer events with the specific objective of targeting caterers and chefs;
- organising a series of seminars this year aimed at raising the profile of locally produced food and drink with catering college students;
- producing, with "Visit Britain", an in-depth trade guide aimed at helping producers understand the opportunities presented by the public's growing enthusiasm for locally produced food and drink when eating out; and
- supporting a new guide, to be launched later this year, which highlights those restaurants and hotels providing the best locally produced food and drink.

US Ships (Disposal)

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions she has had with her US counterpart about importation for dismantling purposes of the ships from the US Reserve Fleet which have set sail for the United Kingdom. [133290]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 20 October 2003]: None. However, there is on-going contact between officials in the relevant regulatory authorities, both here and in the US, and they are working to ensure that potential risks to the environment, during the transport and recycling phases, are thoroughly assessed.

Wild Birds

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what progress has been made in increasing the number of (a) finches, (b) tits and (c) buntings in the wild. [132207]

Mr. Bradshaw: The Marsh tit, Willow tit, Linnet, Bullfinch, Yellowhammer, Cirl bunting, Reed bunting and Corn bunting are red-listed in the 2002 birds of conservation concern listings. The Lesser redpoll is amber listed. The Long tailed tit, Coal tit, Blue tit, Great tit, Chaffinch, Greenfinch, Goldfinch are green listed. The colour listing relates to their conservation status, with red representing the steepest decline in numbers. (Gregory et al. 2002: British Birds 1995).

The National Woodland Bird Survey gathers information about the probable causes of change in woodland bird populations and is the first step in identifying possible new approaches to management of woodlands for songbirds; it was initiated in spring 2003 and is organised by the British Trust for Ornithology and the RSPB and funded by Governmental and non governmental bodies. To date, no general national management scheme has been initiated to recover woodland bird populations, although some local management changes brought about through managing both national forests and designated sites may have benefited woodland species. Recent increases in some woodland species are likely to be due to largely natural factors.

As part of the UK Biodiversity Action Plan, species action plans for the conservation and enhancement of the cirl bunting, corn bunting, reed bunting and bullfinch were published in 1998. Implementation of the plans is being taken forward through partnerships including government, the agencies and NGOs. The plans identify a wide variety of measures that are being pursued to help improve the status of the species.

Some of the work has been very specific, for example for the cirl bunting there have been special management options made available to farmers. For some of the other species, in addition to some specific measures, general changes to agri-environment schemes to benefit farmland birds have been put in place.

The yellowhammer is a new addition to the birds of conservation concern red-list and as such does not have a formal Species Action Plan. It is, however, one of the core 20 farmland bird species that are included in the government's Farmland Bird Indicator and as such will benefit from actions being taken to improve general farmland habitat management. Defra has recently piloted a new Entry Level agri-environment scheme in England which relies on much simpler management options to benefit widespread farmland habitats—the advantage with this, if it is implemented, will be that it could cover a much greater area of farmland than under current schemes and so ultimately have much greater benefits for farmland birds.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Iraq

Mr. Marshall-Andrews: To ask the Solicitor-General whether, in concluding that Iraq had failed to comply with UN Resolution 1441, the Attorney-General relied upon facts and assertions contained in Cm 5769 as material to his conclusion and to the opinion he gave as to the authority to use force; and which such facts and assertions were so relied upon. [135602]

The Solicitor-General: In reaching his view of the legal basis for the use of force against Iraq, as set out in the written statement made in Parliament on 17 March 2003, the Attorney-General had regard to the terms of all the Security Council resolutions set out in Cm 5769. In addition, in concluding that Iraq had failed to comply with its obligations under Security Council resolution 1441, the Attorney-General took into account the statements by the Executive Chairman of UMOVIC and the Director General of the IAEA dated 27 January 2003 and 14 February 2003.

Sickness Absence

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Solicitor-General how many staff in the Department were on long-term sick leave in each of the last five years. [109262]

The Solicitor-General [pursuant to her answer of 9 June 2003, Official Report, c. 574W]: The figures I provided on the numbers of staff within the Crown Prosecution Service who have had periods of long-term sick leave in each of the last five years were unfortunately incorrect. "Long-Term" is defined as being a continuous spell of sick absences lasting four weeks or more. Further analysis of the data has revealed it included persons who had more than one period of sickness which cumulatively added up to 20 days or more. The corrected figures are:

	Number of people	Total number of employees	Percentage of employees
1998	312	6,274	5.0
1999	523	6,360	8.2
2000	650	6,440	10.1
2001	674	6,613	10.2
2002	698	7,219	9.7

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Solicitor-General pursuant to her answer of 9 June 2003, Official Report, column 574W, on sickness absence, what assessment she has made of the reasons for the rise in the level of long-term sick leave from the Crown Prosecution Service since 1998. [128545]

The Solicitor-General: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer above. The Crown Prosecution Service has not carried out any detailed analysis of the reasons for the rise in the level of long-term sick absence since 1998. However, there continues to be a programme to reduce the overall level of sick absence in line with Government targets for the Civil Service as a whole. The Crown Prosecution Service is actively managing sick absence in line with the Cabinet office's initiative and the figures given in my answer above indicate a reduction in long-term sick absence from 2001 to 2002. The present figures for sick absence in the Crown Prosecution Service are broadly similar to Civil Service figures. The latest Cabinet Office figures show 9.7 per cent. of Civil Service staff had periods of absences lasting 21 days or more.

WALES

Departmental Expenditure (Official Residences)

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much the Department spent on (a) maintenance, (b) renovation, (c) council tax and (d) running costs of residential properties used by Ministers and officials in each year since 1997. [134699]

Mr. Touhig: The Wales Office was established in 1999. It is not responsible for maintenance, renovation, council tax or running costs of any residential properties.

Departmental Offices

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many offices are (a) owned and (b) rented by his Department in countries other than the UK, broken down by country. [133622]

Mr. Touhig: The Wales Office does not own or rent any accommodation outside the UK.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Alcohol Misuse

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his Answer of 15 July 2003, Official Report, column 221W, on alcoholism, when the report on the cross-governmental alcohol harm reduction strategy for England will be published. [135517]

Ms Blears: On 19 September the Prime Minister's Strategy Unit published their Interim Analytical Report on the harms associated with alcohol misuse. This will help inform the development of the cross-governmental alcohol harm reduction strategy for England. The final report setting out the Strategy will be published in time for implementation to begin in 2004.

Administrative Court

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases are waiting to be dealt with by the Administrative Court which relate to section 55 of the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002. [135454]

Mr. Lammy: I have been asked to reply. 882 cases are awaiting final determination.

National Criminal Intelligence Service

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many staff of the National Criminal Intelligence Service have the monitoring of allegations of bribery of foreign public officials as part of their job description; what percentage of time they are recommended as part of their job description to give to such monitoring; and in which department of NCIS they are based. [134677]

Caroline Flint: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 27 October 2003, Official Report, column 115W.

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many allegations of corruption the National Criminal Intelligence Service has received since (a) 14 February 2002 and (b) January 2003 following the Memorandum of Understanding on Implementing Part 12 of the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001; how many of these allegations have resulted in investigations; and what subsequent arrests have been made under Part 12 of the Act. [134676]

Caroline Flint: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 27 October 2003, Official Report, column 115W.

Breast Cancer Relief

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what steps the Charity Commission has taken to ensure that internet donations to Breast Cancer Relief are not misapplied; [135432]

(2) what assessment the Charity Commission has made of the role of Breacan Fundraising as owner of the website operated for Breast Cancer Relief; [135352]

(3) what assessment the Charity Commission has made of the volume of donations made to Breast Cancer Relief via its website since the charity was placed in the control of a receiver manager; [135353]

(4) what action the Charity Commission took, and when, to alert WorldPay to the appointment of a receiver manager for Breast Cancer Relief. [135356]

Fiona Mactaggart: These are matters for the Charity Commission as the non-ministerial Government Department responsible for the registration of charities in England and Wales. The Director of Operations will write to the hon. Member and a copy of his reply will be placed in the Library.

Community Support Officers

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Community Support Officers are deployed in each local authority area in Sussex. [135171]

Ms Blears [holding answer 28 October 2003]: In total 65 Community Support Officers (CSOs) have been deployed in Sussex. Of these, 55 are wholly or partly funded by the Home Office. 10 of the 20 CSOs deployed in Brighton and Hove are wholly locally funded. The table gives a breakdown of CSO deployment by local authority.

Local authority	Number of CSOs
Adur	3
Arun	5
Chichester	3
Worthing	4
Rother	3
Hastings	6
Lewes	4

Correspondence

David Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for Walsall, North (1) will receive a reply to his letter of 24 July 2003 regarding a constituent, ref: M3906/3; [128955]

(2) will receive a reply to his letter of 24 July regarding pay negotiations in the Probation Service, reference: M3906/3; and what the reasons are for the delay. [132830]

Paul Goggins [holding answers 11 September 2003 and 20 October 2003]: The information requested is as follows:

We have received numerous letters from Members of Parliament and their constituents, querying the delay in the settlement of this year's pay negotiations for the National Probation Service.

I have replied to my hon. Friend on 4 November 2003 and I apologise for this unacceptable delay.

A pay offer was made to the Trade Unions on 22 July and has been accepted following ballots of members.

Crime (North-West)

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the recorded crime figures were for the north-west in each year since 1992. [134899]

Ms Blears: The requested information is given in the table. The north-west region is comprised of the following police force areas: Cheshire, Cumbria, Greater Manchester, Lancashire and Merseyside.

Total number of crimes recorded by the police for the north west region

	Number
1992	801,832
1993	765,664
1994	719,653
1995	720,732
1996	702,372
1997	649,310
1998–99	726,730
1999–2000	736,381
2000–01	720,055
2001–02	777,809
2002–03	795,024

Note:
Up to 1997, offences were recorded on a calendar year basis, and on a financial year basis thereafter.

There was a change of counting rules for recorded crime on 1 April 1998, which had the effect of increasing the number of crimes counted. Numbers of offences for years before and after this date are therefore not directly comparable.

The National Crime Recording Standard (NCRS) was introduced across England and Wales in April 2002. Some police forces adopted the Standard prior to this date. Cheshire and Merseyside police forces introduced the Standard in April 2002, Greater Manchester in January 2002, Cumbria in April 2001, and Lancashire in August 2000. Broadly, the NCRS had the effect of increasing the number of crimes recorded by the police. Therefore, following the introduction of the Standard, numbers of recorded crimes are not comparable with previous years.

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the cost was to his Department for (a) ministerial cars and drivers, (b) taxis, (c) train travel, (d) the use of helicopters, (e) airline tickets and (f) chartered aeroplanes in each year since 1997. [123076]

Fiona Mactaggart: Information on the costs of categories (a) ministerial cars and drivers and (f) chartered planes, in respect of ministerial travel, is being provided centrally by the Cabinet Office in a parallel question.

With regard to the departmental cost of taxi, train and air travel since 1997, the detailed information requested is not held centrally within the Home Office and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. All official travel undertaken by Home Office employees is in accordance with the requirements of the Civil Service Management Code. All ministerial travel is undertaken in accordance with the rules set out in the "Ministerial Code" and "Travel by Ministers".

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the (a) foreign and (b) UK visits he has made since 1 April; with the cost to public funds of each; whom he met; and the gifts received. [126899]

Mr. Blunkett: The Government publishes an annual list of gifts received by Ministers valued at more than £140. The information for 2003–04 will be published after the end of the financial year.

The Government also publishes on an annual basis the cost and details of all Ministers' visits overseas. The information for 2003–04 will be published after the end of the financial year.

Detailed information for all Ministers in respect of UK travel is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. All travel is undertaken fully in accordance with the rules set out in the Ministerial Code and Travel by Ministers, copies of which are in the Library.

Entitlement Cards

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) of 7 April 2003, Official Report, column 36W, on entitlement cards, when the summary of responses to the consultation on entitlement cards will be published. [133969]

Beverley Hughes: We would prefer to publish the summary of responses to the consultation alongside an announcement of how the Government intends to proceed. This is currently being considered by Ministers.

Ministerial Allowances

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there is a ministerial allowance for mobile phone costs. [135785]

Fiona Mactaggart: There is no ministerial allowance for mobile phone costs. Ministers have access to mobile phones for ministerial duties should they require them.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the financial allowances that Home Office Ministers are allotted; and how much each Home Office Minister has spent of their allowance so far this financial year. [135918]

Fiona Mactaggart: Ministers are not allotted financial allowances.

People Trafficking

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent assessment he has made of the number of (a) women and (b) children being trafficked into (i) the UK and (ii) Leicestershire through the illegal sex industry in the last 24 months. [134354]

Caroline Flint: The nature of trafficking means that it is a hidden crime. The only available estimates of the levels of trafficking are based on a Home Office research study 'Stopping Traffic' (Police Research Series 125, published in 2000), which indicated that there was intelligence to suggest that some women and children are trafficked into the UK for the purposes of sexual exploitation. This was estimated at between 140 and 1,400 per year but it was impossible to make a more accurate assessment of numbers. The report concluded that there was no evidence to suggest that this was on a large scale compared with other European countries.

However, the very nature of the crime demands that it is treated very seriously, which is why the Government have introduced criminal sanctions covering traffickers and has tasked the Reflex group with coordinating the response to this problem. Leicestershire Constabulary are engaged with Reflex in building up intelligence and multi-agency working to tackle trafficking at a regional and national level. Reflex is sponsoring a major Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) conference on 13 November on this issue.

The Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act received Royal Assent in November last year, and sections 145 and 146 of it came into force on 10 February 2003. Data on numbers of prosecutions under these sections will be collected in the usual way and published in Home Office Criminal Statistics. Given that the powers came into effect recently there is not any information yet held centrally about numbers of prosecutions.

Local Policing (New Earswick)

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the experiment in local policing at New Earswick; and if he will make a statement. [135336]

Ms Blears: Any assessment of the local policing experiment in New Earswick is for the Chief Constable of North Yorkshire to make. Nonetheless, the Government encourages the principle of local people's involvement and participation in delivering police services for their communities.

The Government published on 4 November a consultation document on police reform, which seeks views on involving communities in shaping and delivering their policing services.

Police Force (Racial Discrimination)

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he intends to take in relation to racial discrimination in the police force. [135384]

Ms Blears: I am committed to driving out racist attitudes wherever they are found. We are engaged with the leadership of the Police Service in addressing diversity and racism in recruitment, training and development and in the conduct of officers and staff. I welcome the service's determination to confront racism, as evidenced by Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO's) seven point programme. I welcome too the Commission for Racial Equality's investigation announced on 30 October and their wish to work consultatively with Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary and the Independent Police Complaints Commission.

We have developed new selection processes which test candidates' attitudes towards race and diversity vigorously through interviews, role play and written assessment. These processes are already in place in 13 forces and will be implemented in the remainder of the service by summer 2004. Those candidates who do not meet the standard are not recruited, regardless of performance elsewhere in the assessments.

Fundamental changes to the way in which probationer constables are trained are under way. The focus will be in delivery of practice-based training within the local community rather than in residential police training centres. This new approach is already being piloted in several areas of the country. A new curriculum is being designed which will reinforce high professional standards and respect for race and diversity. Engagement with the community will be a key element in the new programme. The training of trainers and tutor constables in race and diversity awareness will also be addressed. The new programme will start to be trialled from April 2004.

A review of the delivery of Community and Race Relations training in the Police Service was published by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary in March 2003 and the recommendations of that report are being taken forward. The strategy for the next phase of the training will call for leadership at all levels to drive cultural change.

There are procedures under the Police Act 1996 and the Police (Misconduct) Regulations 1999 to deal with conduct which falls below the required standard. These procedures can be invoked by way of a complaint from a member of the public or a report or allegation from any other person. This includes any complaint or allegation of racial discrimination or attitudes. The Police Reform Act 2002 introduces a new complaints system to come into force on 1 April 2004, under which serious racial discrimination is a category of a complaint that must be referred to the Independent Police Complaints Commission, which will decide how such a complaint will be dealt with.

It is important that attitudes within the service change and that staff themselves are confident to bring forward evidence of racism. I do not wish to rely on revelations by the media but on proper investigation, analysis and decisive action by senior officers when they are made aware of such evidence.

Police Pay

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the (a) hourly wage for a newly qualified police officer, (b) the average hourly wage for serving police officers and (c) the hourly wage of newly qualified police officers for overtime work are; and how much money was spent by police forces in employing police officers on overtime in each of the last three years. [135868]

Ms Blears: The information is as follows.

(a) Police officers are not paid an hourly wage, instead they receive an annual salary. Upon completion of initial training, an officer will receive £21,462 per year.

(b) Figures are not available for the average hourly wage for serving police officers. The average length of service for constables is 11 years. A constable with 11 years service receives £29,589 per year.

The figures do not include any regional allowances which may be payable.

(c) Overtime is payable at the rate of one twenty-fourth of a day's pay for each completed period of 15 minutes of overtime worked.

Figures for the amount spent on overtime in the police service are currently only available centrally for 2001–02 with a total United Kingdom spend of £400,392,000. This was made up of £319,620,000 for England and Wales, £26,097,000 for Scotland and £54,675,000 for Northern Ireland.

Details of overtime payments for other years have not been aggregated.

Prison Population

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his most recent estimates are of the (a) uncrowded and (b) maximum capacity of prisons in England and Wales and of the average daily prison population for each of the next five years. [131652]

Paul Goggins: As at 17 October 2003, the certified normal accommodation (uncrowded) for the prison estate in England and Wales was 66,738 and the useable operational capacity was 74,775. Average projections for the next five years are set out in the following table.

Average daily figures for prison population projections are not available.

Capacity projections forecast 2003–08

	Uncrowded	Usable operational capacity
2003	65,900	74,200
2004	67,500	75,800
2005	69,800	78,200
2006	70,400	78,750
2007	70,400	78,700
2008	70,400	78,700

Proceeds of Crime Act

Mr. Hepburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the value of criminal funds seized since the introduction of the Proceeds of Crime Act has been in (a) the Jarrow constituency, (b) South Tyneside, (c) the North East and (d) the UK. [133220]

Caroline Flint: Information is available for the United Kingdom only.

The confiscation powers in the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 are triggered by offences committed after the provisions were brought into force on 24 March 2003, so it will be some time before cases are dealt with by the Crown Court in numbers. As of 16 October, nine confiscation orders with a total value of £89,000 had been made against convicted offenders in England and Wales; these orders have yet to be enforced. No confiscation orders under the new legislation have been made in Scotland. The total amount of cash seized by police and customs officers under new powers in the Act which came into effect on 30 December 2002 is £41 million in England, Wales and Scotland. In addition, the Assets Recovery Agency has obtained freezing orders on assets with a total value of over £10 million on 16 cases which are under investigation under the new powers in the Act for civil recovery of criminal assets.

Road Deaths

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many deaths there have been because of (a) dangerous driving, (b) driving under the influence of illegal drugs and (c) driving under the influence of alcohol in (i) Southend-on-Sea and (ii) Essex in each year since 2001. [132757]

Caroline Flint: The requested information has not been published and is therefore not available centrally. Recorded crime figures for Southend are collected at Crime and Disorder Reduction Partnership (CDRP), and Basic Command Unit (BCD) level. At CDRP and BCD level, figures are published for six key offences only, which are violence against the person, sexual offences, robbery, burglary in a dwelling, theft of a motor vehicle, and theft from a vehicle.

Sani Abacha

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reasons he has not responded to requests for documentation sought by the Nigerian Government in connection with funds believed to have been stolen from the country by the late Sani Abacha; and what steps the Government are taking to assist Nigeria in repatriating these funds. [131987]

Caroline Flint: We are still awaiting receipt of information from the Federal Government of Nigeria, requested a year ago that will permit me to make a fully informed decision on transmission of the requested evidence to them. There are court orders that have been issued in Nigeria, which have the apparent effect of precluding the Nigerian authorities from pursuing the mutual legal assistance requests it has issued. We are awaiting confirmation from the Federal Government of Nigeria that those court orders have been lifted or overturned on appeal by them. The Federal Government of Nigeria has confirmed through their solicitors in the United Kingdom that although they contest the validity of those judgments, they would comply with them so long as they remained in force.

In the light of a previous judicial review, it has been made clear that to attempt to transmit the evidence when such court orders were apparently outstanding would leave my discretionary decision liable to being overturned on judicial review. Equally, it would serve no purpose to transmit evidence to Federal Government of Nigeria that they may not be able to use in their criminal proceedings. We prefer to await the outcome of those proceedings before transmitting the requested evidence. We are also not in a position to repatriate any funds that may be in the United Kingdom until the outstanding matters have been addressed by them. We have not been asked to enforce Nigerian confiscation orders in this case.

Stop and Search (London)

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many stop and searches have been carried out during each of the last three years under section 44 of the Terrorism Act 2000 in London; what the charges of those arrested were; and how many have resulted in successful prosecutions. [135165]

Mr. Blunkett: Figures on stops and searches under section 44(1) and section 44(2) of the Terrorism Act 2000 are published annually in the Home Office Statistical Bulletin. The latest published figures are for the financial year 2001–02 and show that in the Metropolitan police district, 3,598 stops and searches were carried out under section 44(1) resulting in 63 arrests. 473 stops and searches were carried out under section 44(2), resulting in 11 arrests.

For the same period in the City of London police district, 3,409 stops and searches were carried out under Section 44(1) resulting in 92 arrests. 86 stops and searches were carried out under section 44(2), resulting in 8 arrests.

Figures for 2002–03 are due to be published later this year. Figures for 2003–2004 will be published when the relevant data has been collated and verified.

The data collected on stops and searches made under Section 44 of the Terrorism Act 2000 is not automatically cross-referenced with subsequent charges or prosecutions, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Young Offenders

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to combat youth offending; and if he will make a statement. [132938]

Ms Blears: On 8 September we published "Youth Justice—The Next Steps", consulting on how to take further our youth justice reform programme for England and Wales. A copy has been placed in the Library. The document sets out changes we would like to make over the next few years in the way young offenders are dealt with. It includes proposals to:

Strengthen parenting interventions

Improve understanding of trials and trial preparation

Manage juvenile remandees better in the community

Establish a simpler sentencing structure with more flexible interventions

Provide intensive supervision and surveillance as the main response to repeat and serious offending while still having custody available

Introduce a more graduated progression between secure, open and community facilities

Improve youth justice skills and organisation; and

Invites views on how pre-court interventions can be developed further.

Consultation ends on 1 December and we encourage anyone with an interest in these issues to let us have their views on whether the proposals represent the best way forward.

These proposals complement the wide programme of work put forward in "Every Child Matters", published on the same date by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. This consults in particular on how to help children achieve their full potential and how to tackle the risks of adverse outcomes including offending which some face in their early lives. The paper consults on ways to strengthen the work of the services which deal with children.

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) police authority and (b) Crown Prosecution Service region fast tracking cases involved persistent youth offenders in the last year for which figures are available. [133053]

Ms Blears: Figures on the time taken from arrest to sentence for persistent young offenders are collected by Criminal Justice Area. Nationally, the number of persistent young offender cases dealt with over the last year for which figures are available, was:

	Persistent young offender cases
2002
August	2,065
September	2,041
October	2,341
November	2,120
December	1,675
2003

NORTHERN IRELAND

Asbestos

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland pursuant to his answer of 24 June 2003, Official Report, column 707W, on asbestos, if he will list the buildings which have been identified as containing asbestos. [130950]

Mr. Pearson: Two schedules, one of which lists those buildings within the Northern Ireland Civil Service office estate that contain asbestos, and one of which lists the specialist buildings owned by NICS departments that contain asbestos, will be placed in the Library.

Concessionary Fares

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people in Northern Ireland hold a Translink senior smart pass issued under the Northern Ireland Concessionary Fares scheme. [136139]

Mr. Spellar: Translink report that, up to 30 October 2003, 166,345 Senior smart passes have been issued under the Northern Ireland Concessionary Fares scheme.

Driving Licences

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people in Northern Ireland hold a driving licence. [136137]

Angela Smith: Figures at 31 October 2003 show that 1,191,574 people in Northern Ireland hold a valid driving licence.

Electoral Identity Cards

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people have been issued with an electoral identity card in each of the parliamentary constituencies. [136136]

Mr. Spellar: The number of cards issued at 31 October 2003 in each of the 18 Northern Ireland constituencies is as follows:

Constituency	Number of cards issued
Foyle	7,093
East Londonderry	4,338
North Antrim	5,091
East Antrim	3,299
Mid-Ulster	4,465
West Tyrone	5,376
Fermanagh and South Tyrone	5,380
Upper Bann	3,974
Newry and Armagh	4,038
South Down	4,326
Lagan Valley	4,208
Strangford	3,865
South Antrim	3,590
North Down	2,929
Belfast, East	3,700
Belfast, South	3,453
Belfast, West	6,339
Belfast, North	5,789
Total	81,253

Passports

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people in Northern Ireland hold (a) a British and (b) an Irish passport. [136138]

Mr. Paul Murphy: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department has advised me that records are not kept on the numbers of British passports issued in a particular region of the United Kingdom.

Irish passports are the responsibility of the Irish Government.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Adult and Community Learning Fund

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the future of the Adult and Community Learning Fund. [134979]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: I have decided to transfer the available budget to the Learning and Skills Council from April 2004. The money will be used to support the LSC's Widening Participation Strategy, meet our Skills Strategy commitment to build on the experience of the ACLF, and complement the LSC's strategy for working with the voluntary and community sectors. The decision has the support of NIACE and the LSC.

Asian Language Teaching

Sarah Teather: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what plans he has to include Asian languages as part of modern language education at primary level. [132726]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: The National Languages Strategy, "Languages for All: Languages for Life", published in December 2002, sets out the Government's commitment that all pupils throughout Key Stage 2 will have the entitlement to learn a language at least in part in class time by the end of this decade. That entitlement must comprise one of the working languages of the European Union. Schools are able to take local decisions about which languages they will offer, and whether or not they wish to teach a community language alongside the teaching of a European language. If a school wishes to teach additional languages, including Asian languages, they are free to do so.

By September 2005, specimen materials for three initial stages of the developing National Recognition System, which will endorse language competence, will be available in a number of languages including Urdu and Punjabi. By 2006, similar materials will also be available in Bengali, Gujarati and Hindi. All of these materials will support the initial stages of language learning, including learning undertaken by young people.

Condover Hall School

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, (1) if he will make a statement on the range of disabilities of children at Condover Hall School; [135321]

(2) what estimate he has made of the average funding per pupil at Condover Hall School in the last year for which figures are available;. [135322]

(3) if he will publish the correspondence between his Department and the Royal National Institute for the Blind on the closure of Condover Hall School. [135287]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 30 October]: We understand that Condover Hall School makes provision for pupils who are visually impaired with multiple and complex needs. Some children are non-ambulant. The School also makes specialist provision for deaf-blind pupils.

As a non-maintained special school, local education authorities placing children at Condover Hall negotiate with the school about the fees to be paid for each child. Fee levels vary depending on the complexity of the child's needs and the type of placement, for example, day placement, weekly boarding, 38 week or in some cases 52 week boarding. Average funding per pupil varies between around £30,000 p.a. and £100,000 p.a. depending on the type of placement. In the current financial year Condover Hall received around £70,000 in grants from the Department for Education and Skills (DfES), designed to raise standards.

My Department was formally notified by the RNIB about the proposed closure of Condover Hall in a letter dated 24 July this year. As my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards said in his reply to the hon. Gentleman's earlier questions about Condover Hall School, officials at the DfES have asked the RNIB to clarify its plans for the closure of Condover Hall, and in particular to explain how the RNIB intends to ensure that appropriate and realistic plans for the placement of children currently attending the school are in place. They are currently awaiting a response. Copies of the relevant correspondence have been forwarded to the hon. Member.

Education (16-year-olds)

Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what percentage of 16-year-olds stayed in full-time education and training in Stoke-on-Trent local education authority in each year since 1997. [135479]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The percentage of 16-year-olds participating in full-time education, and in education and training in Stoke-on-Trent local education authority for end 1997 to end 2000, the latest available year, are shown in the table.

Participation in education and training by 16-year-olds in Stoke-on-Trent LEA

	End 1997	End 1998	End 1999	End 2000
Full-time education[1]	49	52	58	60
Education and training	[2]n/a	68	73	78

[1] Includes participation in full-time education, part-time education and government supported training.
[2] Education and training figures by LEA were first published for 1998.
Note:
Population data do not include any revisions following the 2001 census.
Source:
DfES Statistical Bulletin, published 16 December 2002.

Participation rates by LEA for 16-year-olds are published in an annual statistical bulletin, 'Participation in Education and Training by Young People Aged 16 and 17 in Each Local Area and Region, England'.

Educational Maintenance Allowance

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when he decided to set the maximum educational maintenance allowance at £30 per week; and if he will make a statement. [134257]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Decisions about the various elements of the national scheme were taken in June 2003, including the maximum weekly payment. This has drawn on evidence from the pilot scheme. This information was then disseminated to local partners and schools and colleges in the form of a general leaflet; copies of this were also placed in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will estimate the cost of the national introduction of educational maintenance allowances in (a) 2004–05, (b) 2005–06 and (c) 2006–07 if the upper limit is set at (i) £30 per week and (ii) £40 per week. [134258]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The EMA pilot has been extensively evaluated, including those variants testing different maximum payments. We have drawn from the evidence to develop what I believe will be the most effective model for the national EMA scheme. Evidence indicated that an upper limit of £40 per week was no more effective at increasing participation than the maximum of £30 per week. We have, however, been able to raise the lower threshold for receiving the maximum payment to £19,000 compared to £13,000 in the pilot scheme.

The estimated cost of the scheme for each of the three years is:

	Cost (£ million)	Estimated number of young people on EMA
2004–05	238	274,000
2005–06	374	390,000
2006–07	462	439,000

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what action he is planning to promote the take-up of educational maintenance allowances; and if he will make a statement. [134259]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Plans to promote the take up of the national EMA scheme focus on three main phases of promotional activity, which are:

February 2004—a helpline opens for young people and their parents, along with an interactive website and a main promotion launch.

April/May 2004—second phase of the main promotional activity to raise awareness to coincide with the application packs being made available from April.

August/September 2004—third phase of main promotional activity to coincide with GCSE results and enrolment in further education.

Some promotional activity is already under way to raise awareness in the form of: a general EMA leaflet for local partners and schools and colleges, a leaflet specifically for young people, information in careers materials and a series of regional conferences.

Financial Literacy

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what steps he will take to increase the level of financial literacy. [135757]

Mr. Miliband: Some aspects of financial literacy are covered within the new Citizenship curriculum, which is already compulsory in secondary schools. For example, 14 to 16-year-old pupils should be taught about how the economy functions, including the role of business and financial services. The non-statutory framework for Personal, Social and Health Education, provides for personal finance education to be taught to all age groups, allowing teachers to cover the wide range of topics as set out in the Department's "Financial Capability through Personal Financial Education" guidance for schools.

From 2005/6 a new £60 million Enterprise Education entitlement will provide all Key Stage 4 pupils with the equivalent of five days' enterprise activity which will develop enterprise capability—including personal financial capability as well as business understanding. 151 Pathfinder projects in nearly 400 secondary schools were approved for September 2003 start. They will help DfES to develop additional guidance including case studies and lesson plans related to financial literacy, including advice from the Financial Services Authority and financial institutions.

Free School Milk

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) what measures he will take with local authorities to ensure that all children under the age of 11 receive free school milk; [136069]

(2) what measures he will take to encourage education authorities to use the EU subsidy for provision of school milk; [136070]

(3) what financial support he will give to (a) education authorities and (b) schools to provide free school milk for all those aged 11 and under; [136071]

(4) what discussions he has had with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs regarding (a) the provision of free school milk and (b) the provision of free school milk to all those aged 11 and under. [136102]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: This Department supports the provision of free and paid for milk in maintained schools and encourages schools and local education authorities to offer it to pupils. In addition, our guidance on school lunches includes a strong recommendation that drinking milk is made available to all pupils as an option every day. Following a 20 per cent. reduction in the EU subsidy on school milk from January 2001, this Department agreed jointly with the Department of Health and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to top up the annual £1.5 million shortfall. This assistance helps prevent increases in the cost of providing school milk.

Key Stage 3 Strategy

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what evaluation of the Key Stage 3 strategy has taken place that compares schools in the original pilot with a similar range of schools outside the pilot; and what the result was. [136305]

Mr. Miliband: Final school level Key Stage 3 data will become available later this year when school performance tables are published. We will then be undertaking an analysis comparing the performance of schools which participated in the Key Stage 3 pilots and other schools in similar circumstances. I will write to the hon. Member to inform him of the outcome of this analysis in the New Year.

Local Education Authority Expenditure

Michael Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the average (a) primary and (b) secondary formula spending share per pupil will be in each local education authority in England and Wales for (i) 2004–05 and (ii) subsequent years. [136167]

Mr. Miliband: Figures for 2004–05 will not be available until we have announced the provisional Local Government Finance Settlement in mid-November: figures for future years will become available at the time of the Settlement for each year. The system in Wales is different and is the responsibility of the Welsh Assembly.

Parliamentary Questions

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when he will answer the questions, references (a) 129889 and (b) 129891, tabled by the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham on 10 September 2003. [135964]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: I refer the hon. Member to the answers given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education on 3 November 2003, Official Report, columns 449W and 455W.

School Funding

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the average per pupil funding for (a) primary, (b) secondary and (c) special schools was in each Excellence in Cities area for (i) 2002–03 and (ii) 2003–04. [133604]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 21 October 2003]: The information requested has been placed in the Libraries.

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) whether his pledge of increased school funding is related to a baseline that involves excluding (a) capital funding used for revenue purposes, (b) balances used to permit higher revenue spending, (c) staff reductions, redundancies or non-appointments made to reduce revenue spending and (d) funding incorporated into school mainstream budgets in 2002–03 that in previous years was made by way of special grants; [136301]

(2) if he will make a statement on the base used to calculate each school's 4 per cent. increase in funding. [136302]

Mr. Miliband: The proposed baseline for the per pupil minimum funding guarantee is an adjusted version of a school's budget share for the financial year 2003–04. It therefore does not include any reference to capital funding used for revenue, spend from school balances, the effect of staffing changes, or additions to 2002–03 budgets. The adjustments to the 2003–04 budget shares would have the effect of adding to the baseline any sums made available from Additional Budget Support Grant, whether within a redetermined budget share or allocated separately; and excluding the following items: rates; amounts for named pupils, including those for special educational needs; prior year adjustments and sixth form funding from the Learning and Skills Council.

School Meals

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what systems are in place to ensure that compulsory nutrition standards for school lunches are maintained. [133909]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: It is the responsibility of the local education authority or, where the budget for school meals has been delegated to them, a school's governing body, to ensure that the statutory nutritional standards for school lunches are met. The Department for Education and Skills, in partnership with the Food Standards Agency, have commissioned research by Kings College London to assess whether food provided for and consumed during school lunches in a sample of maintained secondary schools in England complies with statutory nutritional standards and associated guidance. We expect that the findings of this survey will be available in spring 2004.

Specialist Schools

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment he has made of the performance of (a) specialist schools and (b) specialist schools in Redcar and Cleveland borough, in achieving 5A*-C grades at GCSE compared to the national average; and if he will make a statement. [135903]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 3 November 2003]: 56.1 per cent. of 15-year-olds in specialist schools[1] gained 5 or more A*-C grades at GCSE/GNVQ in 2003, based on provisional data. For non-specialist[2] schools, the figure was 48.7 per cent. The national average was 52.6 per cent.

This supports our view that every secondary school should be given the opportunity to attain specialist status when it is ready to do so. The breakdown of data for specialist schools in Redcar and Cleveland is not yet available. GCSE/GNVQ Performance Table data will be published in January 2004.

[1] Specialist schools cover the 979 maintained, mainstream schools which were operational specialists as at September 2002, with 2003 GCSE/GNVQ results.

[2] Non-specialist schools cover maintained, mainstream schools with 2003 GCSE/GNVQ results.

Student Income

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the average gross income of students was in the last 12 months, broken down by income quintile. [135358]

Alan Johnson: The Department has conducted a Student Income and Expenditure Survey (SIES) for the 2002/03 academic year. It will provide up-to-date information on students' income in the 2002/03 academic year for full-time, young, single, childless, English and Welsh domiciled students who are undertaking an undergraduate degree at publicly funded Higher Education Institutions in England and Wales in 2002/03.

The Department will announce a date for publication once a finalised report has been agreed with the researcher. Once published, the Department will use the data for further analysis of students' income.

Teachers

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many newly-qualified teachers have failed to start an induction year four terms after starting daily supply work since the regulation was introduced; and who is responsible for enforcing this regulation. [136304]

Mr. Miliband: The Department does not collect any data on the number of newly qualified teachers that fail to start an induction year four terms after starting daily supply work.

It is the responsibility of the parties involved in the induction process—heads, governors and local education authorities, as well as the individual teachers themselves, to ensure that the regulations are observed.

Transitional Grants

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills which criteria for the newly announced transitional grants for low funded authorities Poole local education authority does not meet. [136490]

Mr. Miliband: In 2004–05, we are targeting transitional grant at LEAs which have received increases of less than 12 per cent. in Education Formula Spending and DfES grant between 2002–03 and 2004–05. On provisional figures, Poole does not fall into that category. We will be announcing details of the calculations at the time of the provisional Local Government Finance Settlement in mid-November 2003.

Truancy

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many officials in his Department have been employed on projects to reduce truancy in each year since 1997. [133698]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The number of officials working on the co-ordination and implementation of projects to reduce truancy and improve school attendance has varied between five in 1997 and 11 today.

University Applications

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many applications there were for university places in England and Wales in each year since 1997. [130376]

Alan Johnson: The latest available information from the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service (UCAS), covering those applying for entry to full time undergraduate courses is shown in the table. Over the same period, the number of applicants from England and Wales who were accepted for entry increased by 9 per cent., and the latest figures published by UCAS for 2003 entry indicate that there will be a further rise this year.

Applications through UCAS to full time undergraduate courses in England and Welsh institutions

Year of entry	Number
1997	1,851,316
1998	1,803,032
1999	1,750,075
2000	1,723,836
2001	1,729,702
2002	1,739,875

Note:
Each applicant can make up to six applications in each cycle.

HEALTH

Hospital Acquired Infections

13. Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, what recent estimate he has made of the number of people who die from infections acquired in hospital. [135981]

Dr. Ladyman: Estimates of the number of deaths associated with these infections cannot be provided as certifying doctors may not have information on where an infection was acquired.

Emergency Calls (East Sussex)

14. Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, what percentage of category A emergency calls were answered within eight minutes in East Sussex in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [135982]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Response times to life threatening calls have significantly improved across the country. Latest information for the year 2002–03 showed that the Sussex Ambulance NHS Trust responded to 72.4 per cent. of life threatening category A calls within eight minutes, compared with 61.3 per cent. in 2000–01.

Foundation Hospitals

15. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, how many putative NHS foundation hospital trusts have published material seeking public support for foundation status; and how much was spent in each case. [135983]

Mr. Hutton: The 25 applicants in the first wave for NHS foundation trust status are all currently consulting with patients, the public, staff and partner organisations on their application. The costs associated with this consultation are not kept centrally.

Phlebotomy Services

16. Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, what support his Department provides for phlebotomy services in general practice. [135984]

Mr. Hutton: Near-patient testing—including phlebotomy—in general practice depends on ensuring that there are enough doctors with the right support. We have just seen the biggest year-on-year increase in the number of GPs for 20 years, and they are supported by more practice nurses and other health care professionals than ever before.

Care Homes

17. Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, if he will make a statement on the number of care home beds available in counties south of the Thames. [135986]

Dr. Ladyman: The number of care home places in counties south of the Thames at 31 March 2001 was 141,365. This was the last year that the Department of Health collected the data. The National Care Standards Commission now has responsibility for collecting this data.

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the average differential between the cost to local councils of running an old people's care home and the residential fee level for independent care homes, with special reference to Redcar and Cleveland. [134945]

Dr. Ladyman: Data on fees charged for independent care home places are not available centrally.

For 2001–02 (the latest figures available), figures provided by councils suggest that the average gross weekly expenditure on supporting older people in council-run care homes in England was £446 and the corresponding expenditure on places in care homes in the independent sector was £286. Caution is needed in interpreting the difference between these figures. This is covered in "Personal Social Services Expenditure and unit costs: England 2001–2002", a copy of which is available in the Library. For example, the difference may in part reflect differences in the dependency of people cared for. Where council-run services are more expensive than those provided by the independent sector, councils need to demonstrate through best value reviews that those higher costs are justified.

According to information reported to the Department by Redcar and Cleveland council, the current gross cost of providing a place in a council-run care home is £456 per week. The average cost for a place in a care home for older people in the independent sector is £292 per week.

Care (Lancashire)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) residential care home and (b) nursing home places were available in (i) Lancashire and (ii) Chorley in each of the last five years, broken down by (A) local authority homes, (B) private sector homes and (C) charity and non-profit homes. [135804]

Dr. Ladyman: The table shows the number of care home places by type of accommodation available in Lancashire as at 31 March for the years 1998 to 2001. Data below local authority and health authority level is not available.

Figures for later years have been collected by the National Care Standards Commission but comparable details broken down by authority are not available.

Number of care home places in Lancashire[1] by type of accommodation 31 March 1998 to 2001

Rounded data

		Residential homes			Nursing homes
	LA	Private	Voluntary	Small[2]	Independent
1998	2,850	10,985	1,080	550	7,555
1999	2,600	11,140	1,080	570	7,315
2000	2,550	11,275	1,045	580	6,930
2001	2,345	11,065	1,035	590	6,185

[1] For residential care Lancashire has been interpreted as Lancashire, Blackburn with Darwen and Blackpool for 1999 onwards; for 1998 it covered Blackburn with Darwen and Blackpool. For nursing care it has been defined as South, East and Northwest Lancashire health authorities.
[2] Independent registered care homes with less than four places.

Community Pharmacies

18. Mr. Anthony D. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, what steps are being taken to enhance the contribution community pharmacies make to the provision of health care. [135987]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Community pharmacy is an integral part of the NHS. Our pharmacy programme, supported by a new contractual framework aimed to be in place next April, sets out a strong, ambitious role for community pharmacy in providing high quality health care services, reducing inequalities and improving access and choice for patients.

NHS Treatment Entitlement

19. Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provisions the NHS has in place to ensure that only those entitled to NHS treatment receive it. [135988]

Mr. Hutton: Entitlement to free national health service treatment is based on residence in the United Kingdom. The National Health Service (Charges to Overseas Visitors) Regulations 1989 place a duty on NHS trusts to establish whether a patient is ordinarily resident or eligible for free NHS hospital treatment and if not to levy a charge for any treatment provided. The Government is consulting on proposals to strengthen the charging regulations.

Men's Health

20. Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress the Government has made in meeting targets set for men's health in the National Plan. [135989]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Work under way on the Department's priority areas, coronary heart disease and cancer—the major killers of men—is having the greatest impact upon men's health. This includes initiatives to reduce smoking and improve diet and nutrition. Action to tackle drugs and alcohol misuse will also impact preferentially on men's health.

New Cross Hospital, Wolverhampton

21. Mr. Dennis Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he proposes to visit New Cross Hospital, Wolverhampton to inspect the premises. [135990]

Dr. Ladyman: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has accepted an invitation to visit New Cross Hospital. The date has not yet been finalised.

NHS Dentistry

22. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of state for Health if he will make a statement on NHS dentistry provision in Leicestershire. [135991]

Dr. Ladyman: In common with a number of areas, the recruitment of NHS dentists is a challenge in the Leicestershire area. The Leicestershire, Northamptonshire and Rutland SHA is addressing access to NHS dentistry as a key priority. A number of options are being examined and these will be supported by funding which has been ring fenced with the aim of attracting more dentists to the area.

"Forecasting the Nation's Health"

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the pilot of the "Forecasting the Nation's Health"; if he will list the trusts which participated in the pilot of the "Forecasting the Nation's Health"; and what plans he has to expand the pilots of the "Forecasting the Nation's Health" to further trusts. [133930]

Ms Rosie Winterton: To support national health service managers in anticipating circumstances of weather related high demand, the Met Office (in partnership with the Department of Health and NHS pilot sites) ran a weather forecast/health demand trial project, "Forecasting the Nation's Health", supported by Her Majesty's Treasury "Invest to Save" funding over the winters of 2001–02 and 2002–03. The aim was to provide NHS managers with advance warning of whether to expect increased or reduced emergency admissions and allow them to plan the use of resources more efficiently.

This work was without precedent internationally. The trial project has been completed and two external evaluations examined the reliability and value of such workload forecasting for the NHS. NHS users have been closely involved in the evaluation. The following trusts participated in the pilot:

Addenbrooke's
Basildon and Thurrock General Hospitals NHS Trust
South Durham Healthcare NHS Trust
The Hillingdon Hospital NHS Trust
Birmingham Heartlands and Solihull NHS Trust
Central Manchester Healthcare NHS Trust
City Hospital NHS Trust
Ealing Hospital NHS Trust
Good Hope Hospital NHS Trust
Hinchingbrooke Healthcare NHS Trust
Mid-Staffordshire General Hospitals NHS Trust
Norfolk and Norwich University Hospital NHS Trust
North Manchester Healthcare NHS Trust
North Middlesex University Hospital NHS Trust
Nottingham City Hospital NHS Trust
Oldham NHS Trust
Plymouth Hospitals NHS Trust
Portsmouth Hospitals NHS Trust
Queen's Medical Centre, Nottingham University Hospital NHS Trust
Royal Berkshire and Battle Hospitals NHS Trust
Salford Royal Hospitals NHS Trust
Sheffield Teaching Hospital Trust
South Manchester University Hospitals NHS Trust
Stockport NHS Trust
The Royal West Sussex NHS Trust
The Royal Wolverhampton Hospitals NHS Trust
Trafford Healthcare NHS Trust
United Leeds Teaching Hospitals NHS Trust
University Hospital Birmingham NHS Trust
University Hospitals Coventry and Warwickshire NHS Trust
Whipps Cross Hospital.

The Department of Health is currently assessing the evaluations with particular interest in the reliability, accuracy and usability of the forecasts in order to make an informed decision about the future direction of support for health demand forecasting systems.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has made to the Chancellor for funds to be made available for the continuation of the piloting of the "Forecasting the Nation's Health". [133931]

Ms Rosie Winterton: To support national health service managers in anticipating circumstances of weather related high demand, the Met Office (in partnership with the Department of Health and NHS pilot sites) ran a weather forecast/health demand trial project, "Forecasting the Nation's Health", supported by Her Majesty's Treasury "Invest to Save" funding over the winters of 2001–02 and 2002–2003.

The Department of Health is currently assessing the independent evaluations of this project before making a decision as to the future direction, support and funding of demand forecasting systems in the NHS. Any decisions about levels and sources of funding will depend on the outcome of this assessment.

Alternative and Complementary Medicine

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will bring forward proposals on the statutory self-regulation of herbal medicine and acupuncture practitioners. [135972]

Mr. Hutton: The Government welcomes the recent publication of the reports of the Herbal Medicine and Acupuncture Regulatory Working Groups. We will give careful consideration to the working groups' recommendations, prior to consulting on the statutory regulation of herbal medicine and acupuncture practitioners. A consultation document will be published early next year.

Ashford (Middlesex) Hospital

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of the staff in the new treatment centre at Ashford (Middlesex) hospital will be (a) additional staff and (b) staff transferring from the NHS. [130935]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 18 September 2003]: The exact position on staffing in this unit will be finalised as part of the final negotiations. It is expected that the professional staff will include additional staff provided by the independent sector provider and national health service staff working in the unit in an agreed and structured way.

Mental Health (Deaf People) Audiology

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what steps the Government are taking to make its suicide prevention strategy accessible to deaf people; [134941]

(2) what measures he is taking to encourage the collection of information on suicides by deaf people at primary care trust level. [134942]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The suicide prevention strategy was launched in September 2002. The strategy is still available in hard copy and can also be accessed via the Department of Health and National Institute for Mental Health in England websites. The deaf community is able to request copies of the document through the Department of Health Publications Orderline on minicom.

Primary care trusts (PCTs) are required to carry out suicide audits as part of their performance review process, but this does not, however, require PCTs to collect data about deaf people as distinct from any other group.

The development of mental health services for deaf people, "A Sign of the Times", was the subject of a separate extensive consultation, which concluded earlier this year. Officials are currently considering how to represent the many high quality responses received.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures the Government is taking to develop evidence-based service provision for the prevention of mental health problems in deaf people. [134943]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The evidence that we have indicates, as outlined in the consultation document Sign of the Times, that access to a full range of services, support to parents in the early years and appropriate educational provision are likely to be the important factors.

The responsibility for assessing the needs of their entire populations, and for making the provision they consider most appropriate, lies with the primary care trusts.

Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list each local network provider awarded a contract by the Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health, the areas they have been awarded contracts for, and their registered office address; how many patient forums they are responsible for; which aspects of the service they have sub-contracted; and to whom they have sub-contracted. [134066]

Ms Rosie Winterton [holding answer 27 October 2003]: A full list of local network providers, the area they cover and the patients' forums they support is available on the Commission for Patient and Public Involvement in Health's (CPPIH's) website at www.cppih.org. A copy of the relevant information has been placed in the Library. Local network providers have to seek approval from the CPPIH to sub contract the services for which they have been contracted to provide. No such requests have been made.

Data Protection

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he has issued to (a) primary care trusts, (b) NHS trusts and (c) agencies of his Department on S.I., 2002, No. 2905, The Data Protection (Processing of Sensitive Personal Data) (Elected Representatives) Order 2002 and the involvement of hon. Members with cases; and if he will make a statement. [135261]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Guidance was issued to all primary care trusts, national health service trusts and agencies of the Department in July 2003 as part of the "Confidentiality: NHS Code of Practice". The guidance states the following in the case of disclosures of health data to hon. and right hon. Members.

> "If an investigation is appropriately authorised, disclosure will meet tests of necessity and appropriateness. The minimum necessary information should be disclosed. There is a balance to be drawn between ensuring that a patient has understood and properly consented to a disclosure of information and needlessly obstructing an investigation. Careful consideration of any written authorisation and prompt action are key, e.g. where an MP states, in writing, that s/he has a patient's consent for disclosure this may be accepted without further resort to the patient."

Plutonium Contamination

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent studies his Department has evaluated relating to the level of plutonium in the teeth of children (a) in the Sellafield area and (b) elsewhere in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [129247]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Department of Health funded studies on the contamination of the population of the United Kingdom by environmental plutonium and other radionuclides in the late 1990s.

The samples chosen for analysis were either teeth, removed for orthodontic purposes, or 24 hour urine samples. Teeth, mostly intact first pre-molars, were collected by district health authorities, batched into samples of 50 teeth, then analysed for plutonium-239 + 240 by alpha-spectrometry. Additional single teeth were analysed for their total alpha-activity by alpha-track counting with Tastrak 'R' and additional batches were analysed for radiostrontium. The results showed that the average concentrations of total alpha-emitters and radiostrontium were approximately three orders of magnitude greater than the equivalent concentrations of plutonium isotopes. Analysis indicated that the concentrations of plutonium, but not strontium-90 or total alpha-emitters decreased with increasing distance from the west Cumbrian coast and its Sellafield nuclear fuel reprocessing plant—suggesting that this plant is a source of plutonium contamination in the wider population of the British Isles. Nevertheless, the measured average absolute concentrations of plutonium-239 + 240 were so low that they are considered to present an insignificant radiological hazard. Moreover, additional analyses showed that the concentrations of other "high toxicity", natural alpha-emitting radionuclides (radium, thorium and uranium) were much higher than the levels of plutonium.

Trainee Dentists

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals he has to increase the number of dentists training in (a) the North West, (b) East Lancashire and (c) England. [135496]

Ms Rosie Winterton: We are currently undertaking the first review of the dental workforce since 1987 in consultation with the dental profession—professional bodies, dental academics, as well as the British Dental Association. We hope to publish the review by the end of this year. The findings of this review will enable us to consider both the number of dentists and the location of their training in England.

Departmental Expenditure (Official Residences)

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much his Department spent on (a) maintenance, (b) renovation, (c) council tax and (d) running costs of residential properties used by Ministers and officials in each year since 1997. [134691]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Department and its executive agencies have no residential properties on its estate.

Insulin

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many people in the UK use (a) animal insulin and (b) GM insulin for treatment of diabetes; [134781]

(2) what the cost to the NHS of prescribing (a) animal insulin and (b) GM insulin for treatment of diabetes was in the last 12 months. [134783]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Data on the number of people using these insulins is not collected. However, the table shows the number of prescription items that were dispensed in the community in England, and their cost, in the twelve months ended June 2003.

Number of prescription items and net ingredient cost of Insulins that were dispensed in the community in England for the twelve months ending June 2003

	Number of prescription items (Thousands)	Net ingredient cost (£000s)
Highly purified animal insulin	128.1	4,217.2
Human sequence (GM Insulin)	3,522.0	150,528.8
All Insulins	3,650.0	154,746.0

Notes:
The data is from the Prescription Cost Anallysis (PCA) system which covers all prescription items that are dispensed in the community in England. This does not include drugs dispensed in hospitals or private prescriptions.
Insulins are those defined in the British National Formulary BNF) paragraph 6.1.1, "Insulins". Insulin drugs have been grouped into highly purified animal and human sequence (GM) insulin in line with the British National Formulary (BNF)
Doctors write prescriptions on a prescription form. Each single item written on the form is counted as a prescription item. The net ingredient cost refers to the cost (which the dispenser is reimbursed) of the drug before discounts and does not include any dispensing costs or fees.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many people in the UK are known to be unable to use GM insulin for the treatment of diabetes; [134782]

(2) how many users of GM insulins for treatment of Type 1 diabetes have been found dead attributable to dead in bed syndrome in each of the last 10 years; [134785]

(3) what research he has (a) commissioned and (b) assessed regarding the (i) efficacy and (ii) side-effects of GM insulin against animal insulin on diabetes patients; [134788]

(4) what assessment he has made of the side-effects of GM insulin on certain diabetes sufferers. [134802]

Ms Rosie Winterton: We have no estimate of the numbers of people with diabetes who are known to be unable to use genetically modified (human) insulin. Decisions on the most suitable type of insulin should be made by people with diabetes in consultation with their healthcare providers. The Committee on Safety of Medicines (CSM) and the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency has kept the safety of human insulins under close review. The CSM concluded that, although some patients have experienced problems on transferring to human insulin and are better suited to animal derived insulins, there is no evidence of a safety concern specific to human insulin. The CSM Sub-Committee on Pharmacovigilance reviewed the issue again in September 2000, following the publication of a systematic review of the literature. 52 randomised controlled trials were identified, in addition to 56 studies of other designs and case reports. The Sub-Committee considered the paper and agreed with the conclusions of the authors that there is no evidence of a safety problem specific to human insulin. In 2002, the Cochrane Library published a review of human insulin versus animal insulin in people with diabetes mellitus. This review included randomised controlled trials of at least one month in duration. No significant differences in metabolic control or hypoglycaemic episodes between various insulin species could be found. Data on the rare occurrence of dead in bed syndrome is not collected.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what measures the Government are taking to secure the continued availability of animal insulin to people who have shown a resistance to GM insulin for the treatment of diabetes; [134784]

(2) what discussions he has had with his Danish counterparts about the continued supply of animal insulin; [134786]

(3) from where the NHS sources (a) animal insulin and (b) GM insulin; [134787]

(4) what discussions he has had with the Insulin Dependent Diabetes Trust about the continued supply of animal insulin to diabetes patients in the UK. [134801]

Ms Rosie Winterton: There are two companies supplying animal insulin in the United Kingdom; CP Pharmaceuticals and Novo Nordisk. Both companies have confirmed that they will continue to supply animal insulin for the foreseeable future. Officials are in regular contact with these companies. I have had no discussions with either the Insulin Dependent Diabetes Trust or my Danish counterparts on this subject.

Diagnostic and Treatment Centres

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the organisations invited to run private diagnostic and treatment centres; in how many cases such an organisation, its associated companies, subsidiaries or directors (a) have been indicted for defrauding taxpayers, patients, staff or their national revenue service and (b) are being investigated for such offences; and if he will list the offences in each case. [130355]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 16 September 2003]: A list of bidders selected to run new treatment centres was announced on Friday 12 September.

In line with major public procurements, Official Journal of the European Communities procurement rules have been adhered to. Regulation 14 of the Public Services Contracts Regulations 1993 specifies the criteria for rejecting bidders. All bidders were required to complete a pre-qualification questionnaire confirming that no bidder had among other matters been convicted of a criminal offence or committed a grave misconduct in the course of its business of not fulfilling obligations relating to payment of taxes. Each appointed preferred bidder has confirmed that that there are no grounds applicable pursuant to which they could be rejected under Regulation 14.

Further, each preferred bidder has confirmed that there are no material nor employment related litigation or other legal proceedings relating to any of the projects that have undertaken which they relied on in their bid to demonstrate their experience of health care projects.

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research informed the grouping of diagnostic and treatment centres into the chain which includes the proposed Ashford centre. [131503]

Mr. Hutton: In autumn 2002, the national health service undertook a national capacity planning process lead by local NHS commissioners. This identified a range of capacity gaps that needed to be met for the NHS to meet the waiting time target set for 2005. Where the NHS was not able to demonstrate plans to meet this demand the residual activity was market tested in December 2002 through an Official Journal of the European Communities (OJEC) advert. In light of the preliminary response, the chains were configured to link capacity gaps of similar activity and organised in a way that the market could provide a rapid response.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether privately run diagnostics and treatment centres will operate (a) in whole and (b) in part from NHS premises. [131906]

Mr. Hutton: A principal aim of the independent sector treatment centre programme is to make available to national health service commissioners additional capacity. Many of the units will either be new build or modular accommodation. In some cases, where local NHS commissioners have requested and where it fits within the local health economy, these units may use NHS accommodation for which they will pay the NHS rent.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether NHS premises will be used by private sector diagnostic and treatment centres. [131051]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 18 September 2003]: A principle aim of the independent sector treatment centre programme is to make available to national health service commissioners additional capacity. Many of the units will either be new buildings or modular accommodation (pre-built operating theatres or ward space). In some cases, local NHS commissioners will make available NHS accommodation that is not currently in use for these new units. In these cases the independent sector provider will pay rent to the NHS.

Trainee Doctors

Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many doctors were in training on the latest date for which figures are available. [135968]

Mr. Hutton: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Ms Mountford) earlier today.

Harefield Hospital

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of personnel working at Harefield Hospital, Middlesex, indicated in the latest staff survey a willingness to transfer to a new cardiothoracic hospital at Paddington Basin in central London. [134656]

Mr. Hutton: Staff retention and recruitment is a major priority in the planning process for the Paddington Health Campus. The most recent Harefield staff survey was conducted by the Royal Brompton and Harefield National Health Service Trust in February 2003. This is a trust document and a copy is available from them on request.

Hospital Trusts (Performance Ratings)

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had with the Commission for Health Improvement on the desirability of the Commission, when assessing the performance of hospital trusts, focusing on (a) outcome, (b) quality and (c) process. [133368]

Mr. Hutton: The Commission for Health Improvement has already introduced new performance indicators which reflect increasingly the outcomes and quality of treatment patients receive, as well as good processes. The Commission for Healthcare Audit and Inspection will, subject to parliamentary approval, take over from April 2004 responsibility for performance ratings and, in consultation with the national health service and the Department of Health, develop the assessment process further.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had with the Commission for Health Improvement concerning its commitment to reassess the way in which the Commission assesses the performance of hospital trusts. [133404]

Mr. Hutton: The Commission for Health Improvement (CHI) inherited and further developed a robust methodology for producing performance ratings. The Commission for Healthcare Audit and Inspection (CHAI), subject to parliamentary approval, will take over responsibility for the ratings from April 2004, and will consult the national health service and the Department of Health, to further develop the assessment process.

Local Pharmaceutical Services

John Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if patient registration will become an aspect of local pharmacy services pilots. [133268]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Local pharmaceutical services pilots can offer patient registration although there is no requirement for patients to use the scheme if they do not wish to do so.

Mental Health Bill

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to issue the results of the consultation on the Mental Health Bill; and in what form. [134775]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Government's response to the consultation will be published before the introduction of the Bill. It will be available in hard copy and on the Department's website.

At that time, copies of responses will be placed in the Library, except in cases where respondents have asked for confidentiality.

NHS Cancer Plan

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions his Department has had with primary care trusts about their role in implementing the preventative elements of the NHS Cancer Plan in (a) Blackpool and (b) England. [135985]

Miss Melanie Johnson: No specific discussions have taken place with primary care trusts (PCTs) about their role in implementing the preventative elements of the NHS Cancer Plan in Blackpool and England. It is for PCTs to discuss with their respective strategic health authorities their role in implementing the preventative elements of the NHS Cancer Plan.

A resource handbook is available for PCTs to highlight the opportunities for the challenges locally from the national service frameworks entitled, "National Service Frameworks: A Practical Aid to Implementation in Primary Care (2002)".

A resource to help health professionals implement the prevention aspects of the NHS Cancer Plan was launched on 1 November 2002 by the Health Development Agency. "Cancer Prevention: A resource to support local action in delivering the NHS Cancer Plan" makes recommendations for action based on the evidence of what works best to tackle Smoking; Diet and Nutrition; Obesity; Physical Activity; Alcohol; Sunlight and Radon—the seven key cancer risk factors highlighted in the NHS Cancer Plan.

Support has been made available in respect of the role of PCTs in delivering NHS stop smoking services, namely recommendations produced by the Health Development Agency entitled, "Meeting Department Of Health Smoking Cessation Targets: Recommendations for Primary Care Trusts" (ISBN: 1–84279–125–7) and available on the Department of Health's tobacco website. These recommendations cover all aspects of service delivery in this area to help PCTs to commission effective, efficient services.

NHS Administrative Costs

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the administrative costs of each health authority in England were in each year since 1997. [127339]

Mr. Hutton: A list of the administrative costs of each health authority in England in each year since 1997 has been placed in the Library.

The following table shows national commissioner administration, and provider management costs in the national health service 1997–98 to 2001–02.

	Total HA + PCT administration and NHS trust management costs (£000)	NHS total expenditure England (£ million)	Percentage HA + PCT administration and NHS trust management costs of NHS budget
1997–98	1,962,983	34,664	5.7
1998–99	1,935,116	36,608	5.3
1 999–2000	2,051,259	40,215	5.1
2000–01	2,124,710	43,951	4.8
2001–02	2,565,092	49,279	5.0

Management costs have, as a percentage of the overall NHS budget, fallen from 5 per cent. to 4 per cent. over the period 1997–98 to 2001–02.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Departmental Energy Use

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs how much (a) electricity and (b) other energy his Department and its predecessors has used in each year since 1997 (i) in total and (ii) per square metre; what the projected use is for each of the following years for which forecasts are made; what plans he has to reduce usage; and if he will make a statement. [135048]

Mr. Lammy: For the amount of energy consumed each year since 1997, in total, and per square metre for my Department I refer the hon. Member to the answer given him by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on 3 November 2003, Official Report, column 403W. This is based on annual returns provided by this Department.

My Department only forecasts energy usage for the forthcoming financial year and the current forecast for 2004–05 are set out in the following table. This table also includes details of our actual consumption for 2002–03 and our forecast consumption for 2003–04.

Consumption (GWH)

	Fossil	Electricity
2002–03[1]	104.5	[2]64.6
2003–04	95.7	61.7
2004–05	97.7	67.4

[1] The figures for 2002–03 have been weather corrected to the 1999–2000 20 year average.

[2] This includes 10 per cent. of energy which is from renewable sources and therefore exempt from CCL.

My Department plans to reduce energy usage by continuing its planned program of energy surveys, efficiency works and training courses for Accommodation Liaison Officers.

In addition my Department follows guidance on government procurement produced by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. This requires all new contracts to meet minimum efficiency standards as well as value for money, when purchasing certain types of product. Types of product that must meet energy efficiency criteria include IT equipment, gas boilers, white goods (eg fridges and washing machines), televisions, lighting systems and light-bulbs 2003.

Judicial Committee

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs how many countries use the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as their final court of appeal; and if he will make a statement. [134401]

Mr. Leslie: The Judicial Committee is used by 15 countries, as well as by the Sovereign Base area of Akrotiri and Dhekelia in Cyprus and by the United Kingdom Overseas Territories. Fuller details are available on the Privy Council Office website www.privycouncil.gov.uk.

Magistrates Courts

Mr. Byers: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what amounts of fines were (a) due to be paid and (b) collected in each magistrates' court in the most recent year for which information is available. [136532]

Mr. Leslie: Magistrates' Courts Committees (MCCs) have a responsibility for the collection of a range of debts imposed by both the magistrates' courts and the Crown Court. Debt collected includes not only fines but also fees, compensation, confiscation orders, legal aid contributions and some maintenance orders. It is not yet possible to separate out only fines from the total so the figures provided in the table include all the elements above. Data are collected centrally at a MCC level, rather than at court level.

Small Claims Courts

Vera Baird: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs how the personnel who adjudicate in the small claims court are selected for (a) the job and (b) particular types of case. [134295]

Mr. Leslie: Small claims are heard in county courts by District Judges and deputy District Judges who are appointed by the Lord Chancellor. Any District Judge, or deputy, can deal with small claims cases. The listing officer in each court is responsible, under the superintendence of the judges, on a day-to-day basis for allocating cases to individual judges.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Housing (Islington)

Jeremy Corbyn: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what discussions he has had with the London borough of Islington concerning (a) its arm's length management organisation application, (b) the cost of its preparation and (c) the views of the borough's tenants on this policy. [136508]

Keith Hill: The London borough of Islington was given a provisional allocation of £24.9 million under Round Three of the Arm's Length Management Organisation (ALMO) Programme in July this year. Officials at the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister have had detailed discussions with council officers while the bid was being assessed. This dialogue will continue as the council draws up its application under section 27 of the Housing Act 1985 to delegate its housing management functions to the ALMO. Approval under section 27 will only be given if we are satisfied that proper consultation has been carried out and that tenants support proposals. The cost of preparing ALMO applications is a matter for the council.

Fire Service

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what in-service death benefits are payable to members of the Fire Service. [136196]

Phil Hope: For Great Britain the full range of death benefits that are potentially available under the Fire-fighters' Pension Scheme are:

Spouse's Ordinary Pension
Spouse's Special Pension
Spouse's Augmented Award
Spouse's Accrued Pension
Child's Ordinary Pension
Child's Special Allowance
Child's Special Gratuity
Child's Accrued Allowance
Lump Sum Death Grant
Adult Dependent Relative's Special Pension
Dependent Relative's Gratuity

Eligibility will depend on individual circumstances at the time of death. In addition, under the Conditions of Service agreed by the National Joint Council for Local Authorities' Fire Brigades, death grant is payable to the dependants or estate of any fire-fighter killed as a result of an accident on duty.

Local Authority Housing Transfers

Mr. Drew: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister (1) whether the requirement that local authorities consultation material issued as part of large scale voluntary transfer is checked by the Department extends to information issued by (a) individual (i) councillors, (ii) tenants, (iii) tenant groups and (b) the selected stock transfer organisation; [136040]

(2) what the reasons are for requiring local authorities to have all materials checked as part of the consultation process for large scale voluntary transfer. [136041]

Keith Hill: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister does not formally check material issued by parties other than the local authority. An authority is required to give Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Housing Corporation an opportunity to comment on its consultation material before it is issued. This is to enable identification of anything which is likely to be unacceptable to my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister when he comes to consider the authority's consent application or to draw attention to the adequacy or comprehensiveness of the material.

In carrying out consultation with tenants about a proposed transfer, local authorities must meet the statutory requirements set out in section 106 of and Schedule 3A to the Housing Act 1985 (as inserted by section six of and Schedule one to the Housing and Planning Act 1986). They are also obliged to adhere to the Code of Recommended Practice on Local Authority Publicity. This permits authorities to explain and justify their proposals and ensure that local authority publicity concentrates on facts and explanation.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the material his Department has checked from (a) Stroud district council and (b) other parties involved in the large scale voluntary transfer process. [136042]

Keith Hill: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has formally cleared material issued by the local authority and has, on request, commented on material issued by other stakeholders.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will publish the advice his Department has given to Stroud district council on their communication with tenants regarding the procedures for large scale voluntary transfer. [136142]

Keith Hill: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given on 22 October 2003, Official Report, column 564. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister expects all local authorities involved in housing transfer to follow the guidance on involving tenants and other stakeholders in the Housing Transfer Manual. All comments provided to Stroud district council have been in accordance with this guidance.

Mobile Masts

Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what representations he has received on third generation mobile telephone masts from the Churt Mast Action Group. [136233]

Keith Hill: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has no record of having received representations on third generation mobile telephone masts from the Churt Mast Action Group.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

HIV/AIDS, TB and Malaria

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much the United Kingdom has contributed to the Global Fund to fight AIDS in each year; how much is planned to be spent in 2004–05; and if he will make a statement. [134971]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: The UK has a long-term commitment to the Global Fund to Fight HIV/AIDS, TB and Malaria and recognises that in order to be effective it needs predictable and sustainable financing. The UK recently extended its pledge by a further two years to 2008 bringing our total contribution to US$280million.

The pattern of our disbursements has been agreed with the Global Fund Secretariat—for the financial year 2002–03, the UK provided £50 million in two separate payments of £25 million, in 2003–04 the UK provided £25 million, and for the financial year 2004–05 we will provide £30 million.

UK funding will be subject to the GFATM reflecting a clear poverty focus, achieving a better financing system, integrating the Fund's activities more effectively with national programmes and meeting agreed benchmarks to monitor its effectiveness. I am pleased to report that good progress was made at the recent 6th Board meeting in Thailand on many of these issues.

Adam Price: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what funds the Government is committed to allocating towards the Global Fund to fight AIDS, TB and malaria; and what funds have been allocated to date. [135274]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: The UK has a long-term financial commitment to the Global Fund to Fight HIV/AIDS, TB and Malaria which will provide the Fund with a total contribution of $280 million by 2008. The pattern of our disbursements has been agreed with the Global Fund Secretariat and to date these amount to £75 million.

International Debt

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what proportion of debt repayments which are made by developing countries and are received by the UK are (a) channelled to non-governmental organisations, (b) channelled to departmental aid programmes and (c) absorbed by the Exchequer. [135064]

John Healey: I have been asked to reply.

Over 90 per cent. of sovereign debt payments to the Government relates to recoveries and interest payable to the Export Credit Guarantee Department (ECGD) under Bilateral Debt Rescheduling agreements in respect of defaulted export contracts.

With the exception of an amount, averaging less than 1.6 per cent. per annum, which is passed on to ECGD's policyholders as their part of the recovery, all the receipts are paid into the Consolidated Fund.

The Department for International Development (DfID) also receives some repayments on aid. The principal repayments are channelled to the DfID bilateral aid programme. Repayments of interest are paid into the Consolidated Fund.

The UK Government are committed to providing debt relief for the most heavily indebted countries in the world through the rapid and full implementation of the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) Initiative, ensuring that it delivers a robust exit from unsustainable debt for the world's poorest countries. The UK has already made a commitment to provide 100 per cent. relief on debts for all eligible HIPC countries when they reach Completion point. Furthermore, the Chancellor has announced that any payments from countries yet to reach Decision Point will be held in trust for the day they can be returned to fund poverty reduction. The HIPC Initiative has an important role to play in maximising the resources available for poverty reduction in developing countries. However, all HIPC countries would still need additional aid to meet the Millennium Development Goals, even if all of their debt from the World bank and IMF were forgiven. That is why the UK's proposal for an International Finance Facility is so important. It can provide the much-needed substantial increase in resources that debt relief alone would not achieve and that could be disbursed by way of grants and additional debt relief.

Kyrgyzstan/Uzbekistan

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will make a statement on the humanitarian situation on the border between Kyrgyzstan and Uzbekistan. [135200]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: Uzbekistan closed its border with the Kyrgyz Republic in January 2003. It was done, according to the Uzbeks, to protect Uzbekistan from cheap Kyrgyz goods. It has had a severe impact on the livelihoods of people living near the border. Cross-border trade has declined, although smuggling, by bribing border officials, has increased dramatically. Families living on either side of the border are separated from their relatives. Some 20 Uzbek citizens, mainly women, have drowned while attempting to cross the border river at Kara Suu. Uzbek border guards along the 1100km border have shot several Uzbek and Kyrgyz citizens. The Kyrgyz Foreign Ministry continues to issue protest notes to Uzbekistan.

Several Kyrgyz and Uzbek NGOs have recently started a project on reducing tension in border areas. International organizations and donors working on cross-border issues include OSCE, USAID, UNDP, Mercy Corps, ICG, ICRC, IOM.

Mongolia

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what projects his Department (a) has initiated, (b) fully directed funds, (c) partially directed funds, (d) funds through EU initiatives and (e) funds through United Nations initiatives in Mongolia; and if he will make a statement on the (i) aims, (ii) structure, (iii) methods and (iv) progress of each. [134456]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: DFID has no long-term or current bilateral programme in Mongolia. The British embassy does provide some direct assistance in the form of a Small Grants Scheme (SGS) allocation (currently £200,000 per annum) to support small-scale poverty and human development focused activities. The focus of the SGS in Mongolia is on children, especially with respect to education, social care and protection from exploitation and violence. Key projects will direct funds towards assisting the integration of vulnerable children into pre and primary school education, while also helping to tackle problems that face Mongolia's street children by defining clear standards of care for shelters and increasing the number of children united with their families. The SGS is largely managed by the Save the Children on behalf of the FCO. The Save the Children Fund reports annually on the SGS to the FCO.

DFID has made small contributions for humanitarian aid and relief in previous years, but none in this financial year.

In addition the UK contributes to the development programmes of various multi-lateral agencies. The imputed share of the UK's spend on Mongolia (in 2001, the latest year for which figures are available) through the EU and the UN was £400,000 and £600,000 respectively.

The EU's current Country Strategy for Mongolia runs from 2002–04 and focuses on Rural Development (including providing support for rural enterprises; addressing the social consequences of transition and protection of the environment). Performance against the Country Strategy is due to be reviewed in 2004–05.

A range of specialised UN agencies—such as UNICEF—operate in Mongolia. In addition, the United Nations Development Programme facilitates delivery of programmes under three headings in Mongolia: Democratic Governance, Economic Transition and Poverty Reduction and Sustainable Natural Resource Management.

DFID does not individually monitor the progress of all projects that are funded on a multilateral basis, as this would involve duplication and unnecessarily divert resources. DFID therefore works to ensure that sufficiently robust reporting arrangements are in place within relevant multilateral agencies.

Non-governmental Organisations

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment his Department has made of the concerns raised by (a) Mr. Dennis McNamara, Inspector General of the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and (b) Dr. Dawit Zawde, President and CEO of Africa Humanitarian Action during his presentation to the UN High Commissioner for Refugees' pre-Governing Executive Committee meeting in Geneva on 2 October; what plans his Department has to address these concerns; and if he will make a statement. [133655]

Hilary Benn: The Government attaches high priority to the concerns raised by Dennis McNamara on the safety and security of humanitarian workers in Iraq and other conflict-affected countries. Prior to the conflict in Iraq, DFID provided the Office of the UN Security Coordinator (UNSECOORD) with £100,000 for security support measures and a further £500,000 immediately following conflict also to support UN security. Since the bombing of the UN Headquarters, DFID funds of up to £3 million have been earmarked to UNSECOORD for extra staff, equipment and measures for improving UN security.

DFID maintains regular contact with non-governmental organisations (NGOs) working in Iraq, at which safety and security issues are carefully considered. Where necessary DFID is supporting NGOs to enhance security measures through our programme support to their work in Iraq.

Dr. Dawit Zawde raised concerns that smaller NGOs are being sidelined in favour of larger ones. DFID does not exclude small agencies. We are focused on achieving results and DFID will work with smaller agencies when this is the most effective way of achieving our objectives.

Sudan

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much his Department is spending in 2003–04 on development aid to Sudan, broken down by (a) type of programme, (b) cost of programme and (c) region for which support is being provided. [136224]

Hilary Benn: In 2003–04 DFID plans to spend £20 million on development aid to Sudan.

The following is a list of those Sudanese projects which are now active, or have been active in 2003–04.

We are open to working in all regions of Sudan. The allocation of funds is decided by need, not location. However, where a project in the aforementioned list is engaged in working in a particular locality, this is mentioned.

DFID funded activities in Sudan during financial year 2003–04

National Projects

Abduction/Slavery

Save the Children UK—Case Resolution and the Eradication of Internal Abduction of Women and Children in Sudan (£500,000).

Demining

International Committee of the Red Cross: 2003 Sudan Appeal (£2,500,000).

UNICEF—Sudan Water and Sanitation Programme (£500,000).

World Food Programme—Sudan Emergency Food Assistance 2003 (£2,500,000).

Peace Building

UNDP—Support for the joint secretariat of the Government of Sudan and Sudan People's Liberation Movement's Joint Planning Mechanism (JPM) (£88,000).

Inter-Governmental Authority on Development (IGAD)—Contribution to Budget for the Sudan Peace Secretariat in Nairobi, to facilitate direct talks between parties involved in the civil war in Sudan (£505,000).

IGAD—Sudan Ceasefire Verification Monitoring Team (£490,000).

Resource People for the Peace talks (advice and support to parties involved in the IGAD peace talks in Sudan) (£100,000).

Demobilisation, Disarmament and Reintegration Adviser to the IGAD Sudan Peace Talks (£63,000).

Relief Organisation/Coordination

UNDP Regional Humanitarian Coordinator, Sudan—Emergency Operations Coordinating and planning (£185,000).

Local Projects

Health/Food

International Federation of the Red Cross—Emergency Appeal Sudan. Floods in Kassala State (£150,000).

Action Contre la Faim—Emergency Nutritional Programme Red Sea State, Sudan (£202,593).

Action Contre la Faim—Nutrition, Food Security and Surveillance Programme in Bentiu, Rob Kona and Surroundings, Unity State, Sudan (£316,426).

Concern—Aweil West and North, Supplementary and Community Therapeutic Care and Emergency Nutrition (£350,000).

GOAL—To prevent disease and establish PHC in Kassala Town in Kassala Sudan in light of the recent floods in the area (£96,500).

MEDAIR: Emergency Nutrition Project: Lekuangale Pibor County, Sudan (£114,500).

Medecins sans Frontieres—Emergency Health Interventions in the Gederaf, Malkal and Wau states in Sudan: treatment of Kala Azar (£700,000).

Medecins sans Frontieres—Health Assistance for the Resident and Displaced Populations in Jonglei and Upper Nile Provinces, Southern Sudan (£424,000).

Medecins sans Frontieres—Primary Health Care: Akop, Ananatak and Luacjang Payams in Tonj County (£265,439).

Medecins sans Frontieres—Treatment of Human African Trypanosomiasis (Sleeping sickness) in Ibba, Maridi County, Western Equatoria, Sudan (£250,000).

Oxfam—Emergency Food and Nutrition Intervention Tokar, Rural Port Sudan and urban shanty areas in Port Sudan, Red Sea State (£647,220).

Save the Children UK: Emergency response to conflict related internal displacement in North Dafur (£500,000).

Tear Fund—Emergency Nutrition, Health and Food Security in Aweil East, South and West (£506,458).

World Vision Emergency Nutrition Project: Thiet, Tonj, Pagal and Kuanythi Payams, Tonj County, Bhar el Ghazal Region, Sudan (£513,706).

Peace Building

IGAD Peace Talks: Joint Military Commission—The Nuba Mountains Cease-Fire Agreement (£2,308,000).

Christian Aid: Legal Stakeholders consultative Workshop, Rumbek, September 2003 (planning an integrated justice sector for south Sudan) (£33,500).

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what resources he will make available to aid post-conflict reconstruction and development in Sudan on the signing of a comprehensive peace agreement; for what types of programme funding will be made available; and which regions will benefit. [136226]

Hilary Benn: DFID intends to increase its programme in Sudan should a peace agreement be reached. The majority of our resources would continue to go towards humanitarian needs, but with a greater emphasis towards longer-term development. We believe that work on the implementation of the peace agreement will require early funding. We would gradually increase the amount put towards the longer-term objectives of improved governance and policies. In addition, we expect to pay our share of the costs of debt relief.

Our intention is to ensure all regions would benefit from peace in Sudan.

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps he will take to ensure that resources made available by his Department will be allocated (a) transparently and (b) to all marginalised groups and regions of Sudan. [136227]

Hilary Benn: We will provide information on the activities we fund in Sudan to any member of the public who requests it.

With regard to making resources available to all marginalised regions and groups on Sudan, our support for peace building is built on the premise that all regions and all peoples need their voices and grievances to be heard. However, our humanitarian responses are based on need, not geography or ethnicity. Our limited resources mean we cannot fund all activities.

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will make a statement on the peace process in Sudan. [136348]

Hilary Benn: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave her on 21 October 2003, Official Report, column 510W.

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps he is taking to ensure the safety of workers distributing aid funded by his Department in Sudan; and if he will make a statement on the recent murders of aid workers in the Darfur region. [136349]

Hilary Benn: When considering proposals for activities in insecure regions of Sudan, the experience and ability of the requesting body to deal with a difficult environment is considered. If an agency funded by us decides to withdraw, suspending or cancelling a project due to deteriorating conditions, we support their decision.

We were saddened to hear of the deaths of the aid workers in Darfur and our thoughts are with their families.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will increase the number of local NGOs with which his Department works in Zimbabwe. [135341]

Hilary Benn: DFID is already funding the activities of several local NGOs either directly or through the partnerships local NGOs have with international NGOs in Zimbabwe. The international NGOs that have such partnerships include Oxfam, SCF, CRS, Care, CAFOD, Christian Aid, JSI and others.

An example of a local NGO DFID is funding is the farm community trust of Zimbabwe (FCTZ). This is assisting displaced former commercial farm workers with both agricultural recovery inputs such as seeds and fertilizers (with some technical assistance) and food aid. In addition we are providing funding to Fosenet, which is an umbrella organisation of local NGOs, with support for four of its members.

The capacity of the local NGOs is often limited and this is being addressed either directly or through the international NGOs that are providing support and facilitation.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what measures are being taken to ensure that (a) aid distributors in Zimbabwe and (b) those responsible for registration are appropriately trained to ensure they (i) understand and (ii) comply with the apolitical nature of aid programmes. [135344]

Hilary Benn: The memorandum of understanding recently signed between the World Food Programme (WFP) and government of Zimbabwe sets out clear processes for registration of beneficiaries and distribution of food aid. WFP conducts rigorous training of its implementing partners on these aid delivery protocols which stress the apolitical nature of food aid. WFP has also disseminated these guidelines to local government officials to remind them remind of their obligations to ensure food aid is distributed on the basis of need rather than political affiliation.

DFID and other donors are providing additional support to WFP to strengthen their capacity to monitor food aid including registration and distribution processes. Particular focus is on the monitoring of political incidents. WFP and NGOs have a zero tolerance policy with regard to politicisation of food aid. Although there have been a few local incidents of political interference these have been dealt with swiftly at a local level through prompt action by NGOs and WFP.

In addition, DFID holds regular meetings with its NGO partners (many of whom are also WFP implementing partners), to discuss and improve food aid mechanisms. Many DFID partners are also individually negotiating memoranda of understanding at district level to ensure all stakeholders are aware of apolitical registration and distribution processes.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Council Tax Benefit

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (1) if he will estimate the average level of unclaimed council tax benefit per pensioner in London; [135151]

(2) if he will estimate the proportion of (a) pensioners and (b) households in London who are eligible for council tax benefit but do not claim. [135152]

Mr. Pond: The information is not available.

Statistics for Great Britain are presented in the DWP series "Income Related Benefits Estimates of Take-Up". The latest estimates relate to financial year 2000–01 and are in the Library.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many recipients of disability living allowance had their entitlement reduced on review to a lower rate in (a) 2002 and (b) 2001. [127229]

Maria Eagle: The available information is in the table.

Numbers of disability living allowance (DLA) recipients whose awards were reviewed[1] and those which were reduced to a lower rate on review in the years ending 30 November 2001 and 30 November 2002

Thousands

	Year ending 30 November 2001	Year ending 30 November 2002
Total number of reconsiderations and supersessions[2]	256.6	268.2[4]
DLA reduced to a lower amount[3]	13.2	26.2

[1] Figures given for "review" are where a reconsideration or supersession has been made. Figures do not include those for renewal claims on expiry of fixed-period awards, or for appeals.

[2] Figures are from a 100 per cent sample and rounded to the nearest hundred.

[3] Figures are: from a 5 per cent. sample, in thousands and rounded to the nearest hundred; for DLA awards which are reduced to a lower amount which remains in payment (this includes cases in which of one of the two components is withdrawn); not including terminations; and based on claims in which the last decision recorded was due to a reconsideration or supersession.
Figures are not available for reductions which have resulted from an earlier decision in the same year.

[4] From November 2002, the methodology for producing these figures was changed to allow statistics to be published much sooner. This has resulted in a small increase in the reported caseload. This is because some cases which have actually terminated but have not yet been updated on the computer system are now included.

Note:
The higher figure for reductions in year ending November 2002 is due to a change in legislation from 8 April 2002. Preserved rights to help with care home costs through income support were replaced by alternative help from local authorities. This overall switch in financial responsibility for care home residents included withdrawal of DLA care component (or attendance allowance), but not mobility component, in such cases after 28 days' residence.

Welfare-to-Work Programmes

John Mann: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many people found work of over 13 weeks in 2002, broken down by Progress2Work area; and how many of these remain in employment. [135313]

Mr. Browne [holding answer 30 October 2003]: The first phase of Progress2Work was rolled out in March 2002 in 27 pathfinder districts. The programme was extended to cover 60 districts by April 2003, and national roll out will be complete by March 2004.

Given the range of problems faced by recovering drug mis-users and the relatively long periods of participation, this is not a programme where we would expect immediate results. However, by the end of 2002, Progress2Work had already been successful in helping 31 people into employment lasting 13 weeks or longer. Due to the small numbers involved, we cannot give figures broken down by Progress2Work area, to avoid the risk of identifying individuals.

As with all of our welfare to work programmes, Progress2Work will be subject to evaluation and the results from this will be published when they become available. This will include an evaluation of whether Progress2Work is successful in helping people to remain in employment in the longer term.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many people securing employment through the New Deal 25 plus remained in that job for (a) more than two, (b) more than six and (c) more than 12 months, in each year since the New Deal 25 plus was introduced. [133029]

Mr. Browne: By the end of June 2003, 154,900 people had been helped into work through New Deal 25 plus. We do not collect data on the length of time an individual remains in the same job but we do record whether they have returned to claiming jobseekers allowance (JSA). If there is no claim to JSA within 13 weeks then their employment is classed as 'sustained'. This is the first point at which we collect such data. The number of people gaining jobs through New Deal 25 plus and the number of those who had not made a new claim to JSA within 13 weeks, six and 12 months is in the table.

New Deal 25 plus—numbers into work since 1998

Year (January to December)	People gaining a job	No claim for JSA within 13 weeks	No claim for JSA within 6 months	No claim for JSA within 12 months
1998 (from June)	6,080	4,460	3,220	3,120
1999	27,040	21,650	17,300	16,560
2000	27,470	22,330	17,930	17,080
2001[1]	32,500	25,960	21,340	20,120
2002	41,450	31,720	26,520	[2]26,520
2003 (to June)	20,360	16,030	[2]15,610	[2]15,610

[1] Includes jobs gained in both the pre-April 2001 New Deal 25 plus programme and the post April re-engineered New Deal 25 plus programme.

[2] These numbers will reduce over time as they include people for whom six or 12 months will not have elapsed since the job was gained.

DEFENCE

A400M

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the employment and technology benefits are to Lancashire of the A400M project; and if he will make a statement. [135571]

Mr. Ingram: The A400M Prime Contractor, Airbus Military, is free to select equipment through competition so that the programme is organised and managed as cost effectively as possible. It is therefore not known how many jobs or the degree of investment that might be generated in Lancashire.

However, Airbus UK have estimated that the A400M programme will directly create up to 2,500 high quality jobs in the United Kingdom—notably in design and advanced manufacture. They have calculated that indirect employment could bring that figure to over 8,000.

Astute Class Submarines

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to place an order for further Astute class submarines; and if he will make a statement. [134483]

Mr. Ingram: A contract was placed in March 1997 for the design and manufacture of three Astute class submarines. The procurement of further Astute submarines is being considered and announcements will be made as soon as possible.

Bomb Disposal Units

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions, broken down by fire authority, in (a) 2001, (b) 2002 and (c) 2003 to date armed forces bomb disposal teams have been called out to provide assistance where the device has been (i) a firework and (ii) firework related; and what the total cost of such call-outs has been. [135647]

Mr. Ingram: I will write to my hon. Friend and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Broadband (RAF Bases)

Tony Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made in introducing broadband for RAF bases. [134388]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 29 October 2003]: RAF station commanders have the option to provide separate recreational broadband internet connectivity for their station if it is commercially available at their localities.

The Defence Communication Services Agency is engaged in the provision of a Defence Intranet broadband service, which allows those Defence users with broadband capable local telephone exchanges to connect to MOD's Restricted Wide Area Network.

This MOD Broadband service has been trialled successfully, and is due to be launched this calendar year.

Disciplinary Offences

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many complaints of bullying and violent assaults were investigated by the Special Investigations Branch in the last 12 months; and what the breakdown of outcomes is. [132179]

Mr. Ingram: In the period 1 January 2002 to 31 December 2002, the Royal Military Police conducted 2,399 investigations of assault. Of these, 30 cases involved an allegation or suspicion of bullying and as a result: disciplinary action was taken in nine cases; no further action was taken in 14; and the outcome has yet to be determined in seven.

In the period 1 January 2003 to 30 September 2003, 1,686 cases were investigated. Of these, 16 cases involved an allegation or suspicion of bullying and as a result: disciplinary action was taken in four cases; no further action was taken in seven; while investigations into the remaining five have not concluded.

RAF Griffin

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the deployment of RAF Griffin aircraft from Cyprus outside Cyprus since 2002 required the mobilisation of sponsored reserve personnel; what cost it entailed; and what mobilisation costs were budgeted when the leasing contract was signed to cover such deployments. [134554]

Mr. Ingram: Griffin helicopters, which are supplied by a contractor but flown by RAF personnel, have been based in Cyprus since April 2003. The aircraft have been deployed once since, in support of a training exercise. There is no contractual requirement for the aircraft to deploy on operations and no requirement for contractor personnel to be sponsored reserves.

Defence Diversification Agency

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many new jobs have been created in Scotland through the Defence Diversification Agency in each year since its inception; and if he will make a statement. [135797]

Mr. Caplin: The Defence Diversification Agency (DDA) has been operating in Scotland since early 1999 and has so far assisted over 250 companies in Scotland, producing technology transfer contracts from the Ministry of Defence to a value in excess of £1 million.

There are no reliable techniques for translating the impact of technology transfer into new jobs created. However, the DDA is exploring methods of measuring value with a view to imbedding appropriate systems into future projects. Estimates from other United Kingdom regions suggests the DDA adds value through its activities of around three times that of its costs.

Defence Systems International Exhibition

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (a) when and (b) where the next Defence Systems Equipment International Exhibition will be held. [134965]

Mr. Ingram: We understand from the exhibition organisers, Spearhead Exhibitions, that they plan to hold the next Defence Systems International Exhibition between 13 and 16 September 2005, at the ExCel Exhibition Centre, London Docklands.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which Government Ministers attended (a) the Defence Systems Equipment International Exhibition in September and (b) the exhibition dinner. [134966]

Mr. Ingram: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, my noble Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement and I attended the exhibition. There was no official exhibition dinner or reception.

Democratic Republic of Congo

Jeremy Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the size is of UK military deployment to the Democratic Republic of Congo; what its estimated annual cost is; and under whose command the forces operate. [136529]

Mr. Ingram: The UK currently contributes six military personnel (shortly to reduce to five) to the UN peacekeeping mission (MONUC) that has been operating in the Democratic Republic of Congo since 13 November 1999. The estimated annual cost of the deployment is £713,000. Troops deployed on MONUC are under the command of the UN Force Commander, General Diallo.

Eurofighter

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent technical difficulties have been encountered in the development of the Eurofighter Typhoon; and when he expects the aircraft to enter operational service with the RAF. [134461]

Mr. Ingram: Following a minor malfunction of the aircraft's landing gear computer during a test flight in Germany on 9 October, all Typhoon flying has been suspended as a precautionary measure while the problem is investigated and rectified. This work is progressing and we hope to resume flying and the acceptance of aircraft into RAF service shortly. Typhoon remains on schedule to become operationally deployable in the second half of the decade.

Export Control

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his answer of 16 September 2003, Official Report, column 705W, on export control, what assessment he has made of the benefits of having extra-territorial controls on UK arms deals; and whether this would have an impact on the number of (a) fatalities and (b) injuries caused to UK armed forces by illicitly purchased weapons. [135104]

Nigel Griffiths: I have been asked to reply.

The 1998 White Paper on Strategic Export Controls (CM 3989) sets out the benefits of introducing extra-territorial trade controls.

No assessment has been made of the impact of extra-territorial trade controls on fatalities and injuries caused to UK armed personnel.

Gibraltar

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the future size of the (a) Army, (b) Royal Navy and (c) Royal Air Force in Gibraltar. [135525]

Mr. Ingram: Gibraltar remains a key staging post and forward mounting base comprising a naval base, airfield and other support facilities. We will continue to maintain forces there appropriate to its role.

Mental Health

Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what action the Royal Welch Fusiliers have taken in respect of soldiers suffering from stress-related mental conditions in the past five years; [135362]

(2) what guidelines he has issued in respect of support and treatment of army personnel suffering from stress-related mental conditions; [135363]

(3) what facilities the Royal Welch Fusiliers have for support and treatment of soldiers suffering from stress-related mental conditions. [135364]

Mr. Caplin: The Ministry of Defence recognises that stress-related disorders are serious and disabling conditions. Policy on prevention is reviewed regularly in light of medical developments. Guidance and prevention of stress-related conditions has been issued widely throughout the army chain of command, and all army medical officers receive training in the recognition and management of such conditions.

Community-based psychiatry is available to every military unit and to every service person. Support available to the Royal Welch Fusiliers includes an on-site community psychiatric nurse, who is backed-up by a psychiatric consultant where possible. Secondary care is provided by military and civilian psychiatric hospitals. If a soldier is assessed as suffering from a stress-related condition the unit medical officer will order treatment tailored to his or her clinical needs. The unit medical officer liaises closely with the chain of command and may also refer individuals to the unit welfare officer and/or the padre as appropriate.

NATO Response Force

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the United Kingdom's commitments to the newly formed NATO response force. [135389]

Mr. Hoon: The NATO Response Force (NRF) was inaugurated on 15 October 2003, some 12 months ahead of schedule, with a limited interim capability.

The NRF is not a standing force and responsibility for providing elements of the force will rotate between nations. The Force Generation and associated force balancing for the NRF is a continuing process which means that both force offers and the subsequent make-up of the force, including the scale of individual national contributions, will change.

As the detailed information on the NRF received from NATO is classified, I am withholding precise details of the United Kingdom and other nations' offers of forces in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

However, I can say that the UK has made an initial contribution to NRF1 (October 2003 to January 2004) and NRF2 (January 2004 to July 2004) primarily consisting of maritime and air assets.

Aircraft Carriers

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress being made with the construction of the new aircraft carriers. [134436]

Mr. Ingram: The Future Carrier project is currently in the Assessment Phase and I refer my hon. Friend to my Written Ministerial Statement made on 16 September 2003, Official Report, columns 44–45WS.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what impact the reduction in size of the two new aircraft carriers will have on operational plans for (a) the capability and use of the carriers and (b) the size of the crews. [134437]

Mr. Ingram: Final decisions have yet to be taken on the main specifications for CVF. The programme is currently in its Assessment Phase which is aimed at increasing the maturity of the design as well as optimising capability and value for money. The size of the vessels will continue to evolve as the design matures to meet the required capability. Crew size will similarly not be fixed until the design is sufficiently mature.

New Vessels

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many new vessels for the Royal Navy have been approved but not yet launched; how many have been allocated names; and what names have been selected. [135411]

Mr. Ingram: A total of 12 vessels—three Astute submarines, six Type 45 destroyers and three Bay Class Landing Ship Dock (Auxiliary) (LSD(A))—have passed Main Gate approval but have not yet been launched. All have been allocated names.

The Astute submarines are to be called HMS Astute, HMS Ambush and HMS Artful. The T45s will be called HMS Daring, HMS Dauntless, HMS Diamond, HMS Dragon, HMS Defender and HMS Duncan, and the LSD(A)s RFA Lyme Bay, RFA Mounts Bay and RFA Cardigan Bay.

Procurement Projects

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which procurement projects involve production of parts outside the UK; which countries are taking part in production; and for what reasons the contract was awarded for production overseas in each case. [133042]

Mr. Ingram: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. (Exemption 9 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.)

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress with the Nimrod Procurement project since June 2003. [133644]

Mr. Ingram: On 19 February, my noble Friend the Minister for Defence Procurement, Lord Bach announced that the MOD and BAE Systems had reached agreement on the way ahead for the Nimrod MRA4 (and ASTUTE) programmes. Since then, we and BAE Systems have been working to agree a formal amendment to the Nimrod MRA4 contract. We hope to have this signed shortly.

RAF Recruitment

Mr. David: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to change the admission rules for the RAF for individuals with anterior cruciate ligament damage, in relation to posts which do not require an active military role. [136033]

Mr. Caplin: Members of the armed forces, regardless of their role, can be required to serve anywhere in the world at any time, often in remote locations. As such they must be physically fit and able to meet the challenge that operating in these environments brings. Consequently, the Ministry of Defence has no plans to change its policy regarding the disqualification of individuals with anterior cruciate ligament damage from joining the armed forces.

Replenishment Tankers

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to purchase Henry J. Kaiser class replenishment tankers from the US Navy. [135339]

Mr. Ingram: We have no plans to purchase Kaiser class tankers.

Ship Naming

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his role is in the naming of Her Majesty's ships; and what his policy is in exercising that role. [135449]

Mr. Ingram: Her Majesty the Queen approves the names of warships on the recommendation of the First Sea Lord, as advised by the Ships' Names and Badges Committee and as endorsed by my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Defence.

Policy for naming ships of the Royal Navy is informed by a number of guiding principles. For example, many ship names have a long and illustrious heritage, and a name with a tradition of Royal Navy use is preferred. Other factors in making a selection include the number of battle honours associated with a name, and whether a name is already classically associated with a particular type of vessel. Alternatively, a ship's name might commemorate historically strong links between the Royal Navy and a particular town or district.

Tanks

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the operational availability is of the (a) Warrior and (b) Challenger, broken down by unit; and what the overall availability targets are for these vehicles. [135392]

Mr. Ingram: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

TREASURY

Information Technology

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 11 June 2003, Official Report, column 891W, on open source operating systems, how many open source software solution procurements have taken place within the public sector procurement community in the last 12 months; and what percentage of the (a) IT contracts awarded and (b) value of IT contracts awarded this represents. [136447]

Mr. Boateng: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Alternative Investment Market

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what discussions he has had with the (a) London Stock Exchange and (b) Financial Services Authority on the alternative investment market becoming an unregulated market; [136078]

(2) what research he has carried out on the way in which an unregulated alternative investment market would affect companies and investors; [136079]

(3) what discussions he has had with the European Commission about the alternative investment market becoming an unregulated market. [136080]

Ruth Kelly: The London Stock Exchange (LSE) is a Recognised Investment Exchange (RIE) under the Financial Services and Markets Act (FSMA) and has to operate all its markets, including the Alternative Investment Market (AIM), in compliance with the recognition requirements for RIEs. The Financial Services Authority (FSA) supervises its compliance with these obligations.

AIM is also a 'regulated market' under the EU's Investment Services Directive (ISO). This means that it complies with the standards for regulated markets set out in the directive and can do business in other member states on the basis of mutual recognition of its regulatory status in the UK.

The LSE has indicated that it is planning to consult about removing AIM from the list of EU regulated markets. If this happens, AIM would not become an unregulated market. The LSE would still be required by the FSA to meet its existing UK regulatory obligations under FSMA with respect to the way it operates AIM. But there would be no mutual recognition of AIM'S regulatory status in the UK by other member states under the ISO. Treasury officials have discussed this issue with the LSE and the FSA.

Because AIM is not going to become an unregulated market, the Treasury has not done any research about the impact of such a scenario on investors and issuers, nor have we discussed it with the European Commission.

Changing Jobs

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 17 September 2003, Official Report, column 863W, on changing jobs, whether similar schemes exist for those making the transition between poorly paid jobs. [136168]

Mr. Boateng: Similar schemes for those making the transition between poorly paid jobs do not exist. The Government have, however, introduced a range of policies to make work pay, including the national minimum wage and the working and child tax credits. Jobcentre Plus advisers also offer help and advice on request to people already in work and seeking new employment.

Correspondence

Mr. Flook: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will answer the letter to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry of 14 July from the hon. Member for Taunton about Berry's Coaches that was passed to him on 30 July. [135879]

John Healey: I have done so.

Customs and Excise (Explosives)

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the role of HM Customs and Excise is in respect of monitoring cargoes of explosives, with particular reference to fireworks, entering the United Kingdom. [135643]

John Healey: As part of the Government's measures to tackle firework misuse, announced in October 2002 by my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Melanie Johnson), then Minister for Competition, Consumer Affairs and Markets, Customs advise the Health and Safety Executive of commercial imports of fireworks which are of concern to HSE.

Customs enforce anti-smuggling controls against imports of illicit explosives and have powers to detain on behalf of Trading Standards officers any fireworks suspected of being unsafe.

Departmental Employees

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to which organisations members of the Treasury are seconded; and if he will make a statement. [135304]

Ruth Kelly: The list of organisations to which Treasury officials are currently seconded is:

3i
AstraZeneca
Barclays
Barts and the London NHS Trust
BBC
Commission for Racial Equality
Church House
Civil Aviation Authority
Croydon council
European Banking Federation
European Commission
Ministry of Finance, France
Giving Campaign
International Monetary Fund
KPMG
London borough of Camden
Ministry of Finance, Japan
National Audit Office
National Electricity Code Administrator, Australia
New Zealand Treasury
OFCOM
Royal Bank of Scotland
Royal National Institute for the Deaf
South West Regional Development Agency
Statistics Commission
World Bank
UK Business Federation
Vegan Society.

Secondments continue to provide the Treasury with the opportunity to increase the diversity of the skills and experience of our staff.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many of his Department's staff are employed outside London; and if he will make a statement. [135307]

Ruth Kelly: None at present, apart from those on secondments to other organisations or on loans to other Government Departments.

Fuel Duty

Mr. Weir: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much was collected in fuel duty from (a) motorists and (b) road hauliers in (i) Scotland and (ii) the UK in each of the last five years. [136451]

John Healey: During the past five calendar years the Exchequer raised the following amounts of fuel duty revenue in the UK:

billion

	Petrol	Diesel
2002	12.8	9.1
2001	13.0	8.8
2000	13.7	9.1
1999	13.6	8.6
1998	12.9	7.9

These figures are published in the Customs and Exercise Hydrocarbon Oils Bulletin, a copy of which is available on the UK trade Information website www.uktradeinfo.com.

The method by which fuel duty revenue is collected does not distinguish between different fuel consumers or geographic areas.

Inland Revenue

Mr. Gray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answers of 15 October 2003, Official Report, column 141W, and 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 139W, what the average marginal cost incurred by the Inland Revenue was in dealing with each of the potential suppliers invited by them to participate in the market making exercise in support of Project ASPIRE until 10 May 2002; what activities gave rise to these marginal costs; and what costs were associated with meetings with individual suppliers. [136566]

Dawn Primarolo: The data requested is available only at disproportionate cost.

ISAs

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what change there has been in the number of ISA holders who are (a) standard rate taxpayers and (b) higher rate taxpayers since the introduction of ISAs; how many people in each category held PEPs; and if he will make a statement. [132874]

Ruth Kelly: The information is not available in the format requested. However, I refer the hon. Gentleman to table T9.7 of Inland Revenue Statistics. The latest version is on the Inland Revenue website: http://www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk/stats/isa/03IR07.pdf.

Lung Cancer

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the comparative death rates from lung cancer were in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) other EU member states and EU accession states in the last year for which figures are available. [136049]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Dr. Phyllis Starkey, dated 4 November 2003:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your recent question concerning lung cancer deaths rates in the United Kingdom, the EU and EU Accession states. (136049)

The latest year for which comparative data are available is 1998, figures for which are shown in the attached table.

Income Distribution

Lembit Öpik: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of national income accrued to the (a) top and (b) bottom (i) 10 per cent. and (ii) 20 per cent. of the income distribution in Wales in each year since 1979. [136485]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Colin Mowl to Lembit Opik Esq, dated 4 November 2003:

The National Statistician has been asked to reply to your recent question about income distribution in Wales. I am replying in his absence. (136485)

The information required to answer these questions is not readily to hand and will require extensive analysis. Unfortunately, we are unable to supply this in the time available. The necessary work is being carried out as a matter of urgency and we will provide the information subject to data availability and sample size limitations for regional data. We will send the completed answer to you as soon as it is available.

In the meantime, please accept my apologies for this delay.

Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of national income accrued to the (a) top and (b) bottom (i) 10 per cent. and (ii) 20 per cent. of the income distribution for each year since 1979 in London. [136525]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Colin Mowl to Simon Hughes, dated 4 November 2003:

The National Statistician has been asked to reply to your recent question about income distribution in London. I am replying in his absence. (136525)

The information required to answer these questions is not readily to hand and will require extensive analysis. Unfortunately, we are unable to supply this in the time available. The necessary work is being carried out as a matter of urgency and we will provide the information subject to data availability and any sample size limitations for regional data. We will send the completed answer to you as soon as it is available.

National Insurance

Paul Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much money he estimates the National Insurance Fund would receive in 2003–04 if those people who are retired but remain in paid employment continued to pay national insurance contributions. [133490]

Dawn Primarolo: The National Insurance Fund in 2003–04 would increase by an estimated £225 million if employees over state retirement pension age were required to pay primary Class 1 contributions.

This estimate is based on April 2003 Budget forecasts.

Norman Lamb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of those who did not receive national insurance contributions deficiency notices have received letters notifying them of the contributions needed to secure full entitlement. [136154]

Dawn Primarolo: The Inland Revenue started the exercise to notify working age people about shortfalls in their contributions for the tax years 1996–97 to 2000–01 at the end of October and it is anticipated that all letters will be sent out by September next year. Everyone will have as much time to make voluntary payments, if they want to, as they would have had if the letters had been issued at the normal time, and payment will be at the original rate.

Private Health Insurance

Lady Hermon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will restore tax incentives for pensioners taking out private health insurance; and if he will make a statement. [136228]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government have no plans to restore the tax relief that used to be available on private medical insurance premiums. We remain convinced that the best way to use the resources available to provide health care is by funding the NHS directly for the benefit of all British residents.

Public Borrowing

Mr. Howard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will measure the surplus or deficit on the current budget between (a) the month in which the present cycle is judged to have started and the month in which the present cycle is judged to have finished, (b) the quarter in which the present cycle is judged to have started and the quarter in which the present cycle is judged to have finished and (c) the fiscal year in which the present cycle is judged to have started and the fiscal year in which the present cycle is judged to have finished, for the purpose of assessing whether he has satisfied his golden rule at the end of the present economic cycle. [135777]

Mr. Boateng: Progress against the golden rule is measured by the average surplus on the current budget over the period from the financial year in which the economic cycle starts up to and including the financial year in which it ends.

Mr. Howard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he plans to measure the total surplus or deficit on the current budget (a) in cash terms since the start of the cycle and (b) as a share of GDP in each period covered by the cycle and take the average of these, for the purpose of assessing performance against his golden rule, over the present economic cycle. [135778]

Mr. Boateng: Progress against the golden rule is measured by the average surplus on the current budget expressed as a ratio to GDP over the economic cycle.

Small Business Investment Companies

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the timetable for the launch of small business investment companies. [135568]

John Healey: The Government issued a consultation document alongside Budget 2003 called 'Bridging the Finance Gap: a consultation on improving access to growth capital for small businesses'. One of the issues raised by the consultation was the possibility of introducing in the UK a variant of the US Small Business Investment Company programme. The Government are currently considering the responses that they have received from the consultation and will respond to them in due course.

Stamp Duty Land Tax

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether licences granted to (a) individuals and (b) businesses requiring an interest in land will be exempt from stamp duty land tax. [135603]

Ruth Kelly: The acquisition of a licence to use or occupy land is not in itself a chargeable transaction. However, the acquisition of such licences is often part of a larger transaction, other elements of which may be chargeable.

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what alternative suggestions he has received to the proposal of charging stamp duty land tax on leases other than basing the charge on the net present value of the lease. [135606]

Ruth Kelly: A number of alternative suggestions were received, some based on net present value, some based on average annual rent and some based on a combination of the two.

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether assured shorthold tenancies will be chargeable to stamp duty land tax after 1 December. [135623]

Ruth Kelly: The grant of a lease, including an assured shorthold tenancy, is within the scope of stamp duty land tax. Whether there is a charge will depend on a number of factors such as the initial term and the rent payable.

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether mineral rights royalties are to be chargeable for stamp duty land tax after 1 December. [135624]

Ruth Kelly: The grant of a lease, including a lease giving the right to extract minerals, is within the scope of stamp duty land tax. Whether there is a charge will depend on a number of factors such as the initial term and the rent payable.

Written Answers to Questions

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Stamp Duty

Mr. Prisk: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners what study has been made of the impact of increases in stamp duty land tax on the commercial holdings of the Church of England; and if he will make a statement. [135607]

Mr. Bell: No such study has been made in respect of the Church Commissioners' commercial property investment portfolio. I understand that changes to this tax come into effect on 1 December 2003: whether or not these will have an impact upon the amount of rent tenants will offer for new leases remains to be seen. The Commissioners take independent professional advice regarding the rental values of their properties and these are reviewed regularly.

SCOTLAND

Common Agricultural Policy

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the implications for tenant farmers in Scotland of reform of the Common Agricultural Policy. [134845]

Mrs. McGuire: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger) on 9 September 2003, Official Report, column 328W.

Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act

Brian White: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what statutory investigatory powers the Department has; which ones will be superseded by use of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000; and what plans he has for removing these legacy powers. [136131]

Mrs. McGuire: The Scotland Office has no statutory investigatory powers.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Countryside and Rights of Way Act

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) when she will publish guidance to those wishing to dedicate their land as access land under section 16 of the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000; [135813]

(2) what additional funding is to be made available to the Forestry Commission to enable them to dedicate their freehold land for access under section 16 of the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000; [135814]

(3) what measures she will take to encourage public bodies to dedicate suitable landholdings as access land under section 16 of the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000; [135815]

(4) what steps she will take in promoting to landowners the opportunities available to them to dedicate their land under section 16 of the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000; [135816]

(5) what measures she has taken to inform other Government Departments about the possibilities of dedicating land as access land under section 16 of the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000; and what response there has been. [135817]

Alun Michael: I expect to publish guidance and model dedication instruments for those wishing to dedicate their land by the beginning of December 2003. I have discussed with the Forestry Commission what funds might be needed to ensure that they are able to meet their commitment on dedication of their freehold estate.

We are developing a strategy for promoting dedication to landowners, which will highlight the benefits of dedication, including the reduced liability that owners will incur and the opportunities to realise the potential that increasing visitor numbers has on the rural economy. This will build on the work undertaken by the Forestry Commission in 2001 when it ran seminars to encourage dedication by woodland owners.

I wrote to Ministers in all Departments in February 2002 about the scope for dedication of land held by Government Departments and sponsored non-departmental public bodies. I have also pursued this point with some commercial organisations that are significant landowners. Now that the dedication regulations have been laid, I will be following this correspondence up, not least to encourage all Government Departments to actively consider the extent to which their landholdings can be dedicated under section 16 and to ensure that the option is widely understood by private sector landowners.

Consultancy Contracts

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will list the contracts for (a) consultancy and (b) work carried out by Bechtel in each year since 1997, stating in each case (i) the nature of the work, (ii) the value of the contract and (iii) the duration of the contract; and if she will make a statement. [134732]

Alun Michael [holding answer 29 October 2003]: Defra was formed in 2001. From information held centrally, Defra has let no contracts with Bechtel.

Dairy Farms

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what arrangements she intends to put in place to improve the opportunity for United Kingdom dairy farmers to compete in European and global markets. [134377]

Mr. Bradshaw: We are helping the UK dairy sector to compete better in European and global markets by promoting supply chain efficiency. My noble Friend Lord Whitty, has been chairing the Dairy Supply Chain Forum to consider, among other issues, ways in which the sector can improve its efficiency through collaborative action, and we have made a grant of nearly £0.5 million to the Food Chain Centre to study how the efficiency of the dairy supply chain might be improved. We have also supported the establishment of English Food and Farming Practices, a new industry-led body that has been set up specifically to support and encourage collective activity across all agricultural sectors. In addition to this, we are actively considering bringing decoupling forward to 2005 to give dairy farmers the freedom to restructure their businesses for the more competitively market orientated environment. Furthermore, the Milk Development Council has been working with Food from Britain to identify potential export markets for UK dairy products.

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions she has had with representatives from the dairy industry on the dispute over the price per litre of milk paid to liquid milk producers. [134380]

Mr. Bradshaw: Price negotiations between producers and processors, or processors and supermarkets, are a private commercial matter in which the Government cannot and should not get involved, as long as competition rules are respected. While the Government share producers' concerns over the low farmgate price of milk, they do not support protests.

The Secretary of State has had no formal meetings with representatives of the dairy industry to discuss milk prices or the current protests. However, Ministers frequently meet with representatives from all parts of the dairy sector and are therefore aware of the issues. In addition, matters affecting the whole dairy supply chain are regularly discussed at the forum chaired by my noble Friend Lord Whitty.

Environment Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) what the outcome was of the Environment Council on 27 October 2003; what the Government's stance was on the issues discussed, including their voting record; and if she will make a statement; [135372]

(2) if she will make a statement on the issues discussed in the meeting of the EU Environment Council on 27 October 2003. [136016]

Mr. Morley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I represented the UK at the Environment Council on 27 October 2003. The Council reached a political agreement on one legislative measure, and also considered a number of other important issues.

The Council reached a political agreement on a Directive on volatile organic compounds (VOCs) in paints. This measure aims to reduce emissions from paints of these organic solvents, which are precursors of ground-level ozone which can be harmful to human health and the environment. We retained a reservation on the proposal as parliamentary scrutiny is not yet complete. Greece asked for further time to implement limits for decorative paints and varnishes, but its request was turned down.

The Council agreed conclusions on the Commission's proposed structural indicators for reporting on progress on employment, innovation, economic reform, social cohesion and environmental protection to the spring European Council. There was general support for the proposed set of 14 headline indicators of which three would be environment-related. Some delegations proposed including new indicators on biodiversity and public health. I stressed the importance of using robust and meaningful indicators. I pointed out that any biodiversity indicator should be able to measure progress towards the EU's target of halting loss of biodiversity by 2010, for example, along the lines of an index proposed by Birdlife International. The current proposal, on protected areas, was not adequate. The Council agreed that the three proposed environment-related indicators, on climate change, energy intensity and transport, should be reformulated in order to focus on the most significant environmental impacts and that good quality indicators on biodiversity and health should be included as soon as possible so as to cover all of the priority areas identified in the EU sustainable development strategy.

The Council agreed conclusions on the Commission's proposal for a European strategy on environment and health. This strategy is intended to reduce the disease burden caused by environmental factors in the EU, to identify and prevent new health threats caused by new environmental factors. We also agreed conclusions on the Commission's proposal for an integrated product policy, aimed at reducing the environmental impacts that arise in the supply chain and life-cycle of products.

The Presidency noted a presentation from the Commission on the results of its public consultation on a legislative proposal for an EU chemicals strategy. The Council also noted a presentation from the Commission on proposals for implementing the provisions of the Aarhus Convention in the EC and on access to justice in environmental matters. We heard a report from Sweden on a ministerial conference they had hosted on environment and sustainable development in northern Europe, and the Commission circulated a report on progress on thematic strategies under the 6th Environment Action programme. Portugal gave a presentation about the devastating forest fires they had experienced this summer, stressing the importance of tackling this issue for the future.

Belgium and France gave short presentations calling for member states' co-operation to reduce ozone levels. The Commission indicated its readiness to help and drew attention to existing measures that might facilitate co-operation and exchange of information.

Belgium presented a short paper on decommissioning of ships, expressing concern in particular about the export of vessels to developing countries for disposal. I supported Belgium's concerns, stressing the need to ensure that first class and environmentally sound dismantling facilities are available in the EU.

The Commission then called upon member states to support a protocol on sustainable development to the Treaty being considered by the Inter-Governmental Conference.

We also discussed preparations for the 9th Conference of the Parties to the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change (COP9) and the Kyoto project mechanisms. After an exchange of views, we agreed to reconvene on 8 December 2003, immediately preceding COP9, to discuss the outstanding issues.

GM Crops

Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what spray density in litres per hectare was used in the GM maize farmscale evaluation programme; and what spray density she expects will be used if commercial cultivation of GM maize goes ahead. [136609]

Mr. Morley: The recommended individual and maximum permitted application rates of the herbicide glufosinate-ammonium used on GM maize in the farm-scale evaluations were defined by the conditions of the simulated product licence that formed part of the experimental pesticide approval. This specified a maximum permitted rate of eight litres per hectare and a recommended individual rate of four litres per hectare, depending on the weeds present and their growth stage. Application was permitted until the nine-leaf stage of maize. For further details, and for details of other non-herbicide sprays used, see Champion et al. 2003; "Crop Management and Agronomic Context of the Farm Scale Evaluations of Genetically Modified Herbicide Tolerant Crops"; Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society (B). 358 (1439): 1801–18. A copy of this journal has been placed in the Library.

Before glufosinate-ammonium could be used on a commercial scale on GM-maize, it would need full pesticide approval. In seeking approval, the necessary data package would have to be supplied by the applicant and be subjected to the considerations of human and environmental safety which have been established for all pesticide uses. Any approval given would specify recommended and maximum application rates in the same way as the experimental permit. These conditions would be determined by the Pesticide Safety Directorate taking due account of advice from their expert advisory committee the Advisory Committee on Pesticides.

National Fruit Show

Hugh Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many Ministers have visited the National Fruit Show (Marden Fruit Show) since 1997. [134137]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 27 October 2003]: No Minister has been able to attend the National Fruit Show in recent years.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when she will publish (a) guidance to the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority on the interim conditioning, packaging and storage of radioactive waste and (b) the study on the case for extending waste substitution, referred to in the Government's First Progress Report to the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee on Managing Radioactive Waste Safely. [134076]

Mr. Morley: The interim conditioning, packaging and storage of radioactive waste will be among the matters to be included in the plans that sites will prepare for the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority. The appropriate regulators will be consulted on the plans. The waste substitution study is expected to be issued for consultation shortly.

St. Helena

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much wild honey has been imported from St. Helena over the last five years; and if she will take steps to ensure that St. Helena continues to be able to export honey to EU countries. [135660]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 3 November 2003]: No wild honey has been imported from St. Helena over the last five years. EU rules do not allow the export of wild honey from St. Helena to the European Union.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what quantities of Arabica coffee were imported in each of the last five years from St. Helena. [135661]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 3 November 2003]: The table shows UK imports of coffee from St. Helena in each of the last five years. Arabica coffee is not specifically identified in official overseas trade statistics.

Waste Management

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the tonnage of tyres (a) sent to waste and (b) dealt with by each method of waste disposal was in the most recent year for which figures are available. [132672]

Margaret Beckett: The latest available figures for used tyres are for 2001. These show that 481,496 tonnes of tyres went for disposal; of these, 290,496 tonnes (60.3 per cent.) were recovered, broken down as follows:

Recovery option	Tonnes	Percentage of waste tyres
Reuse	78,217	16.0
Retreading	49,179	9.9
Recycling	107,000	22.2
Landfill engineering	16,100	3.3
Energy recovery	40,000	8.3
Total	290,496	60.3

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

War Crimes

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Solicitor-General on how many occasions since the coming into force of the International Criminal Court Act 2001 the Attorney-General's consent has been sought to bring a prosecution for war crimes; and if she will make a statement. [134400]

The Solicitor-General: Owing to the way records are kept in the Attorney-General's department answer to this question cannot be provided without disproportionate cost. Applications for consent are not recorded by reference to the offence for which the application is made. Also, a request unaccompanied by evidence may not be recorded as an application.

DEFENCE

Alcohol Limits

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the legal alcohol limit is for (a) operating equipment and (b) driving on military bases in Scotland; when the adequacy of this limit was last reviewed; and if he will make a statement. [135800]

Mr. Caplin: There is no statutory alcohol limit laid down for operating equipment on military bases in Scotland or elsewhere. Where military bases are served by public roads in the UK, the statutory alcohol limits imposed by the Road Traffic Act 1988 apply. If the military bases are not served by public roads, service personnel are subject to standing and local orders which regulate alcohol consumption. Personnel may be prosecuted under the Service Discipline Acts for being unfit for duty as a result of consuming excess alcohol or contravening orders. Commanding officers and the chain of command are very aware of the requirement to provide a safe working environment.

Breathalyser Tests

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the (a) minimum and (b) maximum alcohol levels recorded by breathalyser tests in alcohol related cases investigated by military police on each military base in Scotland in 2003; what the comparable readings were in each year since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [135798]

Mr. Caplin: No such tests have been conducted.

Disused Army Barracks

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) the disused army barracks that his Department is selling, (b) the size of each plot and (c) the selling price of each site. [135863]

Mr. Caplin: The table of army barracks that the Ministry of Defence is currently selling is as follows.

Site name and address	Area in Hectares
McGrigor Barracks, Hospital Road, Aldershot, Hampshire	7.1
Montgomery Lines—South Alisons Road, Aldershot, Hampshire	19.1
Montgomery Lines—North Part, Alisons Road, Aldershot, Hampshire	12.6
Wainscott Camp, Hoo Road, Wainscott, Kent	4.61
Stonebridge Camp, Mundford, Thetford, Norfolk	1.39
Oakington Barracks, Rampton Drift, Longstanton, Cambs	289.7
RE Depot, Long Marston, Warwickshire	185
Saighton Camp, Huntingdon, Chester, Cheshire	48.58

I am withholding the internal valuation of surplus sites in accordance with Exemption 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Drink Driving (Scotland)

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many occurrences of drink driving recorded by military police there were in each of the military bases in Scotland each year since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [135202]

Mr. Caplin: The service police have no powers in Great Britain to stop and breathalyse persons suspected of committing an offence under the 1988 Road Traffic Act.

Suez Medal

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the procedures to be followed by veterans in order to claim the Suez medal. [135465]

Mr. Caplin: I refer the hon. Member to my written ministerial statement of 23 October 2003, Official Report, columns 45–46WS, and Command Paper 5999.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Suez Canal Zone medal applications have been received from (a) Chorley, (b) Lancashire and (c) the North West; and how many have been granted. [135809]

Mr. Caplin: The Ministry of Defence is very keen to issue medals to eligible veterans as quickly as possible. There is already a sizeable backlog of applications which has accumulated in recent weeks. I would not, therefore, wish to divert staff at the medal offices to undertake an exercise of the sort that has been requested, at the expense of issuing the medal to Suez veterans.

TRANSPORT

Airline Competition

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the fairness of competition between airlines operating in the UK; and if he will make a statement. [136181]

Mr. McNulty: Fairness of competition between airlines is a matter for the UK competition authorities and, insofar as there is a potential effect on trade between EU member states, the European Commission.

Aviation Landing Charges

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to equalise aviation landing charges throughout the UK; and if he will make a statement. [136180]

Mr. McNulty: There are no plans because the Government do not set landing charges. These are set by the airport operator and, in the case of the designated airports, the CAA sets a price cap to airport charges in its capacity as economic regulator.

Bus Safety

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) bus drivers and (b) bus passengers were injured as a result of items being thrown at buses in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [136184]

Mr. Jamieson: The information is not available. The Department collects information on bus drivers assaulted by members of the public, assaults on passengers on buses and vandalism to vehicles, but this is not sufficiently detailed to determine how many injuries were as a result of objects thrown at buses.

Central Railway

Mr. Grieve: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will decide on the Central Railway project. [136250]

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expe to announce his decision on the Central Railway pr sals; and if he will make a statement. [136592]

Mr. McNulty: A decision will be made as soon as is practicable.

Entry Clearance

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether, in respect of applications for entry clearance from working holiday makers, identical requirements and conditions are applied for applicants from each Commonwealth country. [133077]

Mr. Mullin: I have been asked to reply.

Yes.

Heathrow Airport

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps his Department will take to instigate levels of nitrogen dioxide consistently within EU limits by 2010 at Heathrow Airport. [135294]

Mr. McNulty: Heathrow Airport lies within an Air Quality Management Area declared by adjacent local authorities. Various emissions sources may contribute to potential NO_2 exceedances in 2010. In the vicinity of Heathrow Airport mitigation strategies could apply to aircraft, airside and road traffic sources, although general 'background' levels of NO_2 are also a major contributor (as elsewhere). BAA plc is required to produce and review an Action Plan to minimise emissions from Heathrow Airport as a condition of the planning permission for the Fifth Terminal.

Kyoto Protocol

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps the Government are taking in (a) European and (b) other international fora to encourage other countries to include international aviation in the Kyoto Agreement. [136252]

Mr. McNulty: Emissions from international aviation are not included in national targets under the first commitment period of the Kyoto Protocol (2008–12). However, the Kyoto Protocol does require contracting parties to work through the International Civil Aviation Organisation (ICAO) to reduce greenhouse gas emissions from international aviation. The Government are therefore working hard in ICAO to engage other countries in the climate change debate and to reduce emissions from aviation. Discussion on action beyond 2008–12 will begin in 2005 when the Government will work closely with all Parties and argue strongly that the framework for global action after 2012 should address international aviation emissions.

Mersey Tunnels

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he intends to establish a public inquiry into the proposed increase in the Mersey Tunnels toll. [136081]

Dr. Howells: Yes. A date for when the inquiry will start will be announced in the near future.

Motorcycle Speeds

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent discussions has he had with Triumph about motorcycles capable of 200mph; and what suggestions he made to the firm about manufacturing such a motorcycle. [136086]

Mr. Jamieson: I have had no such discussions.

Passenger Transport (Tyne and Wear)

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions his Department has had with transport operators and regulators in Tyne and Wear concerning (a) integrated passenger transport networks and (b) the future of the Tyne and Wear Metro. [136030]

Dr. Howells: Officials from the Transport Team at the Government Office for the North East have meetings, on an approximately quarterly basis, with officers at Nexus (Tyne and Wear Passenger Transport Executive). Discussions cover the full range of Nexus' work in developing and promoting an integrated passenger transport network in Tyne and Wear, including buses, rail, metro, ferry and concessionary fares. In addition Government Office officials attend regular meetings chaired by the North East Assembly, attended by representatives of bus and rail operators providing services in Tyne and Wear.

Officials from Government Office for the North East and Department for Transport have also had several meetings during the past year with Nexus concerning its proposals for the future development of the Tyne and Wear Metro and the possibility of tram and bus based extensions to the system. The most recent meeting was held on 21 October 2003. I understand that Nexus intends to submit an outline business case for funding for these developments in 2004 and officials have provided advice to Nexus on their potential submission.

River Tyne (Dredging)

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the locations on the River Tyne that are the subject of discussions between his Department and the Port of Tyne Authority concerning the dredging and disposal of contaminated sediment. [136027]

Dr. Howells: The locations on the River Tyne that are the subject of the application from the Port of Tyne Authority to DEFRA for a licence for the dredging and sea disposal of contaminated sediment, submitted in February 2003, are referenced in the application as:

A. A & P (Tyne) Ltd. North Shields

B. Branmore Investments Ltd. (ex-Cammell Laird (South Shields Ltd.)

C. AkerMcNultyLtd.

D. Swan Hunter (Tyneside) Ltd. East Fitting Out Quay

E. A & P (Tyne) Ltd.—Wallsend Dry Docks

F. Neptune Yard

G. A & P (Tyne) Ltd.—Hebburn Bede Quay, West Quay & No 2 Dry Dock

H. Shepherds Offshore Ltd. Offshore Technology Park

I. Bill Point—Channel

On-going discussions on this issue are primarily between the Port of Tyne Authority and DEFRA.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what alternative disposal routes his Department has identified with the Port of Tyne Authority for contaminated sediment dredged from the River Tyne. [136028]

Dr. Howells: It is not for the Department for Transport to determine alternative disposal routes for contaminated sediment dredged from the River Tyne. The Port of Tyne Authority made an application, in February 2003, to DEFRA for a licence for the dredging and sea disposal of contaminated sediment from various locations on the River Tyne. Discussions on matters of detail relating to this application are on-going and, primarily, for the Port Authority and DEFRA.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the negotiations between the Port of Tyne Authority and his Department concerning the dredging of the river to reach a conclusion. [136029]

Dr. Howells: Negotiations concerning the dredging of the River Tyne are primarily for the Port of Tyne Authority and DEFRA in connection with the Port Authority's application for a licence, submitted to DEFRA in February 2003, for the dredging and sea disposal of contaminated sediment from various locations on the river. Discussions between the Port Authority and the Department for Transport about this matter will continue until such time as a satisfactory conclusion is reached. I am aware that further information is being sought from the Port of Tyne Authority as part of their on-going discussions with DEFRA and that a final decision cannot be reached until such time as all the facts are to hand. It is not possible at this stage to say when this might be but the need to move to an early resolution is fully recognised.

Road Safety

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research he has commissioned on the correlation between the speed of vehicles and the number of road accidents. [136083]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department has commissioned various studies into the correlation between vehicle speed and road accidents. These are either summarised or referenced in the Department's review of speed management policy entitled "New Directions in Speed Management—A review of policy" published in March 2000. Copies of this document are available in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the reasons for the slowing down of the rate of decrease in road fatalities in this decade. [136084]

Mr. Jamieson: The Transport Research Laboratory has been commissioned to investigate the reasons for the slowing down of the rate of decrease in road fatalities as part of their on-going work on monitoring the progress towards the 2010 casualty reduction target. It is a complex issue that demands in-depth analysis because there are different trends for different road user groups and for different accident types.

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve the standard of driving on roads; and if he will make a statement. [136185]

Mr. Jamieson: One of our key road safety goals is to improve the standard of driving and our road safety strategy sets out a number of measures to achieve this. "Tomorrow's roads: safer for everyone", published in March 2000, is available in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve road signage and road markings. [136186]

Mr. Jamieson: The appearance of signs and markings, and conditions for their placing, are specified in the Traffic Signs Regulations and General Directions 2002 (SI 3113), which came into effect earlier this year. Guidance on good practice in the design and use of signs is given in the Traffic Signs Manual. An updated Chapter 7, on sign design, and Chapter 5, on road markings, will be published later this month. It is the responsibility of individual traffic authorities to ensure that signs and markings are used in conformity with the statutory requirements and Government guidance.

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the risk to (a) motorists and (b) pedestrians posed by the level of non-compliance with traffic signals by pedal cyclists in London. [136388]

Mr. McNulty: The Department has made no such assessment. It is an offence for any vehicle not to stop at traffic signals when required to do so. Any cyclist or other road user who fails to comply with traffic signals is a danger to themselves and other road users.

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the merits of licensing pedal cycles as a means to improve compliance by cyclists with road traffic regulations. [136390]

Mr. McNulty: The Department has examined the case for a road tax on cyclists in the past. It would require a registration system like the one for motor vehicles and the costs of the system would certainly outweigh any benefits for enforcement of road traffic offences by cyclists. Moreover, increasing the costs of cycling would not support our policy of encouraging more people to consider cycling as a viable mode of transport and we have no plans to introduce such a tax.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has to make the wearing of bicycle helmets compulsory when riding on roads; and if he will make a statement on their safety uses. [136159]

Mr. Jamieson: A study commissioned by the Department to look into the effectiveness of cycle helmets, published in November last year, found that overall, the evidence suggests that cycle helmets are effective at reducing the severity of brain and upper facial injuries for all ages, and especially children. This reinforces our view that we should encourage helmets to be worn by children.

A survey undertaken by the Transport Research Laboratory measuring wearing rates in 2002 found that the rate for all cyclists on built-up major roads was 25 per cent. The wearing rate is continuing to increase, with the exception of boys under 16 where the rate has reduced from 16 per cent. in 1994 to 12 per cent. in 2002. At these levels making helmets compulsory would cause enforcement difficulties and without greater public acceptance could have an effect on levels of cycling. We are making special efforts to persuade adolescents, and especially boys, to wear helmets. We will continue to monitor wearing rates by all ages and review the option of compulsory wearing from time to time.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people have died from head injuries whilst riding a bicycle in each of the past 15 years. [136160]

Ruth Kelly: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Colin Mowl to Mr. James Wray, dated 5 November 2003:

The National Statistician has been asked to reply to your recent question asking how many people have died from head injuries whilst riding a bicycle in each of the past 15 years. I am replying in his absence. (136160)

The latest year for which data are available is 2002. The attached table for 1988 to 2002 inclusive, shows the number of deaths certified as being due to head injuries in cyclists.

Number of deaths of cyclists from head injuries[1], England and Wales, 1988–2002[2]

	Number
1988	182
1989	196
1990	185
1991	177
1992	141
1993	91
1994	88
1995	130
1996	109
1997	102
1998	79
1999	95
2000	63
2001[3]	59
2002[3]	56

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to raise awareness of safety issues on the roads for (a) bicycle users and for (b) car drivers. [136161]

Mr. Jamieson: The Road Safety Strategy, "Tomorrow's Roads—Safer for Everyone" sets out our aims to improve road safety for cyclists and car drivers. This is being done through publicity, training opportunities for cyclists, education initiatives and driver testing and training. Recent publicity campaigns have included drink driving, speed, mobile phones, seat belts and cycle helmets.

WALES

Crime and Disorder

8. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to seek a joint meeting of representatives of the police, local government, the National Assembly for Wales, the NHS and the Home Office to discuss issues relating to tackling crime and disorder in Wales. [135535]

Mr. Hain: The Welsh Community Safety Unit works closely with the 22 Community Safety Partnerships in Wales to tackle crime and disorder. The membership of these partnerships includes the police, local authorities and local health bodies.

Euro

9. Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has held with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the impact of the rate of the euro on European funding available in Wales. [135536]

Mr. Touhig: My right hon. Friend and I meet regularly with Treasury Ministers to discuss a range of issues.

The Spending Review 2002 settlement enabled the Welsh Assembly to continue to meets its commitment to the success of the Objective 1 programme in Wales.

I understand that £595 million has so far been committed to 955 projects in West Wales and the Valleys.

Community Support Officers

11. Mr. David: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of community support officers in Wales. [135538]

Mr. Touhig: The Government are carrying out an on-going assessment of CSOs throughout England and Wales. Forces with CSOs are submitting evaluations now and we hope to provide an interim assessment by the end of the year.

CSOs have been welcomed across Wales and I have been impressed by the amount of positive feedback that has been received even at this early stage.

Manufacturing

12. Mr. Prisk: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on employment in the manufacturing sector in Wales. [135539]

Mr. Hain: Manufacturing industry is a major contributor to our economy and to employment in the UK and in Wales.

The Government are committed to stimulating enterprise and economic growth through our macroeconomic policies, funding programmes and our "Manufacturing Strategy".

Farming

13. Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to promote the prosperity of Welsh farming. [135540]

Mr. Touhig: Over the last few months I have visited a range of agricultural producers and manufacturers across Wales and I will continue to do everything possible to promote Welsh produce and producers.

Women in the Work Force

14. Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to assist the retention of women in the work force in Wales. [135541]

Mr. Touhig: Widening employment opportunities for women has always been a key priority for the Government. As examples of recent legislation, all women are now entitled to 26 weeks' maternity leave, and employers must give serious consideration to parents' requests for flexible working arrangements. Financial support has also been made available to enhance the provision of child care facilities—in Wales this is the responsibility of the National Assembly.

Painkillers

John Mann: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the Department of Health regarding the number of painkillers available over the counter in Wales which contain codeine phosphate. [135542]

Mr. Touhig: I have not held specific discussions on products containing codeine phosphate, but I am aware that the position in Wales is the same as that in England.

According to the records held by the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency (MHRA), there are currently 96 granted marketing authorisations for medicinal products containing the active ingredient codeine phosphate. These are licensed as pharmacy medicines and are available without prescription from a pharmacy under the supervision of a pharmacist. No products containing codeine phosphate are licensed for general sale.

The National Assembly has recently supported 'Ask about Medicines Week' in October. This is an awareness week to highlight the role of pharmacists and increase people's understanding of medicines.

TREASURY

Automatic Teller Machines

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether United Kingdom consumers withdrawing euros from automatic teller machines in European Union member states are subject to additional charges. [136661]

Ruth Kelly: Whether United Kingdom consumers are subject to charges for withdrawing euros from automated teller machines in European Union member states is determined by the terms and conditions of their accounts and of the automated teller machines they use.

Cross-border Payments Regulation

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the effect upon consumers of the cross border payments regulation adopted on 1 July 2002. [136662]

Ruth Kelly: The Regulation on cross-border payments in euro seeks to prevent excessive charges for consumers for certain cross-border payments in euro by imposing requirements in connection with the level, transparency and facilitation of charges for these types of payments. It does not apply to sterling denominated payments.

Children Trust Fund

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of children in Coventry he estimates will benefit from the additional £250 to the Child Trust Fund. [136141]

Ruth Kelly: This information is not available. However, it is estimated that around a third of all children will receive the additional payment of £250.

Debt Cancellation

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the amount of third world debt which the IMF and World Bank is prepared to cancel; and if he will make a statement. [136061]

John Healey: The UK Government remain fully committed to the rapid and full implementation of the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) Initiative to ensure that it delivers a robust exit from unsustainable debt for the world's poorest countries. At present, 27 countries have reached Decision Point and have started to receive interim relief. Of these countries, eight have reached Completion Point and are now also receiving irrevocable debt relief.

In the September 2003 publication "Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) Initiative: Status of Implementation", the staffs of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) provided an update on progress under the Initiative and new estimates of costs. This document is available on both the World Bank and the IMF websites. Table 9 in the document sets out the status of delivery of assistance by the World Bank. Under the original and enhanced HIPC Initiatives, the World Bank has made total debt service reduction commitments of US$12.4 billion and has delivered $2.5 billion.

Table 11 sets out the status of delivery of assistance by the IMF. Under the original and enhanced HIPC Initiatives, the IMF has made total debt service reduction commitments of SDR £1.8 billion (approximately $1.3 billion) and has disbursed SDR £1 billion (approximately $740 million). The Special Drawing Right (SDR) serves as the unit of account of the IMF and is allocated to member countries in proportion to their IMF quotas.

The UK has provided commitments of around £2 billion of debt relief to eligible HIPC countries and has pledged a total of $474 million through the multilateral institutions to further support the initiative. The UK is committed to providing 100 per cent. relief for eligible HIPC countries, and calls for all bilateral, multilateral and commercial creditors to participate in the Initiative.

The HIPC Initiative has an important role to play in maximising the resources available for poverty reduction in developing countries. However, unless there is an increase in the volume of resources available from donors to poor countries, additional debt relief would simply reallocate resources from one form of financing to another, and from non-HIPC poor countries to HIPC countries, without adding to the overall financing available for poverty reduction. Furthermore all HIPC countries would still need additional aid to meet the Millennium Development Goals even if all of their debt from the World Bank and IMF were forgiven. That is why the UK's proposal for an International Finance Facility is so important. It can provide the much-needed substantial increase in resources that debt relief alone would not achieve, which could be disbursed by way of grants and additional debt relief.

Economy (York)

Hugh Bayley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many businesses have been registered for VAT in the York unitary authority area in each year since 1995. [135949]

John Healey: VAT Registration thresholds are reviewed as part of the Budget process. The Small Business Service produces statistics that are available on their website at www.sbs.gov.uk which show that VAT registrations for the York unitary authority area from 1995 were as follows:

	New registrations	Total registrations
1995	405	4,020
1996	390	4,035
1997	435	4,115
1998	415	4,200
1999	410	4,250
2000	445	4,335
2001	440	4,395
2002	435	4,440

Fuel Duty

Mr. Amess: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the recent increase in fuel duty. [136265]

John Healey: My right hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, announced the increase in fuel duty in his Budget statement in April.

Following that announcement, the legislation implementing this change was debated in Parliament as part of the Finance Bill, which received Royal Assent on 10 July and it took effect on 1 October.

Futurebuilders Investment Fund

Paddy Tipping: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps have been taken to appoint the fund managers of the futurebuilders investment fund. [136066]

John Healey: An open competition to appoint the fund managers was launched on 10 September. A procurement exercise is now under way. It is hoped to make an appointment in December, with the funds coming on stream in the last quarter of this financial year.

Stamp Duty Land Tax

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the (a) total and (b) average liability for stamp duty land tax after 1 December for farm business tenancies; and if he will make a statement. [135604]

Ruth Kelly: I regret that this information is not available.

Tax Credits

Hugh Bayley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people living in York have received each tax credit in each year since each was introduced. [135950]

John Healey: The numbers of families receiving the Working Families' and Disabled Person's Tax Credits in each local authority and constituency in each quarter between May 2001 and November 2002 are shown in "Working Families' and Disabled Person's Tax Credit Statistics. Geographical analyses". Estimates, based on a sample of cases, of the numbers receiving the Child and Working Tax Credits in each local authority and constituency at July 2003 are shown in "Child and Working Tax Credit Statistics. Geographical analyses". These documents can be found on the Inland Revenue website, at www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk/stats/personal-tax-credits/menu.htm.

No corresponding estimates are available for the Children's Tax Credit.

Norman Lamb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the estimated annual cost is of administering (a) child and (b) working tax credit. [136150]

John Healey: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General gave my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Lynne Jones) on 3 June 2003, Official Report, column 30W.

VAT

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the Exchequer proceeds were in the last financial year of charging value-added tax on cycle helmets. [136427]

John Healey: From 1 April 2001, the Government removed VAT from adult cycle helmets. Children's cycle helmets have never been subject to VAT.

Unemployment (Scotland)

John Barrett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people were unemployed in (a) the Edinburgh West parliamentary constituency, (b) the City of Edinburgh local authority area and (c) Scotland in each year between 1985 and 1995. [136624]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Colin Mowl to Mr. John Barrett, dated 5 November 2003:

The National Statistician has been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on the number of people unemployed in (a) the Edinburgh West parliamentary constituency, (b) the City of Edinburgh local authority area and (c) Scotland in each year between 1985 and 1995. I am replying in his absence. (136624)

The Office for National Statistics (ONS) compiles statistics of unemployment from the Labour Force Survey (LFS) following the internationally standard International Labour Organisation definition. However, the data for the years requested are not available. ONS also compiles statistics of those claiming Jobseeker's Allowance (ISA) or previous unemployment benefits for local areas including Parliamentary Constituencies. Data are not fully comparable over time.

The table gives the average number of claimants each year from 1985 to 1995 in the Edinburgh West Parliamentary Constituency, City of Edinburgh Local Authority and in Scotland. The figures are not seasonally adjusted.

Annual average level of claimants for the years 1985 to 1995

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Afghanistan

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when funds provided by his Department for landmine clearance in Afghanistan in 2003 were made available to de-mining teams there; what role the UN is playing in adminstering these funds; and when de-mining personnel in Afghanistan funded by his Department were first paid for this work in 2003. [135845]

Hilary Benn: In 2003 The Department For International Development has provided £2.3 million to the United Nations Mine Action Service (UNMAS) for mine and unexploded ordnance clearance in Afghanistan. This has provided additional support to the on-going activities of UNMAS in Afghanistan allowing an increase in the number of deployed mine clearance teams from 94 to 134 and an increase in the number of mine action personnel to over 8,000. DFID does not directly fund humanitarian demining personnel in Afghanistan.

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will make a statement on attacks on de-mining teams in Afghanistan. [135846]

Hilary Benn: Attacks on demining teams took place in March and April this year on the Kabul to Kandahar road. Since June 2003 the Ministry of Interior has provided four hundred guards to protect teams working on mine clearance and the reconstruction of the road between Kabul and Kandahar. As a result the number of attacks have decreased.

Aral Sea

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much money (a) his Department and (b) other Departments of the Government (i) have pledged and (ii) provided to the International Fund for Saving the Aral Sea (IFSAS) since its inception; and if he will make a statement. [136311]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: The Governments of Central Asia established the International Fund for Saving the Aral Sea (IFAS) in the early nineties; an interstate mechanism for developing and centrally funding regional environmental and research activity aimed at improving the environmental situation in the Aral Sea region. Although the established mechanism provides for an operational framework to generate international assistance, in practice the IFAS has failed to become a functioning institution with a strong regional environmental remit. The failure is attributed to a number of factors but chiefly by the general lack of enthusiasm by the governments in the region to cooperate on practical issues.

A $12 million Water and Environmental Management Project financed by the Global Environment Facility (GEF), managed by an Executing Agency of IFAS, has a component to develop longer term, sustainable regional and national water management strategies; to replace the current system of annual ad hoc water allocation and distribution arrangements which is slowly breaking down. This strategy will help to develop strategic choices at the river basin level such as water allocation between and within the five states, cost sharing for operations, maintenance, rehabilitation and improvement of the existing infrastructure. The UK contributes to the GEF and last year DFID provided an additional contribution of £15 million to the third replenishment.

Departmental Energy Use

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much (a) electricity and (b) other energy his Department has used in each year since 1997 (i) in total and (ii) per square metre; what the projected use is for each of the following years for which forecasts are made; what plans he has to reduce usage; and if he will make a statement. [135056]

Hilary Benn: For information on how much electricity and other energy DFID has used in each year since 1997 I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Bradshaw) on 4 November 2003, Official Report, column 403W.

Forecasts of future consumption are still in the process of being developed. We have occupied our 1 Palace Street building for less than two years and a reliable baseline is only now emerging. Similarly, our East Kilbride office is undergoing extensive refurbishment and extension that will completely alter the energy consumption picture there, and our subsidiary London office is being vacated in 2004 so is excluded from future predictions. However the Department's aim is to reduce its energy consumption in accordance with Government targets, and to this end the London and East Kilbride refurbishments include such features as energy-efficient boilers, low-energy light bulbs and tubes, and, where appropriate, movement sensors instead of light switches to ensure that lights are not left on unnecessarily in unoccupied rooms. The offices have also had their computer monitors replaced throughout with low-energy flat screens. In addition, the London office electricity supply has been 100 per cent. from renewable sources since July 2002, while from this month the new supply contract for East Kilbride is 10 per cent. renewable (the maximum available there). Also at East Kilbride, a feasibility study for an on-site wind turbine is currently under way. The staff Green Awareness programme includes an energy section and a computer switch-off campaign backed up by monthly monitoring and feedback.

DFID is committed to the Government's Sustainable Development Framework and Targets, which include an Energy component, and is developing an Environmental Management System based on ISO 14001 in order to deliver these. Building management systems incorporate energy reduction elements; consumption is monitored monthly and any undue increases investigated.

Sexual and Reproductive Health

Chris McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will list bilateral aid for (a) reproductive health care, (b) family planning and (c) sexually transmitted disease control including HIV/AIDS, broken down by (i) project or sector aid, (ii) programme aid, (iii) technical co-operation, (iv) grants and other aid in kind, (v) humanitarian assistance, (vi) his Department's programme and (vii) CDC investments for each financial year since 1996; and if he will make a statement. [135267]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: The following provides the figures for DFID bilateral expenditure on 'HIV/AIDS'[1] and 'Reproductive Health'[2].

We regard reproductive health as an essential and inseparable element of good health. We believe that the best way to deliver this is for people to be given the right, freedom and support necessary to enable them to take full individual and personal control of their own fertility and reproductive health. Reproductive health continues to be a key priority for DFID and we remain firmly committed to the 1994 Cairo International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD) target of achieving access to reproductive health for all by 2015.

There is no simple solution to HIV/AIDS crisis. It is a very complex and globally diverse epidemic. Condoms or drugs alone are not the answer to tackling HIV/AIDS. The fight against HIV/AIDS also has to include effective public health programmes involving education, prevention, treatment, care and support. For any of these programmes to be implemented successfully they need to involve government, education, health, agriculture, civil society and the private sector and this is the approach the UK promotes.

In financial year 2002–03 alone DFID spent over £270 million on projects related to reproductive health and HIV/AIDS.

[1] 'Multisectoral Responses to HIV/AIDS' covers all activities related to HIV/AIDS control including information, education and communication; voluntary counselling and testing; prevention; treatment, care and support; research; sexually transmitted disease control and prevention.

[2] 'Reproductive health' covers HIV/AIDS programmes, prevention and treatment of sexually transmitted infections and maternal and adolescent health. It also encompasses the services for family planning, contraception and childbearing that make an important contribution to increasing women's choice and opportunity and to preventing unplanned or unwanted pregnancy.

[1] Humanitarian Assistance comprises food aid and other humanitarian assistance.
[2] 2001–02 is a unique year in that total DFID expenditure is understated by around £140 million due to move to resource accounting.
Note:
These figures understate the expenditure figures as they are based on Economic Sector codes. Until recently DFID systems only allowed one Economic Sector code to be applied to each activity, even if the activity was relevant to more than one economic sector.

Chris McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will list his Department's total funding to (a) UNFPA, (b) WHO sexual and reproductive health programme, (c) UNICEF sexual and reproductive health programme, (d) UNAIDS, (e) International Planned Parenthood Federation, (f) Marie Stopes International, (g) Interact Worldwide (population concern) and (h) International Family Health in each financial year since 1996 for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [135266]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: The following table details the funding provided to the various organisations listed since 1996.

We regard reproductive health as an essential and inseparable element of good health. We believe that the best way to deliver this is for people to be given the right, freedom and support necessary to enable them to take full individual and personal control of their own fertility and reproductive health. Reproductive health continues to be a key priority for DFID and we remain firmly committed to the 1994 Cairo International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD) target of achieving access to reproductive health for all by 2015.

DFID support for reproductive health is wide ranging. It covers HIV/AIDS programmes, prevention and treatment of sexually transmitted infections and maternal and adolescent health. Reproductive health also encompasses the services for family planning, contraception and childbearing that make an important contribution to increasing women's choice and opportunity and to preventing unplanned or unwanted pregnancy. Family planning services also provide an important opportunity to improve sexual health and in particular to increase women's access to methods that help prevent HIV infection.

In financial year 2002–3 alone DFID spent over £270 million on reproductive health and HIV/AIDS programmes.

Notes:

1. The figures are "regular budget" or contributions made by DFID centrally and do not include country specific expenditure agreed at country level.

2. The figures for UNICEF and WHO cover the block grants we provide to each organisation. It is not possible to apportion the amounts allocated to sexual and reproductive health programmes.

India

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much aid his Department has (a) pledged and (b) contributed to emergency relief programmes for victims of the Orissa Floods in India; and if he will make a statement. [136312]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: DFID did not receive any request for assistance from the Government of Orissa, nor any NGO for the floods in year 2003. However, Care India utilised £25,000 for flood relief from an on-going DFID supported drought relief project of £1.5 million. It was encouraging to note that Government of Orissa was well equipped and organised to manage the flood relief.

In 2001 DFID contributed £800,000 for flood relief through UNDP and International NGOs. The relief focused on two key areas: agriculture and a combination of cash/food-for-work programmes.

Iraq

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many unexploded cluster bomblets he estimates there are in Basra; how many unexploded cluster bomblets have been (a) cleared and (b) marked by munition clearance organisations in Basra since the end of hostilities in Iraq; and if he will make a statement. [135853]

Hilary Benn: UK forces used approximately 80 cluster bombs against a number of Iraqi military targets and fired around 2,000 artillery delivered L20A1 Enhanced Range Bomblet Shells, mainly in the UK area of operations around Basrah. The UK has over 120 military personnel in Iraq, approximately 1 per cent. of our total in-theatre force, for clearance of explosive remnants of war, and a significant number of Royal Engineers are involved in the marking and fencing of bomblet strike and mined areas. They have already completed 1,600 clearance tasks of unexploded ordnance of all types and have now made safe 619,000 explosive remnants of war and 350,000 small arms rounds.

Mine Clearance

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of his Department's spending on mine clearance by the United Nations. [135850]

Hilary Benn: DFID's current policy of channelling a high proportion of its funds for Humanitarian Demining via United Nations Agencies is currently being reviewed. This will be the first formal review of the policy. The UN agencies have a mixed record of success in their various roles; in particular the role of global co-ordination and the management of field operations could be improved. However there have also been some significant successes (Kosovo and Sudan are two examples).

Pakistan

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much aid his Department has (a) pledged and (b) contributed to emergency relief programmes for the victims of the Tharparkar Floods in the Sindh province of Pakistan; and if he will make a statement. [136313]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: Following the floods in August DFID made a contribution of £97,100 to Oxfam UK to help address the immediate needs of 2000 families in Badin District in Sindh Province.

Emergency assistance to affected families was also provided by the national authorities of Pakistan, UN agencies and other international non-government organisations to meet the immediate needs of those affected.

Safe Drinking Water

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what proportion of the population of (a) Zambia, (b) Ethiopia, (c) Iraq and (d) Malawi he estimates has access to a plentiful supply of safe drinking water. [135296]

Hilary Benn: The Global Water Supply and Sanitation Assessment 2000 (World Health Organisation (WHO)/ United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF)) provides baseline figures on progress towards the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs). The Joint Monitoring Programme is continuing and will provide the United Nations reference data for access to improved water supply.

The figures for the proportion of the population with access to improved water supplies were:

(a) Zambia: 64 per cent.;

(b) Ethiopia: 24 per cent.;

(c) Iraq: 85 per cent.;

(d) Malawi: 57 per cent.

DFID has provided substantial financial support and technical assistance to this initiative from the outset.

South Caucasus (Oil Pipeline)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment he has made of the proposed South Caucasus oil pipeline; and what discussions he has had with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on the environmental consequences of the proposed pipeline. [136065]

Hilary Benn: DFID interest in the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan (BTC) pipeline project in the South Caucasus is as a shareholder of the International Finance Corporation (IFC) of the World Bank Group and of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (EBRD). The Board of the IFC has already decided to provide finance for this project, and the Board of the EBRD is expected to take a decision on this on 11 November.

Both institutions have carried out rigorous due diligence, including on social, environment, legal and commercial issues, in accordance with their standard procedures. DFID has not duplicated this work but, in view of the complexity of the project, commissioned consultants to carry out an assessment of its compliance with the environmental safeguard policies of the IFC and EBRD. I am placing this assessment in the Library of the House.

In considering the IFC and EBRD proposals on the BTC project, DFID carried out extensive Whitehall co-ordination, including with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will ask the UN Relief and Recovery Unit to publish reports confirmed of confirmed incidents of (a) politicisation and (b) the corrupt use of (i) international food aid and (ii) GMB grain in Zimbabwe. [135346]

Hilary Benn: The World Food Programme (WFP) have agreed with all their implementing partners a protocol for reporting irregularities, and in particular political interference, in relation to the distribution of donor-funded food aid, which accounts for the large majority of food being distributed in Zimbabwe this year. This information is shared with donors and implementing partners. We believe that, so long as there is no damage to the effectiveness of international humanitarian operations in Zimbabwe, the UN should also make this information available publicly. We and other donors are discussing this with the UN as part of the present review of the UN's Relief and Recovery Unit (RRU).

Despite continual pressure from WFP, the Government has provided very little information about its own plans and activities in relation to food and grain distribution which it funds itself, distributed by the Grain Marketing Board (GMB). The UN agencies do not have a formal role in monitoring the activities of the GMB, in which donor funding is not involved. However, some local non-Governmental Organisations do monitor food supplies, including those from GMB, and publish reports locally.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Afghanistan

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate he has made of the scale of poppy production in Afghanistan in each year since 1996. [136535]

Mr. Straw: The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC), conducts an annual survey into the level of opium cultivation and production in Afghanistan. Their figures since 1996 are as follows:

	Hectares	Tonnes
1996	57,000	2,250
1997	58,000	2,800
1998	64,000	2,700
1999	82,000	4,600
2000	82,000	3,300
2001	8,000	185
2002	74,000	3,400
2003	80,000	3,600

The UNODC figures for 2001 reflects the Taliban ban on opium cultivation. The ban did not however address the underlying causes of poppy cultivation in Afghanistan and was enforced with a mix of serious violence and bribery.

Ali Salem Tamek

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the Moroccan authorities on the imprisonment of Ali Salem Tamek. [136491]

Mr. Rammell [holding answer 4 November 2003]: We have made no recent representations to the Moroccan authorities on the imprisonment of Ali Salem Tamek. I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my right hon. Friend the Minister of State at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mike O'Brien) gave him on 28 April 2003, Official Report, column 133W.

Argentine-British Council Meeting

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the recent Argentine-British Council meeting held in Argentina is endorsed by the Government as an official forum for discussing Anglo-Argentine relations; what support was provided by (a) the Government and (b) the British embassy in Buenos Aires for the meeting; and whether a Minister from his Department attended. [136495]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 4 November 2003]: The Argentine-British Council (ABC) is a non-governmental organisation. The Government did not offer financial support for its recent meeting. Our ambassador in Buenos Aires held a reception at his residence for all ABC delegates. A member of our embassy attended a session of the meeting as an observer.

Morocco

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on the export of arms to Morocco, with specific reference to their use in the Western Sahara. [136493]

Mr. Rammell [holding answer 4 November 2003]: Secretaries of State from the main Government Departments involved in export licensing are in regular contact with each other on the subject of specific export license decisions and broader export control policy matters. However, Morocco has not been raised recently in such contacts.

Convention on the Future of Europe

Ms Stuart: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish the Government's responses to the questionnaires issued by the Italian Presidency on the Intergovernmental Conference negotiations on the Convention on the Future of Europe. [136140]

Mr. MacShane: Yes. I will place written responses in the Library of the House.

European Union Law

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer of 20 October 2003, reference 132935, what discussions he has had with EU institutions on the relationship of sections 2 and 3 of the European Communities Act 1972 and the jurisprudence to which he refers of the European Court of Justice since the case of Costa v. ENEL; and what assessment he has made of the judgments of the United Kingdom courts in (a) Macarthys Ltd. v. Smith and (b) Thorburn v. Sunderland City Council in relation to the principle that no provision of national law may be invoked to override Community law. [135482]

Mr. MacShane [holding answer 3 November 2003]: The UK has given effect to its obligations under the EU treaties through the European Communities Act 1972. Costa v ENEL set out the clear principle that its obligations under the treaties cannot be overridden by domestic legal provisions.

In Thorburn v. Sunderland City Council, Lord Justice Laws said as part of his judgment:

> "All the specific rights and obligations which EU law creates are by the 1972 Act incorporated into our domestic law and rank supreme . . .".

The ultimate guarantee of parliamentary sovereignty lies in the power of Parliament to repeal all or any of the Acts which give effect to the EU treaties in this country. As Lord Denning made clear in the case of Macarthys Ltd. v. Smith, it is within Parliament's power to legislate contrary to the UK's treaty obligations. The result of so doing, however, would be to put the UK in breach of its treaty obligations.

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will publish the evidence that underlay the claim by the UK's special representative to Iraq on 28 October that foreign terrorists were behind the bomb attacks in Iraq on 26 and 27 October; [135942]

(2) upon what evidence the claims made by the UK's special representative to Iraq that elements in Iran, Syria, Afghanistan and further afield in the Islamic world are contributing to instability in Iraq were based, with particular reference to the bomb attacks on 26 and 27 October. [135943]

Mr. Straw: We have received information from a wide range of sources about the infiltration of foreign extremists into Iraq. The bombings on 26–27 October are currently under investigation by the Iraq authorities and the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA). We do not know at this stage the identities of those responsible for these attacks, although as Sir Jeremy Greenstock said, the use of suicide bombers may indicate the involvement of foreign terrorists.

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions his Department has had with the Governments of (a) Iran, (b) Syria, (c) Afghanistan and (d) other Islamic countries regarding terrorists from those countries entering Iraq to participate in terrorist activities. [135944]

Mr. Straw: We have discussed border security with all of Iraq's neighbours and urged them to tighten up security and border controls to deny terrorists access to Iraq.

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what additional steps the Government has taken to ensure the security of (a) British personnel and troops and (b) those working for international aid organisations in the south of Iraq since 26 October. [135947]

Mr. Straw: Security measures are kept under constant review by UK commanders on the ground. The safety and security of all UK personnel is paramount. Force protection measures in place in southern Iraq are consistent with the current threat level. The Coalition offers security advice and assistance to aid workers wherever possible. However, international aid organisations are responsible for ensuring that adequate personal security arrangements are in place for their staff.

Nuclear Non-proliferation

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer of 12 May 2003, Official Report, column 85W, to the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith), on nuclear non-proliferation, what further actions his Department will pursue to implement the disarmament measures identified at the end of the 2000 Non-Proliferation Treaty Review Conference; and if he will make a statement. [135824]

Mr. Straw: The Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) is the cornerstone of the nuclear non-proliferation regime. The United Kingdom fully supports the Final Document of the 2000 NPT Review Conference and the 13 practical steps towards disarmament that it identified. We intend to continue our close co-operation with other NPT members to strengthen the effectiveness of measures against nuclear proliferation.

To that end, we will participate actively in the NPT review process, including the next Preparatory Committee (PrepCom) in April and May 2004 and the subsequent Review Conference in 2005. We will continue to provide reports at those meetings on our progress on all actions agreed in the 2000 Final Document. The UK is currently working on research into the verification of nuclear disarmament, and we will be presenting a second interim report on our studies at the next PrepCom. We intend to issue a consolidated report on this research at the 2005 Review Conference. This will contribute significantly towards one of the 13 practical steps towards disarmament identified in the Final Document of the 2000 Review Conference.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department has made since 11 September 2001 to the Israeli Government to persuade it (a) to sign and ratify the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, (b) to ratify the Chemical Weapons Convention and (c) to sign and ratify the Biological Weapons Convention. [135825]

Mr. Straw: We have a regular dialogue with Israel on the full range of counter-proliferation issues as an integral part of our diplomatic relationship. This dialogue includes an annual senior official-level meeting specifically on the subject. The last such meeting took place in March this year, with the previous one having taken place in March 2002.

Oil and Gas Reserves

Sir Robert Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the amendments the UK Government wish to see to the draft EU constitution where it impacts on Government policy for the exploitation of oil and gas reserves from the UK continental shelf. [R] [135326]

Mr. MacShane [holding answer 30 October 2003]: Article III-130(2)(c) of the draft EU Constitutional Treaty, which is based on Article 175(2)(c) of the TEC, sets out the Union competence to adopt

> "measures significantly affecting a member state's choice between different energy sources and the general structure of its energy supply"

by unanimity. Article III-157 of the draft EU Constitutional Treaty states the policy on energy shall aim to:

> (a) ensure the functioning of the energy market,
> (b) ensure security of energy supply in the Union, and
> (c) promote energy efficiency and saving and the development of new and renewable forms of energy and states that this policy shall not affect a member state's choice between different energy sources and the general structure of its energy supply.

Under the Treaty establishing the European Community, there is already Union activity in energy matters. We believe there is a strong case for making the legal base for policy in this area more transparent.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Adoption

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) for what reasons adoptive parents are not entitled to the same financial assistance as biological parents; [136501]

(2) what plans she has to review the level of adoptive pay; [136503]

(3) what estimate she has made of the number of claims for adoptive leave made in each of the last three years. [136504]

Mr. Sutcliffe: New statutory rights to leave and pay for parents adopting a child came into effect on 6 April this year. Eligible employees are able to take up to 52 weeks adoption leave and receive Statutory Adoption Pay for up to 26 weeks paid at the same standard rate as Statutory Maternity Pay (SMP)—£100 per week or 90 per cent. of average earnings if this is less than £100.

SMP is paid for the first six weeks at 90 per cent. of average earnings. This reflects the legal requirement that women take a period of compulsory maternity leave following the birth of a child. This is for their health and safety and that of their child. Offering a higher rate of SMP for the first six weeks recognises this and helps mothers to take that time off.

The adopter's partner may be able to benefit from the new rights to paternity leave and pay. Statutory Paternity Pay is paid at the same standard rate as SMP. This rate applies for all fathers, not just adoptive parents.

We are already gathering evidence on how the new rights for adoptive parents are working in practice, as part of a wider monitoring strategy for all the new laws relating to working parents introduced in April 2003, and will continue to do so as an ongoing process. The Government will begin a review of the right to request flexible working in 2006 and we aim to look at how effective the other laws have been at the same time.

The new rights have only been in place for seven months so as yet we do not have any figures on how many parents have taken adoption leave. However, it is estimated that in 2003 there will be 3,850 adoptions per year and we hope that most of these adopters will be able to benefit. We will be looking at the level of take up as part of our monitoring strategy.

Broadband

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action she is taking to bring high speed broadband internet connections to those areas where British Telecom has deemed enablement of the telephone exchange unviable. [136438]

Mr. Timms: The Government intends spending £1 billion on broadband connectivity for the public sector between 2003–06. The Broadband Aggregation Project will set up 9 Regional Aggregation Bodies (RABs), which will aggregate and procure public sector demand for broadband. Each RAB will work closely with stakeholders in their region to develop an appropriate regional strategy that will offer best value for money and the widest availability to surrounding communities.

Regional Development Agencies (RDAs) are committed to improving the availability of broadband in their region and are involved in a range of regional and local partnerships with both the public and private sector. RDAs administer the £30 million UK Broadband Fund which carries out pilot projects, to build awareness and understanding of the benefits of broadband in areas which are not currently served by the market.

A joint DTI/Defra Rural Broadband Team has been set up to address the issue of availability of broadband in rural areas. It aims to support local community action to secure affordable access to broadband, to ensure rural communities derive the maximum benefit from the deployment of broadband and promote rural access and take up of broadband to those in a position to effect positive change.

Competitiveness Council

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who will represent the Government at the EU Competitiveness Council of Ministers on 10 November. [136201]

Jacqui Smith: I will be representing the Government at the EU Competitiveness Council of Ministers on 10 November 2003.

Computer Viruses

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her most recent annual estimate is of the cost to UK business of virus infection of business computers and networks. [136428]

Mr. Timms: The DTI works with business to produce a biennial survey of Information Security Breaches, the latest of which was published in April 2002. The Survey is intended to raise awareness of the importance of effective information security management. The 2002 Survey did not set out to survey or measure the costs of specific security breaches such as virus infections, but surveyed the costs of all forms of information security breach. Based on the information gathered, the figures indicated that serious security incidents cost on average some £30, 000 per incident in 2001. The survey does not contain a figure for the total number of incidents. Work on the 2004 Survey is under way, and the results will be published in April 2004.

Consumer Credit

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to set maximum (a) charging structures and (b) interest rates for (i) personal loans, (ii) credit cards, (iii) store cards and (iv) sub-prime loans. [136288]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The Department has considered the issue of interest rate ceilings for the consumer credit market in the context of its review of the Consumer Credit Act. We are not persuaded of the case for introducing such ceilings. However, we have commissioned research into the way interest ceilings work in other EU countries.

Proposals in these areas and others, will be included in the forthcoming Consumer Credit White Paper, due for publication in December.

Estate Agents

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) of 11 September, Official Report, column 390W, on estate agents, what information her Department collates on the number of estate agents and their regulation. [136634]

Mr. Sutcliffe: According to the Office for National Statistics in June 2003 there were 8480 estate agent enterprises eligible for VAT in the UK.

The Estate Agents Act 1979 regulates the conduct of estate agents in the course of estate agency work. The Act gives the Director General of Fair Trading the power to issue warning or prohibition notices against those persons whom he considers to be unfit to carry on estate agency work.

Export Controls

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to her answer of 16 September 2003, Official Report, column 705W, on export controls, whether she has examined the impact that the Government's proposals for export control will have on the safety of UK military personnel. [136254]

Nigel Griffiths: By strengthening the strategic export control regime, the new controls will reduce the risk that goods or technology exported from the UK, or goods brokered from the UK, or in certain circumstances goods brokered by UK persons anywhere in the world, could be used against UK armed forces.

Inward Investment

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps the Government are taking to promote inward investment in the United Kingdom. [135474]

Ms Hewitt: The Government have expanded the inward investment function, home and overseas, within UK Trade & Investment (formerly Invest UK) to ensure that the UK maintains its place as the number one destination in Europe for inward investment in the EU. UK Trade & Investment works with the Regional Development Agencies and the development agencies of the Devolved Administrations to provide a tailored service to encourage inward investment.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to promote the United Kingdom as a manufacturing base to foreign companies, with particular reference to the qualities of the workforce. [135503]

Ms Hewitt: In promoting the UK as the top inward investment location in Europe, UK Trade and Investment (formerly Invest UK) focuses on value added investment including in manufacturing.

UK Trade and Investment ensures that inward investors are aware of all the qualities the UK has to offer including our skilled and adaptable workforce.

Japan

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the reason was for the postponement of the Minister of State for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services' planned visit to Japan in November; and when it will now take place. [136723]

Mr. Timms: The build-up to the Japanese elections made it difficult to secure key ministerial meetings. The visit has therefore been postponed until early in 2004.

Loan Companies

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of the practice of selling debts by loan companies to debt collection companies. [136174]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The Department has made no specific assessment of the practice of selling debts by loan companies to debt collection companies.

Lenders and debt collectors require a licence from the Office of Fair Trading under the Consumer Credit Act 1974. The OFT issued its "Debt collection guidance—Response to consultation paper and final guidance on unfair business practices" on 14 July 2003. The guidance specifies certain behaviour which OFT would consider in relation to taking licensing action. The guidance makes it clear that lenders must not ignore the unfair practices of debt collectors acting on their behalf, whether in-house or external. Lenders should take care in the selection of third parties, investigate complaints and take action where appropriate. Failure to do so will call their own fitness to hold a licence into question.

The DTI is reaching the conclusion of its review of the Consumer Credit Act 1974. Government proposals in this area will be set out in a White Paper due for publication in December. This will address issues such as the transparency of credit products, ensuring consumers are more aware of the terms and conditions of agreements they may wish to undertake.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if she will take steps to make loan companies publish statements on their efforts to reduce harassment of clients whom they are pursuing for overdue loans; [136175]

(2) if she will take steps to restrict the (a) days and (b) times of day that debt collectors can contact people they are pursuing for overdue debts; [136176]

(3) if she will take steps to restrict the number of (a) letters, (b) phone calls and (c) face to face visits debt collectors can make to people they are pursuing for overdue debts; [136177]

(4) what recent discussions her Department has had with consumer groups about harassment of borrowers by debt collection companies. [136178]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The OFT issued guidance for debt collectors on 14 July 2003 which is aimed at all consumer credit licence holders and applicants and applies to the collection of debt once an account is in default. It sets out the type of behaviour, such as harassment of debtors, that the OFT, which administers the licensing system, considers to be unfair and which could call into question fitness to hold a licence.

OFT guidance states it is an unfair business practice for a debt collector to be contacting debtors at unreasonable times and ignoring or disregarding debtors' legitimate wishes. Further to consultation on the guidance OFT decided not to prescribe specific times given debtors' differing circumstances.

The practice of debt collectors when recovering overdue loans has been considered in the context of my Department's review of the Consumer Credit Act.

The Consumer Credit White Paper that we will publish in December will outline our proposals to regulate the conduct of lenders and unfair credit agreements.

Microsoft (Licensing Fees)

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much was paid to Microsoft in licensing fees by her Department and its agencies in each of the last three years; and how much has been budgeted for (a) 2003–04 and (b) 2004–05. [130680]

Ms Hewitt: The provision of IT services for the Department of Trade and Industry is via a long term PFI contract with UNITAS, (a consortium of Fujitsu Services and Logica/CMG). Under this agreement all IT assets, hardware, software, (including Microsoft licensing fees), etc. are owned by UNITAS. Their provision and associated support are met through agreed bundled monthly service charges and it is not possible to identify specific costs for individual elements of these charges. The contract with UNITAS requires them to ensure that all software included as part of the services they provide to the Department are fully licensed with the appropriate supplier.

Miners' Compensation

Jeff Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) interim and (b) full and final payments have been made to former miners suffering from (i) chronic bronchitis and emphysema and (ii) vibration white finger. [136097]

Nigel Griffiths: The figures as of 26 October 2003 are as follows:

Interim and full and final payments made to former miners

	COPD	VWF
Interim payments	69,753	85,366
Full and final payments	85,735	75,648

Note:

Figures are readily available on the DTI website: www.dti.gov.uk/coalhealth and updated monthly.

Office Plants Document

Brian Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the cost of producing her Department's foliage strategy was; how many staff hours were spent on producing the document; and if she will make a statement. [135400]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 30 October 2003]: The only cost involved in producing the Department's so called "foliage strategy" was staff time at an internal cost of around £600. The strategy was an integral part of a procurement process to rationalise the contractual arrangements for provision of plant maintenance throughout the DTI buildings. The new contractual arrangements have resulted in overall savings of about £6,000 per annum.

Precious Metals

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, in the current EU Presidency working party discussions on the draft directive on articles of precious metal, she will propose that a high level of consumer protection secured by reliable third party verification should be a requisite in harmonised trade in such articles; and if she will make a statement on the stance adopted by other member states in the discussions. [136386]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The Government believe that a system of independent third party checks provides a high level of consumer protection and are opposed to any measures that would reduce such protection in the UK.

Some member states have indicated support for the approach in the draft directive, while others have expressed reservations.

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations she is making to her counterparts in other EU member states to encourage them to support the view that harmonised trade in articles of precious metal should have a high level of consumer protection secured by reliable third party verification. [136387]

Mr. Sutcliffe: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has written to potentially sympathetic member states urging them not to support the draft directive.

Scottish Stamps

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to discuss with the Royal Mail the (a) promotion and (b) marketing of the Scottish definitive stamps. [136155]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 3 November 2003]: The stamp programme is an operational matter for Royal Mail Group plc, I have therefore asked the Chief Executive of Royal Mail to reply direct to my hon. Friend.

Television Reception (East Kent)

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made in negotiation with the French authorities towards agreed enhancement of South Coast television transmitters for those living in East Kent; and if she will make a statement. [135332]

Mr. Timms: Negotiations are continuing. The Radiocommunications Agency is in regular discussion with its French counterpart about sharing spectrum for our respective analogue and digital TV coverage requirements. These negotiations are conditioned by internationally agreed arrangements, and spectrum planning methods, for determining equitable spectrum shares. The close proximity of the two countries and the heavy demand for frequencies on both sides of the Channel requires difficult and complicated technical discussions to maximise the use of spectrum in both countries in a way that minimises interference effects. In some cases, compromises are having to be made on both sides to deliver TV networks, such as mutual toleration of the risk of greater interference for longer periods than advised by the international planning rules.

We are still in negotiation with the French authorities on acceptable channels and transmitter powers for digital TV from the Dover and Bluebell Hill stations in conjunction with the French requests for frequencies (and transmitter powers) for their own networks. Both sides are currently analysing the impact of each others' latest proposals and we hope to meet the French administration as soon as possible to take forward the discussions.

Trade Missions

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on the Government's view of the benefits of trade missions. [135514]

Ms Hewitt: Trade missions are a tried and tested mechanism providing a framework of support, both practical and financial, in which companies new, or relatively new, to the markets concerned can receive support to travel overseas to explore or assess the market or reinforce existing marketing efforts.

The main benefits of participating in trade missions, apart from any financial support, are the raised profile of being seen as part of a UK group of companies; the opportunity to network and do business with fellow participants and the assistance, advice and knowledge provided by the mission organiser before the mission and during the visit.

Transport and Access

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many complaints from British businesses her Department has received concerning transport and access issues in each of the last five years. [134868]

Nigel Griffiths: No such figures are available but the DTI is currently working on identifying optimal ways in which business's views on transport can be recorded and subsequently acted on.

CABINET OFFICE

Magistrates

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many magistrates there are under the age of (a) 30, (b) 35 and (c) 40 serving in Lancashire. [135572]

Mr. Alexander: At 31 March 2003 the available figures show that there were three magistrates under the age of 30 and 28 between the ages of 30 and 39 within the Lancashire Commission. A National Recruitment Strategy announced by the Lord Chancellor on 7 October will seek to find ways of recruiting younger magistrates and this will be actively promoted within the Duchy area.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Benefit Appeals

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many (a) attendance allowance appeals, (b) disability living allowance appeals and (c) incapacity benefit (personal capability assessment) appeals there have been in each of the last three years. [133715]

Maria Eagle: This is a matter for Christina Townsend Chief Executive of the Appeals Service. She will reply to the hon. Member.

Letter from Christina Townsend to Annabelle Ewing, dated 5 November 2003:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question regarding the number of attendance allowance appeals, disability allowance appeals and incapacity benefit (personal capability assessment) appeals there have been in each of the last three years.

The attached table shows the number of attendance allowance appeals, disability living allowance appeals and incapacity benefit (personal capability assessment) appeals which were received by the Appeals Service during the last three years.

I hope this reply is helpful.

Fraud

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what estimate he has made of the level of council tax benefit fraud in the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [134131]

Mr. Pond: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) on 16 July 2003, Official Report, column 432W.

New Deal

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many Employment Service personal advisers have been recruited under the New Deal programme since 1997. [133161]

Malcolm Wicks: The administration of Jobcentre Plus is a matter for the Chief Executive of Jobcentre Plus, David Anderson. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from David Anderson to Mr. Nick Gibb, dated 5 November 2003:

As Jobcentre Plus is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question concerning how many Employment Service personal advisers have been recruited under the New Deal programme since 1997. This is something that falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

In line with the Departments policy, Jobcentre Plus recruits people under the Employment Option of the New Deal into the Administrative Assistant or Administrative Officer grades. As Personal Adviser posts are graded at the Executive Officer grade we would not recruit for these posts under the New Deal programme.

However, people on the New Deal caseload can apply for any posts advertised externally by Jobcentre Plus which would include grades at the Executive Officer level. People recruited using this method would not be classed as one of our New Deal employees.

I hope this is helpful.

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what assessment he has made of the impact of the New Deal for Communities since 1998 in (a) St. Helens, South, (b) Merseyside and (c) the north west region on (i) reducing crime, (ii) creating jobs and (iii) raising standards in education. [134616]

Yvette Cooper: I have been asked to reply.

(a) There are no New Deal for Communities (NDC) Partnerships in St. Helens, South.

(b) and (c) There are two NDC Partnerships in Merseyside—Liverpool (Kensington) and Knowsley (North Huyton). There are six partnerships in the north west region. These include the two Merseyside Partnerships and those in Manchester (Beswick and Openshaw), Oldham (Hathershaw and Fitton Hill), Rochdale (Heywood) and Salford (Central).

The NDC programme is scrutinised and reviewed using two, complementary and linked streams of work:

a performance management system, which drives annual and mid-year reviews, lead by the Government Offices for the Regions;

the NDC National Evaluation, providing external assessment at partnership, programme and theme level, lead by Sheffield Hallam University.

The performance management system was introduced in 2003 and used for the first time for the 2002–03 annual reviews. Partnerships reviewed their own performance and the results that they are starting to achieve.

The evidence provided in these reviews by the NDC Partnerships show that partnerships in the Merseyside and the north west are beginning to make an impact in reducing crime, creating jobs and raising standards in education. For example:

In the Kensington area of Liverpool, the rate of all recorded offences has fallen from 185.3 instances per 1,000 population before the NDC, to 148.8 in 2002–03.

In Salford, the gap between the proportion of pupils getting five or more GCSEs at grades A to C narrowed from 12 per cent. to 8 per cent. in 2002–03.

In east Manchester, the percentage of the working age population who are in employment has risen from 52 per cent.to 65 per cent., which exceeded the city average in 2002–03.

Alongside this evidence from partnerships themselves, data from the national NDC evaluation about the progress NDC Partnerships are making towards achieving their outcome targets is now beginning to come through. An overview of the latest position was recently published in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister Research Report 7 "New Deal for Communities: The National Evaluation: Annual Report 2002–03". Copies are available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what proposals he has to (a) continue and (b) develop New Deal for Communities schemes in (i) St. Helens, South, (ii) Merseyside and (iii) the north west region. [134646]

Yvette Cooper: I have been asked to reply.

(a) There are currently no New Deal for Communities (NDC) Partnerships in St. Helens, South. There are no plans to develop any NDC Partnerships in the St. Helens south area.

(b) There are two NDC Partnerships in Merseyside—one in Liverpool (Kensington) and one in Knowlsey (north Huyton). These partnerships have both been awarded a grant to spend over a ten year time period, and so the Liverpool Partnership will continue until 2009–10 and the Knowsley Partnership until 2010–11. There are no plans to develop any further NDC Partnerships in Merseyside.

(c) There are six NDC Partnerships in the north west, these include the two mentioned in part (b) of this answer and also partnerships in Oldham (Hathershaw and Fitton Hill), Rochdale (Heywood), east Manchester (Beswick and Openshaw) and Salford (Central). The Manchester Partnership will continue until 2009–10 and the Oldham, Rochdale and Salford Partnerships until 2010–11. There are no plans to develop any further NDC Partnerships in the north west.

Pension Advice Surgeries

John Thurso: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions pursuant to his Answer of 12 October 2003, Official Report, column 206W, on pension advice surgeries, if he will break down the number of regular drop-in and appointment surgeries by region. [135926]

Malcolm Wicks: The break down of regular drop-in and appointment surgeries by region is detailed in the table. These surgeries are under constant review with regard to suitability of location, publicity and level of usage. This will enable us to continue to provide a modern delivery that is based on the needs of older people and takes account of their views about how they want to access our services.

Pension Credit

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the take-up rate for the pension credit is in each constituency; and how many people are (a) eligible for and (b) claiming pension credit, broken down by constituency. [135965]

Mr. Browne: The information is not available in the format requested. Approximately half of all pensioner households across Great Britain are eligible for Pension Credit and stand to gain on average £400 a year. Around 1.9 million Pension Credit awards have already been made to pensioner households across Great Britain as a whole (helping more than 2 million individuals).

The Government have a target for at least 3 million pensioner households to be in receipt of Pension Credit by 2006. We want all those eligible for Pension Credit to take up their entitlement.

We intend to publish monthly reports on the progress of Pension Credit take-on, which will include information on the number of applications. The first such report will be published later this month.

Pensions

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what measures the Government plans to introduce to regulate contribution holidays by occupational pension schemes. [135826]

Malcolm Wicks: Government proposals for regulating occupational pension schemes are set out in the documents "Simplifying the taxation of pensions: increasing choice and flexibility for all" (December 2002) and "Working and Saving for Retirement: Action on Occupational Pensions" (June 2003) Cm 5835. These do not contain specific proposals regarding contribution holidays. However, our proposed simplified tax regime for approved pension schemes would abolish the rules that currently require approved occupational pension schemes to run off their surplus funds or lose their full tax exempt status.

We also propose to replace the Minimum Funding Requirement, now widely regarded as inadequate, with scheme-specific funding arrangements intended to ensure that the level of contributions is sufficient to meet a scheme's long-term pension commitments. Trustees and employers, with the scheme actuary's advice, will develop and agree the funding strategy for their scheme in line with this objective.

SchlumbergerSema Doctors

Paul Holmes: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the average time spent by SchlumbergerSema doctors on an individual personal capability assessment was in each year since 1997 (a) broken down by region and (b) in the UK as a whole; and if he will make a statement. [134194]

Maria Eagle: Doctors are encouraged to spend as long as required to carry out an appropriate assessment. Some types of disabling conditions will take longer than others to assess, depending on the nature of the disability .

The available information is in the table.

Average time taken (in minutes) to complete the personal capability assessment

Winter Fuel Payment (Wansdyke)

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will estimate (a) how many people in Wansdyke constituency are eligible for the winter fuel payment in 2003–04 and (b) how many people in Wansdyke constituency received it in 2002–03. [136332]

Malcolm Wicks: The information is not available in the format requested. However, such information as is available is as follows.

The number of people in Wansdyke parliamentary constituency who received a Winter Fuel Payment for winter 2002–03 was 19,940 made up of 8,965 men and 10,975 women. We expect similar figures for 2003–04.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Child Poverty

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what action he is taking to tackle the problem of children living in substandard housing conditions as part of the target to eliminate child poverty. [136446]

Keith Hill: The Government are very aware of the links between housing conditions, health and poverty. Children of low income parents (those on means tested benefit) are more likely (38 per cent. of such households, 760,000 households in all) to live in homes that do not meet the decent home standard than other children (25 per cent.).

That is why the Government are committed to making all social housing decent by 2010 and has made a long-term commitment to eliminate child poverty by 2020. Improving sub-standard housing conditions is an integral part of the Government's child poverty strategy.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister target is that by 2010 all social housing will be made decent and that 210,000 more households will be supported to ensure their homes are made decent. Good progress has already been made—between 1997 and 2001, nearly half a million the numbers of non-decent social sector homes have been reduced. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has also helped around 120,000 vulnerable households in the private sector to make their homes decent.

In March 2003 the draft Housing Bill was published. It includes the following proposals that will benefit poor and vulnerable households by targeting housing condition problems which will in turn address child poverty issues:

Housing Health and Safety Rating System—this new system will target health and safety hazards in the home and provide a better basis for enforcement. It will replace the current Fitness Standard.

Licensing of higher-risk Houses in Multiple Occupation (HMOs)—These house some of the most vulnerable people. The definition includes Bread and Breakfast (B&B) accommodation for homeless families. This mandatory national licensing scheme will improve controls on about 120,000 HMOs, to improve basic facilities and management standards.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has also set a target to end, by March 2004, the use of B&B accommodation for families with children except in emergencies, and then for no longer than six weeks. The Government are considering making it unlawful for local authorities to exceed this six-week deadline, and hopes to make an announcement by the end of this year.

Council Housing Stock

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the average level of council tax is for (a) those councils that have transferred council housing stock and (b) those councils that have maintained control of council stock. [133767]

Keith Hill: Tabled as follows is (a) the average Band D council tax for 2003–04 for those authorities that have completed Large Scale Voluntary Transfers (LSVTs) of housing, and (b) the average Band D Council Tax for 2003–04 for those authorities that have not completed a LSVT.

An LSVT is defined as the transfer of more than 499 properties to a single Registered Social Landlord. No data are available for smaller transfers of housing stock.

Diabetics

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will issue guidance under planning provision that encourages major stores, high street restaurants and other appropriate retail outlets to provide private rooms for diabetics to inject insulin; and if he will make a statement. [133093]

Keith Hill: The internal arrangement of shops and restaurants, including customer facilities such as toilets and baby changing facilities, are not planning matters. Although some facilities for customers are required under other legislation, most are provided by retailers as a customer service.

Domestic Violence

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make a statement about the progress of the Government's domestic violence helpline. [136314]

Yvette Cooper: The development of the single freephone Helpline for victims of domestic violence is making good progress. The Government and Comic Relief are providing funding. However, it will not be a Government help-line as it will be owned and run by two independent charities.

A further statement will be made as soon as the launch date of the project is known.

Housing Market Renewal (West Yorkshire)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to provide resources for housing market renewal in West Yorkshire. [136412]

Keith Hill: The Regional Housing Board for Yorkshire and the Humber has identified £16 million over two years to kick-start a West Yorkshire Low Demand Project, in addition to the needs-based allocation that all local authorities will receive. In 2004–05, West and South Yorkshire will also be sharing £2 million of the £6 million identified for innovative approaches to private sector renewal in Yorkshire and the Humber, with bids from all sub-regions for the remaining £4 million to be invited early next year. The board will also allocate £10 million for 2005–06 for transformational projects that meet the region's priorities, which include regeneration and neighbourhood renewal.

There are no current plans for further Market Renewal Pathfinders. The evidence for further pathfinders will be considered within the context and constraints of the 2004 Spending Review.

Investigatory Powers

Brian White: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what statutory investigatory powers his Department has; which ones will be superseded by use of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000; and what plans he has for removing these legacy powers. [136118]

Yvette Cooper: A full list of existing statutory investigatory powers for which the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has responsibility is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate costs. But in any event, no such powers are superseded by the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000: generally speaking, existing powers make provision relating to compelling production of information (subject to various safeguards) in different contexts and in a wide variety of statutory regimes. Such existing statutory powers could not be used to compel disclosure of communications data in the sense for which the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 provides. Accordingly there are no plans to repeal any such powers in consequence of that Act.

Local Government Finance

David Wright: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister (1) how much additional grant support has been received by Telford and Wrekin Council annually since its creation as a unitary authority; [132548]

(2) what annual percentage increase in grant support has been made available to Telford and Wrekin Council since its creation as a unitary authority. [132545]

Mr. Raynsford: Total grant for Telford and the Wrekin Council since its creation as a unitary authority is shown in the table.

Regional Assemblies

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how much public money he estimates will be spent by both sides of the campaign on the forthcoming regional assembly referendums. [136076]

Phil Hope: Under the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000, organisations can apply to the Electoral Commission to become the lead campaign body for one of the referendum outcomes. The Electoral Commission is currently considering the appropriate level of grant to award to these designated organisations.

Street Wardens

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the sources of funding are for street wardens in Cambridgeshire; and how much funding is being received from each source in 2003–04. [136384]

Yvette Cooper: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister funds three street warden schemes in Cambridgeshire, based in Cambridge, Huntingdon and Peterborough, all of which are match funded by local authorities. The Cambridge scheme has an Office of the Deputy Prime Minister grant of £54,250 for 2003–04, which is match funded by Cambridge city council. The Huntingdon scheme has an Office of the Deputy Prime Minister grant of £64,484, match funded by Huntingdon district council and the Peterborough scheme has an Office of the Deputy Prime Minister grant of £94,691, match funded by Peterborough county council. This represents a total of £426,850 to fund street wardens in Cambridgeshire in 2003–04.

Tollington Estate

Jeremy Corbyn: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what expenditure there has been on the preparation for the sale of the Tollington Estate in Islington by the North British Housing Association and its subsidiaries; and how much of this was funded by (a) local authority, (b) Housing Corporation and (c) re-generation funds. [136507]

Keith Hill: The North British Housing Association (NBH) has spent £590,000 to ensure effective resident involvement and consultation in the development of proposals for the stock transfer of the Tollington Estates from Islington council to NBH. This has involved extensive resident involvement in the preparation of the masterplan for the estates, the provision of an estate based office to provide an accessible information point for residents and the production and circulation of newsletters to everyone living on the estates.

This sum has been funded internally within NBH. There has been no financial support to NBH from other bodies.

HEALTH

"A Vision for Pharmacy"

Hugh Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in implementing "A Vision for Pharmacy". [136051]

Ms Rosie Winterton: "A Vision for Pharmacy", published on 17 July 2003, builds on a programme to develop national health service pharmacy services set out in "Pharmacy in the Future", published in September 2000. The consultation paper highlights the significant progress made in the past three years in delivering important changes in the way pharmacy services are delivered. Consultation on "A Vision for Pharmacy" ended on 17 October and details of the wide-ranging responses received will be published by the end of the year. These are currently being analysed and will help inform and shape further action to deliver improved patient choice and access to a range of high quality pharmacy services.

Accident and Emergency Services

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients admitted to accident and emergency departments in London in each quarter of each of the last four years waited for more than 12 hours before being treated or transferred to a ward. [135156]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not collected centrally. However, data on total time spent in accident and emergency from arrival to admission, transfer or discharge has been collected and routinely published since July 2002. This information is available on the Department's website at www.doh.gov.uk/hospitalactivity.

Asian People's Disability Association

Sarah Teather: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to enable the Asian People's Disability Association to remain in the offices which they now occupy in the Central Middlesex Hospital, Park Royal, (a) during and (b) after the rebuilding programme. [132724]

Mr. Hutton: This is a local matter and I understand that health and social services have been working together to find suitable alternative accommodation for the Asian People's Disability Association and that these negotiations are on-going locally.

Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire Strategic Health Authority

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much debt was inherited by the Avon-Gloucestershire-Wiltshire Strategic Health Authority on its formation; how much of this debt was inherited from (a) Royal United Hospitals, Bath, (b) United Bristol Health Care and (c) North Bristol Health Trusts; and if he will make a statement. [135403]

Ms Rosie Winterton [holding answer on 30 October 2003]: Strategic health authorities (SHAs) were established in 2002–03. Information in respect of inherited balances can be obtained from the chief executive of Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire SHA. The information is not available centrally.

Bechtel

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list contracts for consultancy or work carried out by Bechtel in each year since 1997 stating in each case (a) the nature of the work, (b) the value of the contract and (c) the duration of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [134679]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 28 October 2003]: No contracts for consultancy or other works have been awarded to Bechtel since 1997.

Cancer Research UK

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much funding has been allocated to Cancer Research UK in 2003–04; and for which projects. [133916]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Department has provided £2.6 million to Cancer Research UK to fund their 'Death Repackaged' campaign. This awareness raising campaign was launched in September 2003, to highlight the dangers of terms 'light' and 'mild' on cigarette packs.

The Department does not allocate funds directly to charities for research. We spent an estimated £83.8 million on cancer research in 2000–01. Over 75 per cent. of this expenditure is devolved to the national health service, largely to meet the additional patient care costs associated with research. These costs cover items such as extra scans for diagnosis or monitoring of treatment, extra blood tests, extra in-patient days and extra nursing attention. This support allows work funded by the research councils and charities, including Cancer Research UK, to be conducted within the NHS.

Private Finance Initiative

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the total cost of PFI-based capital investment in the NHS in London has been since 1997; and what revenue costs were incurred on an annual basis to service the financing facilities. [133747]

Mr. Hutton: For private finance initiative (PFI) schemes with a capital value greater than £10 million, the total capital cost of PFI-based investment in the four new London strategic health authorities since 1997 is £975,900,000. The capital value of PFI schemes is defined as: total capital cost to the private sector including the costs of land, construction, equipment and professional fees but excluding value added tax, rolled up interest and financing costs. As PFI procures a service, rather than the underlying asset, capital values are necessarily estimates.

Unitary payments on a PFI scheme—paid for from a trust's general revenue allocations—include elements for 'hard' and 'soft' facilities management services as well as financing costs. A partial breakdown of the unitary costs for schemes with a capital value exceeding £20 million is held centrally. This shows the split between 'availability' and 'services' where 'availability' includes costs attributable to 'hard' facilities management and financing, but does not distinguish further. To collect this information would mean reviewing the financial models for all these schemes which would incur disproportionate costs.

Unitary payments on PFI schemes become payable when the scheme becomes operational. The first to do so was Queen Mary's hospital, Sidcup, which took its first patient at the end of March 2000; the most recent to open was St. George's in September 2003.

Total unitary payments for PFI schemes which have reached financial close since 1997 in the four new London strategic health authorities

	£ million
2000–01	32.848
2001–02	51.813
2002–03	60.000
2003–04 (to date)	94.900

Care Homes

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to assist care homes in adapting premises to meet the new size requirements for residents' rooms. [135178]

Dr. Ladyman: National minimum standards relating to room sizes in pre-existing care homes (that is, a care home which existed before April 2002) were relaxed in June 2003. The change means that pre-existing care homes which do not already meet certain of the standards introduced in April 2002 will no longer be expected to make physical changes to the home to do so.

The Government has no plans to provide direct financial assistance to care homes to meet any of the standards. Care homes are independent businesses and any changes to meet standards should be viewed as 'upgrading' the service being provided. Providers will be able to detail the facilities they offer in their prospectuses, so that those purchasing or using the services can make an informed choice.

Care Payments

Hugh Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to encourage local authorities to make available direct payments for care. [136054]

Dr. Ladyman: From 8 April 2003, there has been a duty placed on local councils to make direct payments to those who choose to receive them. The Government have also established the direct payments development fund. This will provide £9 million over three years to national, regional and local voluntary organisations in partnership with local councils. This is a substantial investment in direct payments support services, key to improving access to direct payments. Increasing the take up of direct payments will contribute to the overall assessment of each council's performance that is made each year.

Clinical Trials

John Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will amend the draft Medicines for Human Use (Clinical Trials) Regulations 2003 to ensure that non-commercial publicly or charitably-funded drug development work will not come under the same regulatory framework as commercially-funded trials. [135584]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The European Directive on the conduct of clinical trials was adopted in February 2001. The main aim of the Directive is to simplify and harmonise procedures across the Community while ensuring the protection of trial subjects and providing a safe environment for the development of new medicines. member states are required to fully implement the Directive by 1 May 2004.

The scope of the Directive is wide and the United Kingdom Regulations will apply to all clinical trials on medicinal products for human use conducted in the UK, including academic and healthy volunteer studies, with the exception of non-interventional trials.

Because the Directive makes no distinction between commercial and non-commercial publicly or charitably funded clinical trials, they cannot be treated differently in the UK implementing regulations. However those drafting the Directive recognised the special position of non-commercial trials conducted by researchers without the participation of the pharmaceutical industry. The Government has taken steps to attempt to influence the Commission in its consideration of a Commission Directive on good clinical practice and also in reviewing guidance that the Commission published earlier this year with a view to avoiding any unnecessary regulatory requirements and costs.

In responding to concerns, and to provide an environment in which patients are protected but high quality research is not inhibited, my noble Friend Lord Hunt of Kings Heath, the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Health, invited the Medical Research Council (MRC) and the Academy of Medical Sciences to co-ordinate a report on the impact of the Directive on academic studies. The impact assessment, prepared by the MRC with the active support of others including Cancer Research UK, the National Co-ordinating Centre for Health Technology Assessment and a number of academic experts formed the basis for a response to the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency (MHRA) consultation on the draft regulations to implement the Directive into UK law earlier this year.

The MHRA is giving careful consideration to legislation and guidance linked to these issues. For example, they are considering the acceptability of different approaches to monitoring the validity of trial data that are less labour intensive and expensive than those usually used in commercial trials. The aim is the use of appropriate quality systems proportionate to risk (thereby minimising increases in costs). A list of responses to frequently asked questions are published on the MHRA website at www.mhra.gov in the Clinical Trials Directive pages, which will be kept updated.

In another initiative, the Department and the MRC have announced a joint project to work with experts to find practical solutions to the issues identified in the impact assessment. Details of the project can be found on www.ncchta.org/eudirective/index.asp.

With our careful exploration of the impact on publicly-funded research and organisations that support it and delays in the Commission finalising the GCP Directive and other guidance, the United Kingdom's implementing regulations are not expected to be made until early in 2004.

Dental Devices (Outsourcing)

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans his Department has to outsource custom-made dental devices to (a) Turkey, (b) Hungary, (c) China and (d) the Philippines. [133244]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Custom-made dental appliances are manufactured to the written prescription of the dentist responsible for the case in question. The choice of manufacturing laboratory is a matter for local decision. All dental laboratories in the European Union are registered with the competent authority, which in the United Kingdom is the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency.

Manufacturers of custom made appliances from outside the European Union are required to designate an authorised representative within the European Union, who must register with the competent authority where they have their registered place of business. The manufacturer must meet the relevant requirements of the Medical Devices Directive (93/42/EEC) and must meet the same standards as devices manufactured within the European Union.

Diabetes

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment he has made of Standard Three of the National Standards Framework for Diabetes; and if he will make a statement; [R] [135375]

(2) how his Department assists primary care trusts to meet Standard Three of the National Standard Framework for Diabetes; and if he will make a statement. [R] [135376]

Ms Rosie Winterton: "The New NHS and A First Class Service" introduced a range of measures to raise quality and decrease variations in service including national service frameworks (NSFs).

The NHS Plan re-emphasised the role of NSFs as drivers in delivering the modernisation agenda. NSFs are one element of the overall programme of modernisation. They are designed to help us to improve health and social well-being by:

- providing services to more people, more quickly and to a higher standard;
- improving the patient experience;
- reducing variations in care across the country;
- increasing compliance with evidence-based practice.

NSFs have challenging aims (the vision) for a particular service or care group. Ways to achieve those aims are described in a number of standards, focused as far as possible on the needs of patients and good outcomes, underpinned by:

- the rationale and a clear statement of the evidence base;
- good practice: key interventions and service models which have worked in practice (linked, wherever possible, to Social Care Institute for Excellence (SCIE) work and the National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE) guidelines and appraisals);
- performance indicators to measure local and national progress.

Standard 3 of the diabetes national service framework is about patient empowerment. All people with diabetes will receive a service that encourages partnership in decision-making and supports them in managing their diabetes.

This is reflected in the "Planning and Priorities Framework for the NHS 2003–06", which includes targets for the diabetes NSF. One such target states the need for primary care trusts to update practice-based registers for people with diabetes by March 2006. This will help to ensure that they receive systematic treatment regimens and advice to help support them in managing their own condition.

The above gives clinicians and other professionals, managers and service users the information and guidance they need to drive forward improvements locally. NSFs will be implemented and monitored in the same way as departmental policy generally, allowing maximum scope for local flexibility. The implementation/monitoring regime will differ from NSF to NSF. Essential elements include:

- implementation guides covering, as appropriate, national actions to support local delivery through a number of underpinning programmes, such as workforce development and research and development;
- national and local champions who will drive forward delivery of the standards with clinical colleagues and others;
- national and local performance indicators to help strategic health authorities, primary care trusts and local councils to benchmark progress;
- the Commission for Health Improvement using national standards to inspect and evaluate services;
- empowered patients and users using standards to feedback on local services;
- patients forums and other similar consultative groups identifying where services could be improved;
- the Modernisation Agency, NICE, SCIE and the Improvement and Development Agency to promulgate, spread and support best practice.

Dysphasia

Mrs. Calton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which primary care trusts support a dysphasia service; and which of these have received external funding. [132784]

Mr. Hutton: Most, if not all, primary care trusts will either directly provide or will commission services for people suffering from dysphasia. Such services may not necessarily be separately identified as dysphasia services but may form part of the service provided by speech and language therapy departments. Information is not available in sufficient detail centrally to show whether particular dysphasia services have received external funding.

Epidermolysis Bullosa

Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision he is making for people suffering from epidermolysis bullosa; if he will meet representatives from the Dystrophic Epidermolysis Bullosa Research Agency; and if he will make a statement about epidermolysis bullosa. [136105]

Dr. Ladyman: Patients with this condition are able to access the normal range of national health service services.

I will certainly consider any request to meet representatives of the Dystrophic Epidermolysis Bullosa Research Agency.

Essex Ambulance Service

Mr. Francois: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many full-time ambulance paramedics were employed by the Essex Ambulance Service on 1 September 2003. [132635]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Published figures are not yet available for September 2003. As at 30 September 2002, there were 210 full-time ambulance paramedics employed by the Essex Ambulance Service National Health Service Trust. In addition, a further 23 were employed on a part-time basis, giving a total whole-time equivalent of 220.

General Practitioners

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the additional cost to the NHS of providing out of hours treatment following acceptance of the new GPs' contract. [134244]

Mr. Hutton: This is a matter for local decision and depending on how services are reconfigured. We are making available an extra £138 million from 2003–04 to 2005–06 to support these changes. These resources are in addition to the average of £6,000 released by each general practitioner who opts out of his/her responsibility for out-of-hours services.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of (a) adults, (b) children and (c) the total population are registered with a general practitioner in (i) England, (ii) each region and (iii) each strategic health authority. [133725]

Mr. Hutton: At 30 September 2002 (the latest published data), 51,522,391 people were recorded as registered with a general practitioner or provider of personal medical services. The table provides details by strategic health authority (SHA). It is not possible to express these figures accurately as a percentage of total population as the phenomenon of "list inflation" means that registered populations are typically larger than actual populations. This phenomenon arises where a patient moves his or her registration and for a transitional period may be registered on two lists. Similarly, an individual who dies or moves abroad may remain on a list for a time.

Health Care-associated Infection

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects the first quarter results of the second phase of the mandatory surveillance scheme for health care-associated infection to be published. [134064]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 27 October 2003]: Collection of data for the second phase of the mandatory surveillance scheme began this autumn, with publication expected to start next summer. Quarterly reporting may not be appropriate for all data.

Care Homes (Somerset)

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) residential care home and (b) nursing home places were available in Somerset in each year since 1997, broken down into places available at (i) local authority-run homes, (ii) independent private homes and (iii) homes run by independent charities and other not-for-profit organisations. [135424]

Dr. Ladyman: The table shows the number of care home places by type of accommodation available in Somerset as at 31 March for the years 1997 to 2001.

Figures for later years have been collected by the National Care Standards Commission but comparable details broken down by local authority are not available.

	Residential homes				Nursing homes

Hospital Appointments

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 13 October 2003, Official Report, column 57W, what information he holds on the proportion of hospital appointments which were pre-booked at the start of 2000–01. [133978]

Mr. Hutton: Information on the proportion of hospital appointments pre-booked at the start of 2000–01 was not collected centrally.

Immunisation

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list coverage rates of immunisations which are given to school age children and infants. [134771]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Information about the childhood immunisation programme, which includes children immunised by their second birthday, and from 1999–2000 by their fifth birthday, is derived from the COVER (Cover of Vaccination Evaluated Rapidly) system and collected by the Health Protection Agency.

Information about numbers of immunisations of older school children is collected by the Department of Health from service providers and does not allow for the calculation of coverage rates because appropriate population denominators are not available.

Information about childhood immunisations from both the sources mentioned is published annually in Departmental statistical bulletins. The latest bulletin, "NHS Immunisation Statistics, England: 2002–03", is available in the Library and on the Department's website at www.doh.gov.uk/public/sb0316.htm.

Intrathecal Analgesic Pumps

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the frequency was in 2002–03 of the fitting of intrathecal analgesic (Isomed) pumps to patients in Gloucestershire; what the cost of each operation was; what the (a) length of the waiting list and (b) average times spent waiting for such an operation were; and if he will make a statement. [135003]

Ms Rosie Winterton [holding answer 28 October 2003]: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Long-term Care

Mr. Horam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) nursing and (b) residential care places for the (i) elderly, (ii) chronically ill and (iii) physically disabled there were in London for each of the last five years, broken down by London borough. [134070]

Dr. Ladyman [holding answer 29 October 2003]: Information on the number of nursing care places for older people aged 65 or over and younger physically disabled people aged 18 to 64 by London health authorities as at 31 March for the years 1998 to 2001, has been placed in the Library. Equivalent data for residential care places by London councils with social service responsibilities, has also been placed in the Library. Comparable data for 1997 are not available.

Data on chronically ill people are not available as this is not one of the client groups for which separate information is collected.

Figures for later years have been collected by the National Care Standards Commission.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made with identifying possible candidates for refund of care costs, following the publication of the Second Report, Session 2002–03, of the Health Service Ombudsman on NHS funding for long-term care of older and disabled people; and what steps he envisages that patients or their families would need to take to pursue their claims. [135371]

Dr. Ladyman: Strategic health authorities (SHAs) have established procedures to investigate inquiries for recompense of the costs of continuing care wrongly denied. To pursue a claim, patients or their families should contact their local SHA and request an investigation of their case.

Medical Appointment Letters

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate the NHS has made of potential savings derived from sending medical appointment letters by second class post. [132782]

Mr. Hutton: No estimate has been made of potential savings derived from sending medical appointment letters by second class post. This is because it is the decision of each trust/health authority, based on locally decided priorities, whether or not post is sent out by first, or by second class.

Mental Health

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many in-patient beds have been available in London for patients with (a) mental health conditions and (b) learning disabilities in London in each year since 1997. [133745]

Mr. Hutton: The average daily number of in-patient beds in London for patients with mental health conditions and learning disabilities in national health service trusts in the London area are shown in the table.

Average daily number of available beds, mental illness and learning disability sectors, London area[1]

	Mental illness	Learning disability
1996–97	7,186	576
1997–98	7,300	569
1998–99	7,008	554
1999–2000	6,155	554
2000–01	6,401	488
2001–02	6,149	461
2002–03	6,321	158

[1] Reorganisation of NHS administrative boundaries may mean figures are not directly comparable. From 1996–97 to 2000–01, the figures are based on the number of beds reported by NHS trusts within the London Regional Office boundary. For 2001–02 and 2002–03, the figures are based on the number of beds reported by NHS trusts located within the five London strategic health authorities of North West London, North Central London, North East London, South East London and South West London.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many agency nurses are employed in each (a) hospital trust and (b) mental health trust shown (i) in actual numbers and (ii) as a percentage of nursing staff overall. [134769]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will commission research into the issues raised by Mind's report, The Hidden Costs of Mental Health; and if he will make a statement. [135600]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Department keeps its priorities for research under review. Priorities for departmental research and development support for the development of policy are determined through discussion with policy colleagues and Ministers. In the national health service, priorities are identified through widespread consultation with those using, delivering and managing services. They take account of the burden of disease, potential benefits and departmental objectives, as well as the responsibilities and work of other funders, including the charities.

National Standards Framework for Children

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he proposes to publish his substantive National Standards Framework for Children. [134772]

Dr. Ladyman: The national service framework for children, young people and maternity services will be published in 2004.

NHS Integrated Care System

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the results have been of the Gateway reviews of the NHS Integrated Care System. [136628]

Mr. Hutton: New and large scale procurement projects in central Government are subject to gateway reviews. The process examines a project at critical stages to provide assurance that it can progress successfully to the next stage. The review provides project teams with advice and guidance from fellow practitioners and in order to maintain the integrity of the advice, this is held to be completely confidential by both parties. The gateway review process is not an audit.

Recommendations are made to the senior responsible officer on good practice in key areas such as programme management, risk management and involving key stakeholders. The national programme is implementing any recommendations which arise from each stage in the gateway review.

The national information technology programme is fully committed to external reviews being undertaken on a timely basis.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many man hours he estimates will be required to input a record for each NHS patient into the Integrated Care System; and who will be responsible for this work. [134287]

Mr. Hutton: Data and information is already keyed in on multiple systems and on multiple occasions.

The efficiency savings will be generated through data and information being keyed in once only. This will result in a net saving to the time required on record keeping and maintenance.

The integrated care records service is not about entering historical data but about improving the capture, use and quality of current data and future support to patient care.

North Bristol Trusts (Chief Executive)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was paid to the former Chief Executive of North Bristol Trusts on his departure in December 2002; and if he will make a statement. [135404]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 30 October 2003]: North Bristol National Health Service Trust made a payment to its former chief executive upon his resignation, the total value of which was £70,961 (gross); the net value of this to the employee following deductions for tax/national insurance etc was £54,576.60. The payment was considered and approved by the trust's remuneration committee in line with its terms of reference.

Nurse Prescribing

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether persons on nurse prescribing courses can be individually funded; [136163]

Ms Rosie Winterton [holding answer 4 November 2003]: The Department has made funds available to work force development confederations to train nurses in prescribing. It is for the confederation, in consultation with local National Health Service employers, to determine how to use the funds available to them.

PAF PI D43

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how long people waited for services in the last five years to be provided after their first contact as recorded in PAF PI D43, broken down by (a) age and (b) length of wait. [130875]

Dr. Ladyman: There is insufficient data available to answer this question in full, as national estimates on waiting times are available only for 2001–02.

The estimated length of time between first contact and first service for new clients aged 18 and over for the year 2001–02 and the relevant percentages for each time band, are shown in the table, broken down by age group.

We are unable to provide any estimated figures for England 2000–01 as only 52 local authorities provided data for the relevant return. Data for years previous to 2000–01 were not collected.

Orthotics

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what the results of the Orthotics Pathfinder project were; and what the cost of the project was; [135276]

(2) whether it is his policy that the model of the Orthotics Pathfinder project will be introduced across the NHS. [135277]

Mr. Hutton: The report of the Orthotics pathfinder project will be published in January 2004 and its policy implications will need to be considered. The total cost of the project was approximately £400,000 over a period of three and a half years. Most of this cost was to fund the changes in service provision, whose effectiveness the project was evaluating.

Patient Power Programme

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on progress towards the Patient Power programme; what targets have been set; and what the (a) deadlines and (b) baselines are for these targets. [128906]

Mr. Hutton: Patient bedside televisions and telephones have been well received by patients and staff. The national health service and private sector suppliers are to be congratulated on the rapid progress being made, which to date is bringing over £100 million of investment into the NHS, and giving patients access to improved communications.

Patient bedside televisions and telephones are operational in 95 hospitals, including 76 major facilities. We want all major hospitals to at least have a contract agreed by the end of 2003, and to have the system installed by the end of 2004. The exception will be a small number of hospitals with public finance initiative schemes which will install the system as their new hospitals come on line. We have also worked with suppliers in order to enable them to introduce the system to smaller sites, so as many NHS patients as possible can have access to the service.

Pharmacies

Brian Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many fully qualified pharmacists are working in pharmacies that provide services for more than 100 hours per week; and if he will make a statement; [135398]

(2) how many pharmacies in England are open for more than 100 hours per week; and if he will make a statement. [135399]

Ms Rosie Winterton [holding answer 30 October 2003]: The information requested is not held centrally. However, as at March 2002, out of a total of 9,756 national health service community pharmacies in England, 1,524, or 15.6 per cent., received payment for extended opening hours either before 0900 hours or after 1730 hours on Monday to Saturday (or after 1300 hours on an early closing day). 4,015, or 41.2 per cent., received payment for opening on Sundays or on public holidays.

We are currently consulting on a range of measures to modernise the regulatory system which governs whether or not a community pharmacy can dispense NHS prescriptions. As well as maintaining and improving access to pharmacies in all our communities and continuing to raise standards for patients, the aim is to make the system more business friendly, to provide more certainty and reliability for the companies who depend on it and to make the process less time-consuming. The measures include a proposal to exempt from the current restrictions applications from pharmacies which intend to open more than 100 hours a week, provided they provide a full and prescribed range of services, appropriate to local needs, determined by the NHS primary care trust. Full details are given in the consultation document, "Proposals to reform and modernise the NHS (Pharmaceutical Services) Regulations 1992", published on 29 August 2003 and available on the Department's website at www.doh.gov.uk/pharmacyregulationconsultation.

Comments can be sent, by 21 November 2003, to Peter Dunlevy, Pharmacy and Prescriptions Branch, Department of Health, Room 155 Richmond House, 79 Whitehall, London SW1A 2NS or e-mailed to peter.dunlevy@doh.gsi.gov.uk.

Research and Development

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the national health service research and development programme was last inspected; and when it is next due to be inspected. [133932]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Department issued a research governance framework for health and social care in 2001. It brought together standards and statements of good practice against which national health service research and development programmes can in future be inspected. In 2002 and 2003, those NHS bodies involved in research reported to the Department on progress against an implementation plan.

In 2004, it is intended that research governance will be one of the controls assurance standards for the NHS. The standard will provide a common point of reference for strategic health authorities' performance management of research governance, and for the Commission for Healthcare Audit and Inspection to take into account in its assessments.

Subject to legislation, the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency will from 2004 have statutory responsibility for inspecting NHS and other sites where clinical trials involving medicinal products are conducted.

Sick Leave

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many sick leave days were taken in each London NHS Trust by (a) doctors, (b) nurses, (c) other health professionals and (d) other employees in (i) 1988, (ii) 1993, (iii) 1998 and (iv) for the most recent period available; and if he will make a statement. [135153]

Mr. Hutton: National data on sickness absence levels in the national health service have been collected only since 1999. Information on working days lost in the NHS due to sickness of less than three days duration is not held centrally, but may be available from individual NHS employers.

Action is being taken across the NHS to reduce sickness absence levels. A national improvement target has been set for all NHS employers to reduce sickness absence levels by 30 per cent. by 2003.

Sexual Health

Mr. John Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health who is responsible for matters of sexual health for the Birmingham and Black Country Strategic Health Authority area; and whether that authority has plans for the development of paediatric services. [135885]

Dr. Ladyman: The medical director of the Birmingham and the Black Country Strategic Health Authority (SHA) is responsible for sexual health services in that area. The SHA is in the process of setting up a clinical network to support development of these services.

The SHA is currently working on its strategic framework, to be completed for full consultation by the end March 2004. Children's services are being addressed as part of that.

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many teenagers were treated for sexually transmitted diseases in the (a) Eastbourne and (b) Surrey and Sussex Health Authority in each of the last 10 years. [133383]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Information about the number of teenagers treated for sexually transmitted diseases is available only at health authority level, and is collected based on the residency of patients. This is shown in the tables.

Data have been provided only since 1995–96 as, prior to 1995, the coding of diagnoses was different and so data would not be comparable.

Notes:
1. The figures for 1995–96 are based on old health authority areas.
2. Admissions are defined as the first period of in-patient care under one consultant within one health care provider. They do not represent the number of in-patients, as a person may have more than one admission within the year.
3. The primary diagnosis is the first of up to 14 (seven prior to 2002–03) diagnosis fields in the Hospital Episode Statistics (HES) data set and provides the main reason why the patient was in hospital.
4. Figures are grossed for both coverage and missing/invalid clinical data, except for 2001–02, which is not yet adjusted for shortfalls.

Smoking

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of smoking-related deaths were due to (a) lung cancer, (b) heart attack, (c) stroke and (d) chronic lung disease in 2002. [133924]

Miss Melanie Johnson: These data are not available in the form requested. However, an estimate of the proportion of deaths in the United Kingdom that were caused by smoking was made by the Health Education Authority in its 1998 report: "The UK Smoking Epidemic: Deaths in 1995". The table shows the proportions of all deaths caused by smoking for each of these diseases for people aged 35 and over.

Estimated number and percentage of deaths caused by smoking: United Kingdom, 1995

Disease	Number of deaths	Percentage of total (net) deaths
Total (net)	121,700	100
Total (gross)	123,000
Deaths from diseases caused by smoking:
Cancer	46,500	38
Respiratory	34,300	28
Circulatory	40,300	33
Digestive	1,900	2

Note:
The percentages add up to 101 per cent. because the percentages have been based on the net total number of deaths. The net number of deaths takes into account the estimated number of deaths which may be prevented in part by smoking.

Urinary Tract Infections

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the Chief Medical Officer's strategy for tackling healthcare associated infections will address catheter-associated urinary tract infections; and if he will make a statement. [134195]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Chief Medical Officer's strategy will be published shortly and will set out actions aimed at controlling all healthcare associated infections.

Walk-in Centres

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 58W, to the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Evan Harris), on walk-in centres, what protocol covers whether clinical information should be shared with a patient's general practitioner. [133402]

Mr. Hutton: National health service walk-in centres are expected to work with their local Caldicott Guardian and are bound by the Data Protection Act 1998 and the Access to Health Records Act 1990.

Worcestershire Royal Hospital

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the deficit at the Worcestershire Royal Hospital; and what timetable he has agreed for its repayment. [135498]

Dr. Ladyman: The West Midlands South Strategic Health Authority is currently developing a financial strategy, with the Worcestershire Acute Hospitals national health services trust and the three primary care trusts within Worcestershire, to address the financial challenges affecting the local health economy.

In line with NHS finance regulations it is intended that Worcestershire Acute Hospitals NHS trust will return to recurrent financial balance within three years.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Early-years Education

Stephen Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what percentage of three and four year-olds are receiving nursery or full time education. [135008]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 30 October 2003]: Around 96 per cent. of the three and four-year-old population in England receives funded early years education provided by a maintained school, a private and voluntary provider or an independent school in January 2003.

We have made the commitment that by April 2004, six months ahead of our original target, all three-year-olds whose parents want one, will have access to a free, part-time early education place. Around 88 per cent. of three-year-olds are now benefiting from free early education.

The latest figures on early years provision in England were published by the Department in the Statistical First Release 15/2003 "Provision For Children Under Five Years Of Age In England—January 2003 (Provisional)", copies of which are available from the Library and the Department's website, www.dfes.gov.uk/statistics.

Education Provision (Bath and North East Somerset)

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how much money Bath and North East Somerset received in total capital funds from central government in (a) 1996–97 and (b) 2003–04; and if he will list the main components of that spending. [136318]

Mr. Miliband: The following table sets out the capital allocations made by this Government to Bath and North East Somerset local education authority (LEA) and its schools in 1996–97 and 2003–04. The LEA determines investment of these funds by prioritising the capital requirements of its schools in an asset management plan.

[1] Figures for 2003–04 are to date.

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) what the pupil-computer ratio was in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in Bath and North East Somerset in (i) 1997 and (ii) 2003; [136335]

(2) how many computers there were in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in Bath and North East Somerset in (i) 1997 and (ii) 2003. [136336]

Mr. Miliband: Information on the pupil-computer ratio and the number of computers in schools is not available in the form requested. Figures for England, which were derived from a sample of schools, are shown in the table.

Average number of computers per school and average number of pupils[1] per computer (used solely or mainly for teaching and learning purposes) by type of school—England—1998 and 2003 (position as at 31 March)

The latest information on ICT in schools was published in Statistical Bulletin "Survey of Information and Communications Technology in Schools 2003", which is available on the Department's website www.dfes.gov.uk/statistics.

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many (a) three-year-olds and (b) four-year-olds were in receipt of free nursery education in Bath and North East Somerset in (i) 1997 and (ii) 2003; and if he will estimate what proportion of the local three-year-old population these figures represent. [136337]

Mr. Miliband: Information is not available in the form requested. The available information is shown in the table.

Number[1] of three and four-year-olds taking up free early education places that are fully funded—Bath and North East Somerset Local Education Authority area 1997 and 2002 (position in January each year)

	1997	2002
Three-year-olds	[2]310	730
Four-year-olds	1,700	1,800

[1] Part-time equivalent number of children.
[2] Only includes three-year-olds attending maintained nursery and primary schools. (There was no Nursery Education Grant available for places for three-year-olds in 1997.)

In every local education authority area, there is an early education place for every four year old whose parents want one in either the maintained, private or voluntary sector. We have made the commitment that by April 2004, six months ahead of our original target, all three-year-olds whose parents want one, will have access to a free, part-time early education place.

Latest figures on three-year-olds and four-year-olds in early years providers were published by the Department in the Statistical Bulletin 'Provision for Children under five years of age in England—January 2002' (08/02) in December 2002, a copy of which is available from the Library. An electronic copy of this publication is also available on the Department's website (www.dfes.gov.uk/statistics).

Education Provision (East Riding)

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what percentage of children in (a) the Haltemprice and Howden constituency, (b) the East Riding of Yorkshire and (c) England remained in education after the completion of their GCSEs in each year since 1997. [136468]

Mr. Miliband: Data on the percentage of students staying on in full-time education and education and training is not calculated for areas smaller than LEAs, as reliable estimates cannot be made.

The percentage of 16-year-olds participating in full-time education, and in education and training, in East Riding of Yorkshire Local Education Authority and in England for end 1997 to end 2000, the latest available year, are shown in the table.

Participation by 16-year-olds

	End 1997	End 1998	End 1999	End 2000
Full-time education
East Riding of Yorkshire	70	71	72	74
England	70	70	71	71
Education and training
East Riding of Yorkshire	[1]n/a	88	87	87
England	84	83	83	83

[1] Education and training figures by LEA were first published for 1998.

Participation rates by LEA for 16 and 17-year-olds are published in an annual statistical bulletin, "Participation in Education and Training by Young People Aged 16 and 17 in Each Local Area and Region, England".

GCSE Syllabuses

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what discussions he has had with examination boards about the compliance of GCSE syllabuses on child care and child development with the WHO International Code of Marketing of Breast Milk Substitutes. [135079]

Mr. Miliband: The responsibility for determining the content of GCSE syllabuses lies with the regulatory authority—the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority (QCA)—and the awarding bodies. I have asked the QCA to consider whether the provisions of the WHO International Code of Marketing of Breast Milk Substitutes are adequately reflected in the awarding bodies' GCSE child care related syllabuses. The Chief Executive of QCA will advise you of the outcome in due course.

Key Stage Tests

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of children in Bath and North East Somerset in (a) 1996–97 and (b) 2002–03 gained Level 4 or above in their Key Stage 2 tests in (i) English and (ii) mathematics. [136315]

Mr. Miliband: The percentage of pupils achieving Level 4 or above at Key Stage 2 in Bath and North East Somerset in (a) 1997 and (b) 2003 in (i) English and (ii) mathematics are as follows:

Percentage

	English	Mathematics
1997
Bath and North East Somerset	68	66
England	63	62
2003 (provisional)
Bath and North East Somerset	78	76
England	75	73

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many children in Bath and North East Somerset in 2002–03 were eligible to sit Key Stage 2 tests. [136342]

Mr. Miliband: The total number of children in Bath and North East Somerset who were eligible to sit Key Stage 2 tests were:

2003 (provisional): 1,811

2002: 1,801.

Local Education Authority Expenditure

Michael Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how much the target transitional grant for Staffordshire local education authority will be in the next two years; and what arrangements have been made for the provision of the grant. [136166]

Mr. Miliband: Details of the transitional support package for 2004–05 and 2005–06, including the arrangements for paying the targeted grant, will be published at the time of the provisional Local Government Finance Settlement later this month.

On 29 October the government published indicative figures for the targeted grant in 2004–05, which have been placed in the Library of the House. These assumed that grant would be available to authorities whose increase in Education Formula Spending and relevant DfES grant between 2002–03 and 2004–05 would otherwise be less than 12 per cent. per pupil. The increase in Staffordshire LEA is expected to be above 12 per cent. per pupil over the relevant period, which means it would not be eligible for the targeted grant.

However, if Staffordshire or any other LEA is able to put forward a compelling case that additional, transitional funds are needed in the short term—above and beyond those already available to the LEA—my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be prepared to consider bringing forward grant payments from my department, so that the LEA will have funds available in 2004–05 for this purpose, with the expectation of a consequential reduction to what they will receive in future years. The maximum amount that might be made available in this way would be a maximum of £300,000 per authority, or 0.2 per cent. of the authority's total education resources in 2004–05, if that is higher. For Staffordshire, 0.2 per cent. of its education resources would be over £800,000.

Ofsted Inspections

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the trends in the percentage of Year 10 and 11 lessons inspected by Ofsted and recorded as set by ability in (a) history, (b) geography, (c) modern languages, (d) science and (e) English between 1996 and 2002. [133829]

Mr. Miliband: The following tables show the percentages of lessons that inspectors recorded as setted by ability by subject in each year for pupils in years 10 and 11. These data are among the background information which are collected by inspectors to assist them in making judgments about standards achieved in schools and are not part of a representative survey of the use of setting by schools.

The table figures provide a useful indicative picture of the use of setting across subjects, with setting being used in the vast majority of schools in mathematics, more than three-quarters of schools in science, and between half and three quarters of schools in English and modern foreign languages. A more detailed study, undertaken over a number of years with a consistent sample of schools, would be needed to enable secure judgments to be made about trends.

Qualifications

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what programmes are sponsored by his Department to ensure that (a) higher educational courses and (b) vocational training are responsive to forecast demand in the labour market. [136031]

Alan Johnson: There are a number of programmes that are responding to forecast labour market demands. In higher education they include: the expansion of Foundation Degrees, New Technology Institutes (NTI), the Teaching Quality Enhancement Fund, Aimhigher and the Enhancing Student Employability Co-ordination Team (ESECT).

In terms of vocational training, programmes such as Modern Apprenticeships and Advanced Modern Apprenticeships are designed to meet existing and future labour market needs. The Higher Education Funding Council and the Learning and Skills Council are working closely with the Skills for Business network and Regional Development Agencies to ensure that vocational qualifications meet the needs of local, regional and national labour markets. Further information is included in 21st Century Skills: Realising our Potential.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many of the vocational training programmes recognised by his Department are structured in such a way that it is possible by undertaking additional further courses of study to obtain a degree level qualification. [136032]

Alan Johnson: All programmes at Level 3 in the National Qualifications Framework have the potential to allow students to undertake further courses of study to obtain a degree level qualification.

In particular reformed Advanced Modern Apprenticeship frameworks now include technical certificates. These are taken in addition to NVQ at Level 3 to assess underpinning occupational knowledge. Their inclusion in frameworks now allows for easier progression to higher education for those with the aptitude to do so.

We are also expanding the number of Foundation Degrees available, with 10,000 extra places from next year. These are new qualifications and provide opportunities for individuals to progress to full honours degrees.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the evidential basis is for the statement in the Higher Education White paper that 80 per cent. of future jobs will require education to level 4. [136456]

Alan Johnson: The White Paper stated that:

'Between 1999 and 2010 the number of jobs in higher level occupations – the ones most likely to be filled by those who have been through higher education – will grow by over one and a half million. That represents 80 per cent. of new jobs over the decade'.

This forecast is based on work carried out by the Institute for Employment Research in 2001: 'Projections of Occupations and Qualifications 2000/01: Research in Support of the National Skills Task Force', Department for Education and Employment. The research estimated that out of the 2.1 million new jobs expected to be created between 1999 and 2010, 1.7 million (or 80 per cent.) will be in the top three occupational groups. These are the jobs which require the sorts of skills that can be acquired through Higher Education.

Teaching Assistants

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what measures are being taken to ensure that the phrase teaching assistants includes (a) supervisors working with classes of children without the presence of a teacher and (b) others employed under paragraph 10 of Schedule 2 to Statutory Instrument 1663 employed to undertake specified work and that these are recorded separately from those who already appear in the teachers tables of the school workforce statistics when these figures are next collected from schools and local education authorities. [136303]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 4 November 2003]: Guidance to LEAs completing the Annual Survey of Teacher Numbers and Vacancies (618G) in January 2004 will make clear that support staff who may be providing cover supervision, or who may be carrying out specified work without a teacher present under the conditions set out in the regulations, should continue to be counted separately from teachers. We would expect most of these to be counted as teaching assistants in the Annual Schools Census, but often support staff in schools undertake more than one role. We are also considering what further categorisation we might introduce for the 2005 school census.

The Workforce Agreement Monitoring Group will continue to monitor developments in the strategies used by schools to deal effectively with teacher absence as part of its wider role in overseeing the implementation of the National Agreement on raising standards and tackling workload.

Trainee Teachers

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the additional financial support offered to trainee teachers since 1997. [136432]

Mr. Miliband: Since 1998, full tuition fee remission has been available to most postgraduate trainee teachers in England. In 1999, the Government announced a further package of support which consisted of a payment of £2,500 for people taking Postgraduate Certificate in Education courses in mathematics and science and a further £2,500 payable on appointment to a relevant post in the same subjects.

These payments were superseded in September 2000 when the Government introduced £6,000 training bursaries for eligible postgraduate trainee teachers and £4,000 Golden Hellos for those going on to teach one of five priority subjects in a maintained school in England. These incentives have been reinforced by the Repayment of Teachers' Loans pilot scheme, introduced in September 2002 for new teachers of priority subjects.

These measures have contributed to an increase of over 5,000 in the number of recruits to courses of Initial Teacher Training between 1998/99 and 2002/03.

Student Finance

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what research he has commissioned on the principal alternative models for (a) university finance and (b) student funding. [136454]

Alan Johnson: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 30 October 2003, Official Report, column 429, in which I cited the work the Government had done on the principal alternative options considered in the Higher Education Review for student finance and university funding—namely, an increase in flat-rate fees, a graduate tax and real rates of interest on student loans.

In addition, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills wrote a letter on this issue to my hon. Friend for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) on two separate occasions, on 11 April and 3 June 2003; both copies are placed in the House Library.

Work Placement

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what reports he has received on health and safety related to trainees on placement; and how experience is disseminated among learning and skills councils. [134279]

Mr. Ivan Lewis [holding answer 29 October 2003]: The Secretary of State receives individual accident reports on trainees injured while on work placement. The Learning Skills Council also report on health and safety issues as part of regular performance reviews with Ministers. They have their own internal arrangements for sharing information with local offices. Mark Haysom, the Chief Executive of the LSC, will write to my hon. Friend with further details of these arrangements and a copy of his reply will be placed in the House of Commons Library.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Cemeteries

Andrew Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in implementing the Government response to the Transport, Local Government and the Regions Committee Report on Cemeteries. [133899]

Paul Goggins: We are planning to publish a public consultation document on reform of the burial laws shortly. We have now completed a pilot survey of burial grounds, and expect to launch the main survey soon. We are also currently considering the publication of a report on the research carried out last year. Guidance on cemetery management and memorial safety is well in hand.

Anti-social Behaviour Orders

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Anti-Social Behaviour Orders have been (a) applied for and (b) granted in each district council within County Durham. [134649]

Ms Blears: Information is given in the table on the number of notifications, as reported to the Home Office, of Anti-Social Behaviour Orders (ASBOs) applied for and issued within the County of Durham from 1 April 1999 up to 30 June 2003 (latest available).

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been refused support by the National Asylum Support Service under section 55 of the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002; and what reports he has received about the length of time these people had been in the United Kingdom before claiming support. [135452]

Beverley Hughes: Section 55 of the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002 came into force on 8 January 2003, restricting the availability of National Asylum Support Service (NASS) support to those asylum seekers who make an asylum application as soon as reasonably practicable.

Of the total (4,365) cases referred to NASS for a Section 55 decision in the first quarter of 2003, 2,850 were refused NASS support on the grounds that their claims were not made as soon as reasonably practicable.

Of the total (3,110) cases referred to NASS for a Section 55 decision in the second quarter of 2003, 1,830 were refused NASS support on the grounds that their claims were not made as soon as reasonably practicable.

Information on how long these applicants had been in the United Kingdom before making an asylum claim is not held centrally.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with (a) local authorities and (b) service providers about the provision of housing for asylum seekers when the current contracts expire; and if he will make a statement. [135461]

Beverley Hughes: The Immigration and Nationality Directorate is in the process of developing a strategy which will determine the procurement of accommodation post 2005 when the majority of its current accommodation contracts expire. Local authorities, private sector accommodation providers, voluntary sector agencies, lobby groups and a number of Government Departments are all being consulted about the development of this strategy.

Cannabis

Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will announce his decision on the use of cannabis for medicinal purposes. [136220]

Caroline Flint: The Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency has yet to complete its evaluation of the safety, quality and effectiveness of the medical preparation of a cannabis-based drug developed and tested by GW Pharmaceuticals.

Once marketing approval has been received, we will move without delay to seek Parliament's agreement to any necessary changes to the misuse of drugs legislation. Our aim is to ensure ready and early availability of the drug as a prescribed medicine.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the sources of cannabis entering the UK; and what has been done to combat the amounts of cannabis imported. [136266]

John Healey: I have been asked to reply.

Current assessments of the source of cannabis entering the EU and UK are contained in 'The European Monitoring Centre for Drugs and Drug Addiction (EMCDDA) Annual Report 2003'; 'Tackling Drugs Communications and Campaign Pack' published by the Home Office and 'Cannabis—An Update 1999–2002' by Professor D. J. Nutt and Dr. J. R. Nash. Copies of these are published at www.emcdda.eu.int and www.drugs.gov.uk.

Customs enforce the import prohibition which applies to cannabis and seizure data is published annually in their Annual Report. In 2001–02 Customs seized over 67 tonnes of cannabis.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his policy on declassifying cannabis; and what assessment he has made of the impact of declassification on cannabis consumption. [136269]

Caroline Flint: The Government believe that all controlled drugs, including cannabis, are harmful and that no one should take them. But our drug laws and our educational messages to young people must reflect the relative harms of drugs, in accordance with the available scientific and medical advice, if they are to be credible, convincing and, ultimately, effective.

The Government's proposal to reclassify cannabis to Class C—in line with the recommendation of the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs and of the Home Affairs Select Committee—will help us to convey a more open, honest and balanced educational message—to young people in particular—about the dangers of misusing illegal drugs.

Reclassification of cannabis is also designed to continue to deter use of the drug, because of its continued illegality, while enabling the police to put in place a consistent regime for policing cannabis, in line with the Association of Chief Police Officers' cannabis enforcement guidance. This will allow the police to redeploy resources to tackling more serious offences, including dealing in Class A drugs, like heroin and crack cocaine, which do the most harm.

The Government will seek to make an impact on the current level of cannabis use by launching an educational and advertising campaign in January aimed at young people, making it clear how the law will operate in practice and seeking to dissuade them from experimenting with cannabis. We are also taking a tough line with dealers.

Crime Statistics

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the effect of the adoption of the National Crime Recording Standard on the capacity to compare crime statistics with previous years' performance. [135279]

Ms Blears: It is difficult to make valid comparisons of recorded crime statistics over time owing to changes in police recording, the latest being the introduction of the National Crime Recording Standard (NCRS) in April 2002. However, the adoption of the NCRS by all forces will establish a fairer and more consistent basis upon which future crime statistics can be interpreted, both nationally and between police forces.

In order to provide a more realistic picture of crime levels, the Home Office has conducted a full evaluation of the estimated impact of the NCRS at a national and force level for 2002–03. More detailed information about the methodology can be found at http://www.homeoffice.gov.Uk/rds/pdfs2/rdsolr3103.pdf. The study concluded that overall the crimes counted in 2002–03 were approximately 10 per cent. higher than they would have been under pre-NCRS recording practices.

Additionally, it is important to note that findings from the British Crime Survey, which is the most authoritative source on crime trends (and which has not been affected by changes to police recording practices) enable trends in crime over the last 20 years to be identified on a reliable basis.

Crime Statistics (Avon and Somerset)

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many drug dealers were convicted in Avon and Somerset in (a) 1997, (b) 2002 and (c) 2003. [136324]

Caroline Flint: The table contains data from the Home Office Court Appearances and Cautions Drugs Database showing the number of drug dealers in the Avon and Somerset Police force area brought to justice in the years 1996 to 2000 (the latest year available). The term 'brought to justice' has been taken to mean cautioned or found guilty of 'dealing' in drugs. "Dealing" has been taken mean drug trafficking, that is: to include possession with intent to supply, unlawful supply, unlawful production and unlawful import/export.

Drug dealers brought to justice in Avon and Somerset police force area, 1996 to 2000

	Number of dealers
1996	340
1997	360
1998	350
1999	330
2000	310

These data are taken from the annual Home Office Statistical Bulletin "Drug Seizure and Offender Statistics, UK 2000", which is available on the RDS website and in the Library http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/pdfs2/hosb402.pdf.

Drugs

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent assessment he has made of the effectiveness of anti-drugs campaigns in (a) the United States and (b) other EU countries. [134837]

Caroline Flint: The issue of drugs is common to many countries. However trends in drug use differ form one country to the next. It is therefore difficult to make comparisons between Britain and other countries.

Part of the development of the "Frank" drugs campaign currently running in England and Wales was an assessment of the effectiveness of campaigns in the United States and in European Union member states. These supported the findings of research in this country that campaigns that aim to shock have at best limited success, because potential users do not associate themselves with the messages. What is needed instead is reliable information and advice for personal contacts of potential users and for potential users themselves. The Frank campaign has been designed in that light.

Dungavel Removal Centre

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his response is to the Report by Her Majesty's Inspector of Prisons on Dungavel Removal Centre; and if he will make a statement. [135438]

Beverley Hughes: We welcomed the publication of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons' inspection report on Dungavel Removal Centre. We were pleased to see that the report concluded that Dungavel was essentially a place of safety where detainees were treated with respect and received a good standard of custodial care. The report contains a number of recommendations and we are considering these carefully. We will respond formally to Her Majesty's Chief Inspector shortly.

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department why Fatima Muse was fined by staff at Dungavel Removal Centre on 27 August after hiding food in her room; under what power this was done; and if he will make a statement. [135439]

Beverley Hughes: Detainees at Dungavel Removal Centre are not fined. They benefit from an incentive scheme that provides them with a weekly cash allowance provided their behaviour and conduct is satisfactory. In the case of unsatisfactory behaviour, a warning letter will be issued and, if the detainee's behaviour does not improve, consideration will be given to withdrawing the weekly allowance. Unsatisfactory behaviour may include breaches of the centre rules on hygiene or health and safety. Detainees taking food from the dining room to their rooms would constitute such a breach. In the case in question, a warning letter was issued in respect of a number of separate matters but the detainee's weekly allowance was not in fact withdrawn.

Ethnic Monitoring System

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what published reports have been produced by Government (a) departments and (b) agencies using information gathered through an approved statutory ethnic monitoring system. [135773]

Beverley Hughes: The information requested is not immediately available. We are currently seeking this information. I will write to the hon. Member as soon as this information has been received and collated.

HMP Leyhill

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners have absconded from HMP Leyhill in the last 12 months for which figures are available; how many of these have not been recaptured; and if he will place in the Library for each absconder in the last year a list of (a) the original offence for which they were imprisoned, (b) their original sentence and (c) the average length of their outstanding sentence. [134996]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 28 October 2003]: Leyhill is an open category D training establishment containing adult males mostly from the South West Area, although many transfer from other establishments after their recategorisation to category D. Leyhill also holds life sentence prisoners, allocated nationally.

Eighty-two prisoners absconded from Leyhill between 1 November 2002 and 24 October 2003. Of these 19 have not yet been recaptured. Table 1 lists for each absconder the offence for which he was imprisoned, the sentence and the length of sentence outstanding between the date of abscond and the expected release date. For prisoners other than life sentenced prisoners the average period for the time from date of abscond to expected release date was 10 months. Table 2 shows the changes in population, and the number of time served prisoners who were discharged from Leyhill in the last 12 months.

Home Detention Curfews

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners have been released from prison on the Home Detention Curfew scheme since the introduction of presumptive release. [135014]

Paul Goggins: The total number of home detention curfew (HOC) releases from 1 May 2002, when the presumptive scheme was introduced, to 30 April 2003 is recorded as 21,928, of which 11,259 were from sentences of under a year.

Immigration

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects a decision to be made on the application by (a) Mrs. Geraldine Marchant and (b) her daughter Ms Martina Rhule, Ref:M1012795, for indefinite leave to remain in the United Kingdom. [135311]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 30 October 2003]: A decision in respect of both applicants should be made within the next two months.

Information Technology

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much the Police Service spent on purchasing and upgrading IT equipment (a) in 2003 and (b) in 2002; and what this cost per police officer. [135896]

Ms Blears: The information is set out in the table.

John Tero

Ms Keeble: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what the terms of reference are of the independent clinical review of the case of the late Mr. John Tero; [134617]

(2) who is carrying out the independent clinical review of the late Mr. John Tero's care in prison; [134618]

(3) when he expects the independent clinical review into the case of the late Mr. John Tero to report; [134619]

(4) what evidence is being considered in the independent clinical review of the case of the late Mr. John Tero. [134620]

Paul Goggins: I was sorry to learn of Mr. Tero's death. The Prison Service has asked Dr. Joseph Blackburn, a General Practitioner and Clinical Governance lead for North Surrey Primary Care Trust, to undertake a clinical review of this. He was given the following terms of reference:

"In respect to the care of Mr John Tero during his period in custody at Her Majesty's Prison Woodhill and Her Majesty's Prison Wymott:

Was the care post Transurethral Resection of the Prostate (TURP) satisfactory and equivalent to care in the NHS?

Was the care of his gastric symptoms satisfactory and equivalent to care in the NHS, including with regard to:

the clinical recordings of the patient's weight.

referral and attendance at hospital appointments?

Would any of above have affected the prognosis?"

The Prison Service expects Dr. Blackburn to consider any evidence which he feels is relevant to these terms of reference. The Prison Service expects to receive Dr. Blackburn's report in November.

Miscarriages of Justice

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people are waiting for admittance to the compensation for miscarriages of justice scheme. [133539]

Paul Goggins: There are currently 58 applicants waiting the determination of their eligibility for compensation under section 133 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (the statutory scheme) or under the ex-gratia arrangements announced by the then Home Secretary (Douglas Hurd) in his statement to the House of Commons on 29 November 1985.

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people who have served under 20 years in prison before being released due to a miscarriage of justice are waiting for admittance to the compensation for miscarriages of justice scheme. [133570]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 21 October 2003]: This information is not readily available. The length of time spent in prison following a wrongful conviction is not a matter that affects a decision on eligibility for compensation. This only becomes a factor when the level of award for a successful applicant is assessed. Consequently, those wrongfully convicted, or their representatives, do not always provide custody details with their initial applications for compensation.

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he is taking to ensure that prompt mental health assessments are available for victims of miscarriages of justice. [133572]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 21 October 2003]: The Home Office funded Royal Courts of Justice Citizens Advice Bureau Miscarriage of Justice Project supports prisoners who have their convictions referred back to the Court of Appeal by the Criminal Cases Review Commission in the period leading up to their release and for up to six months after. This service would extend to providing advice on obtaining any necessary medical assistance.

Psychiatric and other medical reports are often provided by successful claimants for compensation for miscarriage of justice in support of the non-pecuniary loss element of their claim when it is alleged that the claimant's health/mental health has been affected by their period in prison. While the onus is on the applicant to provide such reports to substantiate the particular element of their claim, the cost in obtaining them will be considered when the final award is being assessed.

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average waiting time for admittance to the compensation for miscarriages of justice scheme over the last 12 months was. [133573]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 21 October 2003]: In the 12 months to September 2003, the average time taken to determine eligibility for compensation under section 133 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (the statutory scheme) or under the ex-gratia arrangements announced by the then Home Secretary (Douglas Hurd) in his statement to the House of Commons on 29 November 1985 was 182 days.

North Wales Police

Ian Lucas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) staff, (b) civilian staff and (c) police officers have been recruited by North Wales Police in each of the last three years for which figures are available. [134509]

Ms Blears: The number of police officers in North Wales Police was 1,607 at 31 August 2003, an increase of 238 since March 1997. The number of police staff at 31 March 2003 was 703, an increase of 227 since 31 March 1997. Figures for the recruitment of police staff are not collected centrally. Those for police officers are set in the table.

	Police officers recruitment
2000–01	119
2001–02	90
2002–03	1,331

Note:
March 2003 figures are not comparable to previous recruitment figures as data includes transfers from England and Wales forces and officers returning after a period of secondment.

Driving Offences

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to increase the number of penalty points required to be incurred by drivers leading to an automatic ban; and if he will make a statement. [136182]

Ms Blears: Drivers can expect to be disqualified from driving if they acquire 12 penalty points. The Government have no plans to increase this trigger level.

People Trafficking

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the need for the introduction of safe houses in Leicestershire for (a) women and (b) children rescued from traffickers involved in the illegal sex trade. [134356]

Caroline Flint: The Government has acknowledged that provision needs to be made for the victims of trafficking, in whichever part of the country they may live. It is intended that any victim support measures should be available in due course for all victims of trafficking.

The best information we have about possible number of victims of trafficking in the United Kingdom comes from research published in the report—Stopping Traffic (2002). This estimated that anything between 140 and 1,400 were trafficked annually into the UK for purposes of sexual exploitation.

At present the majority of known trafficking cases are in London and surrounding areas—this is where the service delivery partner is based and have developed their specialist services. Additionally pro-active policing by the Metropolitan Police is uncovering numbers of victims of trafficking in London also.

There is growing evidence to suggest this is a national problem and it seems reasonable to suppose that wherever there is a well developed vice market, there is likely to be a demand for trafficked women to work in the sex industry.

The White Paper "Secure Borders, Safe Haven"—published in February 2002—sets out our general proposals for assisting the victims of human trafficking.

On 10 March this year, we launched a pilot scheme in the London area. Under the scheme, adult female victims of human trafficking for sexual exploitation whose circumstances meet the criteria set out in the White Paper are offered protection and support provided:

The victim has been brought to the UK;

She is being forcibly exploited;

She is working as a prostitute or she demonstrates that she has escaped from the trafficker, and that in the period immediately prior to her escape she had been working as a prostitute;

She has come forward to the authorities; and;

She is willing to co-operate with the authorities.

The objectives of the pilot scheme include: to develop mechanisms that enable and ensure formal assessment of the number of victims of trafficking, the assessment of the relevance and impact of the services provided, development of a multi-disciplinary case-work model to facilitate the effective identification and assessment of victims.

Under the provisions of the Children Act 1989 minors are the responsibility of local authority social services Departments. It is not possible for minors to be admitted to the pilot scheme.

The pilot scheme will be evaluated to assess its impact. We will then consider what more we can do to help victims of trafficking.

Police

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many arrests were made by police officers in England and Wales on foot patrol in each of the last six years; and what percentage of arrests made in England and Wales this represents. [135870]

Ms Blears: Information collected centrally on the number of persons arrested for notifiable offences does not distinguish foot patrol arrests from other arrests.

Police Grant Allocation

Tony Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage floor will be set on his Department's police grant allocation; and if he will make a statement on the relationship of that floor to the police pay award. [136020]

Ms Blears: I shall announce details of the provisional police funding settlement for 2004–05 in mid November, including details of the floor and ceiling on police grant.

Prisons

Mr. Francois: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many full-time prison officers were employed by HM Prison Service in Essex on 1 September. [132631]

Paul Goggins: On 1 September 2003, there were 255 full-time prison officers, including senior officers and principal officers, employed in Essex. There were 76 at Bullwood Hall prison and young offender institution and 179 at Chelmsford prison.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the establishment of staff is at (a) Downview and (b) High Down Prisons; and how many staff were in post at each prison on 1 October. [133263]

Paul Goggins: The information requested is shown in the table. Figures are for all staff and are full time equivalent basis.

	Complement 1 October 2003	Staff in post 1 October 2003
Downview	234	186.5
High Down	481	446

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 6 October 2003, Official Report, column 1246W, on prisons, if he will assess the likelihood of the legislative and other changes listed in his answer being fully implemented within the timescales of the projections. [133554]

Paul Goggins: The prison population projections only include legislative and policy changes that have been implemented or have an agreed date for implementation. All those listed in the previous answer are expected to have delivered their full impact during the period covered by the projections apart from automatic life sentences for serious repeat offenders where the impact is expected to extend beyond June 2009. The impact beyond June 2009 is projected to be around 50 prison places. Estimates made of the impact of such changes are kept regularly under review.

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what provision is made by the Prison Service to ensure that prisons are able to fulfil their statutory duty to provide frequent and reasonable access to legal texts; [134622]

(2) how many prison libraries stock legal texts and statutes as stipulated in Prison Service Order 6710. [134623]

Paul Goggins: All prison libraries are required by their service level agreement to stock the texts stipulated in the libraries Prison Service Order. The Prison Service ensures that libraries comply with this requirement through the Standards Audit and through the annual review of the library service level agreement.

All prison Governors must ensure that libraries obtain the stipulated publications using the capitation grant provided for this purpose.

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners awaiting trial are being held more than (a) 50 and (b) 100 miles from their committal court town; [134624]

(2) how many prisoners awaiting trial were sharing cells with convicted prisoners in the last month for which figures are available. [134625]

Paul Goggins: An individual prisoner's court details are recorded to show first court appearance, committal, remand, conviction or sentencing. Information specifically on committal court details could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

On 31 August 2003, the latest date for which information is available, details were available for 7,473 prisoners, 94 per cent. of the total prison population awaiting trial. This information is shown in the following table. The number of prisoners awaiting trial who share a cell with convicted prisoners is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Prison Service rules and policy state that prisoners awaiting trial should not be required to share a cell with a convicted prisoner. Where it becomes necessary for an unconvicted prisoner to share with a convicted prisoner due to population pressures, they should only do so if they have given their consent.

Every effort is made to ensure that appropriate prisoners are located together and any such decision is made on the basis of staff judgment and experience. Steps are taken to ensure that prisoners are held safely. A full cell-sharing risk assessment procedure is carried out before prisoners are considered suitable to share a cell.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his plans for the management of prison gardens. [135467]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 30 October 2003]: There are no plans to change the existing arrangements for the management of prison gardens.

Rap Music

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of a link between violent lyrics in rap music and gun crime. [136248]

Caroline Flint: Although there has been considerable discussion about the relationship between gun crime and rap music, the Government recognises that there are many factors that can influence the incidence of gun crime. The glamorisation of violence and gun culture in music or other media aimed at young people is unacceptable, but we recognise that music can play an important part in young people's lives and be used to promote and reinforce positive images.

Reoffending

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the impact of overcrowding on the ability of an individual to participate in reoffending reduction courses. [135493]

Paul Goggins: The Prison Service keeps the impact of population pressures under review. The main threat to offending behaviour programmes stems from prisoners being transferred to another prison before completing a programme, in order to alleviate population pressures. So far this has been largely avoided. Only 1.5 per cent. of prisoners who started a cognitive skills offending behaviour programme in 2002–03 failed to complete the programme as a result of transfer (which may have been due to overcrowding or for other reasons). This is similar to the previous three years and compares with 4.8 per cent. in 1996–97.

Thames Valley Police

Tony Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his Department's targets are for the police officers per thousand ratio; what the Thames Valley Police Force's target ratio is; and to what extent his Department expects any imbalance will be addressed by the time of the 2004–05 grant allocation to Thames Valley. [136021]

Ms Blears: Thames Valley Police had record police strength of 3,965 on 31 August, which is 270 more than in March 1997. In addition the force had 2,412 police (support) staff, which is 587 more than in March 1997.

No target for ratio of police officers to 1,000 population is set. Decisions on the balance between police officers and police (support) staff is a matter for the Chief Officers of Police and will have an impact on the ratio of police officers to population in forces.

Tuberculosis (Prisons)

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many tuberculosis cases there are among the prison population; what measures are being taken to (a) identify and (b) isolate TB cases early; and what other measures are being taken to prevent transmission between inmates. [132550]

Paul Goggins: The Prison Service does not routinely collect information from establishments about the number of cases of tuberculosis among prisoners in England and Wales. It has, however, contracted the Health Protection Agency to provide a communicable disease data collection and monitoring service. As part of this contract, the London prisons will shortly begin to pilot use of a new reporting form, which will provide information on newly diagnosed cases of tuberculosis and also on people already being treated for tuberculosis when received into prison.

The Health Protection Agency also issues a Quarterly Report on Infectious Diseases in Prisons. The two most recent editions have included detailed guidance about the control of tuberculosis in prisons designed to clarify and reinforce earlier guidance to establishments. This makes it clear that all prisoners should be screened for tuberculosis on first reception by direct questioning about the particular symptoms of the disease. Where any case of tuberculosis is suspected, immediate efforts should be made to confirm the diagnosis or to make an urgent referral to the local NHS chest physician. Any prisoners with symptoms of the disease should be isolated until a diagnosis is made. The recent guidance also includes advice on notification under the Public Health (Control of Disease) Act 1984 and associated contact tracing.

West Yorkshire Police Authority

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on police officer manning levels in the West Yorkshire Police Authority area. [135876]

Ms Blears: Decisions on the balance between police officers and police (support) staff is a matter for the Chief Constable of West Yorkshire Police (Mr. Colin Cramphorn). At the end of August West Yorkshire Police had 5,169 police officers. This is 140 more than in March 2003 and 280 more than in March 2002. I understand that the force has forecast strength for 31 March 2004 at 5,286 officers. In March 2003 the force had 2,538 police (support) staff, which is 174 more than in March 2002.

Additionally, West Yorkshire Police had 96 Community Support Officers on 31 August, with plans to have 160 by March 2004.

PRIME MINISTER

Committee on Standards in Public Life

Gareth Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister when he expects to announce new appointments to the Committee on Standards in Public Life; and if he will make a statement. [137420]

The Prime Minister: I have appointed two new members to the Committee.

The right hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) DL MP takes up appointment as the Conservative Party nominee in succession to the right hon. Lord MacGregor of Pulham Market OBE. Baroness Maddock takes up appointment as the Liberal Democrat Party nominee in succession to Lord Goodhart QC. Both appointments are for three years in the first instance.

The right hon. Lord MacGregor of Pulham Market and Lord Goodhart are both stepping down from the Committee on completion of their second terms of appointment. I would like to take this opportunity to thank them both for the valuable work they have undertaken on the Committee over the last six years, and the significant contribution they have made to improving standards in public life.

Departmental Expenditure (Official Residences)

Mr. Flight: To ask the Prime Minister how much was spent on (a) maintenance, (b) renovation, (c) council tax and (d) running costs of residential properties used by the Prime Minister and officials in each year since 1997. [134696]

The Prime Minister: For running costs and the cost of maintenance, renovation and council tax of residential properties in Downing street, I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave to the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) on 22 July 2002, Official Report, column 804W, and on 28 February 2002, Official Report, columns 1443–44W.

Expenditure on routine maintenance work to the flat above No. 11 Downing street for 2001–02 was £32,949.

Final figures for 2002–03 are not yet available.

For Chequers, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for north Devon (Mr. Harvey) on 13 February 2003, Official Report, column 952W.

The annual grant for maintenance and to cover civilian staff employed at Chequers for 2002–03 was £499,817.

The Chequers Trust is responsible for paying the council tax on all Chequers estate property.

Northern Ireland

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Prime Minister (1) with whom he has communicated to try to find a way in which he can disclose certain information given to him and the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic by General de Chastelain; and what the responses have been; [136948]

(2) pursuant to his statement of 22 October 2003, Official Report, column 634, on Northern Ireland, when he expects to be able to reveal the information given to him and the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic by General de Chastelain to which he referred; and what the evidential basis was for his statement that on the basis of what he and the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic know that people would be satisfied if they knew the full details; [136949]

(3) whether during his conversation with the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic and General de Chastelain he obtained from the latter facts which were not in the General's press conferences and statement. [136950]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) at Prime Minister's Questions on 29 October 2003, Official Report, column 300.

TRANSPORT

Bus Lanes

Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will make regulations to allow cameras to be used to enforce bus lanes outside London; and if he will make a statement. [136362]

Mr. Jamieson: Section 144 of the Transport Act 2000 enables regulations to be made so that local authorities outside London can enforce bus lanes using cameras to detect vehicles being driven in them illegally. The work on the preparation of the regulations including resolving relevant legal points has taken longer than expected but the Department for Transport and the Department for Constitutional Affairs hope to be able to make the relevant regulations later this year.

MOT Testers

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to increase the number of MOT testers; and if he will make a statement. [136183]

Mr. Jamieson: None—there is no evidence to suggest that there is a shortage of qualified MOT testers. Currently there are around 19,500 MOT testing stations with 50,000 testers. There is no restriction on the number of garages that can apply to become MOT testing stations and, once designated, garages can employ as many MOT testers as they wish.

Railways

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects trains from Liverpool to London to travel at speeds of 125 mph. [136453]

Mr. McNulty [holding answer 4 November 2003]: It is expected that the modernisation of the West Coast Main Line will enable train services, including those from London to Liverpool, to travel at speeds of up to 125 mph from the autumn of 2004.

Road Safety

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the safety implications for road users of speed cameras. [136082]

Mr. Jamieson: On 11 February 2003 the Department published an independently produced evaluation report of the two-year trial of the safety camera cost recovery system. This showed a 35 per cent. reduction in those killed or seriously injured at camera sites, equating to around 280 people and a 4 per cent. reduction in those killed or seriously injured across the pilot areas, equating to around 530 people.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to introduce further regulations on the fitness of individuals to drive. [136085]

Mr. Jamieson: We have an on-going research programme into fitness to drive, the results of which will help inform the Secretary of State's Honorary Medical Advisory Panels in relation to their advice on the driver licensing standards.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he is introducing to reduce the numbers of children under the age of 16 who are killed or receive a serious head injury as a result of a cycling accident. [136422]

Mr. Jamieson: We have produced a large body of material on cycle safety aimed at younger children promoting the use of cycle helmets as well as other cycle safety messages such as conspicuity and training. We have also developed a Cycle Sense campaign aimed at teenagers that was launched on 21 May this year. The campaign encourages teenagers to wear cycle helmets and consists of posters and a new cycle sense website.

Traffic Management Bill

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will comply with the Cabinet Office's guidance on consultation when consulting on the detailed regulations which accompany the Traffic Management Bill. [136802]

Mr. McNulty: We will comply with Cabinet Office guidance when consulting on any such regulations.

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to consult the utilities companies on the detailed regulations that will accompany the Traffic Management Bill. [136803]

Mr. McNulty: We will be consulting widely not only with utility companies, but also with local authorities and other relevant bodies.

UK Airport Security

Jim Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what powers exist to authorise security staff at United Kingdom airports to examine passengers' luggage, by force if necessary, without the knowledge or consent of the passenger; and how many times they have been exercised in the past 12 months. [136796]

Mr. McNulty: Aerodrome managers and aircraft operators are directed through secondary legislation, made under the Aviation Security Act 1982, to examine passenger baggage to a standard sufficient reasonably to ensure that no prohibited articles are taken into a restricted zone or onto an aircraft. Where passengers refuse to permit such an examination, the baggage is not allowed to pass beyond the point of search. If the baggage is not accompanied by its owner, and x-ray screening of a bag has not resolved all doubts, the aircraft operator is permitted by direction to search the bag by hand. Searching unaccompanied hold baggage by hand is therefore rarely necessary.

Underground (Vandalism)

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many prosecutions there have been by British Transport Police for acts of vandalism on (a) on tube trains, (b) in tube stations and (c) on tube lines in each of the last 10 years. [136524]

Mr. McNulty: Vandalism is not classified as a crime group but the offence of criminal damage is the closest equivalent. Prosecutions are a matter for the Crown Prosecution Service. However, the BTP have provided the information in Table 1 regarding the number of people arrested, summonsed or charged with criminal damage in the past six years which is the maximum period for which reliable data are available. Table 2 shows the total number of criminal damage offences reported and cleared for the last 10 years. Table 3 gives a breakdown for criminal damage offences reported and cleared, split between tube stations, tube lines and tube trains for the last four years, the maximum period for which reliable data are available.

Offences on tube lines:	46	26	65	125
Cleared:	10	20	14	8
Offences on tube trains:	295	292	302	426
Cleared:	34	31	32	41
Total Offences:	717	658	733	912
Cleared:	129	147	138	119

Data in Table 3 differ slightly from data in Table 2 as it has been extracted on crime committed date as opposed to approved date. A crime report has an approved date which is the date the crime report has been evaluated and is often different to the date committed. Therefore crime figures will differ slightly depending on which date is used.

CABINET OFFICE

Civil Service Secondments (Science and Technology)

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what action has been taken to bring more people from science and technology backgrounds into the Civil Service on secondments as recommended by the Council for Science and Technology in its review in 1999 of Science and Technology Across Government. [133944]

Mr. Alexander: The Government are committed to developing a modern, flexible and outward focused Civil Service that works in partnership with all sectors of society. A key tool in meeting that commitment is the Interchange initiative, which promotes and encourages the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. Most organisations from anywhere in the country can take part and all sectors of the economy are encouraged to do so.

Individual Departments are directly responsible for the staff they bring in to help them deliver their objectives, including secondees. Information on secondments into the Civil Service is recorded separately by Departments. The Cabinet office holds aggregate data, though not specifically on secondees from a science and technology background.

Since financial year 1998–99, there have been, on average, around 4,000 instances of interchange taking place each year of which about half are inward to the Civil Service.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Agriculture and Horticulture Holdings

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many agriculture and horticulture holdings in the United Kingdom there were which were mainly (a) beef, (b) dairy, (c) sheep, (d) pigs, (e) poultry meat, (f) poultry egg, (g) fruit and vegetables, (h) flowers and other non edible crops, (i) energy crops, (j) arable, (k) mixed and (l) other in each of the last 10 years for which records are available. [135769]

Mr. Bradshaw: Agricultural and horticultural holdings are classified annually from the June agricultural and horticultural census into 27 different types.

For the last 10 years the figures are:

Main farm type—1993 to 2002: June agricultural census—England

Main farm types	1993	1994	1995	1996	1997

Aquaculture Research

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many aquaculture research projects were commissioned by her Department from the Ardtoe Marine Farming Unit in each year since 1997; and what the (a) subject and (b) cost of each project was. [136157]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 3 November 2003]: Aquaculture research projects commissioned by Defra from the Sea Fish Industry Authority's Marine Farming Unit at Ardtoe since 1997 are as follows:

FC0107—environmental control of halibut broodstock and rearing procedures for feeding larvae; 1993–98; total cost £515,400;

FC0905—halibut egg and early larval rearing; 1998; total cost £20,000;

FC1011—development strategy for the UK shellfish cultivation industry; 2000–01; total cost £45,000; and

FC1140—economic evaluation to assess the output potential of the UK shellfish cultivation industry; 2000; £45,000.

Details of Defra research projects may be viewed at the following website: http://www.defra.gov.uk/research/project.

Chemical Industry

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the REACH proposals for regulation of the chemical industry. [136681]

Alun Michael: The Government are committed to the new EU Chemicals Strategy which aims to improve protection for human health and the environment. The new EU Chemicals Strategy is trying to address the fact that thousands of chemicals have been used for many years without adequate information about their hazardous properties or what risks are involved in their short-term and long-term use. In doing so, the proposal for new chemicals legislation, which was adopted by the European Commission on 29 October 2003, should create greater transparency and help identify chemicals of concern.

In the forthcoming negotiations the UK has three overarching objectives:

To create a fast, efficient and workable process of testing, screening and assessing substances of concern, starting with the most harmful, because of their impact on human health or the environment;

To keep animal testing to the minimum necessary to protect human health and the environment; and

To maintain or enhance the competitiveness of the chemical industry and downstream users.

We are currently considering the Commission proposal to assess how far it meets these objectives. The Government will carry out a UK consultation early in the new year which will be accompanied by a regulatory impact assessment, and provide an opportunity for all interested stakeholders to express their views.

Dairy Farming

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many (a) farmers, (b) partners, (c) directors and (d) spouses were engaged in dairy farming in each of the last five years. [135745]

Mr. Bradshaw: Data for the total number farmers, partners, directors and spouses combined are collected annually from the June agricultural and horticultural census as a total. Figures are not available for each item.

For the last five years the figures are:

Farmers, directors, partners and spouses on holdings with a dairy herd June agricultural census—England

	Number
1998	47,591
1999	45,151
2000	43,150
2001	40,702
2002	40,906

Notes:
1. Dairy Herd—holdings with Dairy cows producing milk.
2. 1999 and 1998 figures refer to main holdings only.
3. 2000 onwards—main and minor holdings.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many dairy farmers have left the industry in the last 10 years for which records are available. [135770]

Mr. Bradshaw: Data on the number of farmers leaving the dairy industry are not collected by Defra. From the June Agricultural and Horticultural Census, we can provide the numbers of farmers, partners, directors and spouses. From these figures it will be possible to determine the net difference year on year.

For the last 10 years the figures are:

Farmers, directors, spouses and partners on farms with a dairy herd June agricultural census—England

	Farmers, directors, spouses, partners
1993	50,402
1994	49,592
1995	47,515
1996	46,150
1997	48,066
1998	47,591
1999	45,151
2000	43,150
2001	40,702
2002	40,906

1. Dairy Herd—holdings with Dairy cows producing milk.
2. 1993 to 1999 figures refer to main holdings only.
3. 2000 onwards—main and minor holdings.

Date-based Export Scheme

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will place in the Library papers submitted by her Department to the European Commission on (a) changes to the Date Based Export Scheme and (b) moderate risk status; and how many representations her Department has made to the Commission regarding these papers subsequently. [134660]

Mr. Bradshaw: Copies of the papers submitted will be placed in the Library of the House.

The Secretary of State has discussed these issues with Commissioner Byrne on a number of occasions, most recently on 22 September at the informal Agriculture Council at Taormina. Defra officials have also met Commission officials on a number of occasions, and are in regular contact with them.

Direct Production Payments

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will list the 100 farmers who received the largest direct production payments in the last year for which information is available; and how much each received. [132452]

Mr. Bradshaw: We are unable to supply information on individual payments under the terms of the Data Protection Act 1998 unless such details are allowed by any of the exemptions to the Act. If such exemptions can be identified, then further consideration can be given to the request.

Earth Summit

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the progress that has been made by her Department to meet the outcomes of the Earth Summit in Johannesburg. [136112]

Mr. Morley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 1 September 2003, Official Report, column 845W, which noted that the Government would be presenting an overview of progress against commitments made at the Johannesburg World Summit on Sustainable Development. That progress report, which covers actions across Government, has now been published and is available at: http://www.sustainable-development.gov.uk/eac-wssd/progress.htm

GM Crops

Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what research she has commissioned into coexistence on a commercial scale between GM and non-GM crops that takes account of the interactions and relationships between seed contamination, volunteers, spillage and cross-pollination. [136234]

Mr. Morley: Defra has commissioned a number of studies relevant to co-existence to complement those undertaken by others. These include a report published in 2000 by the National Institute of Agricultural Botany on crop separation distances needed to achieve specified cross-pollination thresholds. Details of other studies including studies on cross-pollination between GM and conventional crops and between GM crops and wild relatives and studies on the persistence and weediness of GM crop volunteers are availlable through the Defra website a: www.defra.gov.uk/environment/gm/research/index.htm The European Commission also published a major research study on this subject last year, available at: www.jrc.es/home/publications/publication.cfm?pub=1044 The body of literature was also recently reviewed by the GM Science Review Panel as part of the GM Dialogue, and their final report is available at: www.gmsciencedebate.org.uk

The Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission has been analysing possible approaches to co-existence and is due to submit a report to the Government later this month. We will consider this issue further in the light of that report.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the petition from residents within the Havering area opposing GM crops. [136475]

Mr. Morley: We have no record of receiving the specific petition to which the hon. Member refers, but the Government certainly recognise that people have concerns on this subject. We already have strict and transparent safety controls on GM crops, along with clear labelling rules to ensure consumer choice. The Government are now considering the outcome of the GM public debate that they have sponsored and will make a response to this in due course.

Livestock Industry

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent discussions her Department has had with (a) industry representatives, (b) the Food Standards Agency and (c) others in respect of the regulatory framework which applies to (i) mobile slaughter operators and (ii) the livestock farmers who employ them. [136263]

Mr. Bradshaw: The public health aspects of the slaughter of animals for human consumption are a matter for the Food Standards Agency. The Fresh Meat (Hygiene and Inspection) Regulations 1995 (as amended) require that no person shall carry on the business of a slaughterhouse unless the premises are licensed under the Regulations. Furthermore the Regulations also require that no person shall sell fresh meat for human consumption unless it has been slaughtered in a licensed slaughterhouse. Consequently it is unlawful for a mobile licensed slaughterman to kill and dress an animal for human consumption outside of licensed premises. At a meeting in February this year, at which Defra officials were present, the Agency explained the regulatory framework to representatives of the National Farmers Union. Subsequently officials from both the Department and the Agency participated in a meeting arranged by the Union, at which representatives of the Union and former mobile slaughter operators were present, to discuss how the framework could apply to the licensing of mobile slaughterhouses.

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what representations she has received from (a) industry representatives and (b) others in respect of regulations which apply to mobile slaughter operators. [136264]

Mr. Bradshaw: The National Farmers Union, Members of Parliament and members of the public have been in contact with the Department about the regulatory framework that applies to the slaughter of animals for human consumption and in particular the private kill of animals on farm.

Pair Trawling (Bass)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps the Government are taking to introduce an outright ban on pair trawling for bass; and what assessment she has made of the use of separator grids to preserve dolphin wildlife in the United Kingdom. [134849]

Mr. Bradshaw [holding answer 28 October 2003]: Defra-funded trials to reduce cetacean bycatch in the offshore bass fishery have demonstrated that separator grids are a viable means of minimising dolphin bycatch in this fishery. The very significantly reduced mortality rate overall in this trial compared with observations on boats over previous years is extremely encouraging. Two animals died in 82 hauls over a seven-week period beginning in March this year, a significant reduction in what is normally observed to be the case. In observations elsewhere in the fishery without the grid deployed, 28 dolphin casualties were recorded in 49 hauls.

On the basis of these results, we will be moving forward from trialling the separator grid to deploying the gear in the fishery. We will continue to monitor the effectiveness of the grid and adjust as necessary. If an effective reduction in small cetacean bycatch cannot be maintained through the use of the grid, I do not rule out other options such as closure of the offshore-bass fishery.

Scrapie

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what representations she has received in the last six months about the eradication of genome groups under the scrapie plan; and if she will make a statement. [135378]

Mr. Bradshaw: Defra has regular contact with stakeholders to discuss a wide range of issues relating to the National Scrapie Plan. Among these are a bi-annual stakeholder forum and various ad hoc industry focus group meetings to discuss and assist in the development of proposals and initiatives to further improve and enhance the National Scrapie Plan.

Sheep Annual Premium

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what percentage of sheep annual premium payments were paid more than two months late in England in the last 24 months. [135380]

Mr. Bradshaw: As detailed in the table, 0.15 per cent. of 2001 Sheep Annual Premium Scheme (SAPS) claims and 0.18 per cent. of 2002 claims were paid two months later than their respective scheme year payment deadlines.

	Scheme year
	2001	2002
Total claims received	30,363	27,083
Claims paid two months later than the EU payment deadline[1]
Number	46	49
Percentage	0.15	0.18

[1] These relate claims under query.

The payment window for SAPS 2003 opened on 16 October 2003. To date, 98 per cent. of claims have been paid.

Tenant Farmers (Rents)

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the implications for tenant farmers of rural development for rents under the revised Common Agricultural Policy. [134842]

Mr. Bradshaw: The biggest implication for tenant farmers arises from the decoupling of support from production. This will mean that all farmers, including tenants, will have more flexibility in terms of what they produce. This is because the support they receive will no longer be dependent on the types of crop or livestock they farm. Taking the reforms as a whole, it is difficult to forecast the precise effects reform might have on rents. However, where tenants continue to farm and claim support, the requirement for land will continue to underpin the land rental market. Further work is planned in this area and we hope to make the results generally available in due course.

MINISTER FOR WOMEN

Regional Development Agencies

20. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Minister for Women, what steps she is taking to help regional development agencies to encourage women to participate in the labour market. [136670]

Ms Hewitt: The Regional Development Agencies have a remit to promote skills, enterprise and labour market participation in their regions. All of these, including the provision of child care, are relevant to women's participation in the labour market.

Equal Pay

21. Judy Mallaber: To ask the Minister for Women, if she will make a statement on progress with the equal pay audits in Government Departments. [136671]

Jacqui Smith: The Government have made a commitment for Civil Service departments and agencies to undertake equal pay reviews and prepare action plans. Action plans representing 99 per cent. of the Civil Service have now been received by the Cabinet Office. The Government will shortly be publishing a summary of the findings from pay review action plans.

Iraq

22. Mr. Michael Jabez Foster: To ask the Minister for Women, what action she is taking to ensure that Iraqi women are fully involved in all plans for the (a) reconstruction and (b) Government of Iraq. [136672]

Mr. John Smith: To ask the Minister for Women what steps she is taking to ensure that Iraqi women play a part in the leadership of Iraq. [136668]

Ms Hewitt: Two weeks ago I met Dr. Raja Khuzaai, one of the two female members of the Iraqi Governing Council. In July I met the US Special Envoy, Amb. Bremer, in Baghdad. I impressed on him the importance of women's full involvement in the emerging political structures—this includes the Constitutional reform process.

I have pledged my full support for the establishment of an Iraqi Women's Higher Council—a non-governmental advisory body on women's issues.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Engineering Investment

12. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, what recent discussions she has held with employers in the engineering sector regarding their plans for investment. [136687]

Ms Hewitt: I have benefited from a number of opportunities, both in writing and in person, to discuss a wide range of issues with representatives of the engineering sector.

Employment Rights (Parents)

13. Mr. Tom Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, what action she has taken to ensure that there is a high take-up of the new rights for parents of young children. [136688]

Jacqui Smith: The package of new laws implemented this April provides parents with more choice and more support about how they balance work and childcare in ways that benefit everyone: employers, employees and children. The Government have produced a wide package of support to promote take-up including guidance and case studies in booklets on the web. National adverts at the time of implementation and in October have ensured a high level of awareness. In addition, we have supported other bodies such as the Federation of Small Businesses and Fathers Direct, to produce their own material.

Research and Development

15. Joyce Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, what plans she has to increase research and development expenditure in the regions. [136691]

Ms Hewitt: All regions stand to benefit from the action taken by the Government to boost public R&D through the last three spending reviews and to encourage business R&D through the tax credits. However, Government research and development spending is largely organised on a national basis as it the best means of securing value for money and driving up excellence. But the Regional Development Agencies are in an excellent position to advise on knowledge transfer in the regions and are fully engaged in the formal role of the deployment of next round of the Higher Education Innovation Fund.

Demolition/Waste Removal Sector (Insurance)

16. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps she is taking to ensure that all (a) demolition contractors and (b) waste removal companies have insurance cover. [136692]

Nigel Griffiths: Employers Liability is a statutory insurance. Enforcement for non-compliance is undertaken by the Health and Safety Executive. The Government have been actively working with stakeholders to reform and improve the existing enforcement arrangements.

If the hon. Member has details of any company breaking this statutory requirement, he should forward the details to the HSE.

Bechtel

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will list the contracts for consultancy and other work carried out by Bechtel in each year since 1997, stating in each case (a) the nature of the work, (b) the value of the contract and (c) the duration of the contract; and if she will make a statement. [135901]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 3 November 2003]: The Department has placed one direct contract with Bechtel since 1997. The work covers the provision of technical support and assistance to the Department's Liabilities Management Unit in carrying out its remit to prepare the ground for the creation of the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority. The Department paid Bechtel £8.044 million for its work in 2002–03. The contract was placed on 10 June 2002 for a two-year duration, with options to extend for a further period of up to five years.

Broadband

Mr. Luke: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps she has taken to increase availability of broadband in the more disadvantaged areas of the UK [136682]

Mr. Timms: Broadband is available to 80 per cent. of households in the UK which is higher than in Italy, France and the USA. The DTI is working with the Devolved Administrations (DAs) and Regional Development Agencies (RDAs) to extend the availability of broadband still further. We have given them £30 million for pilot schemes to extend the availability of broadband. This has stimulated further regional schemes worth at least £377 million over 2000–06.

In England, the Broadband Aggregation Project will make sure that the £1 billion that the Government will spend on broadband connectivity for the public sector between 2003–06 will offer best value for money and widen availability. We have also set up a joint DTI/ Defra Rural Broadband Team to address the issue of broadband availability in rural areas.

Fair Trade

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on Government action to encourage fair trade initiatives. [135508]

Ms Hewitt: I strongly support the aims of the Fairtrade movement. It gives a clear indication to consumers that disadvantaged producer groups in developing countries receive a minimum price above that offered by mainstream markets.

A real strength of the Fairtrade movement has been in raising awareness among mainstream retailers about the importance of managing supply chains to maximise benefits to the poor, and in raising public awareness of important development issues surrounding trade. That is why the Government, through the Department for International Development (DFID) has provided £500,000 in support of UK development awareness and education campaigns centred on Fairtrade over the past two years. My hon. Friend the Minister for Corporate and Social Responsibility met business leaders last year to encourage greater take-up of Fairtrade products. I have ensured that Fairtrade tea and coffee is made available throughout the DTI offices and many of my Cabinet colleagues have responded to my urging to do likewise.

The Fairtrade market, despite recent rapid growth, remains small (£63 million in 2002). Through DFID's support for initiatives such as the Ethical Trading Initiative (£1.3 million over three years 2002–04)—an alliance of UK retail companies, NGOs and trade unions working to improve labour conditions in the supply chains of its corporate members—we are able to contribute to improving the working conditions under which £100 billion of goods are produced each year.

Fireworks

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to launch a public awareness programme after the introduction of the fireworks regulations. [136286]

Mr. Sutcliffe: A communication strategy to make those affected aware of the new regulations is in preparation and will be finalised when the timing and details of the regulations are decided.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions her Department has had and plans to have with (a) police forces and (b) local authorities about the implementation of the new fireworks regulations and their enforcement. [136287]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The Department has had preliminary discussions on fireworks regulations both to come into force before the end of the year and those regulatory proposals scheduled for implementation later on, in 2004.

Specifically, with respect to (a), discussions have taken place on the powers required by the police to enforce possession offences under the Act; and, (b), on the role of local authorities in setting up the requisite machinery for the planned national curfew on firework use, which will be a part of the raft of measures to come into force in 2004.

We will continue consultations and discussions on all proposed regulations in the coming months.

Mr. Bailey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether it is her policy that the sections of the Fireworks Act 2003 that concern anti-social behaviour and fireworks should be in force by Christmas. [135922]

Mr. Sutcliffe: The Department will implement two provisions of the Fireworks Act 2003 by the end of this year—those concerned with the antisocial use of fireworks. Those are:

a prohibition on the possession of fireworks in public places by those under the age of 18; and a prohibition on the possession of category 4 fireworks by the general public.

Other aspects of the Act concerned with both supply and other antisocial behaviour issues we intend to implement by the summer of 2004.

Inward Investment (Indian Businesses)

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make a statement on investment by Indian businesses in the UK. [136693]

Ms Hewitt: There are more than 440 Indian investments in the UK with 19 new investments last year creating 316 new jobs.

Manufacturing

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what (a) proportion and (b) volume in financial terms of manufacturing conducted by companies registered in the UK (i) was carried out within the UK in 1993 and (ii) is carried out within the UK now; and what estimate her Department has made of the (A) proportion and (B) volume in (x) 2004, (y) 2008 and (z) 2013. [135081]

Jacqui Smith: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps are being taken to encourage young people to work in the manufacturing sector. [135505]

Ms Hewitt: Through the Government's National Skills Strategy we are working closely with all sectors of industry, and other stakeholders, to ensure that employers have access to the right skills to support their businesses and organisations. This is complemented by recent changes to the National Curriculum to add vocational choice, which will encourage young people to understand the opportunities that careers in various sectors, including manufacturing, can offer them.

The DTI also published a Manufacturing Strategy, in May 2002, which set out seven areas of activity for manufacturing success, one of which was raising skills and education levels.

Modern Apprenticeships are central to this Government's drive to improve the opportunities for work-based vocational training. Our target is that by 2004, 28 per cent. of young people will start a modern apprenticeship by age 22. To aid us in this task we have has set up a Modern Apprenticeship Taskforce to look at ways to increase the opportunities available for young people to participate in high quality Modern Apprenticeships and to recommend effective and innovative ways of ensuring that Modern Apprenticeship programmes respond to the changing needs of employers and young people.

Many of the new Sector Skills Councils are helping to promote careers in manufacturing. In particular, SEMTA is supporting SETNET and financing careers advice; Skillfast UK has produced CDs containing careers advice for use in schools and colleges; and Proskills is developing a sandwiched based student apprenticeship programme.

My Department continues to support the SETNET scheme, which was created in 1996 to raise interest in science, engineering, technology and mathematics (STEM) in young people (between five and 18) by showing them that they can lead to interesting and rewarding careers—which clearly includes the manufacturing sector. SETNET operates through 53 local SETPOINTS around the UK and is involved in the provision of schemes, resources and initiatives to enrich the delivery of STEM activities in schools.

We are also taking steps to encourage interest in manufacturing and other STEM careers among women and ethnic minorities.

Manufacturing Investment

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps her Department is taking to improve levels of manufacturing business investment. [136690]

Jacqui Smith: By maintaining a stable macroeconomic climate, together with measures such as reforming capital gains tax, making permanent enhanced capital allowances for small and medium sized firms, and introducing the R&D tax credit, we are providing a climate conducive to investment for the long-term in UK manufacturing.

Ofgem Guidance

Mr. John Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions she has had with Ofgem on the guidance they give to (a) hon. Members and (b) constituents on difficulties in obtaining responses from the Customer Relations Department of npower. [136801]

Mr. Timms: Ministers at the DTI have not had any recent discussions on these matters with Ofgem. Constituents who have had difficulty in resolving problems with gas and electricity suppliers should, in the first instance, contact the statutory consumer body, the Gas and Electricity Consumer Council (Energywatch), not Ofgem.

Patents

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of the proposed directive on the patentability of computer-implemented inventions as approved by the European Parliament on 24 September; and if she will make a statement. [136202]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 3 November 2003]: In considering the best ways to encourage innovation in the UK, the Government believe that a fair and effective intellectual property system, for software as well as for other areas of technology, plays a central part in developing and protecting new ideas. The aim of the UK Government and the European Commission, in the proposed directive on software patents, is to clarify the position on patentability of computer-implemented inventions and confirm that only those inventions that involve a technical contribution can be protected by patents. We believe that this is beneficial for industry and consumers alike.

We continue to listen to the concerns of those who oppose the granting of patents in this field, and we believe that the Government's approach offers the best balance of protection for the industry and for users of software. The directive is now before a working group of the Council of Ministers where representatives from EU member states, and the Commission, will consider the amendments made by the Parliament and in due course submit it to the Council itself for its consideration. We will await the comments of the working group and the Commission before finalising our position.

Radioactive Waste

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the planned nuclear decommissioning authority will be given powers to renegotiate existing reprocessing contracts with British Energy when it takes over the ownership and management of the THORP reprocessing plant at Sellafield. [135626]

Mr. Timms: Legislation will be brought forward to establish the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority (NDA) as soon as parliamentary time permits. We intend that the NDA will come into effect in April 2005.

The NDA will take responsibility for those liabilities and assets currently owned and managed by BNFL at the THORP reprocessing plant. As the required legislation has not yet been introduced, it would be wrong to comment on what role the NDA might have in respect of contracts between BNFL and British Energy.

In her statement to the House on 28 November 2002, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry made clear that the Government would need to contribute significantly to British Energy's historic nuclear fuel liabilities that are managed by BNFL in order for the restructuring of British Energy to work. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry also said she will look at how these contracts are managed as part of the creation of the NDA.

Small Business Advice

Linda Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to improve the provision of business advice to owners of small businesses in London. [136619]

Nigel Griffiths: During the first six months of the current financial year, Business Link for London has worked with over 31,887 businesses, this compares to the corresponding period of the previous financial year (2002–03) when 16,432 businesses were assisted, this being a 94 per cent. increase, including 23 per cent. that are Black or Minority Ethnic businesses.

Business Link for London has an agreed Delivery Plan with the Small Business Service to provide a high quality business advice and support service to small and medium sized businesses (SMEs) in London.

Client satisfaction levels are currently at 83.1 per cent. (Quarter 2 result 2003–04), a 5.1 per cent. raise in satisfaction levels compared to the corresponding period in the previous financial year, showing that the quality of service is improving as well as the numbers receiving the service.

Small Loans Guarantee Fund

Linda Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make it her policy to increase the level at which the Government underwrite the Small Loans Guarantee Fund. [136618]

Nigel Griffiths: The Small Firms Loan Guarantee (SFLG) was extensively revised in April 2003 as part of the DTI's transformed business support programme. The changes, including a new guarantee level of 75 per cent for all eligible businesses and additional sector coverage including retail and catering, simplified the SFLG and widened its scope. From 1 April 2003 to 30 September 2003 take-up increased by 40 per cent over the same period last year. The DTI continues to monitor the operation of the SFLG to ensure that it remains relevant and accessible to small businesses.

Technology Sector

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of the state of the technological sector in the United Kingdom. [135511]

Ms Hewitt: During the course of the Innovation Review, my officials have produced a detailed economic assessment of the UK's innovation performance. This includes data and analysis on the technological performance of UK based firms.

This assessment will be published shortly.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Evidence (Duress)

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what safeguards UK courts have in place to ensure that evidence presented before them has not been obtained under duress; and if he will make a statement. [132644]

Paul Goggins: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer given on 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 102W.

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will reply to the letter to him dated 14 August from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton, with regard to Mr. Khalid Rahtin. [133842]

Mr. Blunkett: I wrote to my right hon. Friend on 3 September 2003.

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will reply to the letter to him dated 2 September from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton, with regard to facilities for the disabled. [133843]

Mr. Blunkett: I wrote to my right hon. Friend on 23 October 2003.

Criminal Justice Boards

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many targets he has set for each local criminal justice board in 2003–04. [133485]

Paul Goggins: For the year 2003–04 and in the context of the Criminal Justice System Public Service Agreement, each local criminal justice board has been set the following targets:

A nationally set target to increase by five per cent. the number of crimes for which an offender is brought to justice—this is also known as the 'narrowing the justice gap' target.

The 'Narrowing the Justice Gap' target includes two further locally set sub-targets:

- To increase the number (within a range of five—15 per cent.) of offences brought to justice committed by the core group of persistent offenders.
- To reduce the proportion of ineffective trials with locally set targets contributing to a required national level of improvement of 27 per cent. in both Crown court and magistrates courts over the three-year course of the target.

A nationally set target to improve the level of public confidence in the criminal justice system—where a national six per cent point improvement is sought over the three-year course of the target.

Outside of the Criminal Justice System Public Service Agreement, local boards have also been set the following targets for the year 2003–04:

A nationally set target to ensure that the average time from arrest to sentence for Persistent young offenders is halved from 142 days to 71 days or lower in all criminal justice areas.

A number of locally set targets across the time cases take, covering both youths and adults cases from charge to completion in the magistrates courts, and separately the time taken to handle a case in the Crown court ('timeliness' targets)—with the proviso that any area currently performing the national average must set an improvement target.

Criminal Records Bureau

Mr. Bailey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what assessment was made of the increase in running costs to the Criminal Records Bureau that necessitated the recent increase in fee levels; [131815]

(2) what the changes were since 1993 in fees from the Criminal Records Bureau to local authorities for applications for posts in the education and social care sectors. [131819]

Paul Goggins: The Criminal Records Bureau began operating in March 2002. Initially, the fee for both Standard and Enhanced Disclosures was £12 (with Disclosures issued free of charge to volunteers). We made it clear that the Bureau would eventually become self-financing through the fees that it charged and that the fees would be reviewed regularly. With effect from 1 July 2003, the fee for Standard Disclosures has risen to £24 and for Enhanced Disclosures to £29. A copy of a Regulatory Impact Assessment containing more detailed information has been placed in the Library.

The Disclosure fee is determined by a combination of CRB costs and the volume of applications. The deferment of the introduction of Basic Disclosures has inevitably meant that the volumes of Disclosures issued has been less than forecast, thereby pushing up the unit cost of producing each Disclosure. In addition, the CRB has experienced some increase in costs, for example, as a result of the introduction of the paper application channel in response to customer demand. The CRB's planned expenditure in 2003–04 is £75 million (on the basis of a projected demand for 2.3 million Disclosures) as compared with an outturn of £59 million in 2002–03 (when some 1.5 million Disclosures were issued).

Mr. Bailey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what the average time taken to assess a Criminal Records Bureau application in the education and social care sectors was in the last quarter for which figures are available; [131816]

(2) what the backlog is of Criminal Records Bureau assessments in education and social care. [131817]

Paul Goggins: The specific information that my hon. Friend has asked for on processing times for applicants in the education and social care sectors is not available from the Criminal Records Bureau (CRB) systems. The CRB does monitor and report on the average time to deal with all Disclosure applications, but its systems do not break this information down by sector.

Likewise, the number of applications from individual sectors that are still awaiting a disclosure is not available. At present, however, the Bureau is processing in excess of 90 per cent. of all Enhanced Disclosures in four weeks and 90 per cent. of all Standard disclosures in two weeks. These performance figures are available on the CRB website: www.crb.gov.uk

The CRB also monitors the number of applications that have been outstanding for more than six weeks. As at 4 October 2003, the latest date for which figures are available, the number of applications over six weeks old and awaiting completion is 1,486.

John Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reduce the time taken for Criminal Records Bureau checks to be carried out on new staff in care homes. [133272]

Paul Goggins: Over 90 per cent. of Standard and Enhanced Disclosures are now issued within two and four weeks respectively, exceeding current service standards. These have been set based on experience gained of this complex operation. The current targets are realistic but challenging. They will be kept under review.

We are determined to continue to improve the efficiency of the Criminal Records Bureau (CRB) and the quality of the service it provides to its customers. Measures are currently under consideration in light of the recommendations of the Independent Review Team appointed by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary which are designed to reduce processing time.

As the independent regulator, the National Care Standards Commission (NCSC) has the responsibility to ensure that care homes meet all their statutory obligations. It has stated clearly that where CRB clearances are not in place, and provided that the welfare of care home residents is protected, it will apply its discretion on the use of its enforcement powers on a case by case basis. The NCSC issued a press release on 22 September 2003 setting out its approach to CRB checks for care home staff. A copy is available on the NCSC's website at www.carestandards.org.uk.

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received in the increase in fees for security checks charged by the Criminal Records Bureau. [133384]

Paul Goggins: We have received—both direct and through right hon. and hon. Members—a significant number of representations. These have, chiefly concerned two issues: the size of the increases in fees, which reflect increased unit costs and the need for the Criminal Records Bureau (CRB) to move substantially towards a target of being self-financing by 2005–06; and the short notice of the increases which reflected the need to reduce the possibility of a surge in demand which could have had a detrimental effect on the CRB's operation.

Domestic Violence

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he gives on the way the police deal with the perpetrators of domestic violence. [130990]

Paul Goggins: Home Office circular 19/2000 gives guidance on police handling cases of domestic violence.

The National Centre for Policing Excellence (NCPE) is currently developing updated guidelines for police handling of domestic violence cases.

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how the funding announced in January for domestic violence projects will be allocated; [134912]

(2) in which financial year he will allocate the money announced in January for domestic violence projects; [134913]

(3) when funding for domestic violence projects will be transferred from his Department to crime and disorder partnerships; whether the funds for prevention domestic violence will be ring-fenced; whether prevention of domestic violence will remain a priority for the Department under the new funding arrangements; and if he will make a statement. [134960]

Paul Goggins: Domestic violence accounts for around 25 per cent. of violent crime and tackling it effectively remains a priority for the Home Department.

In February this year my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced a £14 million funding package for domestic violence over a three year period. The first allocation from this funding—announced in May—was of over £2 million this year to domestic violence projects set up under the Crime Reduction Programme's Violence Against Women initiative. This included Gloucestershire's 'Co-ordinated Community Response' to domestic violence. This funding was to help these projects ensure that their services are work of local agencies and that they can secure sustainable ongoing funding for the longer term.

Further funding over the three years will be allocated to help improve local action on domestic violence through Crime and Disorder Reduction Partnerships (CDRPs). A 'mapping exercise' of CDRP activity on domestic violence has recently been conducted to help inform these further allocations. We will be making announcements on this shortly.

Drugs

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the trade in heroin emanating from Afghanistan since the defeat of the Taliban; and if he will make a statement on the trends in volumes of heroin arriving in the United Kingdom from Afghanistan. [135856]

Mr. Rammell: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to my written ministerial statement on 30 October 2003 regarding the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) survey results for the 2003 opium poppy crop in Afghanistan, Official Report, column 20WS.

The UNODC conducts an annual survey into the level of opium poppy cultivation and production in Afghanistan. It has reported levels over the past five years as follows:

	Hectares	Tonnes
1999	91,000	4,600
2000	82,000	3,300
2001	8,000	185
2002	74,000	3,400
2003	80,000	3,600

The UNODC figures for 2001 reflects the Taliban ban on opium cultivation. The ban did not however address the underlying causes of poppy cultivation in Afghanistan and was enforced with a mix of serious violence and bribery.

Afghanistan is the world's leading producer of opium and the UNODC has estimated that, taking into account seizures in the region, the likely amounts available for shipment out of Afghanistan in 2002 were 685 tons of opium and 212 tons of heroin and morphine. Approximately 25–35 metric tons of heroin are targeted on the UK every year and we estimate that around 95 per cent. of this originates from Afghanistan. Trends have remained fairly static.

The UNODC poppy cultivation survey in 2003 has shown reductions in the traditional areas, which demonstrates that drug control policy has been effective where the Afghan Government have been able to exert control. Increasing security and stability in Afghanistan remains key to progress in reducing opium production. This in turn will also bring more stability to Afghanistan.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, what is being done to combat the international drugs trade, particularly that emanating from countries of concern; and if he will make a statement on its impact upon the United Kingdom. [136478]

Mr. Rammell: I have been asked to reply.

The FCO's commitment to tackle international drug trafficking is set out in its Public Service Agreements. In line with the Government's 10-year drugs strategy, '1998–2008: Tackling Drugs Together to Build a Better Britain', the FCO's priority is to reduce the availability of Class A drugs in the UK. Through the Drugs and Crime Fund (£9.9 million in the financial year 2003–04), the FCO assists law enforcement and other agencies in key production and transit countries to improve their capability to disrupt the flow of Class A drugs to the UK.

About 95 per cent. of the UK's heroin comes from Afghanistan. Afghanistan's National Drug Control Strategy, agreed earlier this year, has set the target of eliminating opium poppy by 2013. The UK is investing £70 million on sustainable measures over the next three years to support implementation of that strategy. Additional staff are being deployed to Kabul to assist in the implementation. I will be co-hosting, with President Karzai and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC), an international conference in Kabul in February next year to boost further the international counter-narcotics effort in Afghanistan.

In the financial year 2002–03 the FCO provided over £5 million in counter-narcotics related assistance to priority countries in South America and the Caribbean where illegal drugs are produced or trafficked. This assistance included funding for HMCE drug law enforcement training, provision of drug detection equipment, assessment of local law enforcement communications equipment and contributions to UNODC projects.

Fireworks

Tony Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures are being taken to halt the illegal importation of fireworks, in particular through the internet. [136958]

Mr. Sutcliffe: I have been asked to reply.

Talks are already under way between DTI and the principal Departments that deal with importation and storage issues, that is, Customs and Excise and HSE, respectively.

The Department, under the new Fireworks Act 2003, will bring in a raft of measures by the summer of 2004 and which will include a requirement on importers to provide information about their imports. The purpose of this would be to better track fireworks imports to help ensure that they are destined for legal (licensed) distribution and supply outlets.

Forensic Science Service

Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the proposed Public-Private Partnership regarding the Forensic Science Service will require legislation. [132404]

Ms Blears: The transformation of the Forensic Science Service into a Public-Private Partnership will require the revocation of the Forensic Science Service Trading Fund Order 1998.

Information Technology

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much was spent on purchasing and upgrading IT equipment by his Department (a) in 2003 and (b) in 2002; and what this cost per employee. [135895]

Fiona Mactaggart: The information requested is in the following table:

	Time period	Totals (£)
Part FY	01 January 2002–31 March 2002	36,464,010
Full FY	01 April 2002–31 March 2003	13,017,585
Part FY	01 April 2003–30 September 2003	9,127,403
		58,608,998

Note:
(a) The figures are expenditure incurred by the Home Department, which excludes Executive Agencies and Non-Departmental Public Bodies (NDPBs).
(b) The figures exclude expenditure from the Department's Outsourced Managed Service Contracts for the provision of IT infrastructure services, where the assets have not transferred to the public sector.

The Home Department is unable accurately to reflect the cost per employee of purchasing and upgrading IT equipment due to differing commercial arrangements adopted in its contracts.

Jury Trial

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (a) in what circumstances and (b) for which criminal offences a jury trial may be refused to a person charged with a criminal offence. [135019]

Paul Goggins: There are presently no circumstances in which a person charged with a criminal offence may be refused jury trial.

Certain offences are triable only on indictment, and must be heard by a judge and jury. Summary offences—which constitute the overwhelming majority of criminal cases—are triable only in the magistrates' courts unless they fulfil certain conditions (for example, because they are related to an indictable-only offence). Other offences are triable either way:

> by a judge and jury in the Crown Court on the direction of the magistrate or the election of the defendant, or summarily, with the consent of the defendant. There are no circumstances in which a person charged with an either-way offence can be tried summarily unless he or she has consented to summary trial. The Criminal Justice Bill currently before Parliament sets out new procedures for deciding the allocation of either-way cases, and for the sending to the Crown Court of those cases which need to go there, according to these principles.

The Government have proposed in the Criminal Justice Bill that the prosecution should be able to apply for a trial on indictment in the Crown Court to proceed in the absence of a jury where the length and/or complexity of the trial is likely either to be so burdensome upon the jury trying it as to make it necessary in the interests of justice to conduct the trial without a jury, or to place an excessive burden on the life of a typical juror. The length or complexity (or both) must be caused by the need to address arrangements, transactions or records of a financial or commercial nature or which relate to property. The Bill also provides for a trial on indictment in the Crown Court to be conducted without a jury where there is a real and present danger of jury tampering, or to be continued without a jury where the jury has been discharged because of jury tampering. None of these provisions is restricted to particular criminal offences.

The provisions were defeated at Lords Committee stage of the Bill. The Government have indicated their intention to reinstate them when the Bill returns to the House of Commons.

Prison Officers

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many full-time prison officers were employed by Her Majesty's Prison Service in the East Riding of Yorkshire on 1 September in each of the last three years. [136469]

Paul Goggins: There are two prisons managed by Her Majesty's Prison Service (public sector prisons) in the East Riding of Yorkshire: Everthorpe and Hull prisons. Information on full-time officers employed at these prisons in each of the last three years is shown in the table.

	Full time officers in post
Establishment	1 September 2003	1 September 2002	1 September 2001
HMP Everthorpe	124	120	125
HMP Hull	342	307	242

Officers include prison officers, senior officers and principal officers.

Prison Population

Mr. Keith Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the percentage change in the prison population has been in each of the last 10 years; and what the percentage change in numbers of prison officers has been in each year in the same period. [129604]

Paul Goggins: The information requested is given in the following table. Figures are for England and Wales. Figures exclude those in privately managed prisons.

Year (as at end March)	Percentage change in prison population compared to previous year	Percentage change in number of prison officers compared to previous year
1994	10.3	-1.5
1995	4.4	2.0
1996	4.4	0.7
1997	10.0	-5.5
1998	7.8	1.7
1999	-2.5	1.8
2000	0.4	0.9
2001	-0.6	-1.3
2002	6.2	-3.0
2003	4.6	2.3

Witnesses

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps are being taken to maximise the number of witnesses to crime who (a) come forward and (b) stay with a case to its conclusion. [134054]

Paul Goggins [holding answer 23 October 2003]: The Government published in July this year a national strategy to deliver improved services to victims and witnesses. It recognises that ensuring witnesses come forward and give evidence in court is essential for the effective administration of justice.

The Criminal Procedure (Attendance of Witnesses) Act 1965 and the Magistrates' Court Act 1980 already provide for a witness summons to be issued if the court is satisfied that the witness is likely to be able to give or produce material evidence but will not do so voluntarily. On 3 October we published a consultation paper and invited responses by 2 January 2004 to a proposal to introduce a greater element of compulsion in securing the attendance of witnesses in court.

The Government have introduced a range of special measures to assist vulnerable witnesses to give their evidence in court, including video recording, live links, the use of intermediaries and communication aids. The Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 provides the legislative framework for these measures and a phased implementation programme began on 24 July 2002.

Pilot projects to maximise the number of witnesses coming forward and staying with the case are currently operating on a local basis and the Government have agreed to support these financially. For example:

The West Mercia Constabulary is engaged on a project to examine the reasons why some witnesses are reluctant to report crime and to test the effectiveness of a single point of contact (a "one stop shop") as a way of regularly updating witnesses on the progress of their cases.

The Warwickshire Police is piloting the co-location of police and Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) staff dealing with witnesses and integrated information technology.

The Metropolitan Police is piloting better co-ordination of the arrangements, both within and between criminal justice agencies, of the arrangements for dealing with witnesses.

The CPS, the Prime Minister's Office of Public Service Reform (OPSR) and the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) are running a joint project with pilot sites in South Yorkshire, West Midlands, North Wales, Gwent and Essex. This project is testing a customer-focused service that tailors support more closely to individual witnesses' needs and provides multi-agency dedicated witness care units. These work with witnesses at every stage of the criminal justice process.

The pilots directly support the criminal justice system's Public Service Agreement (PSA) target of narrowing the justice gap, reducing ineffective hearings and raising public confidence. They also complement two other key criminal justice initiatives—the CPS/ACPO Charging Programme and the Effective Trial Management Programme.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Education and Business Links

Linda Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will take steps to seek to improve school leavers' understanding of the business environment. [136615]

Mr. Miliband: We are already taking steps for this goal. The introduction of work-related learning in September 2004 as a statutory requirement at Key Stage 4 for 14 to 16 year-olds will help improve pupils' understanding of the diversity and function of business and its contribution to national prosperity. As part of this, from 2005 all Key Stage 4 pupils will be offered the equivalent of five days' enterprise activity which will develop enterprise capability. This will add to their existing learning opportunities through the PSHE and citizenship curriculum and activities such as work experience placements, industry days and employer mentoring schemes.

Education Provision (Bath and North East Somerset)

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the schools in Bath and North East Somerset which have benefited significantly from the Government's capital initiatives since 1997. [136319]

Mr. Miliband: All schools in Bath and North East Somerset have benefited significantly from capital investment, as we introduced Devolved formula capital for all schools in 2000–01. For a typical primary school of 250 pupils this is worth £21,900 in 2003–04, rising to £25,500 in 2005–06. A typical secondary of 1,000 pupils would receive £74,900 in 2003–04, rising to £87,250 in 2005–06.

As the majority of capital funding is now allocated to local education authorities by formula, so that they can fund locally agreed priorities, the Department does not collect detailed information about the work carried out. This should be held locally. Overall capital investment is set to rise from £3.8 billion this year to over £5 billion in 2005–06, compared with under £700 million in 1996–97.

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will estimate how many support staff were employed by schools in Bath and North East Somerset in (a) 1997 and (b) 2003. [136333]

Mr. Miliband: Support staff numbers in maintained schools in England by local authority are shown in table 19 of the Schools Workforce in England statistical first release (SFR) of 9 September 2003. A copy of this SFR has been placed in the Library. The table is also available on the statistics section of the DfES website at: http://www.dfes.gov.uk/rsgateway/DB/SFR/s000411/index.shtml

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many full-time equivalent teachers there were in Bath and North East Somerset in (a) 1997, (b) 2001 and (c) 2003. [136334]

Mr. Miliband: Full-time equivalent teacher numbers in maintained schools in England by local authority are shown in table 15 of the Schools Workforce in England statistical first release (SFR) of 9 September 2003. A copy of this SFR has been placed in the Library. The table is also available on the statistics section of the DfES website at: http://www.dfes.gov.uk/rsgateway/DB/SFR/s000411/index.shtml

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) what proportion of 15-year-olds in Bath and North East Somerset in 2002–03 entered for GCSE or equivalent examinations; [136340]

(2) what proportion of 15-year-olds in Bath and North East Somerset in (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98 achieved (a) five or more A*-C GCSE grades and (b) one or more GCSE passes. [136341]

Mr. Miliband: The statistical information for Bath and North East Somerset requested in the two questions 136340 and 136341 is detailed in the table:

		Percentage of:
Academic Year	15-year-old pupils who entered for 1 or more GCSE/GNVQ	15-year-olds achieving 5 or more grades A-C GCSE/GNVQ*	15-year-olds achieving 1 or more grades A-G GCSE/GNVQ*
1997	96.4	51.3	95.3
1998	97.2	53.2	96.5
2003 (provisional)	97.1	59.7	95.9

Education Provision (East Riding)

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many (a) primary and (b) secondary teacher vacancies there were in the East Riding of Yorkshire on 31 October of each year since 1997. [136058]

Mr. Miliband: Vacancy data as at October are not collected. The following table shows teacher vacancies in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in the East Riding of Yorkshire at January of each year.

Full-time vacancies in the East Riding of Yorkshire:

	Nursery and Primary	Secondary
1998	1	0
1999	4	0
2001	0	6
2002	12	12
2003	0	5

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the average class sizes of (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in Haltemprice and Howden for the current academic year. [136060]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: Figures on average class sizes for primary and secondary schools for this academic year are not yet available. Monitoring of all class sizes is carried out via the information collected in the Annual Schools Census in January of each year.

As at January 2003, the average sizes of classes taught by one teacher in primary schools and secondary schools in Haltemprice and Howden were 26.8 and 22.2 respectively.

The national figures for primary and secondary schools were 26.3 and 21.9 respectively.

Free School Dinners

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of pupils are eligible for free school dinners in each constituency, listed in descending order. [136282]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: The information requested has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Higher Education (Social Groups)

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) how many students were admitted to higher education from each social group in each academic year since 1997; [133701]

(2) how many applicants to higher education there were from each social group in each academic year since 1997. [133702]

Alan Johnson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 3 June 2003, Official Report, column 214W, which gave the latest available figures for applicants and accepted applicants through the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service (UCAS) to full-time and sandwich undergraduate courses in the UK.

Figures for 2003 entry should be available in early 2004.

Key Stage Tests

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many 14 year-olds in Bath and North East Somerset were eligible to sit Key Stage 3 tests in 2002–03. [136316]

Mr. Miliband: The total number of Key Stage 3 eligible pupils in 2002 and 2003 in Bath and North East Somerset were:

2003 (Provisional)—2,219

2002—2,189

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of children in Bath and North East Somerset in (a) 1996–97 and (b) 2002–03 gained level 5 or above in their Key Stage 3 tests in (i) English and (ii) mathematics. [136317]

Mr. Miliband: The percentage of pupils achieving Level 5 or above at Key Stage 3 in Bath and North East Somerset in (a) 1997 and (b) 2003 in (i) English and (ii) mathematics are as follows:

Percentage

	English	Mathematics
1997
Bath and North East Somerset	64	67
England	57	60
2003 (provisional)
Bath and North East Somerset	74	76

Qualifications

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the findings of research conducted for his Department by Machin, Vignoles and Galindo-Rueda on the relationship between institutional productivity and skills attainments at various levels. [136457]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The research by Machin, Vignoles and Galindo-Rueda showed strong productivity effects from academic level 4+ qualifications and positive productivity effects from level 2 academic qualifications, although these are not quite as robust as the academic level 4 results. At both of these levels employers receive a productivity benefit over and above the wage increase employees enjoyed as a result of holding these qualifications.

No systematic impact on productivity from vocational qualifications was found, regardless of level though the methodology used meant that the impact of vocational qualifications would be more difficult to detect than that of academic qualifications. The authors themselves admit that this finding contradicts previous research, such as that by McIntosh[1], which shows that there are wage returns to the individual for vocational qualifications. Further work is being carried out to gain a firmer evidence base in this area.

The analysis also showed that workers with the poorest basic skills are more likely to be found out of work.

Schools (Ethnic Mix)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what steps he is taking to promote a greater ethnic mix in schools in multi-ethnic areas; and if he will make a statement. [136074]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: The Code of Practice on School Admissions was revised in January 2003 and makes it clear that all admission authorities have a duty to promote racial equality and should assess the impact of their admissions policies on ethnic minority pupils and parents.

Guidance issued earlier this year to School Organisation Committees asks them to consider the potential contribution to community cohesion when considering proposals for a new school. Schools can promote community cohesion by inclusive admission arrangements or by working with other local schools to bring children of different cultural and ethnic backgrounds together to promote understanding between different groups in our society.

Student Drop-out

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many students dropped out from undergraduate degree courses in each of the past five years, broken down by the year of their course in which the drop-out occurred. [131728]

Alan Johnson: The available information on the non-continuation of students beyond the first year in each university, and the projected course non-completion rate in each university is contained in "Performance Indicators in Higher Education in the UK" published by the Higher Education Funding Council for England, a copy of which is available from the House library. The latest edition, published in December 2002, gives figures for students starting full-time degree courses in the United Kingdom in 1999/00. No data are held covering those students who drop out of their course after two or three years.

The latest figures are given below. Corresponding data for 2000/01 will be published later in the autumn.

Completion rates of HE students in UK HE institutions

	Full-time first degree entrants
Students starting courses in academic year:	Percentage not continuing to 2nd year	Percentage who failed to complete the course
1996/97	10	18
1997/98	9	17
1998/99	10	17
1999/2000	10	17

Nationally, the non-completion rate has remained broadly the same at 17–18 per cent. since 1991–92, a period of considerable expansion of student numbers.

Figures published in 2003 by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) show that the UK has one of the lowest non-completion rates among OECD countries.

Student Performance Variations

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the "Education at a Glance" 2003: OECD Indicators finding that in the United Kingdom 82 per cent. of the variation in student performance lies within schools. [131954]

Alan Johnson: The OECD's "Education at a Glance" for 2003 reports the variation in reading literacy between schools in the UK to be 22.4 per cent. of the average variation in student performance across all OECD countries, and the corresponding variation in reading literacy within UK schools to be 82.3 per cent. Taken together, these variances imply that 78.6 per cent. of the total UK variance lay within schools, and 21.4 per cent. between.

A majority of the countries that participated in PISA 2000 showed a greater variation in performance within schools than between schools. Compared with the UK, within-school variation was higher in Australia, New Zealand, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Iceland and the USA. The UK had a similar level of within-school variation to Finland, Ireland and Canada. Countries that have more selection by ability tend to show more variation between schools and less variation within them, compared to countries with less selection.

An important contributor to the variation in reading literacy performance in schools is socio-economic background. We aim through our proposals for 14 to 19-year-olds[1] to transform the learning experience for young people, so that by the age of 16 they are committed to continued learning, whether in school, college or the workplace, whatever their home background.

Policies aimed at levelling up pupil attainment include:

the school work force reform programme, the central purpose of which is to give teachers more time to focus on activities that really make a difference—including the planning, preparation and assessment that enable teaching and learning to be tailored to individual pupil needs;

work to strengthen school leadership such as the National Professional Qualification for Headship, now run by the National College for School Leadership (NCSL) which also runs programmes to improve the performance of middle managers such as year heads; tracking pupil achievement more closely; and supporting parents and encouraging them to participate in their children's learning, in line with research evidence showing (i) that parental interest in their child's education between the ages of 11 and 16 has a more powerful effect on children's attainment than social class, size of family and level of parental education; and (ii) that good at-home parenting has a significant impact on children's education throughout the years of schooling.

The creation of the Children and Families Directorate and the recent publication of the Green Paper "Every Child Matters" reaffirm the Department's commitment to making life better for children and their families.

Teacher Numbers

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many qualified teachers were working in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools in each borough of London for each year since 1997. [135150]

Mr. Miliband: The following tables show full-time equivalent regular qualified teachers in maintained nursery/primary and secondary schools in each London authority in January of each year since 1997. During this period there was a decrease of 8,200 in the number of pupils in primary schools in London and an increase of 42,800 in secondary school pupil numbers. The tables exclude regular teachers without Qualified Teacher Status (QTS), for example, those on employment based routes leading to QTS and those who have overseas teaching qualifications. There were 5,400 full-time equivalent regular teachers without QTS in service in maintained nursery/primary and secondary schools in London in January 2003.

Tuition Fees

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what plans he has to change the income assessments for eligibility for full or partial remission of tuition fees. [136541]

Alan Johnson: We intend to keep the income thresholds at which students are eligible for full and partial fee remission under review. In addition, from 2004, the poorest 30 per cent. of students—those whose parental income is below £15,200—will receive a full HE grant of £1,000. From 2006–07, Higher Education Institutions will need to offer additional bursaries to students, as part of the access agreements they will draw up in return for the ability to charge variable fees of up to £3,000.

Undergraduate Courses

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many and what proportion of undergraduates failed to complete a course at a higher education institution, broken down by (a) institution and (b) course title, in each year since 1997. [133691]

Alan Johnson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 3 June 2003, Official Report, column 215W, which gave the latest available information on non-completion rates contained in "Performance Indicators in Higher Education", published by the Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE).

The next edition, covering students starting courses in 2000–01, is scheduled for publication later in the autumn.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Digital Television

Mr. David: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what percentage of (a) the UK and (b) Wales she estimates will be able to receive digital TV transmissions by January 2004. [135768]

Estelle Morris: The ITC and BBC advise that around 73.1 per cent. of UK households and around 56 per cent. of households situated in Wales are now able to receive the Freeview digital terrestrial television (DTT) service. We do not anticipate further significant coverage increases from the current transmitter sites at this stage. Work on developing a detailed plan for increased DTT coverage is on-going under the Digital Television Action Plan, a copy of which is available at www.digitaltelevision.gov.uk. Digital television services are also available to around 98 per cent. of UK households on digital satellite and to around 25 per cent. of households on digital cable.

Foreign Visitors (Romford)

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many foreign visitors she estimates visited Romford in 2002–03. [136474]

Mr. Caborn: The International Passenger Survey records visits to Romford as part of the total for London; figures on the number of visits by foreign residents specifically to Romford are not collected.

National Lottery

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what the total amount given in lottery grants was for each constituency in the past 10 years; and what the total amount of lottery money raised in each constituency was in the past 10 years, listed in descending order according to the amount spent in each constituency. [136964]

Estelle Morris: I am arranging for the information detailing the total amount given in lottery grants in each constituency to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Information about National Lottery ticket sales is not broken down by constituency, but the National Lottery Commission is able to provide information about sales broken down by postcode area. I shall write to my hon. Friend with it as soon as possible, placing copies of my letter in the Libraries of both Houses.

Ticket sales do not directly link to the overall amount of money raised by the lottery. Payments not in respect of ticket sales form a part of lottery income and this money cannot be attributed to any specific area.

Chris Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what the total amount of Lottery grants given to (a) the richest 100 wards in the UK and (b) the poorest 100 wards in the UK in the past 10 years was, in descending order. [136965]

Estelle Morris: Based on information provided by the Lottery distributors for the Department's Lottery awards database, and using the most recent Index of Multiple Deprivation, the amounts awarded to the most and least deprived wards are in the tables. Since 2000, due to boundary changes, a number of wards have ceased to exist and so are not shown in the tables.

The lists relate only to England as no comparable UK list is available.

New Community Development Fund

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what proportion of the New Community Development Fund sports budget will be allocated to (a) tennis, netball, hockey and swimming and (b) other women's and girls' sporting activities. [136794]

Mr. Caborn: Under the Community Club Development Programme, a total of £60 million has been made available over 2003–06 for the development of facilities at community sports clubs. Of that total, tennis will receive £9.4 million as one of four major participation sports (the others being football, rugby and cricket). Netball, hockey and swimming will receive £1.66 million each.

The Government have not made these funds available on the assumption that these, or other, sports are exclusively for women or girls. Each of the 16 sports included in the programme will make funds available for the encouragement of women's and girls' participation, against their own development plans.

Obesity

Mr. Best: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps her Department is taking to tackle obesity through sport. [136649]

Mr. Caborn: The Government are aware that obesity levels are rising, especially among young people. Raising levels of community participation is key to tackling this. The Government are addressing this by investing in high-quality local sport and activity resources which are available to all. The New Opportunities Fund (NOF) and Space for Sport and the Arts are putting over £581 million into new PE and school sport facilities in England and Wales, and putting over £400 million into local sports facilities, healthy living centres and activity centres for young people. In addition, we are supporting the vital network of 110,000 amateur sports clubs with a new £60 million capital investment, tax and charity breaks, and mandatory rate relief. £28 million is also being invested by my Department in the recruitment, training and deployment of sports coaches across the UK.

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Best: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will make a statement on co-ordination between regional development agencies and her Department on sport. [136648]

Mr. Caborn: Under its modernisation and restructuring programme, Sport England is devolving greater responsibility for funding decisions on community sports projects to its regional offices. New Regional Sports Boards, constituted as sub-committees of Sport England, will prepare Regional Sports Strategies in consultation with all relevant regional interests, including regional development agencies. The strategies will inform funding decisions in the regions.

The Department and Sport England also work directly with individual RDAs on specific issues, such as the long-term future of the British Grand Prix at Silverstone in which the East Midlands Development Agency is representing the Government in discussions with key players. The Department's Olympic Games Unit is also working very closely with the London Development Agency (LDA) in support of the 2012 Olympic Bid, and earlier this year met with representatives of all nine RDAs to discuss the implications across the country of staging the Games. The Department and Sport England continue to work closely with the LDA on monitoring the construction of the new National Stadium at Wembley.

Summer Activities (Young People)

Mr. Best: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will make a statement on her Department's funded programme of summer activities for young people. [136650]

Estelle Morris: The Department for Culture, Media and Sport is working with other Government Departments and agencies to deliver the Positive Activities for Young People (PAYP) programme during all school holidays, including half-term breaks. The programme builds on the success of last year's Splash Extra and Summer Plus schemes and aims to reduce youth offending, encourage children and young people to return to education or training and build community cohesion.

PAYP engages young people through arts, sports and educational activities. It is targeted at those young people most at risk of offending or truancy and areas where community cohesion or street crime is identified as being a particular problem.

It will run for an initial period of three years and is funded by the Department for Education and Skills, the Home Office and by the National Lottery through the New Opportunities Fund. The Youth Justice Board is making an in-kind contribution. The funds available for the first year total £25 million and funding for years 2 and 3, to be confirmed shortly, will remain at least at this level. The programme is being delivered through the Government Offices for the Regions who in turn appoint sub-regional Lead Delivery Agents to plan provision according to local need. The most at risk young people receive key worker support to ensure continuity between school holiday periods.

The programme ran in four locations in the Leeds North West constituency and provided a total number of 549 places on 126 activities.

A full evaluation of the effectiveness of the year-round holiday provision is under way and key findings are expected to be available around May 2004. In the meantime initial feedback from the summer and half term programmes—which is still being collated—suggests a high level of take-up of the schemes over these periods and promising associated benefits.

DEFENCE

Armed Forces (Pay)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether all personnel have received their pay on time during the last six months; what irregularities have been reported; and if he will make a statement. [136577]

Mr. Caplin: 51 RAF trainees experienced a delay in receiving their monthly salary for October 2003. This was caused by an oversight in creating an officer's computer pay record for each of the personnel affected. These records have now been created, and the personnel affected paid.

No other delays affecting significant numbers have been reported during the last six months, and over 99.9 per cent. of electronic monthly payments to personnel have been made on time. Inevitably, however, given the size of our armed forces, isolated cases of delays due to administrative errors can occur.

Arms Fairs

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to support arms fairs. [136295]

Mr. Ingram: The support given by the Ministry of Defence to defence exhibitions at home and overseas will continue in accordance with the Government's policy of assisting the United Kingdom defence industry in its aim to achieve legitimate exports.

Campaign Medals

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when Servicemen and women who served in Afghanistan in 2001–02 will be given their campaign medals. [136955]

Mr. Caplin: Service in Afghanistan on Operation Veritas from 11 September 2001 to a date to be announced has been recognised by the institution of the Operational Service Medal. Command Paper Cm 5939, which contains the detailed qualifying criteria, was laid before Parliament on 8 September 2003 and a Defence Council Instruction was subsequently published on 31 October 2003. The issue of medals will commence upon receipt of applications from Service personnel.

Mr. Flook: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when Servicemen and women who served in Operation Telic in Iraq in 2003 will be given their campaign medals. [136956]

Mr. Caplin: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 23 October 2003, Official Report, column 654W, to the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Gerald Howarth). I can add that the detailed eligibility criteria have since been completed by the Department and passed to the Committee on the Grant of Honours, Decorations and Medals for their approval. The work is progressing well.

Deepcut Barracks Inquiry

Lembit Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures his Department has taken to implement each of the recommendations contained in Surrey Police's inquiry into the deaths at Deepcut Barracks; what the timeframe for implementation is; and if he will make a statement. [135937]

Mr. Ingram: The Surrey Police have yet to produce their fifth and final report and the Ministry of Defence is therefore not aware of the detailed recommendations it will contain. However, the Army has worked closely with Surrey Police to develop a learning account to ensure that the key lessons arising from these tragic deaths are identified and swiftly acted upon. This learning account contains 28 recommendations. Of these recommendations, 25 have been implemented and the remaining three are well in hand.

Fissile Material

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much fissile material has been produced in each year from 1979 to date; and how much is presently held, broken down into material classified as (a) high level, (b) intermediate level and (c) low level material. [135078]

Mr. Ingram: Since 1979, deliveries of fissile material, under Ministry of Defence production contracts, have been as follows (rounded to the nearest kilogram):

	Kilogram
1989–90	181
1990–91	271
1991–92	179
1992–93	268
1993–94	181
1994–95	171
1995–96	21

Fissile material is not classified in the categories requested, which are used to describe levels of radioactive waste. I am therefore unable to provide the information in the form requested.

HMS Trafalgar

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the expected commissioning date is of HMS Trafalgar; where the nuclear reactor Power Range Tests will be carried out prior to commissioning; and if he will make a statement. [136519]

Mr. Ingram: HMS Trafalgar is currently undergoing a Revalidation Assisted Maintenance Period at Devonport. She has not been de-commissioned, and this work will not involve re-fuelling the reactor. There is therefore no requirement for Power Range Testing. HMS Trafalgar is expected to return to service early 2004.

Iraq

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) United Kingdom troops and (b) troops from the Territorial Army are serving in Iraq. [134435]

Mr. Ingram: We currently have around 11,000 United Kingdom service personnel serving in Iraq, of which approximately 1,800 are members of the Territorial Army.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many packets have been sent to armed forces personnel stationed in the Gulf free of charge since the scheme was launched. [136398]

Mr. Ingram: It is not possible to give the precise number of packets sent to members of Her Majesty's forces and entitled civilians on Operation Telic since the service was instituted on 17 April 2003, as numbers are calculated by sampling rather than counting of individual items. However, as at Friday 31 October 2003, we calculate that some 570,000 free packets have been sent.

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his answer of 1 September, Official Report, column 905W, on Iraq, what the outcome was of the investigation; and if he will place a copy of the relevant communications log in the Library. [131785]

Mr. Ingram: The Ministry of Defence is determined to do all we can to establish the facts, and to bring to account those responsible for the deaths of the six Royal Military Police soldiers killed so tragically in Iraq on 24 June. It would not be appropriate to comment while the SIB investigation is still ongoing and we cannot put a timeframe on how long the investigation might take. Once it has been completed a full report will be given to the families concerned. The next of kin are being kept informed of the investigation's progress. I will make public as many of its findings as possible, subject to operational and other security constraints.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how often he receives briefings from the Commander of British Forces in Iraq. [132132]

Mr. Hoon: I receive regular briefings on operations in Iraq, which include input from the Commander of British Forces in Iraq. These are supplemented with additional briefings where necessary.

Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the number of deaths of (a) Iraqi civilians and (b) Iraqi military personnel (i) during the recent conflict and (ii) since the formal cessation of hostilities. [133234]

Mr. Ingram: I refer my hon. Friend to the answers given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 16 June 2003, Official Report, column 55W, to the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) and the answer I gave to the hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Adam Price) on 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 7W.

Kazakhstan

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions (a) he, (b) Ministers in his Department and (c) other representatives of the Government have had with representatives of the Government of Kazakhstan concerning the (i) storage, (ii) disposal and (iii) security of ex-Soviet (A) biological and (B) chemical weapons located in Kazakhstan; and if he will make a statement. [136308]

Mr. Ingram: We are not aware of any discussions with the Government of Kazakhstan concerning the storage, disposal, or security of possible ex-Soviet biological and chemical weapons located in Kazakhstan.

Under the Chemical Weapons Convention (CWC), a state is obliged to declare any chemical weapons (CW) on their territory. Kazakhstan is a state party to the CWC and has not declared any CW being located in Kazakhstan. Kazakhstan is not a state party to the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention.

Low Flying

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether there was a low-flying field training exercise in October in the Severn Valley area. [136014]

Mr. Caplin: There were no major low-flying training exercises in the Severn Valley area during October. Any military aircraft sighted will probably have been undertaking routine military low-flying training.

Ministry of Defence Police

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the first statutory inspection of the Ministry of Defence Police by Her Majesty's Inspector of Constabularies, under the Police Reform Act 2002, will take place; and if he will make a statement. [136392]

Mr. Caplin: The first statutory inspection of the Ministry of Defence Police by her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary, under the Police Reform Act 2002, was conducted between June and October 2003. In common with other Home Department police forces, MDP underwent a baseline assessment of its core business areas. The draft assessment is expected in January 2004 and will be followed by a rolling programme of follow-up visits.

North Site (Malvern)

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his plans are for the future of North Site, Malvern. [136957]

Mr. Caplin: The site was handed to Defence Estates on 27 March this year and is being prepared for disposal on the open market.

Nuclear Warfare

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the United Kingdom (a) withdrew the last nuclear free-fall bomb, (b) reduced the operationally available stockpile of nuclear warheads to below 200, (c) reduced the number of warheads deployed on Trident submarines to 48 warheads and (d) placed fissile material no longer required for defence purposes under international safeguards. [135913]

Mr. Ingram: The United Kingdom withdrew the last nuclear free-fall bomb in March 1998. We have made adjustments to ensure the operationally available stockpile of nuclear warheads has been below 200 since that policy was announced as part of the Strategic Defence Review in July 1998. We reduced the number of warheads deployed on Trident submarines to 48 warheads by December 1998. Since 1990, we have placed fissile material no longer required for defence purposes under international safeguards, with significant volumes of material being brought into safeguards in July and August 1998.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what further actions his Department will pursue to implement the disarmament measures identified at the end of the 2000 Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty Review Conference. [135914]

Mr. Hoon: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 5 November 2003, Official Report, column 662W, to the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell).

Purchasing Strategy

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to take into consideration (a) the social issues involving the employment of disabled people, (b) strategic issues regarding product development and (c) response times to crises, when determining his Department's purchasing strategy; and if he will make a statement. [135763]

Mr. Ingram: The decision on the appropriate purchasing strategy for any procurement has to take into account a wide range of factors, underpinned by the need to provide the armed forces with the equipment they require at best value for money for the taxpayer. As set out in the Government's Defence Industrial Policy (published in October 2002), these factors include, amongst others, security of supply and the ability to respond in times of crises, and the implications for key technologies and industrial capabilities.

Most contracts for the procurement of goods and services include an express condition of contract which encourages our prime contractors to give consideration to the placing of sub-contract work with Supported Employment Enterprises.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what factors underlay the decision to change the purchasing strategy of chemical and biological warfare protection suits by changing the tender from UK only to international sourcing; and if he will make a statement. [135764]

Mr. Ingram: There has been no change in the Ministry of Defence's purchasing strategy for chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear (CBRN) warfare protection suits with regard to the tendering process. These items are classed as warlike stores and as such are exempt from the requirement to advertise in the European Journal (OJEC). The Department advertises its requirements for these items in the MOD Contracts Bulletin. Any company may respond and the Department will run a competition to ensure that its requirements are met in the most cost-effective way.

The procurement of CBRN suits is included in the Defence Logistic Organisation's procurement reform strategy, for Supplier Base Optimisation, which is still under review.

Regiments

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the (a) Queen's Lancashire Regiment and (b) King's Regiment. [135810]

Mr. Ingram: There are no plans to disband the Queen's Lancashire Regiment or the King's Regiment.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

September Sittings

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Leader of the House what representations he has received about the September sitting of the House. [136500]

Mr. Hain: A number of Members have raised with me their view on September sittings—both for and against—by raising it in the Chamber, at business questions and questions to the Leader of the House, and in private discussion. I have had one letter from an hon. Member on the subject, in favour of the change. I have received representations from two outside organisations on the dates of the September sittings.

In my view, the September sitting was successful in conducting important business and in allowing the Prime Minister and other Members of the Cabinet to be questioned and challenged on key issues such as Iraq for which there might otherwise have been demands for a recall of the House.

Sitting Hours

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Leader of the House what recent representations he has received about the sitting hours of the House. [136499]

Mr. Hain: A number of Members have raised with me their view on the sitting hours—both for and against the change—by raising it in the Chamber, at business questions and questions to the Leader of the House, by letter and in private discussion; and I am aware of early-day motions on the subject. I have had no representations from outside Parliament in favour of the House reverting to its former hours. The House has agreed the change for the remainder of this Parliament and will need to review the matter before then.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Call Centres

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether his Department plans to outsource call centre work to premises outside the United Kingdom. [132111]

Mr. Pearson: Northern Ireland Departments and the NIO have no plans to outsource call centre work to premises outside the United Kingdom.

Terrorism

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what his assessment is of the current terrorist threat level in Northern Ireland. [135395]

Jane Kennedy: Recent activity by dissident republicans and loyalists shows that they still pose a threat to the peace process. However, the security forces continue to disrupt, intercept or thwart their operations through good intelligence-led policing and covert operations.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Bailiffs

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs how many complaints have been made in each year since 1997 concerning the conduct of bailiffs; how many complaints have been investigated; how many complaints have resulted in a prosecution; how many convictions there were concerning the conduct of bailiffs; and if he will publish a list of banned bailiffs. [136800]

Mr. Leslie: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Divorced Parents

Sir Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs pursuant to his answer of 22 October 2003, Official Report, column 631W, on divorced parents, if he will commission research on the impact upon children of one divorced parent being given leave to remove their children from the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [136099]

Mr. Lammy: There are no plans to commission such research. Applications to remove children from the jurisdiction (of England and Wales) are made under Section 13(1)(b) of the Children Act 1989. The Section stipulates that where a residence order made under the Act is in force with respect to a child, no person may

"remove him from the United Kingdom; without either the written consent of every person who has parental responsibility for the child or the leave of the court".

However, to take a child out of the country either parent requires the written or oral consent of the other parent, even if it is for less than one month. Where there is a residence order in place, the parent in whose favour the residence order is made may remove or send the child outside the UK for up to one month, provided there are no other court orders in place, e.g. a prohibited steps order. When making a residence order, the court may grant the necessary leave to remove the child either generally or for specific purpose.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs pursuant to his answer of 22 October 2003, Official Report, column 631W, on divorced parents, if he will estimate the percentage of cases in which divorced mothers are successful in obtaining leave to remove their children from the United Kingdom. [136100]

Mr. Lammy: We do not have the data available to enable such an estimate to be made. Figures are kept of the total number of orders made under section 13 of the Children Act 1989 for removal from the jurisdiction since 2000 (when figures were first collected). Separate figures are not held for mothers and fathers.

Forfeiture/Security of Tenure Inquiry

Mr. Lepper: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs if he will make a statement on the scope of the inquiry by the Law Commission into forfeiture and security of tenure; and when he expects the inquiry to be completed. [135877]

Mr. Lammy: The Law Commission is carrying out two reviews dealing with forfeiture and tenancy issues:

(1) The 'Termination of Tenancies' review addresses the whole law of forfeiture including the right of landlords to terminate a tenancy by physical re-entry. The Commission hopes to complete a consultation paper this year. A report will be published later.

(2) The 'Housing in the Rented Sector' review considers the legal basis of landlord and tenant relationships, in particular, the form of tenancies offered by local authorities, other social landlords, and by private landlords. A report will be published on 5 November followed by a further report and draft Bill next year.

Legal Representation (Deaths in Custody)

Chris Ruane: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs if the Secretary of State will make funding available for legal representation of families whose children have died in custody. [135787]

Mr. Lammy: An applicant who is a member of the deceased's immediate family may obtain public funding for representation at an inquest, where the deceased has died in custody, if:

(i) the applicant satisfies the standard financial eligibility tests, and

(ii) legal representation is necessary to assist the coroner to investigate the case effectively.

Ministerial Meetings

Keith Vaz: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs how many meetings (a) he and (b) other Ministers in his Department have held with (i) Lord Bingham, (ii) Lord Woolf and (iii) Lord Irvine since he took office. [127404]

Mr. Lammy: Since taking office the Secretary of State has had three meetings with Lord Bingham and five meetings with Lord Woolf. He has not met with Lord Irvine.

I have had one meeting with Lord Woolf, Christopher Leslie has met him twice and Lord Pilkin has met with him once. Don Touhig and Anne Maguire have not met with Lord Woolf.

None of the Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State has met with Lord Bingham or Lord Irvine.

Petitions

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs how many (a) company winding-up petitions, (b) creditors' petitions, (c) debtors' petitions and (d) insolvency petitions were issued per quarter in each year since 1997, broken down by (i) county court, (ii) county and (iii) region. [136799]

Mr. Leslie: A copy of the figures requested has been placed in the Library of both Houses.

Public Information

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Department for Constitutional Affairs what requirements there are that changes in Government regulations and orders should be made publicly available before they come into force. [136171]

Mr. Alexander: I have been asked to reply.

The arrangements for production of all new regulations and orders are governed by the Statutory Instruments Act 1946 and the Statutory Instruments Regulations 1947. The Cabinet Office issues guidance to Departments in the form of the Statutory Instrument Practice manual (SIP), which can be downloaded from HMSOnline at: http://www.hmso.gov.uk/services/si_practice.htm

The guidance in SIP sets out that the date chosen for the coming into force of new regulations and orders should take into account the production time for printing and publication. Where an instrument creates a new offence, Departments need to ensure that the instrument is issued in good time allowing the public to study the instrument before it comes into force.

All new instruments issued each day can be accessed on HMSOnline at: http://www.hmso.gov.uk/legislation/whatsnew.htm and in the Statutory Instruments Issue List, which is published as part of The Stationery Office (TSO) Daily List of Publications. It is good practice for Departments to ensure publicity for all new instruments before they come into force.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Antisocial Behaviour

Clive Efford: To ask the Solicitor-General what steps she has taken to ensure that the Crown Prosecution Service uses powers available under the Police Reform Act 2002 when dealing with cases of antisocial behaviour. [136221]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) has issued guidance on the procedures to be followed in cases when it is appropriate to remind a court of its power to make an order on conviction in criminal proceedings pursuant to section 1C of the Crime and Disorder Act 1988, as amended by the Police Reform Act 2002.

In appropriate cases, the prosecutor will remind the court of its power to make an order on conviction and will draw the court's attention to the facts of the case that are relevant to the making of an order, together with details of any relevant previous convictions.

The Anti-Social Behaviour Bill seeks to provide the CPS with express power to apply for orders on conviction and to call additional evidence to be led at a contested hearing of an order on conviction, which need not be restricted or linked to the criminal case before court. The CPS will issue further guidance and training to reflect these changes.

Clive Efford: To ask the Solicitor-General what action she has taken to ensure that the Crown Prosecution Service co-operates with (a) local authorities and (b) police forces to deal with cases of antisocial behaviour. [136222]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service has assembled a project team to deal with issues arising from the Anti-Social Behaviour Bill. The aims of the project are: firstly, to develop national guidance with the police dealing with the evidence required to pursue an order on conviction and the type of conditions to be sought; and secondly, to develop local protocols with the police and local authorities as to when it will be appropriate for each agency to take the lead in dealing with applications for orders and prosecuting breaches.

The Home Office Anti-Social Behaviour Unit has agreed to fund a network of 10 to 12 local anti-social behaviour prosecutors within the Crown Prosecution Service. These local experts will engage with the local community and will work with a central project team to issue guidance. They will assist in developing protocols with local agencies, encourage the use of orders on conviction and coordinate local training.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Solicitor-General how many anti-social behaviour prosecutors will join the Crown Prosecution Service; and what their powers will be. [136270]

The Solicitor-General: The Home Office Anti-Social Behaviour Unit has agreed to fund a network of 10 to 12 local antisocial behaviour prosecutors with the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS). These local experts will engage with the local community and will work with a central team to issue guidance, develop protocols and provide training across the CPS.

The prosecutors will be deployed in areas where a high level of antisocial behaviour orders are sought, although they will be expected to share good practice across the CPS. They will: prosecute antisocial behaviour and low-level disorder offences; establish good links with local communities and agencies; encourage the use of orders on conviction; and coordinate local training.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the Lord Chancellor intends to reply to the letter to him dated 21 October from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mrs. C. Whitehurst. [85146]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Lord Chancellor replied to the right hon. Member's letter on 4 December. I apologise to the right hon. Member for the delay in responding to his letter. This was due to an administrative error, and officials have reviewed procedures for handling correspondence as a result.

Family Proceedings Rules Committee

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if the Lord Chancellor will place the schedule of meetings of the Family Proceedings Rules Committee for the next six months in the Library. [84756]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Family Proceedings Rule Committee has no statutory obligation to meet to conduct its business. Drafts of Family Proceedings Rules are circulated to Members for comments and, when they are content, for signature.

HEALTH

Genetically Modified Food

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research has been (a) commissioned and (b) published on post-marketing monitoring of the safety of GM food for people and GM feed for animals. [136191]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 3 November 2003]: The Food Standards Agency (FSA) has funded a feasibility study on the post-market monitoring of genetically modified (GM) foods. The report from this study was published on the FSA website on 23 July 2003. No research has been commissioned on the post-market monitoring of GM animal feed.

Accidental Injury

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to improve the local surveillance of accidental injury. [135316]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 30 October 2003]: The South West Public Health Observatory is working on a pilot basis with the national health service-wide clearing service to run quarterly extracts of specific variables from the accident and emergency minimum data set in the South West. There are currently problems with the quality of the data, and with the level of participation by individual trusts. If these problems can be resolved, it may be possible to replicate the system in other regions.

Breast Cancer (Northumberland)

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average period between screening for breast cancer and notification of the result of the screening was in the Northumberland strategic health authority area for the latest three-month period for which figures are available. [135518]

Miss Melanie Johnson: This information is not collected centrally.

Cancer Services

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evaluation of improvements to cancer services in the NHS he has commissioned. [133893]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 27 October 2003]: A National Cancer Patient Survey took place in 2001. Over 65,000 cancer patients discharged between July 1999 and June 2000 responded. The outcome of the survey was published in July 2002 and is available at: http://www.doh.gov.uk/nhspatients/cancersurvey. It provides a baseline measurement of cancer patients' experience of care in the national health service against which improvements can be monitored. The results of the survey were shared with, among others, cancer networks and NHS trusts who should have studied their local results and taken action to respond to them. Responsibility for the national survey programme, and therefore repeating this survey, has now moved to the Commission for Health Improvement.

A Manual of Cancer Services Standards was published in February 2001 against which cancer networks in England can assess the quality of services they are providing. A process of peer review took place in 2001 to assess compliance with these standards. A second round of peer review will commence in summer 2004.

The "NHS Cancer Plan—Three-year progress report: Maintaining the Momentum" available at www.doh.ov.uk/cancer/progressreport2003 was published on 28 October 2003. It describes overall progress on implementation of the NHS Cancer Plan.

Chorley and South Ribble Hospital

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients have been treated at Chorley and South Ribble Hospital accident and emergency in the last 12 months; how many people from Chorley have been taken to Royal Preston Hospital accident and emergency; and how many patients waited longer than four hours for treatment at (a) Chorley and (b) Preston hospitals. [135805]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested is not available.

Disabled People (Assistance)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what non-financial assistance is available to families with disabled (a) adults and (b) children. [136148]

Dr. Ladyman: All disabled people have full access to national health service primary, secondary and tertiary health care services. Disabled people have the right to receive an assessment of their care needs by their local social services department. Those eligible, according to local criteria, may receive a wide range of services to meet their need, provided as a "package" of support by social services and/or the health service.

Services available include:

Advice, guidance and counselling;

Home care and home help;

Equipment and adaptations to use at home;

Day time opportunities/day centres providing facilities for recreation and training for independent living skills;

Day care, covering day nurseries, registered childminders and part-time playgroups respite care provision, either in peoples own homes or elsewhere;

Nursing and medical support.

In addition, people may receive direct payments, which are cash payments in lieu of social services, giving individuals greater choice and control over how their support needs are met—allowing people to buy their own package of care.

Domestic Accidents

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had with (a) other Government Departments, (b) local authorities and (c) other agencies to establish a co-ordinated approach to preventing accidents in the home. [135317]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 30 October 2003]: Other Government Departments, local authorities, and other agencies were represented on the Accidental Injury Task Force, whose report was published in October 2002. Subsequent discussions with Government Departments and with regional directors of public health have shown that better co-ordination will depend on integrating injury prevention into broader programmes on the needs of children and older people, with particular emphasis on health inequalities.

This is now being pursued in implementing the older peoples' national service framework (NSF), in preparing the remainder of the NSF for children, and in contributing to cross-Government policy proposals for these groups, for example in the Ministerial Sub-Committee on Older People.

Family Planning Clinics

Mr. John Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has (a) to develop family planning clinics and (b) for the development of a career structure for family planning doctors. [135886]

Miss Melanie Johnson: A stated aim of the National Strategy for Sexual Health and HIV is to reduce levels of unintended pregnancies, and the provision of good quality contraception services will play a major role in achieving this aim. Contraceptive services should be available through a range of settings including general practice and specialist care settings, and the Department has issued guidance on good practice in commissioning those services, as well as providing additional investment of £1 million this year to improve access. The Department has also convened a group of experts, including representatives from the Faculty of Family Planning and Reproductive Healthcare, the Royal College of General Practitioners and the Family Planning Association, to define and implement a work-plan to support the improvement of contraception services at primary care trust level. This group will also work with the Faculty of Family Planning to consider issues of staffing and career development.

Fluoridation

Mr. Simon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice the Chief Medical Officer has given on the potential effects of fluoridated drinking water for a patient diagnosed with chronic obstructive pulmonary disorder. [134246]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Department is not aware of any evidence that the effects of fluoridated drinking water differ between people with and without chronic obstructive pulmonary disease.

Food Supplements Directive

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the outcome of the recent meeting between the Food Standards Agency and the European Food Safety Authority to discuss difficulties anticipated by industry in preparing dossiers of information to support the inclusion of substances on the lists of nutrients and nutrient sources appended to the Food Supplements Directive; and what plans the Food Standards Agency has to continue that dialogue. [135264]

Miss Melanie Johnson: On 14 October, representatives from food supplement industry trade associations met with representatives of the European Food Safety Authority (EFSA) to discuss requirements for dossiers supporting addition of nutrient sources to the lists appended to the Food Supplements Directive. The meeting was constructive. EFSA representatives indicated that applicants should submit data establishing the identity and purity of the nutrient source, and any available safety data. EFSA would then advise whether further data were required, taking into account similarities with substances which have already been approved either as nutrient sources or as additives. This, together with advice that combined dossiers for similar substances are welcome, means that dossier preparation costs for many of the 'missing' substances will be significantly lower than previously estimated. The Food Standards Agency is writing to inform interested parties of the outcome and will continue to liaise with EFSA and European Commission representatives on this issue.

Gene Transfer

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what published research involving humans he has assessed which examines the potential for horizontal gene transfer from GM bacteria to gut bacteria; how many people were involved in the experiments; what evidence of gene transfer was identified; and what research he has commissioned on this subject. [136064]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 4 November 2003]: The Department of Health has not commissioned any research that looks at horizontal gene transfer from genetically modified (GM) bacteria to gut bacteria. The Food Standards Agency (FSA) however has published research on the use of human volunteers to examine the potential for horizontal gene transfer from GM food to gut bacteria. Seven people were involved in the study. No intact DNA was shown to be transferred to intestinal tract bacteria. The current state of knowledge regarding gene transfer was reviewed in the GM science review. This concluded that "transgenic DNA is no different from other DNA consumed as part of the normal diet and it will have a similar fate". The science review is available in the Library.

Applications to use oral GM bacteria are assessed on a case by case basis by either the Health and Safety Executive (under the Contained Use Regulations), or by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (under the Deliberate Release Regulations). Each application involving the use of GM bacteria is comprehensively evaluated with regard to safety, including gene transfer.

Genetics Research

Kevin Brennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the organisations which have applied for the special research funding announced in the Government's White Paper on Genetics, (b) the value of each bid and (c) the single gene disorders related to each bid. [135486]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 4 November 2003]: Bids are treated in strict confidence and the information requested cannot be given. The specific clinical conditions to be addressed through the funding for both pharmacogenetic research and research into gene therapy for single gene disorders will depend on what bids are submitted by the research community and how the individual bids stand up to rigorous assessment through peer review. Details of grants awarded will be added to the national research register at www.doh.gov.uk/research/nrr.htm.

Genito-urinary Medicine

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many genito-urinary management clinics there are in (a) Chesham and Amersham and (b) Buckinghamshire. [136574]

Ms Rosie Winterton [holding answer on 5 November 2003]: There are three genito-urinary management (GUM) clinics in Buckinghamshire; at Milton Keynes, Aylesbury and Wycombe. There are no GUM clinics in Chesham and Amersham.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to increase the number of genito-urinary management clinics in England. [136575]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 5 November 2003]: The Department of Health is working to improve access to genito urinary medicine (GUM) services. Primary care trusts should ensure that local GUM services are designed to meet local needs. The Department of Health is supporting them in this role through the provision of additional investment to 'pump-prime' GUM services and address long-waiting times and backlogs in those areas where it is most needed.

£13 million was invested in GUM services in 2003–04 and over £6 million in 2002–03, with additional funding of £5 million announced this year in our response to the Health Select Committee's report on sexual health. To support those areas with little or no GUM services, or where services are struggling to cope with demand, a further £2 million in 2003–04 will be used to establish a small number of development schemes to pump-prime the establishment of new services or further develop those already in existence.

The Department of Health is also continuing to work to increase the role of primary care in the provision of sexual health services which will help to relieve the pressure on GUM services.

The Department of Health is also continuing to work to increase the role of primary care in the provision of sexual health services which will help to relieve the pressure on GUM services.

Head Lice

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what research evidence he has collated on the (a) incidence and (b) spread of head lice in schools; and what advice he offers head teachers to deal with the problem; [136009]

(2) what discussions he has had with the Department for Education and Skills on strategies to eliminate head lice in schools. [136010]

Dr. Ladyman: The Department's policy research programme and the central national health service research and development programmes are not currently supporting research into this subject, due to the pressure of other priorities. The Medical Research Council (MRC), which is funded by the Office of Science and Technology, commissions most of the Government's research into bio-medical and clinical issues. The MRC is always open to new sound scientific proposals, in competition with other applications.

Head lice infestation is a relatively common problem among school age children, which is dealt with at local level. Our policy, which is shared by the Department for Education and Skills, is to encourage a "whole school approach" to the detection and treatment of head lice. This entails encouraging parents to check their children and other family members for head lice as need arises, and arranging treatment where necessary with such advice and support from the local primary health care team (general practitioner, health visitor, school nurse or local pharmacist) as they may require. If this exercise is successfully undertaken at the same time by all parents of children within a school, then the spread of head lice will be arrested.

This Department is in regular contact with the Department for Education and Skills on a range of health issues relating to pupils' health, including the treatment of head lice. Officials from both Departments provide advice to schools and parents on head lice control, including a leaflet containing guidance on prevention and treatment. This is also available on the Department's website at: http://www.doh.gov.uk/headlice/ including translations in 10 languages.

Health Care (York)

Hugh Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what NHS expenditure (a) in cash terms and (b) at current prices on services provided by GP surgeries, other than NHS prescription items, was in York in each year since 1992. [135958]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Information for York is not available. The table shows information for the nearest geographical match to York.

Hugh Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made with implementing the National Service Framework for Older People in York. [136052]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Selby and York Primary Care Trust (PCT) submitted a report on progress towards the milestones set out in the national service framework to its older people's partnership board in September 2003. This report shows the work which has been done to bring about improvements for older people, to work in partnership across organisational boundaries and to ensure a sharp focus on the development of services that are person/patient-centred, joined-up, timely and active in promoting health in older age. A full copy of the report is available from Selby and York PCT.

Hugh Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when digital hearing aids will be offered to NHS patients in York. [136053]

Miss Melanie Johnson: York Hospitals National Health Service Trust will begin fitting digital hearing aids as part of the modernised hearing aid service by March 2004.

Health Services (North-West)

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been spent in the NHS in the North West since 1992. [134893]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Expenditure in the area covered by the former North West Regional Office and the North West Regional Health Authority areas since 1992–93 is shown in the table.

	£ million

Notes:
1. The figures are based on the North West Regional Office area as in 2001–02, taking into consideration boundary changes over the period.
2. Figures do not include NHS expenditure, which is not accounted for by the health authorities, eg General Dental Services.
3. Figures are not consistent between years as there have been considerable changes in the types of expenditure accounted for by health authorities in different years, eg prescribing expenditure.
4. All figures are cash based.

Mental Health

Mrs. Calton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the long-term savings to the NHS that might be achieved by the provision of free prescriptions for people with long-term mental health problems. [135963]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The Department has not made an assessment of the long-term savings to the national health service of providing free prescriptions for people with mental health problems.

Our policy is to help those who may have difficulty in paying prescription charges, rather than extending the exemption arrangements. By using a prescription prepayment certificate, no one need pay more than £32.90 for four months or £90.40 for 12 months, for all the NHS medication that they are prescribed.

Nurses

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provisions in the Statutory Instrument on Nurses, Midwives and Health Visitors Rules Approval, SI No. 873, 1983, are still in force. [136164]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 4 November 2003]: The provisions made in these rules (now operated by the Nursing and Midwifery Council) remain effective. These remain in force by virtue of schedule 2 of the Nursing and Midwifery Order 2001 (S.I. 2002/253).

Paediatric Services

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to ensure that drug treatments currently licensed for adults are evaluated and made available for paediatric use. [134495]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The current legislative framework governing the authorisation of medicinal products contains neither obligations nor incentives to either evaluate medicinal products for use in the paediatric population or to make the products available for paediatric use. The United Kingdom is taking an active part in developing European legislation which will establish a system of obligations and incentives for the development and evaluation of medicines for paediatrics use. This is, however, unlikely to be finalised before 2006.

In the meantime, the UK will continue to use the existing regulatory framework to encourage the pharmaceutical industry to evaluate medicines for use in the paediatric population. The Committee on Safety of Medicines, an independent expert committee that advises the Licensing Authority has established a paediatric sub-group to provide expert advice on the regulatory strategy to improve the availability of medicines licensed for use in children.

The Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency (MHRA) routinely asks companies for paediatric development plans where appropriate, both pre- and post-licensing. In addition, when a marketing authorisation for a medicinal product is granted or amended the pharmaceutical companies are required by the Licensing Authority to provide evidence-based statements on paediatric use in the summary of product characteristics. The MHRA monitors authorisations granted for the paediatric use of medicines in the United States and contacts the marketing authorisation holder with a request for the data to be submitted to the MHRA for assessment. Several companies have submitted data in response to such requests and UK authorisations for paediatric use have been granted as a result. In other cases, the MHRA has asked companies to consider developing formulations of medicinal products that are specifically adapted for paediatric use. Following positive responses, the MHRA is actively discussing formulation development plans with several companies.

The MHRA is keeping the UK pharmaceutical industry informed of legislative developments at the European level and has offered to give regulatory and scientific advice on the development of medicines for paediatric use.

Palliative Care

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list those hospices that have received funds from the money which was earmarked for palliative care in the NHS Cancer Plan in 2003–04; and how much of the money has been retained by NHS trusts; [135385]

(2) if he will make a statement on the grounds on which funds from the NHS Cancer Plan for palliative care are allocated to hospices. [135386]

Miss Melanie Johnson: We do not hold a centralised list of those hospices that have received funding from the additional £50 million for specialist palliative care, the allocation of which was recently announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health. This additional money is for specialist palliative care services in their entirety, and not for voluntary hospices alone. The overall level of funding for hospices, both from allocation to cancer networks from the £50 million and from local resources, is a matter for local discussion and agreement.

The National Partnership Group for palliative care (NPG) which is made up of representatives from the voluntary sector (including hospices), the national health service and the Department, set out clear criteria for the use of the funding, which included evidence of local consultation and partnership working between all stakeholders in deciding how the additional funding should be invested.

Polymer Fume Fever

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research he has collated on a possible relationship between the creation of toxins from the heating of Teflon-coated pans and the onset of polymer fever in humans; and if he will make a statement. [133102]

Miss Melanie Johnson: 'Polymer fume fever' is a term applied to an influenza-like illness associated with the inhalation of products resulting from heating polytetrafluoroethylene (PTFE, marketed under the trade name Teflon) and other fluorocarbon polymers, to temperatures of about 300–450 degrees centigrade. These temperatures are well above those involved in cooking food in non-stick pans. Polymer fume fever is usually a mild and self limiting condition. Almost all reports of this condition relate to occupational exposure. Although the temperatures needed could arise from the misuse of non-stick pans, this does not appear to be a significant problem in practice. There is only one case report in the published literature which attributed these symptoms to exposure to fumes from an unattended cooking pan which overheated (Blandford et al. A case of PTFE poisoning in cockatiels accompanied by polymer fume fever in the owner. Vet Record v.96 175–6 (1975)).

Prescription Charges

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his policy is in respect of prescription charges for those who suffer long-term mental illness. [135601]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Improving services for people with mental health problems is a priority for the Government. Our policy is to help those who may have difficulty in paying prescription charges, rather than extending the exemption arrangements. By using a prescription prepayment certificate, no one need pay more than £32.90 for four months or £90.40 for 12 months for all the national health service medication that they are prescribed.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on (i) the way that different groups are treated when considered for exemptions from prescription charges and (ii) whether charges deter people from having their prescription dispensed; and if he will make a statement. [136073]

Ms Rosie Winterton: No research has been commissioned or evaluated on these matters.

Our policy is to give priority to helping people who may have difficulty in paying charges, rather than extending the exemption arrangements. The number of prescription items dispensed continues to rise, and the balance between chargeable and free prescriptions has not changed significantly in recent years. We have no plans to change the current charging arrangements.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to abolish prescription charges by 2007; and if he will make a statement. [136115]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Prescription charges provide a valuable contribution to national health service resources. We have no plans to abolish prescription charges.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) four month and (b) 12 month prescription prepayment certificates were issued in each of the last four years. [136421]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The available information is shown in the table.

Estimated number of Pre-Payment Certificates (PPCs) issued in England in the last four years

	PPC 4 month	PPC 12 month	Total number of PPCs
1999–2000	550,000	330,000	880,000
2000–01	580,000	370,000	950,000
2001–02	610,000	420,000	1,020,000
2002–03	640,000	480,000	1,110,000

Note:
The figures above are estimates compiled from Health Authority returns until September 2002. From October 2002 the Prescription Pricing Authority has been responsible for issuing pre-payment certificates and has provided the data. The figures have been rounded to the nearest 10,000.

Private Patients

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much private patient bad debt was written off by NHS trusts in each of the last five years. [135910]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 3 November 2003]: National health service trusts in England (excluding strategic health authorities and primary care trusts) wrote off the following amounts annually for bad debts and abandoned claims over the past four years:

1998–99—£1,554,000
1999–2000—£1,999,000
2000–01—£2,133,000
2001–02—£1,445,000

A provisional estimate for the current financial year (2002–03) is £1,941,000.

Residential Care

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether it is the policy of Her Majesty's Government that persons residing in residential nursing homes whose conditions deteriorate so that they require constant medical attention should have their costs borne by the national health service; and what procedures exist to make such assessments. [136698]

Dr. Ladyman: Any individual with a need for health care, which meets criteria for national health service continuing care, will have the costs borne by the NHS, regardless of where they reside. The Government's intention that the NHS should identify these individuals is reflected in proposed directions to the NHS re-emphasising the need to carry out appropriate continuing care assessments wherever it appears that there is a need for such services. All such assessments are informed by the single assessment process.

Rheumatoid Arthritis

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the health authorities in England providing funding for anti-TNF therapy for people with rheumatoid arthritis; and if he will make a statement. [136877]

Dr. Ladyman: Information is not held centrally on which primary care trusts are prescribing these drugs. The use of anti-TNF drugs in the community is negligible, but they are used extensively in hospitals. When the National Institute for Clinical Excellence issued guidance on these drugs in March 2002, they recommended that consultant rheumatologists, or consultant paediatric rheumatologists in the case of juvenile idiopathic arthritis, should prescribe them. Information is not held centrally about drugs prescribed and dispensed in hospitals.

Information is available on the number of prescription items of drugs that are dispensed in the community in England. Details of these anti-TNF drugs (contained in the British National Formulary paragraph 10.1.3) are included in the Prescription Cost Analysis publication, which can be accessed at www.doh.gov.uk/prescriptionstatistics/index.htm.

Sexually Transmitted Diseases

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his Department is doing (a) to reduce the incidence of sexually transmitted diseases among young people and (b) to discourage young people from embarking on early sexual relationships. [136572]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 5 November 2003]: The Government's National Strategy for Sexual Health and HIV (2001), which recognises that young people are one of the groups disproportionately affected by poor sexual health, aims to reduce the transmission of all sexually transmitted infections.

The implementation of the strategy includes specific actions targeting young people, for example, the launch last year of a national safer sex campaign, 'The Sex Lottery', for young adults to raise awareness of sexual health and promote safer sex, and initiatives within the national chlamydia screening programme to increase rates of diagnoses and treatment of chlamydia amongst young people—the group most affected by this disease.

The Government's Teenage Pregnancy Strategy (1999) encompasses a multi-faceted approach to help young people resist peer pressure to have early sex, improve sex and relationship education, increase access to effective contraception and sexual health services and support parents in talking to their children about sex and relationship issues.

Smoking-related Deaths

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have died from (a) smoking-related and (b) secondary smoking-related diseases in each of the last five years. [135657]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Information is not available in the form requested. The Health Education Authority 1998 report, "The UK Smoking Epidemic: Deaths in 1995", estimated that in the United Kingdom in 1995 smoking caused more than 120,000 deaths of people aged 35 years or more. A copy of this report is available in the Library.

The independent Scientific Committee on Tobacco and Health concluded in its 1998 report that, "exposure to environmental smoke is a cause of lung cancer and, in those with long-term exposure, the increased risk is in the order of 20 to 30 per cent.". The committee repeated the explanation of this risk set out earlier in its fourth report that "a 20 to 30 per cent. increased risk in exposed non-smokers would be a rate of 12 to 13 per 100,000 per year. Thus we would expect an additional 2 to 3 lung cancer cases a year per 100,000 non-smokers regularly exposed to environmental tobacco smoke. The numbers of people so exposed are not known precisely". A copy of this report is also available in the Library.

Social Care

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of qualified social workers who are not working (a) for social services departments and (b) in social care. [134774]

Dr. Ladyman: The Department has not made such estimates.

Student Nurses

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many student nurses left their courses before qualifying (a) in 2002 and (b) in 2003 to date. [135407]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 4 November 2003]: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he will take to improve the bursaries available to student nurses. [135408]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 4 November 2003]: National health service bursary rates across all professions are considered each year and have been uplifted annually since 1998, including an increase of 10.4 per cent. (well ahead of inflation) in 2001.

The Department has made a number of other improvements to the NHS bursary scheme, including extension of eligibility for disabled students' allowances and hardship support to diploma level students, and more help with the costs of travel and accommodation. The Government have also committed to introduce help with the costs of child care from 2004.

My ministerial colleagues and I continue to keep NHS-funded student support arrangements under review in order to ensure that they continue to meet our objectives for the service.

Vitamin Supplements

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to introduce Vitamin D supplements free to vulnerable children. [136215]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Welfare Food Scheme provides vitamin supplements containing vitamins A, C and D, free of charge, to low income families. All children at risk of Vitamin D deficiency also may be prescribed Vitamin D supplements.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Council Tax

Mr. Davey: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the (a) average and (b) average band D council tax was in the London borough of Greenwich in each year since 1997. [136594]

Mr. Raynsford: The information requested is tabled as follows:

	Area Band D council tax for 2 adults	Average council tax per dwelling
1996–97	763	608
1997–98	821	651
1998–99	883	710
1999–2000	883	711
2000–01	883	710
2001–02	911	734
2002–03	954	774
2003–04	1,088	883

Mr. Davey: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the average council tax was in (a) the North East, (b) the North West, (c) Yorkshire and the Humber, (d) the East Midlands, (e) the West Midlands and (f) the East of England in each financial year since 1995–96. [136596]

Mr. Raynsford: The information currently available is tabled as follows. I will write to the hon. Member shortly to give average figures on this basis for 1995–96 to 1998–99.

Average council tax per dwelling

	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02	2002–03	2003–04
North East	627	645	676	735	801
North West	680	699	733	774	840
Yorkshire and the Humber	602	622	663	712	786
East Midlands	640	672	713	784	859
West Midlands	642	670	718	111	855
East of England	674	714	762	842	970

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the gross income threshold is above which individuals are not eligible for council tax benefit. [135359]

Mr. Pond: I have been asked to reply.

There is no single income threshold which automatically denies entitlement to council tax benefit. The amount of income a person can receive before they lose entitlement to council tax benefit will be dependent on their personal circumstances, for example the size of their family, and the council tax level of the local authority area in which they live.

Housing (Older People)

Linda Perham: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what representations on the planning of housing for elderly people he has received in the last 12 months from groups representing older people. [136611]

Keith Hill: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has received various comments on the planning of housing for older people from groups representing or having an interest in older people's housing. These include responses to the recent publication for consultation of "Influencing The Size, Type And Affordability of Housing", which set out proposed changes to the current policies on planning for affordable housing. The Housing and Older People Development Group, which advises the Department of Health and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, has also recently discussed the issue of planning of housing for older people.

Housing (Overcrowding)

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether directions have been made under Section 334 of the Housing Act 1985 to require information on overcrowding. [136940]

Keith Hill: The information requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. As far as the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is aware, the powers in section 334 of the Housing Act 1985 have not been used by local authorities or my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister in recent years. However, all local authorities have carried out assessments of the need for new affordable housing, to underpin their housing strategies. Part 7 of the Local Government Act 2003 puts these strategies on a statutory footing for the first time.

Local Authority Rent Collection

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many times each local authority has used an enforcement agency to collect arrears in each year since 1997; how much money was collected each year by enforcement agencies in each local authority; and if he will list the enforcement agencies used by each local authority. [137135]

Mr. Raynsford: The information requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Local Elections

Dr. Pugh: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many allegations of electoral fraud in postal voting for local elections in the North West Region have been (a) reported and (b) investigated in the last 10 years. [134289]

Mr. Raynsford: Information on electoral fraud at elections is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost

Local Government Grant

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he expects local government to receive grant based on the Formula Spending Share formulae using 2001 Census data. [136705]

Mr. Raynsford: Officials of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will continue discussing with local authority representatives how the 2001 Census data might be incorporated into the Formula Spending Shares. A decision will be made following these discussions on whether to use the 2001 Census data in the 2005–06 Formula Spending Shares.

Planning Appeals

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the reason is for reducing the time for planning appeals from six to three months; when it came into force; how many appeals it is expected to change; which appeals it applies to; and how many refusals there were on 5 September. [136941]

Keith Hill: The proposal to reduce the time allowed for an applicant to decide whether to lodge an appeal was one of many aimed at speeding up and improving the effectiveness of the planning system announced in the Green Paper "Planning: Delivering a Fundamental Change", published in 2002. The amendment is not expected to change any planning appeals, only to speed up the planning process and prevent delays.

The Amendment Order came into force on 5 September 2003 and reduces the time limit for receipt of section 78 appeals, as specified in article 23(2) of the Town & Country Planning (General Development Procedure) Order 1995. The reduced time limit also applies to an appeal made under section 78(2) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. The reduced time limit applies to applications received by the local planning authority on or after 5 September 2003.

The decision on whether to allow a planning permission or not remains within the remit of a local planning authority and as such information on the number of applications refused on 5 September 2003 could be gathered only at disproportionate cost.

Private Office Costs

Mr. Flight: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the running costs of Ministers' private offices have been in his Department in each year since 1997. [123103]

Yvette Cooper: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) on 7 May 2003, Official Report, column 771W.

Regional Housing Boards

Mr. Drew: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister (1) what arrangements are in place to ensure that there is sufficient expertise on rural housing on Regional Housing Boards; [136038]

(2) if he will list the membership of each Regional Housing Board, indicating which members have responsibility for rural housing. [136039]

Keith Hill: Regional Housing Boards have been formed specifically to include representatives able to act collectively and corporately on all housing issues in their regions, including the needs of rural areas. Each Board is chaired by the Regional Director of the Government Office, the most senior official in each region responsible for rural affairs. Others, particularly the senior representatives from the Housing Corporation, carry rural issues as part of their wider remits. There has also been significant input from rural local authorities and others with an interest in rural issues in development by the Boards of Regional Housing Strategies. The Communities Plan, which introduced the Boards, makes clear that the Countryside Agency must be involved to ensure that all Strategies are rural proofed.

Board membership, quite rightly, varies to reflect regional variations. Current membership is tabled as follows:

Social Housing

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will encourage local authorities and housing associations to build a range of properties with varying numbers of bedrooms in agreements made under section 106 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. [136630]

Keith Hill: Planning Policy Guidance Note 3 "Housing" (March 2000) requires local planning authorities to provide wider housing opportunity and choice, and a better mix in the size and type of housing than is currently available.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister recently published for consultation proposed changes to the current policies on planning for housing mix set out in PPG3. The consultation document "Influencing The Size, Type And Affordability Of Housing" proposes that local planning authorities should plan to meet the housing requirements of the whole community by planning for a mix of housing types and sizes that reflects up-to-date assessments. It proposes new policy which would allow local planning authorities, where appropriate local plan policies are in place, to reject developments that conflict with the objective of widening housing choice.

A local planning authority can secure a range of sizes of housing either by granting permission to a planning application or by attaching a planning condition, where this information is not provided by a planning application. Alternatively, notes could be appended to an outline permission to give the developer guidance as to what precise form of development will be acceptable to the local planning authority. A section 106 agreement can be employed to secure that some of the housing for which planning permission has been granted must be affordable housing, and the agreement can specify the type of that housing.

Total Cost Indicators

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will permit Total Cost Indicators to increase in line with the increase in property prices. [136629]

Keith Hill: The Housing Corporation launched their new approach to investment on 24 October. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has agreed that as part of the phased introduction of the 'new approach' that total cost indicators (TCIs) will be phased out over time. For the Social Housing Grant bidding round for 2004–05 and 2005–06, TCIs have been uprated by an average of 8 per cent. using a range of 5 per cent. to 15 per cent. based on existing TCI groupings.

TREASURY

Air Transport

John Barrett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what plans he has to increase air passenger duty; [136399]

(2) what plans he has to end the tax exemption status of aviation fuel. [136400]

John Healey: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) on 28 October 2003, Official Report, column 206W. Levels of all taxes are reviewed as part of the annual Budget process, taking account of a range of social, economic and environmental considerations. The Chicago Convention prohibits the imposition of taxes or charges on fuel kept on board aircraft and consumed on international flights. The UK is also bound by bilateral air service agreements which impose further restrictions.

The 2002 Pre-Budget Report stated that the Government would discuss with stakeholders the most effective economic instruments for ensuring that the industry is encouraged to take account of, and where appropriate, reduce its contribution to global warming, local air and noise pollution. The Government's views will be set out in the Air Transport White Paper, due to be published later this year.

ASPIRE Programme

Mr. Gray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 141W, who has been the Board member responsible for project ASPIRE since the planning first commenced; when the intention to engage in a market making exercise in support of project ASPIRE was first committed to by Inland Revenue; when the potential suppliers who took part in the market making exercise were first selected by Inland Revenue for that purpose; and what action Inland Revenue subsequently took after 12 April 2000 to the end of July 2001 to ensure that maximum value for public money expended upon project ASPIRE was obtained. [136562]

Dawn Primarolo: The Board of the Inland Revenue has set up a Superintending Group to oversee the work of ASPIRE, which is chaired by Sir Nicholas Montagu KCB, the Chairman of the Inland Revenue.

As I said in my answer of 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 141W, the market-making exercise was conceived by the Inland Revenue between August and October 2001; it was also committed to at this time. Potential suppliers were also identified between August and October 2001 as part of the planning for the market-making exercise.

Bank Accounts

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people have taken up basic bank accounts in the UK: and what percentage this represents of all UK personal bank accounts. [136444]

Ruth Kelly: Latest figures from the British Bankers Association show that at the end of June 2003, the total number of basic bank accounts was 6,063,327. At the end of 2002, the total number of personal accounts (Major British Banking Groups) was 111,847,000. Basic bank accounts represent around 5–6 per cent. of all personal accounts using these figures.

Crown Estate Income

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much income the Crown Estate has received from rents paid for (a) marinas and (b) piers in each year since 1997. [136459]

Ruth Kelly: The figures for rents received for piers and marinas in England, Wales and Northern Ireland are in the table.

The information for Scotland is not readily available prior to the current financial year. This is because information held on foreshore lease arrangements in Scotland in previous years cannot readily identify income from piers and marinas. However, the estimated income for the current financial year in Scotland is £95,000 from piers and £60,000 from marinas, and this would be indicative of income in previous years.

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue the Crown Estate has collected from charges levied on cables crossing its land in each year since 1997; and how much the Crown Estate has charged per kilometre of cable laid (a) on the seabed and (b) over ground in each year since 1997. [136460]

Ruth Kelly: Since 1997 the information requested is as follows:

Land based cables

Cables that cross land, or connect Scottish Islands to the UK mainland for domestic purposes, are covered by the British Telecom Master Agreement, which is expressed as a lump sum payment. This agreement is negotiated between BT and the Crown Estate and covers not only cables, but also poles, struts, stays, joint boxes, etc. that cross land.

Seabed cables

The Crown Estate holds consultation with the United Kingdom Cable Protection Committee (UKCPC) in respect of telecommunication cable systems that either transit UK waters or land at some point on the UK coast. The agreement relates to international systems only. The agreement sets out fixed charges for single destination and self-healing loop systems, regardless of the length of cable involved.

	Revenue (£ million)

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to the answer of 27 October 2003, Official Report, column 38W, on Crown Estate income, how much income has been received by the Crown Estate from rents paid for cables which connect (a) Orkney, (b) Shetland and (c) other Scottish Islands to the UK mainland for each financial year since 1997; and what estimate the Government have made of the impact on UK businesses of charges levied by the Crown Estate for cables that use the seabed. [136496]

Ruth Kelly: Revenue paid to The Crown Estate for cables to Orkney, Shetland and other Scottish Islands from the UK mainland is calculated under the British Telecom Master Agreement. The revenue is not calculated for each specific piece of land that is crossed and therefore information for cables connecting individual Scottish Islands is not identifiable. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave earlier today regarding the revenue received by the Crown Estate from cables crossing either the seabed or land managed by the Crown Estate since 1997.

Rents charged by the Crown Estate for use of the seabed are established by professional valuers in negotiation with users, and where appropriate, involve consultation with the relevant industry or interest groups. The rents are set at levels appropriate to the market conditions and must not take advantage of any monopoly interest. The Crown Estate must comply with the requirements placed upon it by Parliament under The Crown Estate Act 1961, with regards to the maintenance of the Estate and the income which it yields. The Crown Estate manages the estate according to sound commercial principles, and also understands and works with the industries that use its assets to ensure that high standards of management and stewardship are followed.

Firearms

Mr. Gray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answers of 15 October 2003, Official Report, column 280W, and 14 July 2003, Official Report, column 133W, whether firearms include shotguns for licensing purposes; of the firearms controlled by HM Customs at Farnborough airport in 1999 how many were not presented with a valid firearms licence or British visitor firearms licence by the individuals declaring them to customs officers on the date of entry to the UK; and how many firearms were prohibited within the meaning of the Firearms Acts. [136563]

John Healey: Firearms include shot guns for import and domestic licensing purposes. Of the importations of firearms controlled by Customs at Farnborough airport in 1999 one was a prohibited weapon within the meaning of the Firearms Act 1968 and did not have a valid firearms licence or British Visitor's Permit.

Fireworks

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many illegal fireworks have been seized on entry to the UK at the port of Hull in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [136356]

John Healey: 17,400 fireworks weighing approximately 3.5 tonnes have been seized at the port of Hull in the 12 months to 31 October 2003.

Inland Revenue

Mr. Gray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answers of 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 141W, and 8 September 2003, Official Report, column 103W, on the Inland Revenue, whether Commissioners of Inland Revenue were given objectives relating to Project ASPIRE or its antecedents which attracted performance-related pay in 1999–2000 to 2002–03. [136564]

Dawn Primarolo: Commissioners of the Inland Revenue have Performance Agreements in the same way as all other staff. These contain agreed objectives that are relevant to their job but the Agreement and its contents are personal to the individual. Commissioners can earn performance-related pay under the pay system that applies to the Senior Civil Service, but details of performance appraisal and consequential pay adjustments are always treated as confidential information.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answers of 15 October 2003, Official Report, column 280W, and 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 139W, what the destination offices were in 2000–01 of Inland Revenue officers posted from the Business Tax Group, within International Division, broken down by (a) Business Tax Group Deputy Director's Office, (b) Policy Team and (c) Advisory/ Casework Team. [136565]

Dawn Primarolo: It would be inappropriate to disclose the information requested as it would facilitate the identification of individual members of staff of the Inland Revenue. Exemption 8 (a) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government information applies in this case.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 8 September 2003, Official Report, column 103W, on what date the Inland Revenue submitted its Supplementary Memorandum, as published in the 29 Report of the Committee of Public Accounts, Session 2002–03, HC 332, to the Committee of Public Accounts. [136820]

Dawn Primarolo: The Supplementary Memorandum to which the hon. Member refers was submitted to the Committee of Public Accounts on 12 February 2003.

Oil and Gas Industry

Sir Robert Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact of the draft EU constitution on the Treasury's powers to set the fiscal regime for the exploitation of oil and gas reserves from the UK continental shelf. [R] [135325]

Dawn Primarolo: Any changes to the provisions of the existing EU Treaties, including in relation to energy matters, require the unanimous agreement of all member states. The Government have made it clear in their White Paper, "The British Approach to the European Union Inter-governmental Conference 2003", that they will insist that tax matters continue to be decided by unanimity.

Pensions

Mr. Keith Bradley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he estimates the cost would be in this financial year to the Treasury of exempting the state retirement pension from income tax. [136795]

Dawn Primarolo: The cost of exempting the state retirement pension for the purposes of income tax is £4.6 billion in 2003–04.

This estimate was based on the 2000–01 Survey of Personal Incomes and is consistent with the Budget 2003 forecasts.

Property Sales (Tax)

John Barrett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the annual revenue that would be raised from a 40 per cent. tax rate on profits from the sale of property. [136622]

Dawn Primarolo: Reliable estimates of the yield from imposing capital gains tax at 40 per cent. on profits from the sale of property are only available at disproportionate cost.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much, as a percentage of GDP, has been spent on (a) health, (b) education and (c) defence in (i) the United Kingdom and (ii) each other member of the EU in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [136521]

Ruth Kelly: Financial year figures for UK expenditure on health, education and defence are as follows:

Revenue Recovery

Mr. Gray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 14 October 2003, Official Report, column 139W, on the Inland Revenue, if he will break down the £1.09 million by size of company from which recovery was made. [136881]

Dawn Primarolo: All of the transfer pricing cases involving recovery by Revenue Policy International in the year 2000 involved substantial multinational companies.

Tax Credits

Norman Lamb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many nil awards have been made in respect of applications for (a) child and (b) working tax credit. [136149]

Ruth Kelly: Details of families who have child and working tax credit awards as at quarterly reference dates are published in "Child and Working Tax Credits. Quarterly Statistics". This appears on the Inland Revenue website at: www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk/stats/personal-tax-credits/menu.htm

John Barrett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 22 October 2003, Official Report, column 620W, on tax credits, what plans he has to make estimates of take-up of (a) child tax credit and (b) working tax credit broken down by (i) region, (ii) local authority and (iii) parliamentary constituency. [136358]

Dawn Primarolo: As I announced on 31 October, 5.9 million families are now receiving benefits through new tax credits. Estimating take-up will only be possible when the Family Resources Survey for 2003–04 becomes available.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what the average waiting time for an NHS tax credit exemptions certificate was in the last year for which figures are available; [136486]

(2) what the procedure is for the Inland Revenue to provide details to the exemptions office of those people who are eligible for an NHS tax credit exemptions certificate; [136487]

(3) how many people were eligible for an NHS tax credit exemptions certificate in the last year for which figures are available; and how many are still waiting to receive certificates. [136488]

Dawn Primarolo: Claims for tax credits are processed as quickly as possible. Claims for which no further information is required, and which pass the various pre award checks, go through the stages of calculating the award quickly and will normally be in payment within a few days. Once an award has been made, the Inland Revenue identify the families who are entitled to a health costs exemption certificate and send the data to the Prescription Pricing Authority (PPA) to issue the certificates on behalf of the Department of Health. On receipt of the data the PPA processes tax credit exception claims and issues the certificate within 30 days of valid data being received. Data are sent monthly from the IR to the PPA.

Since the new tax credits were introduced in April 2003, the PPA has issued over 1.7 million certificates for tax credit claims. A certificate is issued on an individual basis and a couple would therefore receive one each.

The latest batch of data was received by the PPA on 24 October 2003 and issue of the associated certificates will be completed by 24 November 2003.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Departmental Publications

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many copies of his Department's publications for people who have been bereaved were printed in 2002–03. [135484]

Mr. Pond [holding answer 3 November 2003]: The Department produces a number of leaflets for people who have been bereaved. Around 1,300,000 copies of these leaflets were printed during 2002–03. Information on bereavement benefits is also included in general benefit leaflets.

Leaflets giving details of bereavement benefits are available from social security offices, post offices, undertakers, registrars and some doctor's surgeries.

Pensions

Mr. Tynan: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many people in Scotland are in receipt of occupational pensions. [134589]

Malcolm Wicks: In the financial year 2001–02, an estimated 525,000 people were in receipt of occupational pensions in Scotland; this compares with 5,775,000 people in receipt of occupational pensions in the United Kingdom. A higher percentage of the population are in receipt of occupational pensions in Scotland than in the United Kingdom as a whole (9.1 per cent. in Scotland and 8.6 per cent. in the UK as a whole).

Source:
Estimates from Family Resources Survey 2001–02.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will estimate (a) the gross cost and (b) the cost net of savings on means-tested benefits and increased income tax revenues of introducing age additions to the basic state pension of (i) £10 per week at the age of 75 and (ii) £15 per week at the age of 80 from April 2004. [135793]

Malcolm Wicks: The information requested is set out in the following table:

£ billion

	Gross cost	Net cost
Estimated gross cost and the cost net of savings on means-tested benefits and increased income tax revenues of introducing age additions to the basic state pension of £10 per week at the age of 75 from April 2004.	2.2	1.4
Estimated gross cost and the cost net of savings on means-tested benefits and increased income tax revenues of introducing age additions to the basic state pension of £15 per week at the age of 80 from April 2004.	1.9	1.2

Notes:
1. Figures are in 2003–04 price terms and are rounded to the nearest £100 million.
2. Gross costs are estimated by the Government Actuary's Department.
3. Income-related benefit offsets are calculated using the DWP policy simulation model.
4. Income tax revenue increases calculated by the Inland Revenue using the 2000–01 Survey of Personal Incomes and April 2003 Budget forecasts.
5. The two options have been costed separately.
6. The age addition increases are assumed to be flat-rate increases and are paid in full to all pensioners of applicable age.

Pension Credit

John Thurso: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many calls have been made to the pension credit telephone application line, broken down by originating region. [135927]

Malcolm Wicks: The information is not available in the form requested. The pension credit application line had received approximately 1.25 million calls as at 25 October 2003.

Winter Fuel Payment

John Thurso: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will estimate how many people in Scotland who became newly entitled for the 2003–04 winter fuel payment and who needed to make a claim before 19 September 2003 in order to receive their payment before Christmas failed to do so; and what the value was of such payments. [135925]

Malcolm Wicks: We estimate that around 60,000 people will be newly entitled to the 2003–04 winter fuel payments in Scotland, and of these, around 26,700 should receive their payments automatically. The others would need to claim and we have publicised the availability of winter fuel payments and how to obtain a claim form.

We are unable to provide any reliable estimate of the value of unclaimed winter fuel payments because the amount due depends on the composition of the household. It is up to an individual, where a claim is necessary, to decide whether or not to make that claim. They have until 30 March 2004 to make a claim for this winter.

Notes:
1. New entitlement based on population estimates from the Government Actuary's Department.
2. Figures for total winter fuel payments taken from the Matching Intelligence Data Analysis Service Winter Fuels Payment 2002–03 exercise 100 per cent. data. Figures are rounded to the nearest five.
3. The estimated number of people who turned 60 between March 2002 and March 2003 and were claiming the state pension should receive automatic payments.
4. The data for the number of people who should receive automatic payments are from5 per cent. samples of individual benefits and figures have been rounded to the nearest 100.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Afghanistan

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what progress has been made in opening schools for girls in (a) Kabul and (b) other parts of Afghanistan. [136211]

Hilary Benn: UNICEF has been working in partnership with the Ministry of Education, the United Nations Office of Project Services (UNOPS) and a number of NGOs to rehabilitate over 200 primary schools both in Kabul and in other parts of Afghanistan, with special emphasis on parts of the country where large numbers of people have returned from overseas.

We contributed £2 million to the UNICEF "Back to School Campaign" during 2002–03. The program targeted approximately 1.78 million primary school children (both girls and boys), and up to 50,000 teachers across Afghanistan. This year, over 4 million children are back at over 6,500 schools. Over one third of the pupils are girls.

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps he is taking to ensure the safety of workers distributing aid funded by his Department in areas outside Kabul, with particular reference to women aid workers. [136350]

Hilary Benn: DFID funded aid projects are implemented by its partners, mainly the UN and NGOs. All these partners have strict security guidelines in place to ensure the safety of their staff, including women. Some of these partners have also appointed dedicated professional security officers. The UN has security officers in all of its regional offices providing regular security updates and advice, to the UN and other aid agencies. In addition, ACBAR, the main NGO coordination body in Afghanistan, regularly updates and discusses all security related reports and advice with the NGO community. DFID provided a grant of £800,000 to the UN in October 2001 to enhance its safety and security measures.

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what facilities are available to Afghan women in order for them to be educated enough to be able to participate in the election. [136558]

Hilary Benn: The Constitutional Commission's public education department, run by the UN, has launched a wide-spread public information/education campaign to acquaint Afghans with the Constitutional Loya Jirga process. The electorate is being provided with information packages and training through provincial registration meetings. Concerning women's participation in the elections, a specific information and training campaign is currently being developed by the UN but details have yet to be finalised. DFID has contributed £1 million towards the election registration process with a further £2 million allocated from the joint DFID-FCO-MOD Global Conflict Prevention Pool.

Aid Programmes

Tom Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will list the aid programmes in middle-income countries whose funding from the Department will be changed as a result of the diversion of aid to the reconstruction of Iraq; and what assessment he has made of the impact of such changes on middle income countries. [135501]

Hilary Benn: Final decisions have yet to be taken on where reallocations will occur and I refer the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington to the answers I gave the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) on 4 November 2003, Official Report, columns 486W and 490W.

Aid Provision

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much aid the UK gave to each of the five poorest nations in each of the last five years. [136189]

Hilary Benn: The five poorest nations have been identified as those with the lowest GNI per capita. This is calculated by dividing the Gross National Income by the mid year population. GNI per capita in US dollars is converted using the World Bank Atlas method.

UK bilateral assistance (£000) to five poorest nations

Poorest nations based on GNI per capita	GNI per capita (US$)	Total Gross Public Expenditure 2002-03 (£000)
Democratic Republic of Congo	80	15,586
Ethiopia	100	44,240

AIDS

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions he has had with governments of countries affected by AIDS, concerning the future impact of AIDS on public services and stability of their society. [136217]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: HIV/AIDS is a human catastrophe and a significant development challenge. This is acknowledged by many governments and it is frequently discussed in meetings the Department for International Development has with partner countries. The issue is also discussed in a range of regional and international fora.

HIV/AIDS is not just a health problem. It requires a response that addresses public services like education, livelihoods and food security, access to justice and security. In Malawi for example DFID is working with other donors and the Malawian Government to ensure that the Poverty Reduction Strategies addresses the impact of HIV/AIDS on all public services. In education, DFID is currently working with the UNAIDS Interagency Task Team for Education and HIV/AIDS to promote high level understanding and leadership, and strengthen the technical capacity of developing countries to develop and implement effective education responses to the epidemic.

AIDS Orphans

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what estimate he has made of the number of AIDS orphans there are, broken down by country. [136203]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: We expect the very latest statistics on orphans to be published in a report by UNICEF, "Africa's Orphaned Generations", on 23 November 2003. Until then the international community, including DFID, has drawn on the joint UNAIDS, UNICEF, USAID Report, "Children on the Brink 2002", which provides statistics on current and projected numbers of children orphaned by HIV/AIDS in 88 countries.

"Children on the Brink 2002" estimates that 13.4 million children under the age of 15 had lost one or both parents to AIDS in 2001. 11 million of these children are in sub-Saharan Africa. By 2010, this number is expected to rise to 25 million, with probable large increases in Asia. In the hardest hit countries, it is estimated that 15 per cent. of all children will be orphaned by AIDS by 2005.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions he has had with other donor countries and NGOs concerning AIDS orphans in developing countries. [136218]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: HIV/AIDS has created an unprecedented orphan crisis. By 2001 13.4 million children had lost one or both parents to AIDS. The growing impacts of HIV/AIDS on children, particularly in sub-Saharan Africa, have strong implications for the achievement of all development goals. Co-ordinating and harmonising the response to this crisis is a key challenge for the international community.

In June 2001, DFID joined the rest of the international community at the United Nations General Assembly Special Session (UNGASS) on HIV/AIDS in adopting the Declaration of Commitment which set common targets for reducing the spread of HIV/AIDS and alleviating its impact. The Declaration includes three strong commitments to provide special assistance to children orphaned and affected by HIV/AIDS.

DFID is now working with UNAIDS and UNICEF, who are co-ordinating other development agencies and NGOs to develop a Global Strategic Framework to translate the UNGASS Declaration into country level action and commitment. Other governments engaged in this process include the US, the Netherlands, Sweden, Australia, and Denmark. Emphasis is placed on the need to strengthen community-based care of orphans and ensure that they stay in school.

At the country level, we are in dialogue with governments and development partners to ensure that national responses to the epidemic include appropriate provision for the education, health, nutrition and housing needs of orphaned as well as their protection from abuse and exploitation. In Uganda, we have supported the Government in the implementation of free universal primary education. Prior to the introduction of the free Universal Primary Education policy, 12 per cent. fewer orphans were attending school compared to non-orphans. In 2000 this had diminished to 4 per cent. as a result of free primary education. In Malawi we are working with other donors and the Government of Malawi to ensure that the needs of orphans and vulnerable children are addressed through the Poverty Reduction Strategy processes.

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what response his Department is making to the UNICEF and UNAIDS announcement of a co-ordinated global response to AIDS orphans. [136277]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: HIV/AIDS has created an unprecedented orphan crisis. By 2001 13.4 million children had lost one or both parents to AIDS. The growing impacts of HIV/AIDS on children, particularly in sub-Saharan Africa, have strong implications for the achievement of all development goals. Coordinating and harmonising the response to this crisis is a key challenge for the international community.

In October of this year, DFID joined other major international partners to develop a global strategic framework for the protection, care and support of orphans and other children made vulnerable by HIV/AIDS (OVC). The framework will highlight key issues in an effective response to the needs of OVC. We fully endorses the draft framework's emphasis on free primary education and strengthened support to community-based care for OVC within the context of a broad multi-sectoral national HIV/AIDS strategy. We continue to emphasise the importance of embedding responses to the orphan crisis in national level mechanisms such as the Poverty Reduction Strategy processes, and the urgency of providing treatment programmes to prolong the lives of HIV+ parents.

AIDS/TB/Malaria

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what the United Kingdom's contribution will be to the Global Fund for combating AIDS, TB and malaria in each year up to 2008 for this year. [136046]

Mr. Gareth Thomas: The UK recognises that in order to be effective the Global Fund to Fight HIV/AIDS, TB and Malaria (GFATM) needs predictable and sustainable financing. The UK recently extended its pledge by a further two years to 2008 bringing our total contribution to approximately US$280million.

The pattern of our disbursements has been agreed with the Global Fund Secretariat—for the financial year 2002–03, the UK provided £50 million in two separate payments of £25 million, in 2003–04 the UK provided £25 million, in 2004–05 we will provide £30 million, and in 2005–06 we will provide £33 million. In the years 2006–07 and 2007–08 we have pledged US$40 million per year.

UK funding is subject to the GFATM reflecting a clear poverty focus, achieving a better financing system, integrating the Fund's activities more effectively with national programmes and meeting agreed benchmarks to monitor its effectiveness. Good progress was made at the recent 6th Board meeting in Thailand on many of these issues.

Democratic Republic of Congo

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what support and advice is being provided to the interim government of the Democratic Republic of Congo. [136343]

Hilary Benn: The Government have recently informed the Transitional National Government (TNG) of the Democratic Republic of Congo, and made public, a significant stepping up of its engagement with the DRC, following the installation of the TNG this summer. This year, our programme will amount to £23 million.

Ensuring a successful transition process, including embedding the TNG, is crucial to our overall goal of ensuring peace and poverty reduction in the DRC and through that, the region as a whole. As a member of the International Committee for Support to the Transition, we are pressing for a well developed and shared understanding between donors and government of the Transition Process and of the varied challenges and milestones that the process will entail, as well as strong day-to-day co-ordination of their support efforts.

We are providing £700,000 in direct support for the basic infrastructure needs of the Transition Institutions, which include the President and four Vice Presidents, Government, Parliament, Senate, Supreme Court and the five Democracy Support Commissions (Elections, Human Rights, Truth and Reconciliation, Anti-Corruption and Media). We are considering technical assistance for the drawing up of a national Disarmament, Demobilisation and Reintegration (DDR) strategy, a Security Sector Reform (SSR) strategy, and a Poverty Reduction Strategy Paper (PRSP). We are also looking at providing some civil service capacity building support to the Government with UNDP and other donors.

It is crucial for DRC and the wider Great Lakes region that the transition process remains on track. We will therefore make continued efforts to strengthen and consolidate peace, which include humanitarian work, disarmament, demobilisation and reintegration of ex-combatants, army, police and justice sector reform, and grassroots peace-building work.

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what efforts are being made to ensure that the forthcoming elections in the Democratic Republic of Congo will be free and fair. [136346]

Hilary Benn: We believe that national elections are a key part of the transition period under way in the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) and an important challenge for the new Transitional National Government (TNG). This will require not only support from donors but also strong and effective engagement by civil society and a free and responsible media.

We are currently providing £700,000 in direct support for the basic infrastructure needs of the Transition Institutions, which include the President and four Vice Presidents, Government, Parliament, Senate, Supreme Court and the five Democracy Support Commissions, including the Independent Electoral Commission. When the financial needs of the electoral process become clearer, we will consider what further support we might give. With other donors and the TNG, we are looking at how we can provide core funding for all five Democracy Support Commissions (Elections, Human Rights, Anti-Corruption, Media and Truth and Reconciliation). We are promoting donor coordination and harmonisation to ensure an effective approach towards all aspects of holding free and fair elections.

Media pluralism is critical for encouraging and supporting political pluralism. We are therefore providing support to the media sector not only as above through the Media Commission, but also: through £500,000 funding to Panos Paris, an NGO who are working to build capacity and strengthen the media sector to improve access to, and quality of information; and over £1 million through Foundation Hirondelle to support Radio Okapi, the UN linked radio station which broadcasts good quality news and peace messages and will play an important part in the elections.

Finally, free and fair elections will not happen unless the transition process remains on track. We will, therefore make continued efforts to strengthen and consolidate peace, which include humanitarian work, disarmament, demobilisation and reintegration of ex-combatants, army, police and justice sector reform, and grassroots peace-building work.

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will make a statement on the report by a UN commission on the misuse of the Democratic Republic of Congo's natural resources. [136347]

Hilary Benn: I am currently considering the Final Report of the UN Panel of Experts on the Illegal Exploitation of Natural Resources in the Democratic Republic of Congo and I shall write to the hon. Lady as soon as possible.

Developing Countries (Property Ownership)

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development pursuant to his answer of 16 September 2003, Official Report, column 653W, on developing countries (property ownership), what resources his Department is allocating to deal with these problems. [136179]

Hilary Benn: In my earlier responses to my hon. Friend I outlined DFID's assessment of and engagement in property ownership issues. DFID has currently over £575.4 million in approved project and programme commitments dealing with these issues in both urban and rural areas in developing countries.

In urban areas, £160.7 million has been committed by DFID to this issue. This includes programmes and projects relating property ownership issues to urban management, urbanisation policy and shelter and tenure.

In the rural sector DFID has currently committed £412.6 million to programmes and projects dealing with land policy.

In other sectors (Governance, Human Rights, Social Protection, Local Government Reform) DFID currently has £2.1 million committed.

In addition DFID has the services of a Land Policy Adviser.

Iraq

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development (1) what poverty impact assessments have been undertaken on the impact of redirection of funds from middle income countries to the reconstruction of Iraq; and if he will make a statement; [135253]

(2) what programmes will be ended prematurely owing to the redirection of funds away from middle income countries to the reconstruction of Iraq. [135252]

Hilary Benn: Final decisions have yet to be taken on where reallocations will occur and I refer the hon. Member for Blaby to the answers I gave the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) on 4 November 2003, Official Report, columns 486W and 490W.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what resources are being diverted from his Department's budgets to Iraq; which other countries are affected; and if he will make a statement. [135262]

Hilary Benn: Final decisions have yet to be taken on where reallocations will occur and I refer my hon. Friend to the to the answers I gave the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) on 4 November 2003, Official Report, columns 486–90W.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development whether the money allocated to aid reconstruction in Iraq has been transferred from other aid programmes. [135497]

Hilary Benn: I refer the hon. Member for the City of Durham to the answers I gave the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) on 4 November 2003, Official Report, columns 486W and 490W.

Maternal Mortality

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps his Department is taking to meet the Millennium Development Goal to reduce the level of maternal mortality among mothers in childbirth in developing countries, with particular reference to Africa. [136278]

Hilary Benn: The Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) are central to DFID's work, including the goal to improve maternal health, and its associated target of reducing the maternal mortality ratio (the number of maternal deaths per 100,000 live births) by 75 per cent. between 1990 and 2015. Our Public Service Agreement includes ambitious targets on increasing access in Africa and Asia to skilled attendance at childbirth. Skilled attendance is an important contributor to safe childbirth and serves as an internationally agreed proxy indicator of progress towards the maternal health MDG, trends in maternal mortality being notoriously difficult to assess directly. DFID's strategy includes advocacy in the international arena, support to countries to strengthen health systems and improve access to maternal and reproductive health services, and support for research and improved measurement tools. DFID is participating in a new international partnership for Safe Motherhood and Newborn Health.

Sub-Saharan Africa bears a disproportionate burden of maternal mortality. In 2000, there were approximately 247,000 maternal deaths in sub-Saharan Africa, almost half the 529,000 deaths worldwide. We support the maternal health strategies of African countries through health sector budget support, through safe motherhood projects, for example in Kenya and Malawi, and indirectly through general budget support. Since 1997 we have committed approximately £0.5 billion to health systems strengthening in Africa. We also fund international multilateral agencies and international NGOs active in supporting maternal health programmes in Africa.

Tanzania

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what reports he has received on food security in Tanzania; and if he will make a statement. [136620]

Hilary Benn: The Government of Tanzania has submitted reports to development partners on food security and the distribution of around 16,000 MT of subsidised food from their Strategic Grain Reserve. I have been receiving further updates on the situation from the DFID office in Dar es Salaam. WFP approved an Emergency Operation on 20 October to provide additional assistance to drought affected persons. DFID is considering its response to this appeal.

Zimbabwe

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will make a statement on the closure of the regional hospital in the Matabeleland South province of Zimbabwe. [136274]

Hilary Benn: Shangani hospital serves a population in Matabeleland South Province that includes about 12,500 newly resettled families in a former commercial farming area.

At the end of September 2003, Shangani hospital announced that it had ceased to admit patients because it had run out of food. This occurred despite Government of Zimbabwe policy that all hospitals and other key institutions have priority for access to food supplied by the Grain Marketing Board, which is a parastatal. In response, the chair of the Provincial Food Task Force promised to provide food to the hospital on an emergency basis and to undertake an investigation into the situation.

Shangani hospital is now operating again, although shortages of food, ambulances and fuel persist.

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if he will make a statement on the interruptions to the water supply in Harare, Zimbabwe. [136275]

Hilary Benn: Several cities and towns of Zimbabwe are being affected by the interruption of their water supplies to varying degrees. The lack of provision of foreign exchange by the central government imposes a serious constraint on local government's capacity to purchase water treatment chemicals. In addition, the country is coming towards the end of the dry season resulting in very low levels in the main reservoirs.

It is hoped the recent rains will have helped the situation, as well as the anticipation of normal rainfall this year. The Harare city council so far is managing to ensure clean water supplies to Harare, and has begun to receive some support to import chemicals from donors following a request through the United Nations. There has recently been a general improvement in supplies as the city council took active action to deal with the situation including a hosepipe ban.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Afghanistan

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the trends in (a) poppy cultivation and (b) the heroin trade in Afghanistan; and if he will make a statement on its impact on the country's stability. [135847]

Mr. Rammell: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him today (UIN135856).

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions his Department has had with (a) the UN, (b) international partners and (c) farmers in Afghanistan regarding the measures which need to be taken to meet the target set in the 2002 Spending Review to contribute to the reduction of opium production in Afghanistan. [136536]

Mr. Straw: We are working closely with the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) to support the Afghan government in achieving its target of eliminating opium within 10 years. We also consult regularly with other key donors, as this is not something we can achieve on our own. We are organising an international conference, co-hosted with the Afghan Government and UNODC that will take place in Kabul in February 2004 with the aim of encouraging wider international community support. The UK also provided financial and human resources to the latest UNODC Farmers Intentions Study. This has helped us to ascertain the best methods of ensuring that Afghan farmers cease to grow opium poppy and pursue alternative livelihoods.

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures his Department is taking to meet the target set in the 2002 Spending Review to contribute to the reduction of opium production in Afghanistan; and what estimate he has made of changes to the size of the opium harvest in Afghanistan in each of the next three years. [136537]

Mr. Straw: The Afghan Transitional Authority (ATA) adopted its National Drug Control Strategy on 19 May 2003. Its objective is to reduce opium poppy cultivation by 70 per cent. in five years and by 100 per cent. in 10 years. The UK is committed to helping the ATA achieve this objective and has prepared a balanced programme of counter-narcotics activity to support implementation of the Afghan strategy. We have committed £70 million over three years and additional personnel are currently being posted to Afghanistan. It is difficult to assess expected cultivation levels in each year but we do not expect progress to be linear. Experience of counter-narcotics policies in other countries, such as Thailand and Pakistan, shows that cultivation tends to increase before declining. Cultivation also tends to move from traditional areas to more marginal and inaccessible areas to protect crops against law enforcement activity. Progress in the initial years of assistance towards reducing opium levels will also be dependent upon wider improvements in security and governance.

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the report by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime on poppy production in Afghanistan. [136621]

Mr. Rammell: I refer the hon. Member to the Written Ministerial Statement I made on 30 October 2003, Official Report, column 20WS, regarding the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) survey results for the 2003 opium poppy crop in Afghanistan.

Azerbaijan

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Azeri Government since the election of

Ilham Aliev as President regarding (a) the conduct of the recent elections in Azerbaijan and (b) arrests of opposition supporters. [136433]

Mr. MacShane: The EU issued a statement on 23 October expressing regret for the shortcomings in the electoral process in Azerbaijan, while acknowledging that it was an improvement over previous elections. In the two weeks following the elections, our ambassador to Azerbaijan met twice with President-elect Ilham Aliev, and on both occasions he raised the issue of the post election arrests of opposition party officials and journalists. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Rammell) expressed our concern about the post-electoral developments in a press release of 23 October. A copy of the press release is available on the Foreign and Commonwealth Office website: www.fco.gov.uk/policy/news/press-releases. Many of those detained have since been released. We will continue to closely monitor the situation and keep in close touch with our EU and OSCE (Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe) partners.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of whether the recent elections in Azerbaijan can be deemed to have been free and fair; and if he will make a statement. [136445]

Mr. MacShane: We acknowledge progress over previous elections in Azerbaijan, but regret that some shortcomings were observed. The International Election Observation Mission (IEOM) stated in its preliminary conclusions that voting was generally well administered in most polling stations, but that the overall election process still fell short of international standards in several respects. It is important that Azerbaijan takes steps to build on the progress it has made and to reaffirm its commitments in the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) and obligations within the Council of Europe to the democratic process. We await the IEOM's final assessment on the conduct of the elections.

Burma

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to persuade the Thai Government to lift its restrictions on cross-border aid to internally displaced people in Burma and on refugees from Burma entering Thailand. [135573]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We believe that the Burmese regime's refusal to grant access to IDP areas is the biggest restriction on aid to internally displaced people in Burma. The Thai authorities have a long record of providing safe haven for those fleeing persecution by the Burmese regime. With our EU colleagues, we regularly engage with the Thai authorities on this issue.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Thailand's roadmap for democracy in Burma. [135574]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The UK welcomes and is supportive of Thai efforts to encourage the Burmese military regime to enter into substantive genuine dialogue with democratic and ethnic minority leaders in Burma leading to national reconciliation. We believe that Thailand's proposal forms a good basis on which to build from.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will raise the issue of the Burmese Government's atrocities against the Karen, Karenni and Shan people at the UN Security Council. [135575]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government are encouraging all the appropriate bodies of the UN to tackle the issue of helping bring about national reconciliation, respect for human rights and democracy in Burma. Should Burma feature on the UN Security Council agenda, the Government would ensure that the plight of Burma's ethnic groups was taken fully into account.

We regularly raise Burma, including the plight of Burma's ethnic groups, bilaterally with our Security Council partners, but there is currently no agreement that Burma should be discussed by the Security Council.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what account the Government takes of the Burmese Army's atrocities against the (a) Karen, (b) Karenni and (c) Shan people in their decision-making; and what sanctions regime against Burma the Government will adopt. [135576]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Together with the international community, we recognise that the resolution of the ethnic nationality issue is an essential ingredient in any possible solution to Burma's problems. The disproportionate violation of human rights suffered by ethnic groups has been highlighted by successive UN resolutions and were included in the European Union Council Conclusions on Burma when the EU decided to strengthen the Common Position in April 2003. We are currently discussing with EU colleagues what additional measures we may take to encourage national reconciliation, respect for human rights and democracy in Burma.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action the Government is taking to raise concerns with the Burmese regime regarding the Burmese military's deployment of land mines in (a) Karen, (b) Karenni and (c) Shan civilian areas; and if he will make a statement. [135791]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Continued fighting between the Burmese Army and armed ethnic groups, which includes the use of land mines by both sides, is the cause of on-going suffering among the ordinary people in these areas. Ethnic groups, including the Karen, Karenni, and Shan, suffer disproportionately.

The UK co-sponsors resolutions in the UN General assembly (UNGA) and UN Commission on Human Rights (UNCHR) condemning the military regime's actions against the ethnic groups.

China

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Chinese Government regarding the imprisonment of Phuntsog Nyidrol. [136431]

Mr. Rammell: Phuntsog Nyidrol was included on the list of individual cases of concern handed over to the Chinese authorities during my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's visit to China in July. We have regularly raised her case in the context of the biannual UK/China Human Rights Dialogue, and have requested her release on medical grounds.

Colombia

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received on the number of human rights violations, broken down by (a) murders, (b) kidnappings and (c) death threats each year in Colombia under the (i) Pastrana and (ii) Uribe administrations. [136309]

Mr. Rammell: We see many reports on the human rights situation in Colombia each year from non-governmental organisations, international bodies and foreign governments. These reports have different methods of collating and presenting their data, so a consensus of figures of the particular categories mentioned by my hon. Friend is difficult to come by. Detailed reports are available on the following websites.

UNHCHR http://www.unhchr.ch/Huridocda/Huridoca.nsf/TestFrame/1304674285b7eb3bc1256cf5003906fb?Opendocument

US State Department http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/hrrpt/2002/18325.htm

Amnesty International http://web.amnesty.org/report2003/col-summary-eng

Human Rights Watch http://hrw.org/wr2k3/americas4.html

The issues highlighted in these reports are of great concern to us. We raise these regularly with the Colombian Government. I recently did so when I met the Colombian Foreign Minister in New York on 23 September. We will continue to work closely with the Colombian Government, EU partners and others to tackle the problems.

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance he is giving to the Colombian Government on human rights issues. [136561]

Mr. Rammell: Our human rights assistance for Colombia addresses the key problems of violence, displacement, children's and women's rights, impunity and the guarantee of fundamental human rights freedoms. Projects include provision of human rights training for the Colombian armed forces; encouraging greater attention to the rights of displaced women, adolescents and girls; strengthening Colombian NGOs; rehabilitation of child soldiers; helping street children out of their negative environment; provision of political and financial support to the work of the UNHCHR office in Bogota and to the Special Adviser to the UN Secretary-General on Colombia. We also contribute to the EU's programme of assistance of Euro 330 million over the period 2001–06 (which includes assistance on human rights).

EU Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the non-institutional matters which he submitted to the Italian Presidency by 20 October for raising at the Inter-governmental Conference. [135377]

Mr. MacShane: The Government's letter to the Presidency on non-institutional issues for discussion in the Inter-governmental Conference raised the following issues: aspects of Justice and Home Affairs, the status of the Charter of Fundamental Rights; economic governance and the budget; defence; and the scope of qualified majority voting and co-decision. The Government's White Paper sets out our position on these questions in detail.

Immigration (Chagos Islanders)

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with West Sussex county council about provision for permanent settlement of Chagos Islanders arriving at Gatwick airport. [134756]

Mr. Rammell: My officials have been in contact with West Sussex county council and following this, officials in the Department for Work and Pensions and the Department of Health are considering, with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the situation of the destitute Chagossians in the UK.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements he has made for the settlement of Chagos Islanders in the UK. [134792]

Mr. Rammell: Officials in the Department for Work and Pensions and the Department of Health are considering, with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the situation of the destitute Chagossians in the UK. No final decisions on any measures can be taken until the judicial review proceedings are completed.

Iraq

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions the Government have had with the US Administration regarding foreign nationals entering Iraq to participate in terrorist activities; and what assessment his Department has made of the number of foreign terrorists in Iraq. [135945]

Mr. Straw: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given to him by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Rammell) today (UIN136351). I am withholding details of the Government's estimate of the number of foreign terrorists in Iraq under exemptions 1 and 2 of Part 2 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the Government is taking to prevent foreign terrorists coming into possession of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq; and what discussions the Government have had with international partners on this matter. [135946]

Mr. Straw: Coalition forces regularly conduct anti-terrorist operations, and the UK and US Governments have urged Iraq's neighbours to tighten up border security and border controls to deny terrorists access to Iraq. Coalition forces and the Iraq Survey Group continue to search for and secure WMD-related sites and materials.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received of external support from governments in countries surrounding Iraq for individuals and organisations carrying out terrorist activities in Iraq; and if he will make a statement. [135966]

Mr. Straw: We have received a range of reports about possible support from individuals and organisations from within Iraq's neighbours for terrorist activity in Iraq. The Government have urged Iraq's neighbours to tighten up security and border controls to deny terrorists access to Iraq.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with representatives of the US Administration on possible foreign involvement in attacks in Iraq; and if he will make a statement. [136351]

Mr. Rammell: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary regularly discusses Iraq issues with US Secretary of State Colin Powell. The Government have urged Iraq's neighbours to tighten up security and border controls to deny terrorists access to Iraq.

Pakistan

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer of 5 November 2003; Official Report, column 663W, what assessment he has made of whether the steps taken by the Government of Pakistan support a conclusion that the Government of Pakistan are not a sponsor of terrorism. [135648]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We welcome the steps which the Government of Pakistan have taken and is continuing to take against terrorist and extremist organisations. But we remain concerned that some such groups are still operating within and from Pakistan. We continue to urge the Government of Pakistan to do more to prevent all forms of terrorist activity.

Paramilitary Groups

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) of 4 July 2003, Official Report, column 558W, what assessment he has made of the level of protection needed for trade unionists receiving death threats from paramilitary groups. [136353]

Mr. Rammell: I regularly make clear our great concern about the extremely difficult situation faced by trades unionists in Colombia. Protection is given under the Colombian Ministry of Interior Protection Programme. We welcome the recently increased spending on this programme, and the reactivation of Inter-Institutional Commission for the Promotion and Protection of Workers' Human Rights. Deaths of trades union members have been significantly reduced this year. But there is much more to be done and the Colombian Government has acknowledged this. It supports and has played a large part in discussions on an EU funded project for the promotion and defence of the human rights of trades unionists. We will continue to emphasise the need for further protection of all vulnerable groups in Colombia.

Sudan

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Government of the Sudan on press freedom. [136090]

Mr. Mullin: Human rights in Sudan remains one of our priorities. We monitor the situation closely. Our embassy in Khartoum regularly lobbies the Government of Sudan on human rights, including on press freedom.

Most recently the embassy raised the suspension of the daily newspapers the Khartoum Monitor, Al-Wan and Al-Azminah. I am pleased to be able to say that all three of these newspapers have now resumed printing. We will continue to maintain pressure on the Government of Sudan to improve its human rights record and will continue to raise human rights violations at every opportunity both bilaterally and as part of the EU/Sudan dialogue.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Government of Sudan on the (a) death penalty and (b) use of torture. [136092]

Mr. Mullin: Human rights in Sudan remains one of our priorities. We monitor the situation closely. Our embassy in Khartoum regularly lobbies the Government of Sudan on human rights, and pays particular attention to cases involving the death penalty, corporal punishments and allegations of torture.

The embassy continues to raise these issues both bilaterally and multilaterally as part of the recent EU Sudan dialogue. The last meeting of the EU Sudan dialogue was on 2 November 2003 which, among other issues, focused on press freedom and the application of "hudud" (amputations) punishments.

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the UK's role in the Sudan peace process. [136162]

Mr. Mullin: We continue to offer the parties and mediators our full support in their efforts to reach a comprehensive peace agreement, which we hope will be signed early in the New Year. During the break in the formal talks, due to resume on 30 November, we are encouraging the parties to maintain contact. In that respect, the UK Special Representative visited southern Sudan last week and had a useful meeting with the leader of the Sudan People's Liberation Movement (SPLM).

We are supporting the peace process in other ways; by broadening our humanitarian assistance to include direct support for the peace process and for early rehabilitation and peace-building work; by providing funds and personnel to the Joint Monitoring Commission (JMC) in the Nuba Mountains and the Verification Monitoring Team in the south.

We are discussing what support we can provide immediately following a peace agreement so that the Sudanese people can see early benefits of peace. Assisting Sudan in its progress towards peace continues to be a high priority.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he has taken to help bring about a lasting peace in Sudan. [136436]

Mr. Mullin: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) today (UIN136162).

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the release of political prisoners in Khartoum and Dafur, Sudan. [136091]

Mr. Mullin: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 23 October 2003, Official Report, column 713W.

In Darfur, the release of prisoners affiliated to the Sudanese Liberation Movement was an encouraging sign in accordance with the Abeche cease-fire agreement. We continue to urge both parties to respect the cease-fire and support the political dialogue currently taking place in Abeche.

Printed indexes to Hansard

The fortnightly index is one of three printed indexes to Commons Hansard produced from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Indexing Service (POLIS). It contains references to material in the daily parts and weekly edition of Hansard. The other indexes produced are:

- The volume index to Hansard. This covers the same date range as the fortnightly index but references may be different as a result of changes to the text and column numbering in the bound volume.
- The sessional index to Hansard. This contains references to material in the bound volumes for a whole session.

Indexes on the Parliamentary website

Fortnightly, volume and sessional indexes covering material from the beginning of the 1999/2000 session will also appear on the Parliamentary website at http://www.parliament.uk with links to the full text of Hansard.

SCOPE

The indexes include entries covering:

- The content of all material recorded in Hansard, including debates, procedural motions and questions.
- The names of all Members contributing to the Parliamentary business recorded in Hansard.
- The names of some types of Parliamentary business whenever they occur in Hansard. These are 'Ministerial statements', 'Business statements', 'Opposition days' and 'Estimates days'.

ARRANGEMENT

- All headings are in one word-by-word alphabetical sequence, with Members' contribution entries distinguished from other entries by italics.
- Where a Member contributes to Parliamentary business and is the subject of Parliamentary business there are separate contribution and subject entries, the subject entry coming first.
- Entries beginning 'Mac' and 'Mc' are sorted in one sequence as 'Mac'.
- 'St', when abbreviated for Saint, is filed as 'Saint'.
- Numbers are filed as if spelt out, e.g. '10 Downing Street' as if 'Ten Downing Street'.

HEADINGS

Choice of headings

- Specificity—Entries summarise the overall content of a debate or question as specifically as the various POLIS thesauruses allow. For example, Education, Higher education, Universities or the name of a particular university is used depending on the breadth of the item.
- Name headings—Specific entries are included for the names of people, places, institutions, organisations, committees, programmes, initiatives, publications and legislation when these constitute the overall subject of an item.
- Organisations and subjects—Organisation entries are preferred for material about the general performance, administration and staffing of an organisation (for example, United Kingdom Passports Agency, Standards). Subject entries are preferred for what organisations do as part of their duties (for example, Passports, Fees and charges).

Geographical coverage

- Subject headings—Subject headings are assumed to refer to the whole of England, Great Britain or the United Kingdom unless otherwise stated.
- Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales—Material relating to the whole of Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales is indexed under these headings.
- Places within the UK—Material about specific towns, areas and institutions is entered under the name of the specific town, area or institution.
- Foreign countries—Most material relating to foreign countries is collected under the name of that country. Some additional material may be found under the names of—groups of countries, areas within countries, geographical features, place names associated with particular issues, politicians and heads of state, international bodies, and institutions and companies operating in those countries.
- EC/EU material—General material about the European Communities and European institutions as bodies is entered under 'European Communities' and 'EC institutions'. Organisational material about specific communities and institutions is entered under the name of the body, for example 'European Coal and Steel Community' or 'European Parliament'. Material about what the Communities and institutions are doing or propose to do is entered under various subject headings beginning 'EC' such as 'EC environmental policy'.

Parliamentary material and business

- Material about Parliament—This is indexed under 'Parliament', the names of the two Houses, the 'Palace of Westminster' and parts of the Parliamentary estate (such as 'Portcullis House').
- Committees—Material about committees is indexed under 'Committees', types of committee (such as 'Select committees') and the names of individual committees (such as 'Home Affairs Select Committee').
- Parliamentary proceedings/procedures—Material discussing these is indexed under the specific type of proceeding (such as 'Parliamentary questions' or 'Oral questions'), procedure (such as 'Calling of Members') or issue (such as 'Unparliamentary expressions').
- Legislation—Entries for Parliamentary proceedings on bills and statutory instruments are entered under their titles. Where the lead word of the bill or statutory instrument does not provide a full or clear indication of the subject there are additional subject entries when the bill or instrument is debated. For example, debates on the 'Child Support Pensions and Social Security Bill' have entries under 'Pensions' and 'Social security benefits' as well as under the title of the Bill.
- Members' names—These are given in the form by which the Member prefers to be known.
- Speaker and Chair—Contributions by the Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speaker and deputies'. Contributions from the chair during Committees of the Whole House are brought together under 'Chairman of Committee of the Whole House'. Significant rulings and statements (as opposed to routine comments) are indicated by the sub-heading 'Rulings and statements' in both cases.

Guidance on headings

- Cross references—'See' references indicate all the material has been entered under another heading. 'See also' references indicate that additional information may be found under another heading.
- Concept thesaurus—A copy of the subject thesaurus to POLIS, listing the concept entries used in the index, is available on the Parliamentary website. A hard copy is available from the Head of the POLIS Unit, House of Commons Library, 1 Derby Gate, London, SW1A 2DG (020 7219 6456).

REFERENCES

- References in the indexes are to columns rather than pages.
- References to debates, but not questions, are accompanied by the date of the item.
- There are separate sequences in Hansard for the material taken on the floor of the House, Westminster Hall sittings, written statements and written questions:
  - References consisting of a number by itself indicate material taken on the floor of the House.
  - References ending in 'wh' indicate Westminster Hall sittings.
  - References ending in 'ws' indicate written statements.
  - References ending in 'w' indicate written questions.
- References under all headings except the names of Members contributing to Parliamentary business and the titles of legislation are listed in one numerical sequence irrespective of whether the material is taken on the floor of the House, is discussed at a Westminster Hall sitting, is a written statement or is a written question.
- References under the names of Members contributing to Parliamentary business and the titles of legislation are listed in numerical sequence under the following headings:
  - Chamber Debates (which includes interventions and points of order as well as significant contributions to debates);
  - Westminster Hall Debates (covering all debates held as part of the Westminster Hall sittings);
  - Written Statements (consisting of ministerial statements issued in writing); and
  - Questions (which includes all written, oral and urgent questions).

ABBREVIATIONS

The following abbreviations are used in connection with the progress of bills:

- 1R = First reading
- 2R = Second reading
- Com = Committee stage
- Rep = Report stage
- 3R = Third reading
- res = resolution
- amendt(s) = amendment(s)
- * = matter taken formally without debate or division
- (HL) = Bill starting in House of Lords
- (SP) = Bill in Scottish Parliament.

Parliamentary background

- The Parliamentary website at http://www.parliament.uk contains a range of information about Parliament and the full text of some Parliamentary papers and proceedings including Hansard.
- Information on current Parliamentary business is provided in the House of Commons Information Office Weekly Information Bulletin, available on the website and from The Stationery Office (020 7873 8499).
- Further information on Parliamentary proceedings and procedures is available from the House of Commons Information Office (020 7219 4272).
